The Waco Democrat, of the 8th inst. has the following: Last night (Tuesday) about 1 o'clock, Dr. O'Bryan, and another gentleman from Searsville, in the upper edge of this county, reached here on express, bringing the sad intelligence that the Indians were in that vicinity depredating, and that six families had already been killed and several houses burned.

The Austin Gazette publishes the following letters: Passengers in the stage from Waco to-day informed us that a few hours before the stage left that place on yesterday morning a messenger came down from a neighborhood on the east side of the Brazos, bringing the appalling intelligence that on the evening before (Tuesday last, the 6th inst.) six families were murdered by the Indians in that neighborhood. One man stood in his field and saw a body of Indians go to his house where his own and his brother's families were. He was totally powerless to protect them, and they were murdered by the savages. Another body of thirteen Indians were seen on the same day, not far from the same neighborhood. How long are these things to last? Capt. John Smith, of Waco, immediately commenced raising a company at Waco, to pursue the Indians, and is doubtless now after them. One of my informants is Mr. Aycock, brother of Hon. T. J. Aycock, of Marlin. W. S. COLEMAN.

Burnett, March 5, 1860.—I stop the mail a moment to say that our county is literally full of Indians. Nine were seen yesterday four miles west of town; six yesterday four miles north of town, and fifteen this morning south of town. A negro belonging to John S. Proctor, Esq., was shot in the head with an arrow by one of the fifteen. I have just extracted the arrow; wound not dangerous. We think it probable another negro belonging to Mrs. Allen was shot through the arm by the Indians. He saved himself by getting to a house. There is a log cabin with the Indians—don't know whether they are white or an Indian. Our boys are all after them, with a fair prospect for a fight. The Indians are well mounted, and in full retreating—we think for the Morgan Creek encebrake. We have a mounted guard waiting there to receive them. We need more arms, more ammunition, more horses, and something to feed the horses. Shall we appeal to the citizens of Austin in vain? Give us your aid! Our Governor fails to do so. Remember, if Burnett falls, Austin comes next—therefore nothing to prevent the Indians from going down the Colorado to your city. We have by voluntary contribution raised ten or twelve hundred dollars to pay a few men to range till we can get our crops planted. Every man we can raise is out. Our condition is truly awful. T. MOORE.

The San Antonio Ledger has received a letter from Mr. R. W. Vaughan, of Cherokee Creek, San Saba county, dated the 3d inst., giving the details of a fight with a party of Indians on the evening of the same day. Mr. Vaughan went out early in the morning to look for a mule he had staked out on the prairie, but on arriving at the place found that it had been driven off with four horses, and saw a fresh Indian trail on the spot. He immediately returned to his house, and communicating the news was joined by five of his neighbors—Capt. John Williams, Isaac Williams, Matthew Kuykendall, Milton Hanner and Edmund Moore—with whom he went in pursuit of the Indians. After following the trail a considerable distance, they overtook them about sunset in a very rough and wild country. The Indians were eight in number, well armed with guns, bows and shields, and stood their ground manfully for about half an hour, by which time they had lost three of their number. The citizens charged upon them, when the Indians dismounted and ran into the timber, carrying with them their fallen comrades. The whites then took possession of their horses, and not being able to follow the Indians further on account of the approach of darkness, returned to their homes. None of the citizens, fortunately, were hurt in the fight, but Capt. Williams had his horse shot through the body with a rifle ball.

Mr. Rosbe Woods, living on Richland creek, San Saba county, was killed by Indians on the 27th of February, having been shot through five times.

FRANCE AND ROME.

IMPORTANT CIRCULAR OF THE FRENCH MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR.

The following circular has been addressed by the French Minister of the Interior to the Prefects of Departments:

PARIS, Feb. 17, 1860.

M. le Prefet—The Roman question has for some time past given a pretext for attempts at agitation, to which it is necessary to put an end. Forgetful of what the Emperor has done during the last ten years for the Holy Father, we hear of people talk of hostility and spoliation. Regardless of the profound peace the Church enjoys in France, of the respect with which the Government surrounds it, of the benevolence and liberality with which it is treated, people talk of persecution. Little pamphlets composed in this sense, with more or less of ability, and in a popular form, are by hundreds of thousands gratuitously distributed in the temples, in schools, in private houses. The pulpit itself is made, in certain places, the echoes of these calumnies and this excitement. Among the promoters of these manœuvres, many, doubtless are blind, though sincere. The spirit of party, however, gives them auxiliaries, and these are not amongst the least ardent. The population seems to be little moved by all this effervescence, which is in the eyes of sensible people more hurtful than useful to religion; and the Government had hoped that it would subside before its patience and its forbearance. Good citizens ask whether forbearance, by being prolonged uselessly, might not become weakness, and whether it be really prudent to allow excitement to be any longer spread among the faithful, merely because there exists a diplomatic question, which must assuredly will not be resolved by these imprudent but fruitless attempts to lead the public astray. The Government is of that opinion, and, without ceasing to be moderate and benevolent, it believes the moment has come to recall those who go beyond the law to the execution of the laws which it allows to remain dormant.

The sixth clause of the law of the 27th of July, 1849, prohibits the gratuitous or non-gratuitous distribution of any production or pamphlet when the authorization for it has not been given by the Prefect, and punishes with from one to six months imprisonment, and a fine of from 25 to 500 francs, those who act in contravention of the law.

I charge you, M. le Prefet, to take care that in your department this prohibition shall be henceforth respected. If, after a friendly warning, this distribution be persevered in, you will concert with the Procureur-General and the Procureur-Imperial, to whom his Excellency the Minister of Justice has given his instructions, that those who commit an infraction of the law, whoever they may be, shall have the law applied to them.

There is another class of cases, more delicate, but not less to be regretted, to which I also direct your attention. On many points of the territory, a zeal as unjust as it is unenlightened, has caused to be heard in the pulpit, either against the Government or against the Emperor himself, words which neither the bishops nor the counsel and kind warnings of the civil authority could prevent. Perfectly free with regard to all which concerns the faith, the pulpit, for the evident interests of religion as of public peace, ought to remain scrupulously apart from this external excitement; and there exists in our code an enactment which awards to such irregularities a correctional penalty. The Government does not think it opportune to prescribe its strict application at once. With adverting for the present to severities which acts of a graver kind only might incline it to employ, it reminds you that in virtue of the law of the 18th Germenal, year X., abuses of this nature may, after official information, be brought before the Council of State. In order to direct your notice to this matter, you will receive from the Minister of Worship detailed instructions.

In these circumstances, where the Administration must not depart from their habitual moderation, but according to what shall be strictly necessary to put a stop to the agitation of people's minds, I ask you to exercise at the same time moderation and firmness. Take care also, that no one shall misunderstand the nature and the extent of the measures which I recommend to you. The Emperor desires peace and liberty for religion. He desires that the most profound respect, the most benevolent protection shall be secured to religion and to its ministers; that the faithful shall have complete security for the maintenance and the liberty of their faith; but he, moreover, wishes his authority, which is the keystone of the arch under which are guarded the interests of religion as well as others, to be also respected; that those who should mock desire public tranquility should not labor to disturb it; and that, as one in France being above or beyond the laws of the country, those laws shall be by all faithfully observed.

Receive, M. le Prefet, the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

BILAULT, Minister of the Interior.

THE WAR WITH MEXICO.

The arrival of Miramon, with his army, before Vera Cruz, and the departure of General Morin from Havana, with a squadron bearing reinforcements and munitions for the belegauring forces, appear to bring to a crisis the long contest between the contending parties in the Mexican Republic. That is to say, if the contest be viewed as dependent for a final result on the issue of this campaign. The repulse of Miramon would probably be a fatal blow to his power. If, as the Havana papers state, his forces number eight thousand men, he has concentrated almost the whole of his effective strength in the besieging expedition. In the meantime the federal armies are gathering in his rear, preparing to intercept his communications, and even attempt the capture of the capital. If he succeed in taking Vera Cruz, he may find that he has only changed places with his adversaries; with a defeated army he could never hope to regain the capital. Already Queretaro and Zacatecas have fallen into the hands of the Liberals, and their forces are gathering for action in the great and populous States of the South. Such is the view taken by the Vera Cruz press.

The opinions and anticipations entertained on the other side come to us only through the collateral medium of the Havana newspapers. The Diario de la Marina, which reflects the sympathies and ideas of the Spanish authorities, is naturally favorable to Miramon, because it approves the policy of the party he represents, and hostile to Juarez, because Juarez is friendly to the United States. It therefore takes an encouraging view of Miramon's situation, and correspondingly depreciates the prospects of the Liberalists. It doubts the reported capture of Zacatecas and Queretaro, and ridicules the idea of any danger to the capital during the absence of Miramon before Vera Cruz. It refers to the failure of General Degollado's former attempt on Mexico, during the first Vera Cruz campaign, as evidence of the probable failure of the second effort of the same kind. Moreover, it says that the Liberals lack both the men and the means for a campaign against the capital; that they can expect nothing from the South, because General Calvo, now in possession of San Luis, holds them in check in that quarter; nor from the South, because there is no movement in that part of the country; nor from the West, because there Will, Mejia and Velez are triumphant and dominant. It is impossible to reconcile these conflicting views without more precise information, and this, unfortunately, is wanting.

The Diario denotes some remarks to a branch of the subject which may involve the most important consequences. The expedition of Gen. Marin, bearing succor for the Reactionary party, had already sailed from Havana, and its arrival on the Mexican coast was daily anticipated. The Vera Cruz papers, so it is stated by the Diario, were calling on the commander of the American squadron to undertake the defense of the port against this new and threatening danger. The Diario asserts that the American commander exhibited an inclination to comply with this demand; nevertheless, the American vessels were anchored off the Castle of San Juan, as if with the intention of defending Vera Cruz against any manifestation attack. The Havana correspondent contends that, under the laws of nations the American forces have no right to interfere; that the Miramon expedition is under the Mexican flag, and obeys the orders of a legitimate government recognized by all civilized nations, including even that of the United States.

Under present circumstances we do not see how we are to avoid interventhn, in some form or another; nor is it policy to attempt to avoid it. We may just as well seize the present opportunity, as to waste our time in waiting for another, and meanwhile suffer the intrusion into Mexican politics of foreign elements and foreign influences, which we may find it extremely difficult to expel.—Delta.

DOMESTIC.

Washington Affairs.

WASHINGTON, March 15.—The majority of the House Committee on Post-offices and Post-Roads are of opinion that a daily overland mail can be carried between St. Louis and other points on the Mississippi, and California, for $1,000,000 per annum.

Attorney-General Black is rapidly recovering, and was out yesterday.

The Treasury Department and the President are still in conflict upon the tariff question.

Secretary Cobb strenuously opposes any increase of duty on iron.

All the officers and employees in the Baltimore Custom-house who voted for Douglas delegates to Charleston, at the recent election in that city, have been summarily dismissed.

The Senate Post-office Committee has unanimously agreed to recommend to the Postmaster-General to advertise for contracts for the overland mail service, twice a week, between St. Paul and Olympia and Fort Vancouver; also, between St. Joseph and San Francisco; from St. Louis via Fort Comanche to San Diego and San Francisco, and from New Orleans via San Antonio and Fort Comanche, where it is to connect with the present overland route from St. Louis and Memphis. Each trip is to be performed in twenty days. The present mail service by steamers, via the Isthmuses, is to be abrogated.

The Navy Department has been advised by dispatches from New Orleans, received by the Star of the West, that Miramon's Government was taking measures to blockade Vera Cruz, and that ships leaving Havana under the Spanish flag would hoist the Mexican flag on reaching the vicinity of Vera Cruz.

March 16.—The Senate, in executive session, rejected the Nicaraguan treaty, the measure having failed to obtain votes from two-thirds of the members.

In the discussion on the Nicaraguan treaty in the Senate (executive session) yesterday, even the most remote encouragement to anything like filibusterism was strongly condemned by nearly all who spoke upon the subject.

The House Pacific Railroad Committee has adopted a resolution to the effect that it is the opinion of the Committee that communications and aid the Government should construct railroads and other internal improvements, but that it is the duty of the Government to aid such enterprises by liberal grants of land and money. A majority of the Committee are in favor of a central route.

The Secretary of State received the Minister from Honduras on the 13th inst. The interview was a long one, and it is believed that the negotiations which were broken off two years ago are about to be renewed.

The State Department has received favorable information from Mr. Collins, our Consul at the Amoor, who is now at St. Petersburg, concerning inducing the Russian Government to favor his project for a telegraph line from Moscow, in Russia, via the Amoor and California, to St. Louis, Mo.

Latest from California.

St. Louis, March 15.—The overland California mail, with dates from the Pacific coast to the 24th ult., has arrived at Molley's Station, the present terminus of the San Francisco telegraph line.

The business at San Francisco continues to be dull. The speculative movements during the past week were unimportant. A quantity of Muscovado and New Orleans Sugars, all in first hands, were taken up. New Orleans Sugar has sold at 12 cents per lb.; Crushed sold at 12¼ cents. There was no demand for Refined; no sales are reported. The Pork market closed quiet—Clear Pork was selling at $20 per bbl.; Mess at $17 per bbl.

The Black Republican State Convention, to elect delegates to the Chicago Convention, met on the 22d ult. After having elected delegates, a resolution was offered, which was carried by a majority of 17, directing them to vote for Wm. H. Seward for President of the United States.

The day appointed for the meeting of the California Democratic State Convention, to elect delegates to the Charleston Convention, was the 28th. It is generally believed throughout the State that the delegates elected will favor Gov. Latham as their first choice for President, in the contest of 1860.

The net earnings of the Sacramento Valley Railroad, which is twenty miles in length, for the past fifteen months are reckoned at $270,000.

A rich and valuable vein of silver ore has lately been discovered in Tuolumne county.

The accounts from the several mining districts continued to be favorable.

Accounts lately received from the quicksilver mines in Sonora and Nava counties were of a most cheering nature.

A line of stages has been established between Placerville and Carson Valley. The stages are now running regularly between these two points.

Three Days Later from California.

A bill had been introduced into the Legislature, proposing to the General Government, that for the sum of $50,000 per annum, the State of California will undertake to relieve the Federal Government of all responsibility regarding the Indians in the reservations of that State.

Resolutions were also offered and a bill presented, providing for the apprentice system.

A large number of prominent San Francisco merchants left that city on the 25th for the silver mines of Washoe county.

Accounts received from the southern portion of the Territory of Oregon to the 26th state that great excitement is prevailing in the vicinity of Jacksonville in consequence of the discoveries of rich quartz.

One of the mining companies had taken $175,000 from rocks weighing in all 1500 pounds. A rock has been found which yielded sixty pounds in gold.

A spaches of silver ore has lately been found in the mines of Washoe county, which is said to assay over $30,000 per ton.

One hundred and forty-six delegates elected to the California State Convention, favor the views of Latham—forty-four others, those of Gwin and Weller.

Execution of Stephens and Hazlitt.

CHARLESTOWN, March 16.—All the parties concerned in the late Harper's Ferry conspiracy have forfeited their lives. Stephens and Hazlett, the two last conspirators, were brought to the scaffold at noon to-day, and after a short prayer delivered by the minister, they were launched into eternity. Everything passed off quietly.

Another Nicaraguan Treaty.

WASHINGTON, March 19.—Negotiations for another treaty with Nicaragua are to be immediately commenced. The Administration were very much surprised at the rejection of the treaty recently concluded, by the Senate, as its provisions were very liberal, and gave the United States full protection and right of transit across the Isthmus.

Any attempt at a renewal of the treaty with Nicaragua for the transit route and other objects, it is admitted, will be useless. The Republican Senators are decidedly opposed to all intervention by our Government in the affairs of Nicaragua.

The Executive, it is understood, will attempt no more treaties with the Central American States for the purpose of protecting them from outside assaults; the negotiations with the Minister from Honduras are therefore suspended.

Prince of Wales's Visit to Canada.

It is stated that the Prince of Wales will sail for Canada at the latter end of May or early in June, in the line-of-battle ship Renown, 91 guns. The suite that will attend his Royal Highness has not yet been arranged, but everything connected with this visit will be conducted on a scale worthy of the mother country, and calculated to do honor to the American colonies.

Miramon's Navy Annihilated—City of Mexico Surrounded by Liberals—Great Excitement at Vera Cruz.

PASS-A-L'OUTRE, March 19.—The Mexican steamer Marquis de Habana has arrived inside the bar at this pass, as a U. S. prize, in charge of Lieut. Chapman, of the U. S. sloop-of-war Saratoga.

She left Vera Cruz on the 11th inst., but before reaching the mouth of the river, her engines broke down, and she was detained outside until the tow-boat Anglo-Saxon came to the rescue, and towed the prize inside the bar.

She brings full particulars of the capture of Commodore Marin's expedition, recently fitted out at Havana for the purpose of aiding Miramon in his operations at Vera Cruz and other Mexican ports on the Gulf.

Marin's two steamers were well supplied with provisions, ammunition, and such other supplies as Miramon's army stands most in need of.

The General Miramon, which arrived at the Southwest Pass this morning, in charge of Lieut. Minor, and the Marquis de Habana, were both taken off Anton Lizardo, on the morning of the 6th inst., by the U. S. sloop-of-war Saratoga.

The steamer Marquis de Habana has on board a portion of the prisoners who were taken; and the United States steamer Preble, which was to have left Vera Cruz on the 14th, is hourly expected with the remainder of the prisoners.

The officers in charge of the Marquis de Habana, report that the town of Alvarado, which had previously been dismantled by the Liberals, was in possession of Miramon's troops.

Miramon was actively besieging Vera Cruz, but with slight chance of success, now that his supplies and support from sea are cut off.

The Liberal forces in the interior had been rapidly concentrating on the city of Mexico, which is now entirely surrounded.

Much bad feeling existed among the French and Spanish fleets against the Americans, and great excitement prevailed generally at Vera Cruz, in consequence of what is considered by many the high handed action of Com. Turner in capturing these steamers.

Particulars of the Capture.

On the 5th inst., Miramon commenced the siege of Vera Cruz. On the 6th March appeared before the city with two steamers, and not showing his colors, Commander Turner, in the sloop of-war Saratoga, with a detachment from the Savannah and the Preble, on board the steamers Indianola and Wave, was ordered to proceed to the anchorage of the steamers, off Anton Lizards, and ascertain their character. Upon nearing the steamers one of them was seen to be moving off, when a shot was fired ahead of her to bring her to and the steamer Indianola was sent to overhaul her. The hail from the Indianola was answered by a shot from the General Miramon, accompanied by a volley of musketry, whereupon the Saratoga fired a broadside into the Miramon, and the action became general, resulting in the capture of the two Mexican Steamers, together with Marin their commander, and nearly all his men. Marin and most of the prisoners are on board the Preble. The action was brief but spirited. Fifteen or twenty men were killed, and as many more wounded.

Americans Driven from Mesilla.

The "Arizonian" has the following particulars of the recent difficulty between Americans and Mexicans at Mesilla:—A serious difficulty had arisen between the American and Mexican population, which had resulted in bloodshed and the driving from town of the American residents. The Judge of the Probate Court, A. Barila, a Mexican, elected at the late election, issued an order to shut up several houses belonging to Americans. G. H. Dary, Esq., Clerk of the Court, refused to carry it into effect. Each party arming themselves, retreated to their homes for defence. An American was shot at. Several persons fired at the Mexican, but unfortunately missed him, killing a woman. A Mexican again fired at an American, but was immediately shot down. Three others were killed. The Marshal sent to Fort Fillmore for aid. Before the troops arrived the Americans were obliged to leave town. The troops are now in Mesilla, but not an American resident remains.

Interesting From El Paso.

The Tucson Arizonian, of the 18th inst., has a letter dated El Paso, Feb. 22, from which we extract the annexed interesting intelligence:

Many Mexicans of distinction and wealth have arrived, determined to reside here. They have been driven from the State of Chihuahua, the Rio Grande divides that State and Texas. These Mexicans belong to the Liberal party. One gentleman, by name Bordero, formerly Governor of Chihuahua, (a millionaire) upon his arrival declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States. Judge Crosby, of the District Court, being in El Paso, Caltero at once took out his declaration papers. An English gentleman, by name Potts, who has resided in different parts of Mexico for the last twenty years, (Church party,) now in power in Chihuahua, would not make any arrangement to allow him to remain in the country. He has a charter from the authorities, upon liberal conditions, to construct a railroad through the State—to connect with the great Pacific Railroad project.

Rumor reached us last night that the Tacubyans and Liberalists had fought a grand battle a few days since, near or at the city of Chihuahua, and that the Liberals got worsted and had a general killed in the engagement. Some allowance must be made for these reported great battles, at least fought among themselves.

Lieut. Jackson, of Fort Bliss, received dispatches by last San Antonio mail, from Washington City, which he forwarded by express to Santa Fe.

These dispatches, rumor also says, make the inquiry of the Quartermasters's Department, as to the capacity of maintaining and provisioning a certain number of troops. "Coming events cast their shadows before."

FOREIGN.

The French Treaty Sustained by the British House of Commons.

Mr. Disraeli's motion, in the House of Commons, for the consideration of the French treaty in advance of the budget, created a warm debate.

The result of the vote was as follows: For the motion 230, against it 283; majority for the Government 53. This considerably guarantees that the treaty will be ratified.

The London journals, by the North American, contain detailed accounts of a spirited debate in the British Parliament on the annexation of Savoy and Nice to France.

In the House of Commons, Mr. Kinglake moved that the Minister of Foreign Affairs be requested to lay before them the correspondence which had passed between the English, French and Sardinian Governments, in relation to the annexation of Savoy and Nice to France.

Lord, in seconding the motion, took occasion to denounce in strong terms the policy and ambitious designs of the Emperor Napoleon.

Lord John Russell responded that he would immediately produce the papers, but at the same time he deprecated the discussion of the subject at the present time.

The motion was agreed to by a large majority.

Speech of Napoleon.

The most important political intelligence by the Circassian is the programme of the French Emperor, as indicated in his late speech to the Legislative body which met at Paris on 1st last.

Among other things, the Emperor declared that Tuscany was to be created into a separate kingdom, while Parma and Modena would be allowed to annex themselves to Piedmont.

His remarks upon the annexation of Savoy to France relieve all doubt as to his policy on that point.

He plainly intimated that France wanted Savoy for the security of her frontier, and expressed a hope that the great powers would see the necessity for taking this step.

Spanish Defeated in Morocco.

Advices from Morocco, via Madrid, state that a battallion of the Spanish troops had been surprised by a largely superior force of Moorish troops, and were defeated with heavy loss.

The engagement took place near the fortress of Melilla. The Spanish loss was reported at 200 soldiers and fifty officers killed besides a large number wounded.

The Spanish Government had offered terms of peace to Morocco, but the Spanish demands are so exorbitant that they cannot be accepted.

Austria and the Annexation of Savoy—Further Compulsion in Italy.

Advices received from Vienna state that the government of Austria will make no steps to oppose the annexation of Savoy to France.

The Papal Government has prohibited the commercial intercourse which has been existing between Ancona and the Romagna. The merchants are greatly vexed at this measure, and are using their best efforts to restore commerce between these two points.

Great agitation continues to predominate in the Marches, the owners of real estate are refusing to pay the tax imposed upon them. In Italy, thousands of citizens are daily signing the address to the great European powers in favor of the annexation of Savoy to France.

The Austrian army in the Papal States is rapidly increasing. Large numbers of soldiers continue to arrive daily.

It is currently reported that the citizens of Nice received the proposition of the Emperor Napoleon, relative to the annexation of their territory to France, with great enthusiasm.

Victor Emanuel has agreed to the solution proposed by France in reference to the Romagna.

Buoncampagne has resigned his position as Governor General.

Garibaldi Suing for a Divorce.

A correspondent of the Manchester Guardian says that Garibaldi, the celebrated Italian leader, has already separated from his wife.

General Intelligence.

The French Ministerial circulars demand obedience to the laws from the clergy on the Roman question.

Prussia and Russia, it was reported, had joined in a proposal for a conference of the five great powers.

Hanover had consented to submit the question of the State dues to a general conference.

A Hong Kong letter says that the claims of American citizens for losses sustained at Canton, in the year 1856, are in a half way of liquidation. A dividend is to be paid forthwith, and the remainder is guaranteed.

Rumors were current of an address, attributed to Victor Emanuel himself, calling on Sicily for insurrection.

A congregation held at the Vatican had decided that the King of Sardinia should not be excommunicated, whatever political events might supervene.

Lord John Russell had brought forward the Ministerial Reform Bill in the House of Commons, which was attracting much attention. It extends the elective franchise to £10 for county occupancies, and £6 for borough occupancies.

It is authoritatively stated that the French Government has resolved to reduce the army to 150,000 men.

It is reported that Prince Lucien Bonaparte now has the best chance of being made King of Tuscany.

It is again stated that the Pope threatens to excommunicate King Victor Emanuel.

The English minister at Turin condemns the annexation of Savoy with France, and is using all his influence with the Sardinian Government to prevent it.

It is reported that the Pope has signified his willingness to make some concessions to the demands of France.

The title of Knight has been conferred on Capt. M'Clintock.

The telegraph line connecting the Isthmus of Suez with India has been completed, and is now in working order between Calcutta and Alexandria.

The Atlantic Telegraph Company have secured subscriptions to their stock to the amount of £70,000, for the purpose of supplying the necessary additional cable that will be required to repair the old one, which is to be taken up and examined.

The total amount expended thus far in the construction and laying of the Atlantic cable is £166,558.

Arrests, imprisonments, and transportation, continue unabated in Venetia, and a new and more economical mode of punishment has now been devised.

The Governor of Venetia has issued a circular declaring that all persons host le in opinion to the Austrian Government will be compelled to serve in the militia.

The whole Spanish press are violently attacking England for the course the latter has adopted towards the Pope, as well as the Morocco question.

Later advices from Shanghai state that a Dutch war-steamer had been boarded and captured by pirates in the Chinese Sea. The pirates killed seven officers and forty men, and after robbing the vessel of everything valuable, run her ashore.

A telegram from Shanghai states that advices had been received from Japan to the effect that the ports of Swatow and Kiawan had been opened to foreign trade.

The check upon business, growing out of the recent difficulties, continued, and affairs were generally unchanged, but it was hoped that the firm attitude assumed by the American and British Consuls would soon reassure the Japanese Government.

The steamer Louis, bound from Marseilles to some other point in the Mediterranean, foundered at sea, and-is a total loss. A large number of passengers were on board, fifty of whom were drowned.

The Austrian Government has issued a decree suppressing the circulation of the London Times in any portion of the Empire, owing to its course on the Italian question.

Mr. Thouvenel, the French Foreign Minister, in a dispatch in reply to Count Rechberg, says that France will consent to a less radical combination than that proposed for the disincumbrement of the States of the Church, provided the principle of strict non-interference be maintained on the part of Austria.

The Russian Ambassador at Turin had cautioned Count Cavour to be careful about the annexation of Central Italy to Piedmont, intimating that Russia might interpose grave objections.

It is reported that in consequence of, and in accordance with the advice of France, all projects with reference to Central Italy will be abandoned by the Sardinian Government for the present.

The Spanish squadron had bombarded the Morocco ports of Lavacae and Cancella. It is also reported in Madrid that the town of Robbatt has been bombarded.

MARRIAGES.

"It is not good for man to be alone."

At the residence of the Bride's father, on Sunday morning, the 19th of February, by the Rev. A. W. Moore, Mr. WILLIAM J. CHASEY, of Dallas county, Ala., to Miss MARTHA A. E. JONES, of Chambers county, Ala.

February 9th, at the residence of Joshua Willis, by Rev. W. C. Moreland, Mr. WILLIAM M. MALONE to Miss SENORA WILLIS, all of Claiborne Parish, La.

In Gretna, La., on the 15th inst., by Rev. James D. Parker, Mr. ISAAC W. SCHAEFE and Mrs. MARTHA EGLESTON.

ADVERTISING.—By advertising, this paper was largely supported in the days of its weakness. By advertising it is to be made strong enough to enlarge. Many of our friends do us injustice here. We sometimes receive a long advertisement of a Church interest, expected to be inserted gratis, when, for the same space, we are getting from other people $250 a year. This is a fact. Our advertising columns are worth to us from $600 to $1000 a year.

RECEI

Poetry.

THE HARPY EAGLE.

BY SALLIE M. WHITE.

Why should he bear
A sullen spirit in his rough, bold breast,
When far above old Chimborazo's crest
He soars in chilling air?

Above the war
Of storms that clash on Andes' rocky steeps,
His fearless pinion the proud region sweeps
Upwards and on, afar.

He sees the sun
Rock weary on Pacific's reddened breast,
And fleets of clouds sail down the rosy west,
When the long day is done.

He could bathe in light
Of stars that brighten as the years advance,
That stand like marshalled hosts with spear and lance
Upon the plains of night.

But, like a demon driven
From mountain temples where the air kings reign,
To dark, mysterious haunts he comes again—
Like Miriler from Heaven—

Where forests span
O'er shadows twilight, deep as noon of day,
He broods in gloom, nor fears that here will stray
The foot of mortal man.

THE VINDICATION.

Persons represented—Father, Mother, Kate, and little Fred.

SCENE: Breakfast table—Di. in attendance.

Di. (in an under tone)—Miss Katie, Miss Katie! you makes a mistake.

Fred.—Do look at sister Katie, mother; instead of sending me my cup of coffee, she is sending me the coffee pot, and I saw her just now pour nearly half the cream into the sugar bowl.

Mother—Why, Kate, what in the world is the matter—are you in love?

Kate—Nu, indeed, not I.

Father—Looks suspicious—strong symptoms.

Kate—I was only thinking—that is, I have some idea—of—writing a little sketch for the Advocate, and just then I was thinking what I should say.

Mother—Well, the child certainly is losing her senses.

Kate—Not so much of a child, mother; you know I shall be seventeen years old next February.

Mother—And considering that this is somewhere about the first of March, the time must appear to you very near at hand.

Kate—Well, I was going to say, if I expect ever to shine in the literary world, it is high time I was making some kind of a commencement.

Mother—Bless my heart! May I presume to inquire how long you have aspired to literary fame?

Kate—I have had a desire to try and do my duty to my country ever since I read the piece in the Advocate entitled, "Southern Intellectual Sin," and that desire has been strengthened lately by hearing a Northern lady say that, in her opinion, the Southern ladies lacked intellect.

Mother—I suppose, then, you are determined to show her that at least one of them has a small sprinkling of intellect, and who knows? perhaps your bright ideas and brilliant wit may reflect a glory upon all of them.

Kate—The Southern ladies need no reflected light; they shine by a light of their own. Their refined and graceful manners more than counterbalance the all-knowingness and independence of the Northern ladies.

Fred.—Counterbalance; that's the word sister Kate was trying to think of when she sent me the coffee-pot.

Father—Literary ladies never make good housekeepers, Fred.

Kate—But what is the reason, mother, that Southern ladies so seldom write for magazines and newspapers?

Mother—There are good reasons, Kate. But what does the editor of the Advocate say? I read the piece when it made its first appearance, but don't recollect much about it now.

Kate—He calls upon wealthy planters, their wives, sons and daughters, to enrich, with their well-stored brains and ready pens, the columns of Southern magazines and newspapers, and help to shape the character and destiny of the South.

Mother—He can call spirits from the vasty deep; but will they come when he calls them? Authors are generally poor, and dependent on their writings for a livelihood; the wealthy have no such stimulus; they already enjoy wealth and position in society, and are very well satisfied with things as they are.—It is a very small proportion of the rich, in any country, that make an effort to toll up the hill of literary fame.

Kate—And the ladies, mother?

Mother—The ladies of the South, generally, marry very early in life, and after marriage, the care of children, and the oversight of servants, occupy their time, and I believe they think their duty to their family more imperative than their duty to their country.

Father—And they are half right, too.

Mother—Then there are ladies who have both leisure and ability to write, who question whether it is consistent with the retiring delicacy of the female character to seek notoriety in any way. Milton says:

"Nothing lovelier can be found
In woman than to study household good,
And good works in her husband to promote."

Your favorite, Washington Irving, has this passage: "The sweetest days of summer are those in which the sun, partly hid behind the light clouds, warms without dazzling; and the sweetest women are those who never shine, except to those they love."

Kate—Dear old man! I have a great mind to give up all my aspirations for a brilliant literary career.

Mother—Well, you need not decide upon it yet; there are some excellent women who know not only how to write well, but how to fulfill well womanly duties.

Kate—Well, mother, suppose I send this conversation to the editor of the Advocate, and call it an apology for the ladies of the South.

Mother—Not an apology, a vindication.

Kate—Oh, yes, vindication, that's the word.

Father—Well, really, Kate, since you are getting old enough to help your mother talk, I am afraid I shall forget the sound of my own voice.

KATE ASHTON.

Woodlawn, La., March, 1860.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

Mary Brame.

MARY BRAME, the daughter of Walter and Jemima Brame, was born in Caroline county, Va., in 1785. In her second year she was deprived of her hearing by a violent attack of putrid sore throat, which also seriously injured the organs of speech; and the little one thus early became deaf and partially dumb.

Her perception, naturally quick and clear, enabled her to apprehend readily; she gained ideas and information with wonderful facility. Of remarkable personal beauty, and of a loving and grateful nature, she was an attractive child to all, and her misfortunes only made her the dearer to the members of her own family. At this day there were no institutions for the instruction of the deaf-mute, and little Mary grew up without a knowledge of letters. Such facts and principles as could be imparted to her by the aid of the very limited means that were available to her friends, were carefully communicated. The intelligent assiduity of one sister especially, did much to develop and cultivate her faculties.

This sister, the next younger to Mary, was awakened and converted in her girlhood, and was the first of her family to become a Methodist. The blessing which Elizabeth had found was too full of peace and joy to be enjoyed alone; and it was with her a delightful duty to communicate to her mute sister the knowledge of the forgiveness of sins through a Savior, even Jesus. Her lessons, simple, graphic, clear, were sanctified and impressed on the heart of the pupil and awakened earnest enquiry. She too saw herself to be an offender against a Holy Law, and trembled under its solemn penalties; she felt her heart to be far from God and unholy in His sight; she felt her need of Jesus, the Savior, the Advocate, and out of the depths of a speechless and despairing agony, she emerged after many days, to tell by her impassioned gestures and most expressive signs, and in her imperfect but picturesque language, that "she loved God; that Jesus saved her; that God was angry with her no more; that she loved the great God; that her heart was lad no more, and that she loved every body."

In this child-like and happy faith and trust, she lived from that hour, and in the light of that peace she walked. In 1807 she professed to find peace and joy in believing; and we who have known her daily life for the most of the last fifty years, know that she partook of the spirit of Christ. Her character was an example and an admonition. Always employed, always cheerful; happy and ready to serve her friends in even the humblest offices, she was disinterested in that service to a degree more than human, for it was of God's grace and not of nature.

Her habit of private devotion was sacredly observed. She used to mingle in the public worship of God though she heard nothing; her piety was kindled by the fervor of the preacher and the devout emotion of the children of God. But best of all, she loved the closet where the Spirit helped her infirmities, and whence she could send her supplications, earnest and confiding to the most Holy Place. Her individual trials were made the subject of her petitions, as she has often told the writer; and as her thanksgiving for special mercies were never omitted. It needs no articulate language to reach the ear of Him to whom all hearts are open and all desires known.

This gentle and beneficent life was closed at the ripe age of Seventy-six. A touch of paralysis, early in the summer of 1859 warned her that the Master was calling her. In September she was stricken down helpless, but so rallied as to enjoy the pleasant days of autumn with fervent thankfulness. She truly loved Nature—in the garden, in the forest, or in the sky, always referring all to God, the Maker.

Her peace and resignation, her cheerfulness and gratitude, during all the weeks of seclusion from her accustomed and much loved occupations, was wonderful and beautiful. Her only impatience was that she had a desire to depart—but as she often said, she did not murmur. She often and anxiously inquired when she might expect her release. She wanted "to go home," "wanted to see the great God."

Thus she waited, and her release came on the 25th of January, 1860; when with little suffering and in the full possession of all her faculties, she sweetly fell asleep in Jesus. To her it was a blessed and glorious awakening—to hear the harmony of heaven; to utter the repressed praises of a lifetime. To us there is the missing of a dear familiar presence—the quiet step, the loving service, and all her daily life of cheerfulness and thankfulness; to us the loneliness of the deserted chamber and the vacant chair.

The children whom she loved and caressed in their babyhood, and whose sports she loved to watch, gathered about her and cheered her hours of weariness; kind friends, dearly loved, and often thanked by her, rendered life's last sad offices, and the strong arms of those whom she had once dandled on her knee, bore her tenderly to her last resting place beside her beloved sister, Mrs. Elizabeth Burruss, in the family grave yard of Hon Edward McGehee, of Wilkinson county, Miss.

But there can be no deep grief in such a death as hers. As a ripe shock she was gathered into the garner of God. We rejoice to know that she is with the dear Savior whom she loved, and with the "Great God" whom she so reverently worshipped, and that her voiceless prayer is now turned into perfect and adoring praise.

Thus lived and died "Aunt Polly," known as such to hundreds who will think kindly and happily of her when they read this.

M. B. M.

Mrs Eleanor M. Reed.

MRS. ELEANOR M. REED was born in Baton Rouge, La., September 11th, 1818. When six years old her parents moved to New Orleans, where she lived many years. When about nineteen years of age she was united in marriage with Lewis A. Reed, April 6th, 1837. She experienced a change of heart, March 8th, 1841. The same day she joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, and at the communion table sealed her covenant vows, which she kept sacred and inviolate through life. Thet was a memorable day to her, it was the beginning of another life—the life of faith. She was the subject of early religious impressions; the good seed thus early sown on her susceptive nature by the Spirit of God, fostered by the prayers and counsel of a pious aunt, did not lie dormant through a perpetual winter; while yet in the spring-tide of life it germinated, and produced the fruit of the Spirit—"love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness." All these graces combined in her character made her truly amiable. Her modest, quiet spirit sought to conceal rather than display her graces, but their influence, like the fragrance of the embowered garden, was diffusive, and was recognized by all who knew her best. She had a sympathetic nature; she would rejoice with the happy and weep with the sorrowful. Her soothing voice and kind attention in the chamber of the sick, gave her the attractions of a gracious angel in their view.

She set a high estimate upon the ordinances of the Church. "Her sweet communion, solemn vows, her hymns of prayer and praise," were the feasts of her soul. She was an efficient teacher in the Sabbath school; long will the children of Waterproof remember her pious instruction. It was a sad privation when affliction kept her from preaching, class-meeting, or the social prayer-meeting. From the time of her conversion, she read her Bible through consecutively every year. She made many sacrifices to aid her devoted husband that he might serve the church efficiently in easy circumstances. Engaged in a profitable business, surrounded with domestic comfort, she resigned much of it, and cheerfully subjected herself to the privations consequent on an itinerant life. To a friend she said, "I can never forget the time when my husband consecrated himself, his family, and all his interest, to God, and resolved to obey his call to preach the gospel. I resolved, too, to give him all the encouragement and aid I could, by relieving him of domestic cares;" and she did faithfully perform her vow. Her last sickness was protracted and severe. After her confinement in November, the disease—"dropsy of the heart"—became fixed. She gradually grew worse, till death terminated her suffering March 1st, 1860. The evening before her death the writer visited her, when he inquired if she was still resigned to the will of God? She said, "Yes, though I walk through the valley and shadow of death I fear no evil, for I know that God is with me." Her pain during the night became acute, but she was happy, even in rapture. As beams of celestial light flashed through the rifting clouds, she exclaimed, "I shall see," referring to the text, "We shall be like him for we shall see him as he is." Her joy was full of glory. She called her husband, bade him farewell, thanked him for his kindness to her through their united life, begged him to never locate, but continue to preach Jesus, to live faithful and meet her in heaven. She called all her children and blessed and charged them as a dying mother only could, then took her babe, embraced and blessed it, then gave it to her husband and said, "raise it for God, my dear, that I may receive it in the better home." After thanking her friends and earnestly praying for all, the final hour came; the angel convoy was in waiting; the intermediate shadows began to fade away; the valley that in the distance seemed dark, opened in the daylight of heaven; the passage that in the distance seemed lonely, was a triumphal procession.

"O, had we seen thee when the vail withdrew,
And thy fond spirit from its prison flew,
What floods of glory burst upon thy sight,
What songs melodious ring the ether bright,
As heavenly spirits led thee through the sky,
'Midst blazing suns and flaming worlds on high;
While joyful friends thronged thick the heavenly way,
And hailed thee in the bright abodes of day;
Then joining in their songs of triumph high,
The loud hosannas echoed through the sky.

J. D. ADAMS.

Waterproof, La., March 9th, 1860.

Children's Column.

BIBLE PICTURES.—NO. V. BY THE EDITOR.

Creation of the Living Things.

Our last BIBLE PICTURE was a description of the "creation of all the green things"—the grass and the vegetables, the shrubs and the flowers, and the trees, and the vines, and the fruits. But, although the earth had been dried, or drained, by rolling the waters off into the ocean, and though it had been covered with a beautiful carpet of green, there was yet no living thing upon it to enjoy these things. There were no beasts, no birds, no fishes. It was a wide and beautiful world, but it was silent as midnight. If you had been on it then, you would have felt awfully lonely. Any person who has been out upon the wide, green, and flowery prairies of Texas, where there are no inhabitants or cattle in sight, can form some idea of how the world looked at this time. There stood the trees, but not a bird sung in their branches. There spread out the fields of green, waving grass; but no cow, nor horse, nor other animal was there to crop it. The flowers lifted up their heads, and wafted "their sweetness upon the desert air," but there were no busy bees to enjoy the honeyed sweets. The broad heaven and the soft yiel ing atmosphere spread out like a great upper ocean; but not the wing of a single fowl was seen cleaving its blue depths. There stood the grand mountains, lifting their snowy tops up into the lonely skies; but not a single wild goat nor other animal climbed their crags, or hid in their caverns.

But at last God, out of the ground formed every beast of the field and every fowl of the air.

"A HOME FOR MY MOTHER."

Business called me to the United States Land Office. While there, a lad, apparently sixteen or seventeen years of age, came in and presented a certificate of forty acres of land. I was struck with the countenance, and general appearance of the lad, and inquired of him for whom he was purchasing the land. The reply was:

"For myself, sir."

I then inquired where he got the money! He answered, "I earned it." Feeling then an increased desire to know something more about the lad, I asked him whether he had any parents, and where they lived. At the question, he took a seat and gave the following narrative:

"I am from New York State. I have living, a father, mother, and five brothers and sisters. I am the oldest child. Father is a drinking man, and often returns from his day's work drunk, and not a penny in his pocket. Finding father would not abstain from liquor, I resolved to make an effort, in some way, to relieve mother, sisters and brothers from want. After revolving things over in my mind, and consulting with mother, I got all the information I could about the far West, and started from home for Wisconsin, with ten shillings in my pocket. I left home on foot. After spending my ten shillings, I worked my way to Wisconsin, where I got an ax, and setting to work, cleared land, earned money, saved it until I gathered fifty dollars, and with it now pay for forty acres of land."

"Well, my good lad" (for by this time I became interested in him), "what are you going to do with the land?"

"I will work on it, raise myself a log-house, and when prepared, will invite father and mother, brothers and sisters, to come and enjoy this home. The land I desire for my mother which will secure her from want in her declining years."

"And what will you do with your father," said I, "if he continues to drink ardent spirits to excess?"

"Oh, sir, when we get him on the farm, he will feel at home; he will be happy at home; and become a happy man."

I then replied—"Young man, those being your principles so young, I recommend you to improve upon them, and the blessing of God will attend you."

By this time the receiver handed him his duplicate receipt for his forty acres of land. Rising from his seat on leaving the office, he said:

"At last I have a home for my mother."

FRANKLIN'S BIRTHDAY.—On the evening of the 17th Feb., at Boston, the anniversary of the birthday of Benjamin Franklin was celebrated by the Franklin Typographical Society. The Hon. Edward Everett delivered an oration on the early life of that distinguished printer, prefacing his remarks with a most beautiful and feeling allusion to the catastrophe at Lawrence, and also appropriately eulogizing the talents and writings of the late eminent historian, Lord Macauley.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

Of scarlet fever, on Tuesday, Feb. 28th, at 2 P. M., HATTIE, second daughter of W. A. Woods and Charlotte Balfour Delap, aged 17 years.

The deceased was a member of the Girls High School, Fourth District. The following is a tribute from her classmates:

Each day some pearl drops from the jeweled thread of friendship; some lyre to which we have been wont to listen, is hushed for ever. Each day a flower is plucked from some sunny home—a breach is made in a happy circle. In vain we endeavor to convince ourselves that that joyous young creature, who so lately moved in our midst, is now slumbering in the "silent city of the dead." Each morning we await her accustomed smile and cheerful welcome; but as day succeeds day, and she comes not, our hearts feel the truth, that "Death has claimed her for his own." Sweet Hattie! Even now, while we pen this simple tribute to her memory, her fairy form rises before us, her eyes sparkling with

"A beauty forever unchangingly bright,
Like the long sunny lapse of a summer day's light."

She is gone! and with heavy hearts we turn to the duties in which she was so faithful a sharer. If we, then, who are but schoolmates, so mourn the loved and lost, what must be the anguish of that home circle from which she has been so suddenly snatched? It has been truthfully said that it is a painful thing that Love and Death should dwell in the same world. But since such is the dire decree, we can but bow in submission, and point the sorrowing parents to the "land where grief is never known, neither sickness nor death."

Gently!
She is sleeping—
She has breathed her last.
Gently!
While you're weeping,
She to Heaven has passed.

The above notice was written by the schoolmates of the deceased. I visited her during her illness, prayed with her in her last hours, baptized her and received her into the Church. Her father and sisters were baptized at the same time, and united with the Church. May God bless the bereaved ones, keep them faithful, and bring them together in Heaven at last.

L. PARKER.

MRS. THIRZA SAUNDERS, daughter of Rev. Thos. Arundel, died 8th of March, at the residence of her son, Col. Wm. A. Saunders, Marion, Ala., in the 67th year of her age.

She was born in Franklin Co., North Carolina, 4th Sept. 1793, piously educated, at 12 years of age she attached herself to the M. E. Church. For about 54 years she lived a consistent and useful Christian. Her zeal knew no abatement; and while the praises of God dwelt upon her lips, her hands delighted to minister to the wants of suffering humanity. In the Spring of 1822 she emigrated to Alabama, where her house was the home of the preachers; and pleasant to the itinerant were the seasons spent in that family circle. She was a dutiful wife, a most affectionate mother, and a kind and indulgent mistress. For 36 years it was my privilege to mingle frequently in the family, and experience those kind attentions which spontaneously flow from an affectionate and pious heart. For many years she suffered from severe attacks of disease, which she bore with Christian resignation. Some two or three years since she was attacked with neuralgia which, settling in her eyes, destroyed her sight, nor did she enjoy an hour of exemption from pain up to the hour of her death. I often visited her during her affliction, and in the midst of severe sufferings, always found her enjoying inward peace, with her mind firmly stayed on God by unshaken trust in his promises. When she found her end drawing nigh, it was her earnest prayer to die without struggling; which prayer was fully answered; for when the hour came she lay quite composed, and expired without a groan. Though her loss be felt by a large circle of friends, yet none sorrow as those without hope, all believing she has entered into rest, and many indulging the hope to meet her in that better world. Doubtless her entrance to Heaven was hailed by a father and a brother who died in the ministry, and soon that company will be enlarged by another brother, who has been a preacher sixty-four years.

"Oh, what a mighty change
Shall Jesus' sufferers know,
While o'er the happy plains they range,
Incapable of woe.

LEVERT.

Southern Christian Advocate please copy.

MRS. ELIZABETH B. HOBBS, was born January 5th, 1829, and died February the 17th, 1860. In the fall of 1845, under the ministry of the sainted Level, she was converted, and joined the Methodist Church, in which she lived and died. During her sickness she lamented the want of a sanctified heart. She had lived, however, after the order of the gospel of the present age—exemplary and consistent—but during her sickness she told me that she had neglected the life of a deep and entire devotion to the service of God. As her pastor I visited her, and with others, prayed to God to forgive the folly of a partial devotion, and to sustain her in the conflict with death; it was her comfort, and the rejoicing of surviving friends to see her calm. Thus she passed away safely, we believe, to her heaven-home. But to the surviving friends, and to the Church of God, who mourn her loss, I would say, let the providence of that death utter its lesson of wisdom to all. The universal testimony of a large circle of friends and acquaintances, give assurance that in her bosom beat the impulses of a warm and noble heart. The wife, the mother, the sister, the friend, the mistress is gone. A husband weeps in bereavement, and eight children in orphanage. But the wife, mother, sister, friend and mistress lives, and there the vision of earthly gladness, undimmed by sorrow, and relumed by the smile of Jesus, may again be realised "through the belief of the truth and the sanctification of the Spirit."

WHITFIELD HARRINGTON.

On the 23d of February, 1860, LIZZY, the daughter of Isabella and the Rev. W. Harrington, of the Mississippi Conference, died in Jackson, Miss, aged two years and five months. The beautiful child we have lost, God adopts as his own for ever. Amen and amen.

MRS. HENRIETTA L. CROSS, daughter of Robert and Elizabeth Bowdon, and wife of Dr. Z. E. W. Cross, departed this life January 8th, 1860, at the residence of Rev. N. M. Skipworth, Jackson parish, La. She was born in Shelby county, Alabama, Oct. 20th, 1837. When but a child she was left an orphan. About the age of thirteen she professed faith in Christ, at a Methodist Camp-meeting, and joined the M. E. Church, South. Soon after she left home to go to school, and being inexperienced, failed to present herself to be received in full membership, and she retrograded in spiritual enjoyment. In 1858 she emigrated with her husband to La. Feeling unsettled she deferred attaching herself to the Church; still, however, determined to do so as soon as circumstances, in her judgment, would justify. But in the meantime she fell destroyer, consumption, selected her for his victim. She suffered intensely, yet bore her affliction with patience and fortitude. She was greatly concerned about her spiritual condition, and prayed fervently for an evidence of her full acceptance with God her Savior. A short time before her death the blessed answer came, the Heavenly messenger entered and took possession of her soul. She exhorted her husband to repent and meet her in heaven. She has left an affectionate husband and two children, with many friends to mourn her loss.

J. R. NEELIE.

MRS. NANCY S. FOXWORTH, wife of Samuel G. Foxworth, of Marion county, Mississippi, departed this life Feb. 10th, 1860, after an illness of about ten days. She was born Jan. 22d, 1810. embraced religion and became a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, when about nineteen, at a camp-meeting at Chrystal Springs, Mississippi, and was a bright and shining light in the Church. She was the mother of nine sons, seven of whom survive to mourn the loss of an affectionate Christian mother. Only five days after the funeral I was called upon to attend the funeral of her husband (Samuel G. Foxworth), who was born Jan. 29th, 1808, died Feb. 16th, 1860. May the Lord make this afflictive dispensation of his providence a blessing to all their surviving relatives. N. B. YOUNG.

Columbia, Miss., March 5th, 1860.

Died in the vicinity of De Soto parish, La., 18th Feb. 1860, MRS. SARAH ANN HEDDING, wife of James T. Hedding, and daughter of Josiah Dickson, of Hinds county, Ms. in the thirty-second year of her age.

She joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1858. She was truly conscientious in all her deportment, yet always a doubting Christian; still we have encouraging hope that her spirit is with God. There are but few occasions in which death makes more remorseless havoc than in the present. Nor did his ravages cease here. The grave had scarcely closed over the daughter-in-law ere another was opened alongside for the mother-in-law. It is to be hoped that their spirits are re-united.

H. J. HAMILTON.

SHOE STORE.—E. C. CATE & CO., 18 & 19 CAMP-ST. Equal House No. 18 camp street, under City Hotel.

In the Department of FAMILY SHOES—

We have ladies', Misses' and Children's Boots, Brogans, Gaiters, &c., in every variety, both for dry and wet seasons; and Gentlemen's, Boys' and Youths' light and heavy work, adapted to any season and in every style.

All of which goods have been manufactured under our own supervision, of such materials and in such manner as a long retail experience has shown us to be best adapted for durability and good shape during wear. As in quality, so in price, our goods cannot fail to please. For an index, note the annexed

LIST OF BOOT PRICES:

Ones' Calf Pegged Boots for	$ 2 50
do Fine Sewed do	4 00
do Fine Dress do	6 00
do Heavy Sewed Water Proof Boots	5 50
do Best Rump Boots	8 00
do Super-Quality Bottom Water Proof Boots	10 00
do Fine Congress Gaiters	$1 00 to 5 00

Gents' Quilted Bottom Congress; heavy and fine Calf and Morocco Brogans and Oxfords, &c.

In the Department of PLANTATION SHOES—

Durability has been our especial aim. All having been made to sell to the Planters direct, we have sought to put them together in that manner that will prove the most economical, and will warrant them equal to any made to measure.

In this, as well as the other branches of our business, we have tried to be progressive, and have made some additions to the usual styles of Negro work for which we can give advantages. Among them are:

Men's Long Russet Boots for drivers.
Men's and Women's half Russet Boots for swampy lands.
Men's Extra Heavy three soles, Russet Brogans.
Men's do do Kentucky Blue Brogans.
Women's Heavy Unlouped Dutch Lace Boots.
Men's super Dipping Boots.

These goods, together with the regular Russets and Dutching Boots, House Servants' Shoes, &c render our stock most desirable for all Family and Plantation purchasers.

We have the same styles as the above, by the dozen or package, for all merchants requiring good goods, at our Wholesale Rooms, No. 19 Camp street—opposite City Hotel.

EDUCATIONAL.

DOLBEAR'S COMMERCIAL COLLEGE, OF THE City of New Orleans, founded in 1832—Chartered by the Legislature of Louisiana, with Agricultural and Mechanical Departments—Capital stock, $2 0 000—in the new and spacious edifice known as STORY BUILDING, south east corner of Camp and Common streets, entrance on both streets, open day and evening. Faculty:—

RUFUS DOLBEAR, PRESIDENT.
MATHEMATICAL DEPARTMENT.
GEO. E. BRACKETT Professor,
BOOK-KEEPING DEPARTMENT.
RUFUS DOLBEAR, Lecturer.
J. W. BLACKMAN, Professor.
ENGLISH DEPARTMENT.
HON. J. N. CARRIGAN, A.M., late Supt Education, La; Prof and Lecturer on Commercial Law, etc
and M. B. M'CARTHY, Professor.
FRENCH DEPARTMENT.
MARC. ROUX, Professor.
DEPARTMENT FOR PENMANSHIP.
RUFUS DOLBEAR, Lecturer.
J. H. BRIFFITH Professor.
SPANISH DEPARTMENT.
MANUEL MARINO, Professor.
GERMAN DEPARTMENT.
GEO. BESSER, Professor.
LATIN AND GREEK DEPARTMENT.
M. MARINO and G. BESSER Professors.
ITALIAN DEPARTMENT.
RHETORIC, LOGIC, AND ELOCUTION.

This is the only chartered Commercial college in the South-West, and the oldest in the United States, and has stood for

NOT MORE THAN A QUARTER OF A CENTURY.

On its own merits alone, persons from 12 to 60 years of age, can attend to any branch they may wish.

Board can be had with the Professor, or other good families speaking English, French, Spanish or German, from $5 to $6 per week.

Catalogues with terms, opinions of the press and leading men of the nation, etc., sent to all who desire them.

N.B.—To prevent mistakes or impositions, Students intended for this College should bring this advertisement as special directions, as there are every where temporary rooms opened for a few months, all of course making wonderful pretenses and promises, and posting flaming placards to enlighten the people of New Orleans and of the South! When three or more form Clubs and enter at the same time, ten per cent will be deducted from tuition.

☞ Citizens and strangers are invited to visit.

feb 1 1y RUFUS DOLBEAR, President.

SOULE'S COMMERCIAL COLLEGE, CORNER OF Camp and Common streets, entrance No. 80 Common street,—established in 1856,—open day and evening the entire year.

A full course of instruction in this institution embraces Double Entry Book-keeping, Commercial Calculation and Commercial Law, and Penmanship. Gentlemen can enter for the full course, or any branch they desire, and at any time, as there is no class system, no copying from books, and no memorizing of arbitrary rules.

Merchants, Book keepers, and young gentlemen wishing instruction, are respectfully requested to call and examine our practical forms and peculiar manner of teaching.

For catalogues containing full information, and Balance-sheet Circulars, the most magnificent work of the kind ever executed in the United States, address,

GEO. SOULE, New Orleans.

FELICIANA FEMALE INSTITUTE, JACKSON, LA. The exercises of the second term of the scholastic year will commence on the first of March. Pupils entered at any time, and charged from the time of entrance.

Extensive grounds and houses have been added to the premises.

A good library, a new and complete apparatus, a full and competent corps of teachers, comfortable and newly-furnished apartments, afford the best facilities for a thorough education.

BOARD OF TRUSTEES:

WM. H. WATKINS, D D, President.
J. N. EVANS, Secretary.
Prof. W. H. N. MAGRUDER, WM LIPSCOMB,
JOHN W. BURRUSS, Esq., Col. S. M. BRYAN,
F. Y. D. HAGAMAN, Esq. Rev. A. G. HILLER
Rev. JOHN C. MILLER, JOHN MCKOWEN, Esq
Hon. JOHN MCVEA.

6m THOS W BROWN, Principal.

KENNER ACADEMY—A BOARDING AND DAY School for Boys and Young Men—VICTOR SCHELLHA Principal This Institution is located in the town of Kenner, Jefferson parish, La., about ten miles from New Orleans by railroad, and sixteen miles by river. The location is extremely delightful and pleasant. The health of the place is unsurpassed during the whole year.

The course of study is thorough, embracing the English, French, Spanish, German, Latin, and Greek languages. Students can be prepared for any class in College, or for business pursuits.

The Academy Year is divided into Two Sessions of Five Months each, commencing on the First of October and March, respectively. Scholars will be received at any time during the year; none for less time than one session.

For further particulars see circulars, or address Principal.

PORT GIBSON COLLEGIATE ACADEMY, FOR Young Ladies, resumed its Exercises on the first Monday in Dec. last. A well chosen Faculty will spare no pains or care to make this Institution a pleasant and profitable place for young Lady students.

The buildings are large, well-ventilated, and well furnished. The grounds ample and beautiful.

For Information and Circulars, apply to

Rev. B. JONES, Port Gibson, Miss.

PROFESSIONAL.

JAMES J. HUTCHINSON, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, Livingston, Alabama., will Practice in Sumter and the adjoining counties. [ap24]

DR. E. D. BEACH, HAVING RESUMED THE practice of Medicine, offers his professional services to the citizens of New Orleans.

N. B.—Special attention paid to diseases of the RECTUM, PILES, FISTULA IN ANO, ETC.—Fistula in ano permanently cured without the use of the knife, cautery, pain, or confinement whatever. Office No. 6, Baronne street near Canal. ap27.

J. E. ELAM, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, BATON Rouge.

REFERENCES—Henderson & Gaines and Chlan & Bolton, New Orleans; W. S. Pike and A. Ratta, Baton Rouge.

B. D. & A. W. ROBERTS, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, Floyd, Carroll Parish, Louisiana. ja19

FUQUA & KILBOURNE, ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW, Clinton, Louisiana, practice in the Parishes of East and West Feliciana, and East Baton Rouge.

References—Payne & Harrison, Byrne, Vance & Co., W. and C. Letchford and Co., Broadwell & Haynes, and Pritchard & Flower, New Orleans. mar 7-1y.

W. F. WINANS. J. T. HEATH.

WINANS & HEATH, ATTORNEYS AND COUNsellors at Law, Shreveport, La. Office—Market street. Will practice in the courts of Caddo, De Soto, Bossier, Claiborne, and Bienville.

G. SPENCER MAYO, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, Harrisonburg, La., will practice in the Courts of Catahoula, Concordia, Caldwell and Franklin Parishes.

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES.—THESE MAchines have recently had great improvements for Fine Sewing, and their sale is now very rapidly increasing. They are used in preference to all others at the largest and most fashionable dressmaking establishments in New Orleans, also at all the large hotels and principal boarding-houses, and in hundreds of private families, and give universal satisfaction.

They are sold, if desired, on a trial, with any and all other Sewing Machines.

WALTER BENNETT, Agent,
33 Camp-street.

COMMISSION MERCHANTS.

W. A. BROADWELL. A. P. HAYNES.

BROADWELL & HAYNES, COMMISSION MERchants (formerly Broadwell & Payne), No. 40 Union street N. O. Having retired from business, I take great pleasure in soliciting for my former Partners, BROADWELL & HAYNES, the patronage and confidence of my friends, believing their experience, capacity and means, will merit its continuance, and enable them to give general satisfaction. [jel] M. U. PAYNE.

W. R. STUART, New Orleans. HR. D. A. JAMES, Madison Parish, La.

STUART & JAMES, NO. 42 UNION STREET, New Orleans, have associated themselves together for the purpose of conducting a COTTON FACTORAGE & BENERAL COMMISSION BUSINESS; are prepared to make the usual Advances to planters, in the way of supplies, etc., and respectfully solicit patronage.

B. M. LOWE & CO., COTTON FACTORS AND General Commission Merchants, No. 97 BRAVIER STREET, New Orleans. ap6

PILCHER, GOODRICH & CO., COTTON AND SUGAR Factors and Commission Merchants, No. 47 Carondelet, corner Union street, New Orleans. jy11-1y

A. H. MAY & CO., COTTON FACTORS AND General Commission Merchants, No 94 Bravier street, New Orleans. au2 1y

J. C. PAYNE. J. P. HARRISON.
G. W. SUTHTNOTON. WM H. HARRISON

PAYNE & HARRISON, COMMISSION MERCHANTS No. 51 Union street, New Orleans. dec7-1y

S. L. WALKER, New Orleans. ROBT. C. HUTCHINSON Caddo Parish, La

WALKER & HUTCHINSON, COTTON FACTORS and Commission Merchants, No. 37 Carondelet street, New Orleans. je23

J. BOYD & CO., COTTON FACTORS, RECEIVING and Forwarding Merchants, No. 4 Union street, New Orleans.

LEONARD FASH. F. B. LAURANS.

LEONARD FASH & CO., COMMISSION MERchants, and Dealers in Western Produce, 61 Magazine street, New Orleans. Oct 24.

LANE, SALTER & CO., SUCCESSORS TO LANE, MAYFIELD & Co., Cotton and Sugar Factors, and General Commission Merchants, No. 79 St. Charles street, New Orleans. 1y5-1j

JOHN F. WYCHE & CO., COTTON FACTORS and Commission Merchants, No 19 Common street, New Orleans.

SPALDING'S PREPARED GLUE.—SAVE THE Pieces! Economy! Dispatch!

☞ "A STITCH IN TIME SAVES NINE."☜

As accidents will happen, even in well-regulated families, it is very desirable to have some cheap and convenient way for repairing Furniture, Toys, Crockery, &c.

SPALDING'S PREPARED GLUE

meets all such emergencies, and no household can afford to be without it. It is always ready, and up to the sticking point. There is no longer a necessity for limping chairs, splintered veneers, headless dolls, and broken cradles. It is just the article for mine, shall, and other ornamental work, so popular with ladies of refinement and taste.

This admirable preparation is used cold, being chemically held in solution, and possessing all the valuable qualities of the best cabinet-makers' Glue. It may be used in the place of ordinary mucilage, being vastly more adhesive.

"USEFUL IN EVERY HOUSE."

N.B.—A Brush accompanies each Bottle. Price 25 cents.

Wholesale Depot, 48 Cedar-street, New York.

Address HENRY C. SPALDING & Co.
Box No. 3,600, New York.

Put up for Dealers in Cases containing four, eight, and twelve dozen—a beautiful Lithographic Show-Card accompanying each package.

☞ A single bottle of SPALDING'S PREPARED BLUE will save ten times its cost annually to every household.☜

Sold by all prominent Stationers, Druggists, Hardware and Fancy Dealers, Grocers, and Fancy Stores.

Country merchants should make a note of SPALDING'S PREPARED GLUE, when making up their lists. It will stand any climate. jan 25 1y

MISCELLANEOUS.

NEW CARPETING.—J. D. DAMERON & CO., 121 Canal street have received a large and choice assortment of English Velvet and Tapestry CARPETING, of the celebrated manufacture of Crow by and sons and others.

Roglow Brussels and Wilton's—New Patterns.
Three-Ply and Ingrains, of the best makers.
Rugs, Rolles, Door Mats, etc.

CURTAIN MATERIAL.—We would call attention to our extensive stock of all descriptions of Brocatelle Satin de Lahe, and Worsted Curtain Material, Lace and Muslin Curtains, Table and Piano Covers Lambs, Trimmings etc.

WINDOW SHADES AND CORNICES.—In this branch of our business, great pains is taken to get up the Newest Styles, and our stock has no superior.

OIL CLOTHS.—3 feet to 24 feet wide, of choice quality and new patterns.

WEST THOV BELL FOUNDERY.—ESTABLISHED in 1826. The subscribers manufacture and have constantly for BELLS. sale at their old established Foundery, their superior Bells for BELLS Churches Academies, Factories, Steamboats, Locomotives, BELLS. Plantations, &c., mounted in the most approved and substantial manner with their new Patented Yoke and other BELLS. improved Hangings, and warranted in every particular. BELLS. For information in regard to Keys, Dimensions Mountings, BELLS. Warrantee, &c., send for a circular

Address, A. MENELY'S SONS, Agents, West Troy, N. Y
☞ SLAIK, STAUFFER & CO, Agents, New

NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY A COMMITTEE OF MINISTERS FOR THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH.—C. C. GILLESPIE, EDITOR.

VOLUME X.—NUMBER 13.
WHOLE NUMBER 470.

NEW ORLEANS, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 28, 1860.

$2 00 A YEAR, IN ADVANCE.
OFFICE—112 CAMP ST.

NEW YORK LITERARY CORRESPONDENCE.

Report of the Evangelical Alliance—Addresses of the American Delegates—Dr. Nast and Strauss—German Methodism—Northern Methodist Missions—Improvement in School Books—The School-Reader Problem—A new Volume of Hood's Poems—Marsh's Lectures on the English Language—Thomas's West Coast of Africa—The Fool of Quality—Taylor's Five Years in China—Elgin's Mission to China and Japan—Harpers' Greek Texts.

New York, March 8, 1860.

The "Conneil of the British orgnnization" of the great Evangelical Alliance, has just issued a report in English, of the proceedings of the last meeting of that body, at Berlin, in 1857. I say just issued, but it is dated 1859—and I should say I have just got hold of a copy. It is a portly volume of over 700 pages, and contains, besides minutes of the proceedings, reports of all the important papers read before the Association. A great many very interesting subjects were discussed, of which I have now only space to mention the addresses delivered by American delegates. Rev. Dr. Baird, of New York, spoke a few words on "Emigration to America," giving some information on the care our government bestows on newly arrived immigrants, to protect them from the wiles of "sharpers"—information much needed, for America has of late years got a very hard name among the German people. Professor Carver, of Pensylvanin, spoke for the American Lutheran Church. Rev. Dr. Schaff, of Mercersburg, Pa., delivered an important address on "Christianity in America," in which he shows the working of the American system of dis-connection between Church and State, which Europeans can hardly understand, and gives a very clear and interesting view of the religious culture and condition of our people. And finally, Rev. Dr. Nast, of Cincinnati, the honored pioneer of Methodism among the vast German population of this country, contributes an able exposition of the work done by our Methodist system, chiefly among the Germans. I think the statistics of Methodism which he gave, of its widespread mission work, of its great success in all parts of the Union, and world, of the energy of its spirit, and the faithfulness and success of its ministers, must have both surprised and delighted the German divines, who can scarce conceive of so vast a work as our Church has accomplished in this country. Coming from Dr. Nast it must have been especially cheering, for he grew up in Germany, in close acquaintance with many whom he here met again for the first time after many years, and found among the most eminent church dignitaries present at Berlin, old university friends, whom he had not seen since early youth. I think as Methodism has had no more faithful laborer in its fields than Dr. Nast, neither could it have had any better representative at this great German festival than him.

I believe it is not generally known that Dr. Nast and Strauss, the celebrated German Infidel, whose "Life of Christ" is yet one of the "strong books" of that side, were fellow-students at the University. Here seems to me matter for grave reflection. How widely different have been the paths of those two men—both setting out from the same alma mater, both taught in the same learning; both eminent as scholars, and men of no ordinary intellectual powers. One has written a book which, while confessedly the ablest on the Infidel side, has yet been without any perceptible influence on the human mind or on human progress, except in the negative way of calling out some of the best defences of the Christian religion that the world has seen. The other is hailed by thousands of Germans throughout the length and breadth of this Union, as their spiritual father, to whose labor, whether writing or preaching, they owe, under God, their conversion from the rationalism which so drearily besets Germany, to the saving light of Christian truth.

The first German Methodist congregation was formed in 1838, by Dr. Nast, in Cincinnati. In 1840, I remember, then a boy and living in Cincinnati, that the German congregation numbered about 30, all told, all belonging to the poorest and lowest class of German residents, who often embrace religion in spite of violent persecutions from relatives, and it was no unusual thing for members to be attacked by their rowdy acquaintances of other days, when returning home from the night service. In 1857, according to Dr. Nast's report, there were over 200 German Methodist stations in the country, from Iowa to Texas, and from Maine to California, and over 16,000 members; besides which there is a large and prosperous work going on in Germany.

The forty-first "Annual Report of the Missionary Society" of the Methodist Episcopal Church, is before me. It seems that we have missionaries and members in the following foreign countries:

	Missionaries.	Members.
Liberia	25	1,494
South America	1	67
China	5	50
Germany	37	1,319
India	20	82
Bulgaria	3
Sandwich Islands	1	20
Scandinavia	8	441

Making a totnl of 100 Missionaries and 3183 members.

These are besides Domestic Missions which return a total of 319 Missionaries, and 22,827 members, besides the American Domestic Missions, under the care of the Annual Conferences, with whose support the Society is not charged. The receipts up to January 1st, 1860, amount to $276,660; of which I notice that the Philadelphia Conference contributed over $25,000; the New York and New York East Conferences together, $39,000, and the Baltimore Conference over $13,000.

The following are the disbursements for the year to various foreign missions:

Foreign German Mission	$21,869 60
Liberia mission	22,035 05
China mission	17,368 43
Norway and Sweden	6,509 86
Buenos Ayres	966 07
India mission	32,355 38
Bulgaria mission	2,539 03

I have often thought that nothing would surprise the men who died twenty years ago, more, if they could come back to us, than the vast improvement that has in that time been made in school books. Not only have many branches of study been introduced and popularized, such as Physiology and Chemistry, which were then thought to be purely "professional," but in every one of the old departments great improvements have been made in the text books. From "Reading without Tears," that welcome little pictured primer for the poor little beginners, to plain and common-sense expositions of human physiology, everywhere the landmarks of knowledge have been widened, and the highways improved. No school-book has retained so much of the old style as our various "School-Readers." There are a great many different "Readers" in use in various schools, but all seem to be modelled on the one plan, of providing a certain number of pieces, of moderate length and correct style, mixing poetry and prose at random, and selecting the whole from our best authors. By reading such pieces over, under the supervision of a judicious teacher, the scholar was supposed to get proper habits of pronunciation, enunciation, accent, tone, and whatever else might be necessary to enable him to "open his mouth without putting his foot in it," as Mrs. Partington says.

Now, as long as fourteen years ago, it occurred to Professor Marcius Wilson, a gentleman who has devoted his life to the work of education, and who is the author of a number of school and college text-books, which have been very successful, and are now in general use,—that it might be possible to give to the 'Reading Lessons,' (which, though always selected from the works of the best authors, are unfortunately too often prosy extracts, and scarcely ever afford what the young and growing mind most ardently desires—useful information), to give to these, now tedious "reading-lessons," another character, and to embrace in one lesson the conveying of useful and interesting knowledge—no other way to be taught in the public schools, and therefore generally omitted—with the regular object for which children are made to read in schools.

The common schools of our country, in which ninety-nine hundredths of our people receive all their scholastic education, are necessarily confined to a very limited range of studies; little beyond the elementary branches of reading, writing, spelling, geography, grammar, and arithmetic, can ever be introduced into them, because the time of the teacher is fully occupied with the classes required in these elementary studies alone. Yet an intelligent parent would have his children, although they were to be farmers and mechanics, know something of such useful branches as Animal and Vegetable Physiology, Natural Philosophy, Chemistry—especially in its applications to Agriculture—History, Astronomy, &c., &c. The "people" are continually demanding that these higher branches shall be taught in the Public Schools, especially to the more advanced pupils. But all the efforts of parents and teachers, and the planning of educators, have until now failed to devise any means by which any acquaintance whatever with these branches should be obtained by one out of fifty of the children in our Public Schools.

Professor Wilson noticed that the children in a highly intelligent and well-regulated family are instructed in these subjects, not by formal studies and recitations, but by familiar conversation, and by an abundance of interesting and instructive books. By such incidental means children not only acquire much positive knowledge at a very early age, but receive a good degree of mental discipline also.

Now, the problem to solve is, how to introduce this familiar, kind, interesting way of communicating knowledge into our schools.

The Germans, who are probably the best educators in the world, saw the difficulty long ago, and solved it in a way, and a very pleasant way too, which is very nearly Professor Willson's. In many schools in Germany it is the custom, when the children have been "good" during the day, for the school-master to read to them during the last hour of the afternoon, from some interesting book of Natural History, travels, or adventure. The school sits and listens with the utmost delight, and children—even to the smallest—keep up the connection of the narrative from day to day, often for a month.

Now, this is one way. But Professor Willson's seems to me a better, for the reason that it is of more universal application, and that it has a method about it which must ensure its success. He says: "We believe that many very interesting portions of the higher English branches of study, which form topics of useful conversation, and subjects of reading, in intelligent families, can be brought to the notice of all the children in our public schools, in a way to interest them exceedingly, and that, too, without taking any of the time which they are now devoting to their ordinary studies. In no possible way, however, can these subjects be brought to the notice of any large proportion of the children of our country, but through the medium of the "Reading Books" used in the schools. All the children read in school. Make the Reading Books interesting and instructive, while they at the same time shall teach the Art of Reading, so far as it can be taught from books, and whatever the Reading Books contain, all the children will have some knowledge of."

There you have the principles upon which a series of "Readers" are being gotten out, which will, in my opinion, effect an important advance in popular culture. One great object of "schools" is to train the youthful mind to correct habits of observation in after life, and to infuse it with such an ardent love of knowledge that when relieved of the restraints of school the pupil will still go on acquiring knowledge and adding to his stores. Now it strikes me that there can be no happier way of attaining this grand point in the habits of a child than this, by which he is gradually, easily, by daily steps, by interesting means, both pictorial and literary, made acquainted with the wonders of nature by which his life is surrounded. It must be borne in mind that these books will teach the art of reading at least as well as the "Readers" now in use, so that no time is wasted, but much gained in this regard.

By the use of such a set of books as these, important subjects of knowledge that have hitherto been brought within the reach of only a favored few, will become familiarized, to a certain extent, to the great mass of the children of our country. Not that the children would thus, and at once, become proficients in any of these departments; but they would, at least, know the subjects embraced in them; they would learn many useful things about them; they would become interested in them, and be stimulated to make further acquisitions: the horizon of their knowledge would thus be enlarged; the world would appear to them in a new aspect, more full of beauty, and more vocal of the wisdom and goodness of the Creator. Such Reading Books would not only not exclude from our schools more scientific treatises, but they would create an additional demand for them; and in the Common Schools, and among the masses, the broad foundation would be laid of a higher degree of popular education than we have before witnessed.

The mechanical execution, judging from some specimen pages I have seen, will be very much ahead of the common school-book print. The illustrations are not only beautifully printed, but carefully, spiritedly, and correctly drawn; and I notice in the Natural History parts, that animals are grouped, and may be compared, by a scale attached to each group, which will, it seems to me, afford infinite instruction and amusement to the children, in comparing the real size of the animals represented. In short, Harper's series of "School and Family Readers" are in my opinion the most important accession to School Literature that we have had for many years.

It seems late in the day for a new collection of Poems, by Hood. That the author of the "Song of the Shirt" wrote in so many papers, and was so careless as to the fate of many of his best pieces, that Mr. Epes Sargent has been able to gather together from old English papers and magazines a goodly volume of Poems, well known as Hood's, but never before put up in book form. This, Derby and Jackson have just issued, as volume three, of their edition of Hood's writings, though it is complete in itself, under the title of "Whims and Wails." It is an interesting addition to the pieces before collected. It is curious that Carlyle's, Macaulay's, Sidney Smith's, Professor Wilson's, and now Hood's works, should all be collected first on this side the water. It shows how much more appreciative the American mind is than the English, of the works of the best writers in the language.

Mr. George P. Marsh, our most distinguished linguist, taking that term in its broadest and best significance, has just published (by Scribner and Co.) "Lectures on the English Language," a very valuable and able contribution to the history and philosophy of our tongue. It is a book which every scholar will at once put upon that shelf which contains the books he most often delights himself with; and which every College and High-school in the land should adopt as a text book for the higher classes.

Rev. C. W. Thomas's "Adventures and Observations on the West Coast of Africa," is a book to which I need hardly call the attention of your readers, who will be glad of so interesting a contribution to our knowledge of Africa, and pleased that it comes from a member of their own Church.

In these days of universal "novel" reading (and writing), when even the staidest D.D. may be seen with Dickens or Thackeray or Scott in hand, it is refreshing to get hold of a novel which Wesley himself recommended, and had reprinted: such is "The Fool of Quality," by Brooke. The able and interesting introduction, by Rev. Dr. Strickland, gives the history of the book, which will interest the reader almost as much as the book itself, and to that I will refer the reader.

Messrs. Derby and Jackson, who publish the above mentioned book, have in the press a volume which will interest, specially, the Methodist world. It is to be called, "Methodism successful, and the causes of its organic success," and is by Rev. B. F. Tefft, D.D., once editor of the Ladies Repository, and the author (years ago) of a novel called the "Shoulder-Knot."

Messrs. Derby and Jackson will also shortly publish "Five Years in China," by Rev. Charles Taylor, for some time a Missionary in that country, and now Corresponding Secretary of the Sabbath School Society of the M. E. Church, South. I have not seen the sheets, but am told that it will be a volume of great interest.

Speaking of China puts me in mind of the last and most interesting book on that country and Japan, which the Harpers have just published, in a style which does them credit. It is a book which is having a great run in England, and is likely to have the same here.

Messrs. Harpers have, also put scholars (in both senses of the word) under an obligation, by the publication of what is certainly the most convenient and elegant text of the poems of Horace, that ever I saw. It is a little compact volume, in flexible covers, which may be slipped into a coat pocket, and yet is printed in fair large type, and on the best of paper. As a volume for the recitation room, and for the constant use of the lover of Horace, it is an unexampled convenience. It is immediately followed by "Eschylus," in the same style, and other volumes are in course of preparation. These neat and tasteful little volumes, edited by the most eminent scholars of England, will fill a want which has been but half met by the incorrect and slovenly pocket editions heretofore.

THE NORTH-WEST PASSAGE.—Some years ago the British government offered a reward of twenty thousand pounds sterling to the discoverer of the North-west Passage. The prize has been already awarded by Government to Sir R McClure. This officer sailed from Behring's straits, and reached the farthest point eastward attained by any vessel. From this point he abandoned his ship, after being two years shut up in the ice, and still proceeding eastward, joined the expeditions from Baffin's Bay, thereby completing the voyage and journey across the North American continent from the Pacific to the Atlantic. The friends of Sir John Franklin, however, claim that the credit is due him, and that his widow is in consequence entitled to the claim.

CRITIQUE OF J. C. G.'S "BRIEF CRITIQUE—NO. 1."

A writer under the signature "J. C. G.," in the New Orleans Christian Advocate, of 13th February, undertakes to sustain Dr. A. Alexander's Theory of the Conscience against his reviewer in the last Quarterly. J. C. G. admits in the first sentence that he has "never read any work of the late Archibald Alexander." But, nevertheless, he assumes to "vindicate" Dr. Alexander. It is questionable whether any man can sustain the credit of a fair critic and impartial judge between two parties, who confesses that he knows but one side of the case. In the present case, as will be seen, "J. C. G." has the singular infelicity of not settling the controversy between Dr. A. and his reviewer, but of making himself a third party.

He says, in "vindication" of Dr. Alexander: "The conscience is not separate from and co-ordinate with the intellect and sensibilities, but is the mind as cognizant of moral truth, and the heart as affected by it." This leaves the question precisely where the reviewer left it. It finds its equivalent in his language. "Postulate: The mind and emotions pronounce in concert one moral judgment; and you have no need to conjure up a separate faculty, e.g., a conscience faculty, to do the same thing." Now a "faculty," in the sense intended by philosophers, is one in itself, existing relatively to every other one. But "J. C. G." merges conscience into the intellectual and emotive faculties. He holds that "the conscience is not separate from and co-ordinate with the intellect and sensibilities." If it is a faculty at all, it is separate from and co-ordinate with every other faculty. If one at all, it is such an one, too, as manifests both intelligence and caution, in its own distinct and proper self, in the deliverance of a moral judgment. This would be investing the conscience with understanding and feeling, which are usually reckoned as attributes of distinct parts of man's nature—the mental and the emotional. But he gives a higher statement of this idea. In his view, "conscience is the mind as cognizant of moral truth, and the heart as affected by it." Here the moral faculty affirmed, is totally lost in the mind—one-half of man's immaterial nature, with all its separable faculties; and in the heart—the other half, with all its separable faculties; whenever they have a moral truth presented for consideration. He must make a better statement of his case, before the least discerning will admit that he has made it out. Till then, as against him, this declaration of the reviewer will hold good: "To show that there is such a faculty as conscience, will for ever remain impossible, unless it is shown to be capable of abstraction from the faculties of intellectual judgment and moral feeling, and independent of their concurrent action for its very being." Until this is done, conscience can only be regarded as an effect and not a faculty—the moral judgment itself, and not its cause.

"J. C. G." takes a step further, and finds that "the conscience is a simple faculty, because the moral idea of right and wrong can not be resolved into other ideas, neither can the moral feeling of right and wrong be resolved into other feelings." Here he clearly confounds the moral judgment, which is simple, no matter how many faculties are employed in delivering it, with the faculties giving such judgment birth. It is not disputed that complex faculties, as they are known to us, may produce simple effects. This is the case in all theories of conscience. No one can deny that there is a universal, original, simple moral judgment—moral, as distinguished from the emotional, per se.

The contest is not us to the existence of such judgments, but as to the cause of them. Hence the reviewer agrees with Dr. Alexander in his "admirable and correct analysis of the complex act of pronouncing a moral judgment," but denies that a "simple faculty" puts forth this complex act. So J. C. G. is shown to be guilty of argumentative tergiversation, when he changes the simplicity of a faculty to the distinct, uncompounded, ultimate judgment which that faculty is assumed to pronounce, and then makes this prove the original singleness of the faculty itself. Such tortuosity will never reconcile the argument of Dr. Alexander with his premises. His champion must give a better answer to the question: "How can that be a 'simple' faculty which performs a complex operation, judging what is right, and feeling its obligation?" For as there is a clear and universally acknowledged distinction between the intellectual and the emotional parts of our constitution, it is not obvious that there is a single faculty within whose office it is to give expression to our understanding and our feelings. There is nothing irreconcilable in the assumption, on the other hand, that many faculties of our nature combine to give the simple judgment that a certain act is moral, because the intellectual faculties had found it to be right, and the emotive had found it to be duty. This ultimate simple judgment flows out from the judgment of the understanding on one part, and the judgment of the feelings on the other. Hence, a moral judgment always discovers something of both mind and emotion in it. So far, therefore, as the arguments of Dr. Alexander and his champion "inform us of any result," to use the language of the reviewer, "it is—that conscience is the product of the mental and emotional faculties, interpenetrating and acting in an effort to produce one simple result, namely, the deliverance of a moral judgment, and so far as this conclusion can do it, it puts the conscience for ever out of the category of an original, irresolvable faculty of the human constitution.

"J. C. G." further says: "Is this moral sense universal?" Dr. A. affirms. The reviewer seems afraid to take either the affirmative or the negative." To use the mildest terms respecting it, this is an unjust assertion. While the reviewer denies the proof of an surcesolvable moral faculty by the argument of Dr. Alexander, he nowhere denies the existence of conscience as a moral judgment. He expressly says in his review, first: "No one denies that in every case, where a moral object or relation comes before the mind, there is a feeling of approbation or disapprobation, according to the moral character of the object, of which we are immediately conscious; secondly, so long as mind and emotion endure and obey their own laws, just so long will a man know when he has done a wrong, and feel how mean it was; thirdly, to determine the fact that there is a universal human judgment of right and wrong, is by no means a difficult thing—because mind and emotion are universal natural faculties. This is a sufficient vindication of the reviewer from the charge of fear to express his views on the point in question.

As to the point made by J. C. G., that the most objectionable feature of the review is its theory of the ground of moral obligation, it would be easy to show that the critic has left unnoticed the reviewers theoretical grounds of moral obligation, and seized upon the practical ones, to sustain his charge of objectionableness. As the discussion of the "moral imperative," ought—which Kant merges into the "categorical imperative," would be too metaphysical for a newspaper article, your correspondent designs. O. A. M.

[Why "too metaphysical for a newspaper?" Let us have it.—Ed.]

OPENING OF THE FRENCH LEGISLATURE.

The French Chambers were opened March 1st in the Great Hall of the Louvre. The day happened to be fine, with a cloudless sky. So early as half past ten groups were assembled in the Place du Carrousel. The entrance by the Rue de Rivoli on one side, and the Quay on the other, was watched by people who are never tired of such spectacles. The cards of invitation to strangers indicated 12 o'clock as the last hour at which they could be admitted. At half-past 11 o'clock the hall was nearly full. The were the same as last year. The throne stood in the centre of a platform, at one end of the room, within a canopy of crimson velvet, surmounted by the Imperial arms, and flanked by pillars displaying gilt shields with garlands over them. On the right of the throne were three chairs, and on the left the same number; the throne, of course, for the Emperor—the chairs for the Princes of the Emperor's family having rank at the Court. On the platform, behind and at both sides of the throne, places were set apart for the Cardinals, Bishops, Marshals of France, Ministers, etc. To the right also, extending in a line along the side, the Cent Gardes, in their handsome uniform, stood. Their cuirasses and helmets shone like silver. To the left of the throne, on a level with the platform on which it stood, was the Empress's gallery, and at the same side the deputations of the Grand Crosses of the Legion, the Grand Marshal of the Palace, the Grand Huntsman, etc. On the right, places were allotted to the President, Vice-Presidents, and members of the Council of State, the President, Vice-Presidents and Secretaries of the Legislative body, and the Deputies; while in front of the throne were the President, Vice-Presidents, and Grand Referendary of the Senate, and the Senators. Along the sides were deputations from the Court of Cassation, Court of Accounts, and Imperial Court; the clergy of different denominations, the Prefect of Police, the Prefect of the Seine, deputations from the Tribunal of Premiere Instance, the Generals and Colonels of the Imperial Guard, the Generals of the 1st Military Division, superior officers of the army and navy, members of the Institute.—The Diplomatic Corps had places to the right, immediately above the Emperor's tribune, and the galleries which run along the sides above were occupied by ladies. The corridors on the floor, between the wall and the enclosed space set apart for the great bodies of the State, were filled by the visitors.

ARRANGEMENTS AND DECORATIONS

ENTRANCE OF THE EMPRESS AND EMPEROR.

The Empress entered at a few minutes before one, accompanied by the Princess Clotilde and Madame Murat, followed by the ladies of her household. Her Majesty was saluted on making her appearance, and again on taking her seat, and a pause was heard for the Prince Imperial. The Emperor came from the Tuileries by the long picture gallery, and at a quarter-past one some faint sound, supposed to be the salute of the cannon of the Invalides, announced His Majesty's approach. He was preceded by a Master of the Ceremonies, the Equerry on duty; the Prefect of the Palace, the Chamberlain on duty, the Adjutant General of the Palace, the Grand Master of the Ceremonies, the Grand Chamberlain, and the Grand Marshal of the Palace. Then came the Emperor, dressed in a General's uniform, followed by Prince Napoleon, the Princes of the Imperial family having rank at Court, the Grand Almoner, the Aide-de-camp on duty, the Commander of the Cent Gardes, and the officers of the households of the Imperial Princes. His Majesty was greeted with repeated cries of "Vive l'Empereur!" "Vive l'Impératrice!" "Vive le Prince Impérial!"

The Emperor took his seat upon the throne, having on his right Prince Napoleon, Prince Louis Lucien Bonaparte, and Prince Joachim Murat, and on his left Prince Lucien Murat and Prince Napoleon Lucien Bonaparte—the new most Serene Highness, who has not as yet left Paris for Italy, as reported. The Grand Master of the Ceremonies then, in a loud voice, requested all present to be seated—a request with which those who were fortunate to have seats at once complied. Those who had only standing room of course remained in statu quo.

The Emperor deviated on the present occasion from his ordinary practice of reading his speech standing; he remained seated during its delivery, owing to fatigue or to slight indisposition. But his voice was as distinct as ever, and it reached every corner of the hall.

SPEECH OF THE EMPEROR.

Messieurs les Senateurs—Messieurs les Deputes—On the opening of last session, relying on the patriotism of France, I endeavored to fortify your minds in advance against the exaggerated apprehensions of a probable war. To-day I have at heart to reassure you against the anxiety caused by peace itself. That peace I desire sincerely, and shall neglect nothing to maintain it.

I have only to congratulate myself on my friendly relations with all the Powers of Europe. The only points of the globe where our arms are still engaged are in the extreme East; but the courage of our sailors and of our soldiers, aided by the hearty assistance of Spain, will doubtless soon lead to a treaty of peace with Cochin-China. As regards China, a serious expedition, combined with the forces of great Britain, will inflict on her the chastisement of her perfidy.

In Europe difficulties approach, as I trust, their termination, and Italy is on the eve of constituting herself free. Without referring to the long negotiations which have been dragging along for so many months, I shall confine myself to a few principal points.

DOMINANT IDEA OF THE TREATY OF VILLAFRANCA.

The dominant idea of the Treaty of Villafranca was to obtain the almost complete independence of Venetia at the price of the restitution of the Archdukes. That transaction having failed, despite my most earnest endeavors, I have expressed my regret thereat at Vienna as well as at Turin, for the situation by being prolonged threatened to lead to no issue. While it was the object of frank explanations between my Government and that of Austria, it suggested to England, to Prussia, to Russia, measures, the whole of which clearly prove on the part of the Great Powe s their desire to obtain a reconciliation of all the lutercsts.

THE EMPEROR'S ITALIAN PROGRAMME.

To second these dispositions it was necessary for France to present that combination the adoption of which would have the greatest chance of being accepted by Europe. Guaranteeing Italy by my army against foreign intervention, I had the right to assign the limits of that guarantee. Therefore I did not hesitate to declare to the King of Sardinia that, while leaving him full liberty of action, I could not follow him in a policy which had the fault of appearing in the eyes of Europe a desire to absorb all the States of Italy, and which threatened new conflagrations. I counselled him to reply favorably to the wishes of the provinces which should offer themselves to him, but to maintain the independence of Tuscany, and to respect in principle the rights of the Holy See. If this arrangement does not satisfy everybody, it has the advantage of reserving principles, of calming apprehensions, and makes Piedmont a kingdom of more than 9,000,000 souls.

ANNEXATION OF SAVOY.

Looking to this transformation of Northern Italy, which gives to a powerful State all the passes of the Alps, it was my duty, for the security of our frontiers, to claim the French slopes of the mountains. This re-assertion of a claim to a territory of small extent has nothing in it of a nature to alarm Europe and give a denial to the policy of disinterestedness which I have proclaimed more than once, for France does not wish to proceed to this aggrandizement, however small it may be, either by military occupation or by provoked insurrection, or by underhand manœuvres, but by frankly explaining the question to the Great Powers. They will doubtless understand in their equity, as France would certainly understand it for each of them under similar circumstances, that the important territorial rearrangement which is about to take place gives us a right to a guarantee indicated by nature herself.

THE ROMAN QUESTION.

I cannot pass over in silence the emotion of a portion of the Catholic world; it has given way suddenly to such inconsiderate impressions, it has given itself up to such passionate alarms. The past, which ought to be a guarantee for the future, has been so much overlooked, the services rendered so much forgotten, that I needed a very deep conviction and confidence—an absolute confidence in public common sense, to establish in the midst of the agitations endeavored to be excited that calm which alone maintains us in a proper path.

Facts, however, speak loudly for themselves. For the last 11 years I have maintained alone at Rome the power of the Holy Father, without having ceased a single day to revere in him the sacred character of the chief of our religion. On another side the population of the Romagna, abandoned all at once to themselves, have experienced a natural excitement, and sought during the war to make common cause with us. Ought I to forget them in making peace, and to hand them over anew for an indefinite time to the chances of a foreign occupation? My first efforts have been to reconcile them to their Sovereign, and, not having succeeded, I have tried at least to uphold in the revolted provinces the principle of the temporal power of the Pope.

ERA OF PEACE.

After what has been already said, you see, if all is not yet over, how it is still permitted to hope for a speedy solution. The moment seems then to have arrived to put an end to these anxieties, which have lasted too long, and to seek for the means of inaugurating with boldness a new era of peace in France. Already has the army been reduced to 150,000 men; and this reduction would have been more considerable but for the Chinese war and the occupation of Rome and Lombardy. My Government will immediately present to you a series of measures, the object of which is to facilitate production, to increase, by affording the means of living cheaply, the prosperity of those who labor, and to multiply our commercial relations. The first step to be taken in this path was to fix the period for the suppression of those impassable barriers which, under the name of prohibitions, have shut out from our markets many productions of foreign industry, and constrained other nations to adopt an annoying reciprocity with regard to us.

But something still more difficult has impeded us. It was the little inclination for a commercial treaty with England. I have therefore taken resolutely upon myself the responsibility of this great measure. A very simple reflection proves its advantages for both countries. Neither the one nor the other assuredly would have failed within a few years to take, each in its own interest, the initiative of the measures proposed; but then, the lowering of tariffs not being simultaneous, they would have taken place on one side and on the other without immediate compensation. The Treaty has done nothing more, then, than to anticipate the period of salutary modifications, and to give to indispensable reforms the character of reciprocal concessions, destined to strengthen the alliance of two great peoples. In order that this treaty may produce its best effects I invoke your most energetic co-operation for the adoption of the laws which will facilitate its practical adoption.

FREE TRADE.

I call your attention, before all things, to the means of internal communication, which by their development can alone permit us to compete with foreign industry; but, as periods of transition are always those of suffering, and as it is our duty to put a stop to a state of uncertainty so hurtful to our interests, I appeal to your patriotism for the prompt examination of the laws which will be submitted to you. By liberating raw materials from all duties and reducing those which weigh on articles of common consumption the resources of the Treasury will find themselves severally diminished; nevertheless, the receipts and disbursements of the year 1861 will be balanced without any need of an appeal to credits or a recourse to new taxes. In sketching out to you a faithful picture of our commercial position, I have wished to inspire you with full confidence in our future prosperity, and to associate you in the accomplishment of a work fruitful in great results.

The protection of Providence, so manifestly on our side during the war, will not fail to a peaceful enterprise whose object is the improvement of the lot of the greatest number. Let us continue, then, firmly our path to progress, without allowing ourselves to be arrested either by the menaces of selfishness, or by the clamors of parties, or by unjust suspicions. France menaces no one; she desires to develope in peace, in the plenitude of her independence, those boundless resources which Heaven has given her, and she will not awaken gloomy susceptibilities, since out of the state of civilization in which we are that truth springs day by day with greater force which consoles and reassures humanity—that the more a State is rich and prosperous the more she contributes to the riches and prosperity of others.

THE STORY OF CHEVY CHACE.

It was in the reign of Henry VI. of England, and of James I. of Scotland, that the hot-headed Percy, Earl of Northumberland, made a vow, and swore a great oath, that he would hunt for three good days among the Cheviot Hills, in spite of his Scottish foe—tha brave and mighty Earl Douglas—and all his clan. He declared that he would kill the fattest harts in all the forest, and carry them away to feast upon in his grand castle. When the bold Douglas heard this, he laughed, in a grim, mocking way, and sent the Percy word to look for him, also, at that merry hunting.

Lord Percy came out of Bamboro, with a company of fifteen hundred archers, and began the chase among the beautiful Cheviot Hills, early on a Monday morning, in the golden autumn time.

By noon they had killed a hundred fat deer. Then they blew a loud bugle-call, and all came together to see the quartering of the game. Then the proud Lord Percy said, "The doughty Douglas promised to meet us here, to-day; but I knew full well the braggart Scot would fail to keep his word."

Just then, one of his squires called his attention to a sight which quickly changed his opinion of the Scottish chief.

Down below, in Tivlotdale, along the borders of the Tweed, came a host of full two thousand men, armed with bows and spears, bills and brands. As soon as they came near to the hunters, they cried out, "Leavo off quartering the deer, and look to your bows; for never, since you were born, have you had greater need of them than now."

The Douglas rode in front of his men, his white plumes dancing in the wind, and his brazen armor flashing in the mid-day sun; and when he spoke his voice was like a trumpet—so clear, and strong, and threatening.

"Ho, there!" he cried; "what men, or whose men are you? And who gave you leave to hunt in Cheviot, in spite of me?"

Then Lord Percy, with a black frown, and a voice like thunder, answered, "We will not tell thee what men, nor whose men we are; but we will hunt here, in this chace, in spite of thee and all thy clan. We have killed the fattest harts in all these forests, and we intend to take them home and make merry with them."

"By my troth!" answered the Douglas, "for that boasting speech, one or the other of us must die this day! But, my Lord Percy, it were a pity to kill all these guiltless men, in our quarrel. We are both nobles of high degree, and well-matched; so let our men stand aside while we two fight it out."

The Percy agreed to this; but neither his nor the Douglas' men would consent to stand still while their lords were fighting.

So the English archers bent their bows, and let fly a perfect shower of arrows, and the Scottish spearmen charged upon them. Then the English and Scots both drew their swords, and fought face to face, and foot to foot. And so began one of the most terrible fights that the sun ever looked upon. Soon the Douglas and the Percy came together, and fought till the blood spirted through their armor, and sprinkled all the ground around them in a thick, red rain.

At last the Douglas cried, "Yield, Percy, and I will take thee to our Scottish king, and thou shalt be nobly treated, and have thy ransom free; for thou art the bravest man that I ever conquered in all my fighting!"

"No!" replied the proud Earl; "I have told theo before, and I tell thee again, I will never yield to any man living; so lay on!"

Just then an arrow, sent by a strong English archer, came singing sharply through the air, and pierced deep into the breast of the Douglas. He gave one cry—"Fight on my merry men, while you may; for all my days are over!" and then straightened himself out and died.

Lord Percy took the dead man's hand, and said, "Woe is me! to have saved thy life I would have parted with my lands; for in all the country there was not a braver or better man!"

As he stood there lamenting, a Scotish knight, called Sir Hugh Montgomery, came galloping up on a swift steed, and drove his spear clean through Lord Percy, so that he never spoke more. Then an archer of Northumland took aim at Sir Hugh, with an arrow tipped with a white swan's plume, and the next moment the knight fell from his saddle; and the plume on the arrow that struck in his breast was no longer white, but red.

And so they went on till evening, and still the battle was not done. Then they fought by the moonlight, until the night winds sighed about them, and the skies wept till tears of dew, and the fearful little stars glinted down upon them through the moaning trees.

In the morning it was found that of the fifteen hundred archers of England there were living but fifty-three; and of the two thousand spearmen of Scotland, but fifty-five, and these were so weary and wounded that they gave up the fight.

When it was told to the Scottish King James, at Edinburgh, that the noble Douglas had been slain at Cheviot, he cried, "Alas, woe is me! for there is not and never will be such another captain in all Scotland."

But when the word was carried to King Henry, at London, that Lord Percy had been killed at Cheviot, he said, "May God have mercy on his soul! I have a hundred captains in England as good as ever he was; nevertheless I pledge my life to avenge thy death, my gallant Percy!"

To fulfill this angry vow, he went to battle against the Scottish King, and made the lives of six-and-thirty of his bravest knights, and many hundred gentlemen and soldiers, pay for the life of the Percy.

Soon the Scots avenged themselves; then the English; till it seemed that there would be no end to the fighting, and blood-shed, and sorrow that came from that hunt in the Cheviot Hills, most often called "Chevy Chace." For century after century, the descendants of the men who fought there were at deadly strife; and few, I fear, were as noble foes as the great Douglas and Lord Percy.

At last they forgot that the first cause of the quarrel was a dispute about the right to kill a few deer, between two chieftains who were reconciled in death, and they went on hating, and robbing, and killing one another; fighting, all the while, in the darkness of ignorance, and superstition, and fierce, wicked passions. But after awhile God sent a better day to England and Scotland—a day of knowledge and true religion; and by its light these men saw that they were brothers—flung down their swords, and clasped hands and were at peace for ever.

THE EMPIRE OF MOROCCO.

The Empire—as it is called—of Morocco embraces nearly one half of the northern coast of Africa, extending from Algeria on the east to the Atlantic on the west—an average width of 200 miles, and a depth of at least 500. It is divided by the Atlas mountains into two regions, the one sloping northwardly and westwardly towards the sea and the other stretching into the desert. It is this northern slope, commonly called the Riff coast, which has been the scene of the late military operations. Upon this coast the Spaniards have long possessed several penal settlements or presidios, the principal of which is Ceuta. Tetuan is also on the Riff coast—it is, or rather was, before it was knocked to pieces by the Spaniards, a town of about ten thousand inhabitants, without a harbor of any importance, and with little or no trade to speak of. Tangier is the residence of the foreign consuls; Salee is the decayed station of the Moorish navy, and Mogador is the only port of consequence on the Atlantic coast. In the interior, however, are several large and populous cities—Morocco, the residence of the Shereef, or Emperor—Fez, the seat of the University, and the religious capital of the Empire, and Mequinez, the military capital, where the Imperial treasure is deposited. This treasure, which is kept in vaults, and is said to contain $50,000,000 in money, would be splendid booty for the Spaniards. It would more than pay the expenses of the war, but whether the Spaniards will be able to lay hands upon it is very doubtful. It is guarded by the regular army of the Emperor, sixty thousand strong, and which, according to the last accounts, has never yet been in the field—never having stirred from its post at Mequinez. The troops whom the Spaniards have been fighting are the wild Arabs and Berbers of the Riff coast, who constitute the militia of the country, and who have fought for the most part under the leadership of their own sheiks or chiefs. The way in which the Emperor has acquired this enormous amount of treasure, the accumulation of which is said to have been the one aim of his life, is characteristic of the people and the government. The Emperor permits the Governors of the towns and provinces not only to collect the taxes, but to extort from the people whatever sums of money they please, subject to the single condition of honoring the Emperor's drafts for whatever amount and at whatever time he may please to draw. In a word, says an English writer, the Governors are the Shereef's sponges, and are squeezed as often as they become full. Leeches, as is well known, are an important article of export from Morocco. There are human leeches there, it would seem, as well as other.

The people of the country are fierce and fanatical. The Spaniards have found them brave to a degree of desperation, and what with the increased difficulties of transportation in a mountainous and roadless country, and the obstinacy of the inhabitants, there can be no doubt that any advance

New Orleans Christian Advocate.

Terms—$2 00 per annum, in advance.

NEW ORLEANS:

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 28, 1860.

SENDING OUT ACCOUNTS.

We are now sending out the accounts of the Advocate as rapidly as possible. We send a list to the preacher, and individual accounts to the subscribers, at the same time. We send accounts to all who have not paid to January, 1861, it matters not how small the amount; because we wish all accounts to begin and end with the year. We are as careful as possible; but should there be mistakes, let us know immediately. Let all pay up to 1861, and the accounts will be much more convenient to our subscribers, and also to ourselves.

LET US HAVE THEM.

The next issue of the Advocate will be the first one in April. The price from then to the end of the year will be only $1 50. We shall increase the edition for the benefit of those who may subscribe during the month, etc. We want ONE THOUSAND NEW SUBSCRIBERS to begin at the date specified. An average of THREE EACH from all the preachers who receive the paper gratis as agents, would accomplish it. We place it at the lowest figure, that it may be easily done, and done at once. Every agent could do it within one week after reading this.—We merely state the proposition; we will not urge it. Can our friends be brought to do a great thing, so easily done, for a good newspaper of their own? The paper speaks for itself. This issue, in order to get in the stirring news of the time, has cost us something. Much matter, advertisements included, is unavoidably postponed till next week. Be patient.

AN INSPIRED PULPIT.

The health of the world and of the Church.—Luther, Calvin, Wesley—Rev. Dr. Malan, of Geneva—Chalmers and Summerfield—Mr. Guinness—Spurgeon—The Methodist Ministry.

Only angels, and a few chosen, far-seeing, deep-thinking, more than usually inspired men, it seems, can adequately conceive how much the health of civilization, the saving spirituality of the Church, and the salvation of men, depend upon an inspired pulpit. In the days of the Apostles, the pulpit was inspired, and its "word was with power." Losing its inspiration in ecclesiastics, forms and learned scholasticism, the Church was dead, and the world in gloom, until Luther and Calvin arose. The same was true of religion in England when the Wesleys and Whitefield awoke the slumbering Church with tongues of fire, and the inspiring sound of the gospel trumpet. Whenever the pulpit loses its power, the land sinks into unbelief and irreligion. The land of Luther is a pertinent illustration. Evangelical religion is struggling for existence there, but the great German revival, corresponding to the English and American revival of a century ago, is yet to come.

Nothing is more conclusive on this subject than the history of Rev. Cesar Malan, D. D., of the city of Geneva, Calvin's home. About the time of Napoleon's downfall, two Americans, Rev. Dr. Mason, of New York, and Rev. Matthias Bruen, of Philadelphia, visited Geneva. On their arrival they found that one of the chief attractions there was a young clergyman, who was also an officer in the University, and whose brilliant and wonderful eloquence drew crowds of earnest admirers around him, each Sunday, in the Cathedral where Calvin's voice had rung three centuries before.

But the genius of the young preacher was not inspired by the Holy Ghost, nor his eloquent lips touched with hallowed fire. He was a Socinian, as most of his brother clergymen, were. He was the descendant of Malan de Mariadol, a nobleman of the South of France, whose family suffered persecution on account of its Protestant faith. One of the female ancestors of Dr. Malan was buried alive with a Bible in her hands because she would not renounce the belief of her heart. It was at the time of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes that a branch of the Malan family was driven to Geneva. But his education had been tainted by the scoffing scepticism of Voltaire. How had the mighty fallen! Calvin's pulpit usurped by Socinianism, and the eloquent son of the Huguenots blinded by French infidelity.

Dr. Mason and the Rev. Mr. Bruen sought an interview with their new acquaintance, and unfolded to him those leading gospel truths of which he was totally ignorant. His heart became warmed. He began to inquire of the Bible, and before the arrival of Robert Haldane in Geneva he had actually preached a sermon which was doctrinally true, yet without exciting much attention. Then came Haldane's teaching. Day by day, without intermission, for many months did that pious Scotch layman hold forth the truth to all who could come to his house. All Geneva was aroused. Sunday after Sunday sermons were levelled against the doctrines taught by Robert Haldane. The Venerable company of Pastors endeavored to put him down, but the flame was not long destined to smoulder. It was to Malan that the grace and the glory were given to be first to raise from the ground the tarnished banner of the Church of Geneva, and from the pulpit of Calvin boldly to proclaim that gospel whose echoes sacredly lingered within his temple. Whether it was that Dr. Malan's change of doctrine was not perceived, or that the coldness of his manner betrayed the truth that his soul was not yet fully awakened, his orthodox sentiments glided over the minds of his hearers without disturbing the stillness of spiritual death. But when he was indeed aroused, and the sentiments came to be uttered before the Arian and Socinian company, by lips touched with fire, all the enmity of the natural man rose up in arms against the faithful witness for a dishonored Savior. His eloquent words dropped on the leaden slumbers of his audience like bolts of fire shot from Heaven. Pastors, professors, syndics, and private citizens were cut to the heart, and almost gnashed on him with their teeth, as Dr. Malan descended from the pulpit, and passed through their opening ranks unrecognised, as avoided and rejected man. His own relatives turned away from him with mingled emotions of disappointment, vexation and shame. His attached wife, not then a partaker of the same glorious faith, beheld him with a grieved and wounded heart, and reproached him with the shipwreck of all the cherished dreams of their young ambition. He walked in his robes from the ancient temple to his own house, dejected and overwhelmed, about to hide himself in his secret chamber. But, on entering the door, the manly form and benignant countenance of Robert Haldane met his eye, and his sinking spirits were revived as by a cordial, when his hand was grasped, and the words were heard, "Thank God, the gospel has been once more preached in Geneva!" But the deep wound he had given could neither be healed nor forgotten. It burned in a thousand minds, and called for revenge. And revenge was carried out by the most insulting contempt. Dr. Malan was hurled down from the giddy heights of popularity, where he had stood apparently so safe only a few weeks before. He became an outcast and was considered a traitor.

But several influential Christian friends came to him from England, and it was then that Dr. Malan entered into those relations of personal friendship with some of the most eminent of English Christian noblemen and statesmen, relations which, to this day, have been to him as great and constant a source of joy. The Rodens, the Castlereaghs, the Gainsboroughs, the Mandevilles, and several German and Russian princes, and even two queens, are among the many distinguished personages who have repeatedly visited Geneva in order to seek religious advice from this earnest and eloquent divine. For many years he has extended the warmest and most generous hospitality to the thousand foreigners who were anxious to meet him; and his house was the head-quarters of such persons as the world honors, as well as of humbler ones.

The conversion and ministerial history of the great, and good, and useful Dr. Chalmers illustrates with equal force, the doctrine of this article. So also, was the history of "that burning and shining light," in whose luminous radiance the nations "rejoiced for a season," John Summerfield. The great power of all of them lay in their inspiration—the baptism of the Holy Ghost. More recently, we have had other illustrations. Mr. Guinness, who is now in this country, is not a great man, intellectually or otherwise. But thousands attend his ministry, and, for his age, a very large number have been converted through his preaching.

He is now in his thirtieth year. His father was an officer in the army, and brother of Guinness the celebrated brewer of Dublin. His mother was the widow of Capt. D'Esterre, who fell in a duel with the late Daniel O'Connell. He received a religious education in his youth, and is said to have been the subject of strong convictions in reference to his spiritual state. These seem to have passed away as he approached manhood. When he was about twenty-two he resolved to go to sea. He accordingly left England and visited the southern shores of this Continent, the West Indies, Mexico, Texas, and returned improved—physically, mentally, spiritually. He had not been a heedless spectator of the ways of God, as these are to be seen in the mighty sea. He had become better acquainted with himself and with his fellow men. In 1854 he set out on a voyage to the East Indies; but the vessel was forced to put back in wrecked condition. Young Guinness was taken violently ill, and returned home apparently dying. About this time he appears to have experienced a change of heart, and to have consecrated himself to the service of Christ. In January 1856, he entered college with the design of qualifying himself for preaching the gospel. While he remained at college, he spent all the time he could spare from his studies among the poor, teaching them and explaining to them the way of salvation. He addressed audiences wherever he could find them. For a time he preached to the inmates of the workhouse in Cheltenham, where he was attending college. Being disappointed one day in addressing a congregation here, as he returned home he took his stand in a retired part of the city, began to read aloud from his Bible, when a crowd gathered around him, which he addressed from the fifth verse of the thirtieth Psalm—"Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning." He pursued this, as well as other methods, for the purpose of benefitting the souls of those around him, while pursuing his preparatory studies. He was ordained as an evangelist in July, 1859, —ministers from different denominations engaging in the ordination ceremony. Previous to this, however, he had occupied for three months the pulpit of the tabernacle Moorefields, London, the same place where Whitefield had preached the Gospel with so much power and success. Within the short space of two years and a half, Mr. Guinness has traveled through England and Scotland, proclaiming everywhere to large assemblies the good news and glad tidings of salvation. He also visited France, and is now in the United States.

All who pray in faith for the coming kingdom of Christ will pray that God may give him yet greater success, and raise up more like him. An educated ministry is a want of these times, but an inspired ministry is the want of all times. The regret of all sincere christians that Mr. Spurgeon has "defiled his garments" by "entangled alliances" with modern fanatical reformers, is not so much for his opinions, which are of little weight on these subjects; but that an inspired, powerful, and useful preacher is hindered in his ministry. The great value of the Methodist ministry has been its inspiration and living power. Shall another Wesley ever be needed to awaken it?

MR. SPURGEON'S MANIFESTO.

Mr. Spurgeon is simply a great preacher, and, now that he has tried to be something else, has committed a fatal mistake. He is constitutionally fitted for a preacher, and was happy enough to be "obedient to the heavenly vision" by which providence leads men to their rightful vocations. He is objectionable, in many things, to the clerical taste of the times, and, doubtless, some of these objections are founded in truth. But all original and forcible characters are similarly inharmonious with taste and conventionality. This very ruggedness is at once an evidence of force and an element of success. Great successes are always accompanied by great offences against conventionality. Mr. Spurgeon's originality, in the sense alluded to, is not affected or forced to extremes. However self-conscious and even egotistic he may seem to be, he is, at the same time, both simple and natural; that is to say, he is sincere and true to himself. Subjectively great men, though most egotistic, have least appearance of it; while objectively great men, though least egotistic, are most chargeable with it. Success in thought is not necessarily attended with egotism; success in action nearly always is. Had Mr. Spurgeon arisen and made his debut in the United States, he would not have acquired such a reputation as he has. There would have been but little novelty in his earnestness, spirituality, and evangelical eloquence. Such preachers are not so rare in the United States as in England. Nevertheless, Mr. Spurgeon is a great preacher—a man of original mental force, and of real gospel power.

That he should have deviated from the simple mission for which he is so eminently fitted, and in which he has been so useful—directly useful at home, and relatively useful abroad—is deeply to be regretted. It is to be regretted because he is wrong—wrong in mixing up politics with the gospel, and wrong in the political sentiments he has espoused, or rather taken upon himself to promulgate. It is to be regretted because it is foolish. Like Whitefield, he is a great preacher, and like Whitefield, he is nothing more. He is no more equal to the political problems of the times, than was Whitefield to the theological problems he undertook to solve. Great in his true sphere, he has made himself ridiculous by entering one where he is a pigmy. The contempt he incurs in this false relation will react upon him in his true one, and do him great injury there. It is to be regretted, because, were he right in sentiment, his course is utterly useless. The people to whom he preaches are not connected with slavery. The people of this country, who are connected with it, and have studied it, and practically know all about, will pity his folly, and be as much influenced by his opinions as by those of "the man in the moon." Even the abolitionists of this country, who have duped him into this folly, will like him no better for it. The New York Independent, the principal organ of Northern ecclesiastical abolitionists, has already intimated to him, even in the same paper in which appears his anti-slavery manifesto, that he had better try his strength upon the cotton buyers and manufacturers of his own country, who are the principal supporters of slave-labor. Mr. Spurgeon's usefulness will be injured every where, because it is undeniable that among earnestly christian people, in Europe and America, whatever their political sentiments, there is a feeling of repugnance to the abolition mania in the pulpit. There is an unmistakeable taint and universally offensive odor about it.

Mr. Spurgeon deserves pity, because, in the new field upon which he has entered, he is a mere child—a poet in a battle-field. He is misled by an unconscious vanity. "The serpent beguiled him and he did eat." The furor with which the press of his own denomination in the South has denounced him is superfluous and in bad taste. The denunciations of the secular press have been undiscriminating and excessive. A young, ardent, earnest, eloquent christian preacher, who has maintained his integrity amid an amount of adulation sufficient to turn a stronger head, has simply made himself ridiculous by expressing opinions common in his own land, about which he knew but little, and which his popularity has deceived him into believing will be of weight in this country. And, to make the matter worse, he has assumed the tone of authority with which he, very properly, proclaims the gospel to the multitudes of London sinners who attend his ministry. It is all very foolish, but very natural, under the circumstances. As to burning his books, and similar excessive demonstrations, it is equally natural, under the circumstances, and equally foolish. There are always a few who take advantage of a general feeling to commit excesses which are not at all representative of the character of the sober and intelligent majority. Devotion to truth and principle, and fidelity to right and duty, never call for such exhibitions; nor is any cause in the least benefited by them. The people of this country are becoming old enough to cease these modes of expressing their sentiments which properly belong to the uncultivated and oppressed masses of the cities of the old world, and some in the new, who have no mode of getting a hearing before the public but in mobs, and "strikes," and riots.

DR. LIVINGSTONE'S AFRICAN EXPEDITION.

DISCOVERY OF A NEW LAKE.—EXTENSIVE COTTON GROWING COUNTRY.

Further intelligence has reached us from Dr. Livingstone. At the Kongone, December of last year, Dr. Livingstone was in the enjoyment of excellent health. The little steam launch, supplied to the Zambesi expedition by Mr. McGregor Laird, is not at all adapted for navigating the Zambesi, being neither able to carry nor to tow, nor to attain, whilst burning wood, a speed of more than four knots per hour. Notwithstanding the repairs by the Lynx engineers, the little craft's plates are in such a corroded condition that she will, in all probability, be abandoned after taking Dr. Livingstone back to Tete. Mr. T. Baines, the artist of the Livingstone expedition to the Zambesi, came down to Cape Town in the steamer Lynx. He left Dr. Livingstone with his brother, the Rev. C. Livingstone, Dr. Kirk, the botanist, and Mr. Ray, the engineer, at the mouth of Kongone. They were about to return to Tete, whence they were to proceed to the country of the doctor's old friend, Sekeltu, the chieftain of the Makololo, on which excursion they would probably be absent about eight months. They expected that, against their return, a new steamer would be sent out from England.

The navigation of the Zambesi is still an open question, so far as experience has yet gone; but it is expected that during the flood season it will be found in every respect to meet all anticipations. Mr. Thornton, the geologist, left Tete in July last, in company with some Portuguese traders, on an independent expedition into the interior of the country. He was, however, expected to return at the commencement of the present year, and it is likely he will be able to furnish some interesting information regarding the lands through which he traveled. The party had all, more or less, suffered from fever; but Dr. Livingstone had endured the least. The following are extracts from letters received from Dr. Livingstone:

We have traced this river (the river Shire) to its departure from the hitherto undiscovered Lake Nyassa, or Nyinyesi. This discovery opens a cotton-producing country of unknown extent, there are no frosts to endanger or cut off the crops, and one sowing of foreign (probably American) seed, already introduced by the natives themselves into several districts, serves for three years' crops, even though the plant is annually burnt down. We found that the Shire, which is easily navigable for 100 miles above its confluence with the Zambesi, has only 33 miles of cataracts above 15 deg. 55 min. south latitude, when the river becomes placid again, and continues so right into Nyassa, in latitude 14 deg. 25 min. south. The land above the cataracts and east of the Shire is arranged in three terraces of different heights. The lower, or that of the valley of the Shire, is about 1,200 feet high, and exactly like the valley of the Nile at Cairo. The second is three or four miles broad, and over 1,000 feet in altitude; while the third is over 3,000 feet at its western edge, and some 12 or 15 miles broad. These terraces are wonderfully well watered with running rills of deliciously cool water. There is also considerable cultivation of cotton of the indigenous kind, which requires to be sown annually.

We travelled in the hottest season of the year, or that called la West Africa "the smokes," when, from the burning of tens of thousands of acres of tall grass the atmosphere takes the appearance of a partial London fog. The valley of the Shire was then very hot and stifling, but one day's march took us up to the third terrace, where it was delightfully cool. On this terrace, which is about equal in altitude to Table Mountain at the Cape, long talked of as the highest in South Africa, rises Mount Zomba, which we ascended, and found to be between 7,000 and 8,000 feet in altitude. Here, though it was cold, there is considerable cultivation, though not of cotton. We have not, thanks to Heaven, lost a man yet, though, from the leaky state of our vessel we never could keep water from our beds, and have long lain on damp, rotten cushions. A common road could easily be made past the cataracts, and a small steamer made to unscrew could be replaced on the lake.

The land beyond Zomba contracts into a narrow isthmus between the Lakes Shirwa, or Tamandua, and Nyassa. The former we found to be about 90 miles in length, but no one could tell us where the head of Nyassa lay. There was a swell on it as on the sea, though there was no wind, and it given off the Shire constantly without rising or falling to any extent. The Shire is from 80 to 100 yards wide, about two fathoms deep, and has a two-and-a-half knot current. A lake giving off such a body of water must itself be large. Where we saw it the width was eight or ten miles.

The two lakes lie parallel with the east coast, and all the traffic from the central region must cross at certain fords, the chief of which is situated at the point of departure of the Shire, for there the traders can pass along the isthmus, between the lakes, without embarking on either. They then diverge to Mozambique, the Angoria river, and other parts.

We met a large east coast slaving party here coming from Cazembe's country with an immense number of elephants' tusks. A more blackguard looking set I never saw; they appeared to be the people of the Angoria river, but were not Arabs, though somewhat like them. When they knew we were English they slipped off by night. The English name is well known far into the country. A colony of our own honest poor would be a great advantage to both England and Africa; and were our religious as well as mercantile establishments planted simultaneously I have no fear as to the result. I have submitted a plan to Government by which I think this new field may be occupied advantageously, and a command of a large portion of the east coast slave market obtained. This is the work which I proposed to myself when the expedition was planned.

In a subsequent letter addressed to Sir Roderick Murchison, dated November the 6th, Dr. Livingstone describes another mountainous and healthful region parallel to the Shire, lying to the east of the Lakes Shirwa and Tamandua and Nyassa, and which, like Mount Zomba, rises to 7,000 and 8,000 feet in height. In concluding this letter he says, "develope lawful trades, including the cotton trade, in this hilly and healthful country, and slavery is doomed over a very large district."

THE CENSUS AND THE CHURCH.

The Census of the United States is to be taken during the present year. It is very desirable that the statistics of religion, and of the Churches, so far as they are to be embodied in the census, should be comprehensive and accurate. This is alike important to the historian, the philosopher, the christian, and the citizen. We have never examined one of the census blanks, and do not know either to what extent religious statistics are included, nor upon what class or classes of persons thoroughness and accuracy may be made to depend. We call attention to the subject, however, that those concerned may be properly awake to it. The following account of the method adopted in taking the census of the United States, we copy from an address made by Mr. Kennedy, Superintendent of the Census, before the American Geographical and Statistical Society in New York, which at the present moment will be read with interest:

The General Government has in each State and Territory one or more judicial districts, with each one of which is connected a marshal, who acts as high sheriff in the District Court of the United States. These marshals are required by law to subdivide their districts, and to each subdivision to appoint an assistant—taking care not to include a greater population (by estimate) than twenty thousand in any one subdivision.

The assistants having been qualified (by oath) for the proper performance of their duties, are furnished, through the marshals, with blanks and instructions.

In the prosecution of their work they are required to make two copies of their work. The original returns are filed with the Clerk of the Court of each county, and the copies are forwarded to the marshal, who transmits one copy to the Secretary of the State for his district, and the other to the Census Office in Washington. The compensation to the marshals is in proportion to the population enumerated by his assistants; should that exceed one million, he is paid one dollar for each one thousand persons enumerated. Should the population returned by his assistants be less than one million, he receives the sum of one dollar and twenty-five cents for each one thousand returned; a system of compensation sufficiently moderate, but which may admit of the payment of a greater amount for a lesser service, as in the case of a marshal whose returns include nine hundred and fifty thousand persons, at one dollar and twenty-five cents per thousand persons, no more than he whose returns do not much exceed one million—an inequality not unusual in rating fees for mileage and service.

The assistants who perform the work of enumeration are paid on a different principle, combining in a novel manner, compensation for labor and travel; one that was found to operate very fairly and satisfactorily to the employees and to government. His allowance is two cents for each person enumerated; for each farm ten cents; for each establishment of productive industry fifteen cents; for social statistics two per centum on amount allowed for enumerating the population, and two cents for each mortality return, with ten cents per mile for travelling expenses, to be ascertained by multiplying the square root of the number of dwelling houses in his division, the product whereof is to be derived from the number of miles traveled, and eight cents per page for two copies.

The marshals and assistants in California, Oregon, Utah and New Mexico, under the operation of an amendment law, received compensation at the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, which was determined by the addition of one hundred per cent.

RUSSIA AND THE EUROPEAN COMPLICATIONS.

A strangely interesting letter, from Moscow, written by F. S. Claxton, Consul, to the State Department, and published in the National Intelligencer, may, or may not, help to explain the apparently unaccountable weight recently attached by England and France to the faintly expressed dissent of Russia to their programme for the settlement of the Italian question—causing them to oppose the annexation of Tuscany to Sardinia. Apart from this suggestion of the danger, felt by France and England, of the approach of Russia, by this strangely circuitous route, to Turkey, India, and China, the letter is full of interest. It gives us a glimpse of an almost entirely unknown region. It presents us the vision of American enterprise gradually leading the van of civilization into the almost mythic regions of Independent Tartary. It conjures up cities of large size and population and trade whose names are hardly known, and where "cotton is carried to market." We live in an age "upon which the ends of the world are come," in more senses than one. The letter says:

An adopted American citizen, Mr. Charles T. Huffstettin, at present in the employ of the Russian Government as geologist and mineralogist, having just returned from a visit to an examination of that portion of Independent Tartary lying to the north of Khiva and Bokhara and east of the Aral sea, has made such statements respecting that unknown and unexplored region that I deem it proper to transmit the information to the Department, regretting that I am unable to enter more into details.

Mr. Hoffstettin conversed freely enough until he discovered the purport of my inquiries, after which he became more guarded and only declined permitting me to glance over his notes, or to write out the result of his observations, that I might enclose them to you. It will be recollected by the Department that some ten years since a Russian corps d'armee, whilst marching on the Khiva from Oleuburg, became lost in the desert of Bourouk and the Embinsku steppes, and nearly all perished. Since then information has been gradually and secretly sought, and the object of the expedition of which our countryman was a member was of an exploratory character. It consisted of an officer of the corps des mines, General Kartine, Governor of Olenburg, an officer of topographical engineers, and Mr. Hoffstettin. No escort was provided, and the intentions of the party concealed. They left Moscow last spring, and, descending the Volga, landed at Karagan, on the eastern shore of the Caspian Sea, and proceeded thence by camels to Khiva and Bokhara.

My informant states that the amount of traffic along this line is enormous. As many as three hundred camels arrive at and leave Khiva each day. The principal article of merchandise transported westward is cotton, which grows and thrives on the steppes. It is of shorter staple than our own, and commands in Kazan, where it is manufactured into yarn and cloth, about fifteen cents a pound, (English); manufactured silk, of inferior quality, (used here for dressing-gowns,) camel's hair, pistaches, gold dust, and precious stones, are the remaining articles of commerce. In exchange, the Tartars take cotton goods, cutlery, fire-arms and powder, with some few of the European luxuries.

The climate is represented as very mild, about that of the central provinces of France. Furs are not worn, and the Russian stove unknown. The whole country from the Caspian to Bokhar, was found a succession of steppes devoid of timber and water. In the neighborhood of Bokhara good timber lands abound. Inns or hotels were not to be found; nothing but the bare walls of the "Strauger's Karavansaries," where it was expected that both bedding and food should be provided by the lodgers.

The population of Khiva was estimated at over 30,000; that of Bokhara at 125,000; that of the entire country not calculated. Each city is the capital of its respective district, governed by nominally independent princes or khans, who are naturally very much under Russian influence, to which country they pay a very heavy tribute, under the name of presents.

The language of the people is Tartaric, but Sclavonic terms and expressions are so much interspersed, and the intercourse with the Russians so constant that no difficulty was found in making themselves understood in that language by the party. The people throughout were found most peaceable and hospitable; their houses far more comfortable than those of the peasants and lower classes in Russia. Mr. Hoffstettin says they might be termed luxurious; their furniture all, as a matter of course, of Eastern style—divans and cushions forming the principal part.

After leaving Bokhara the party proceeded north into the Kirgees country, and thence across the frontier to Orenburg.—The same quiet inoffensive people were found as in Tartary proper—their habits nomadic and their occupation entirely pastoral. Flocks of sheep and herds of cattle, numbering many thousand, were frequently met with, and as a consequence meat very cheap—one copec per pound; flour the same.

The mineral resources of this section were found to be almost fabulous, and to verify the previous reports and rumors was part of the object of the exploration. Gold, copper, iron and quicksilver, as well as precious stones and marbles, were found, the gold and silver in rivers, and rich "diggings" (washings) of the former, which yield from to twenty-five roubles per hundred pounds (about eighty cubic feet) of earth. Amongst other natural curiosities the party visited a volcano, where the scoria was pure iron; in fact, the mountain was a grand natural smelting furnace. Porphyry, malachite, turquoises, emeralds and sapphires were seen, and some fine specimens brought away.

On this Russian territory the land was much less auriferous; nevertheless, some two thousand persons were engaged in gold digging, and with fair returns, labor being cheap. Parties hire lands from the proprietors or officers of the Crown, and obtain privilege from the proper officer to work a certain tract, generally two versts square. The serfs are hired for six months, and are bound to remain for that term. The police of the district being performed by Cossacks, but little difficulty is encountered in keeping the people at work, but considerable danger is run from the soldiery themselves, who often rob the successful operator. The gold is received at the Government assay office, and a receipt given, which is cashed either in St. Petersburg or Moscow.

With so rich a prize as the land of the Kirghees at their very door, it is not very surprising that the Russians should desire its possession, and that every step made should be with this ultimate view. Mr. Hoffstettin says the Government desires to construct a railroad from the Caspian to Khiva. Whenever completed, it would certainly place the country at the mercy of an invading force, the more so as all the employes would be necessarily Russians.

Independent Tartary, remote as it is, and difficult of access at present, will soon be brought within easy communication with European markets by means of a railroad now in process of reconstruction between the rivers Don and Volga. The road in question will be but forty miles in length, and will constitute the only land carriage between the ports of the Caspian and Black Seas.

Another route, to which I referred in my report on the trade of the Caucasus, will, if ever opened, prove more direct; a road from Poti, the seaport of Tiflis, via that city and Koora or Cyrus river, will obviate the navigation of the Don, the transhipment and descent of the Volga.

THE BALTIMORE CONFERENCE.

The Baltimore and East Baltimore Conferences of the Methodist Episcopal Church, North, both met on the 29th of February last. Bishop Simpson presided at Baltimore, Bishop Morris at East Baltimore. The Baltimore Conference took strong ground against abolitionism, which, by some logical slight of hand, they distinguish from anti-slaveryism. The former was denounced, nothing was said about the latter. The Conference is officially and historically committed to the anti-slavery platform, however. The following are their resolutions, on the subject.

Resolved, 1. That we sincerely deplore the agitation of the slavery question, both in the Church and State, and earnestly hope and fervently pray that this discreditable and disastrous strife may speedily cease.

2. That this conference disclaims having the least sympathy with abolitionism. Or the contrary, we are determined not to hold connection with any ecclesiastical body that makes non-slaveholding a condition of membership in the Church, and that we are opposed to any inquisition upon the motives underlying the relation of master and slave.

3. That the subject of slavery should be committed exclusively to the jurisdiction of the respective conferences in which it may be found to exist.

4. That no action of the General Conference can influence us to violate principles and practices, as indicated in the foregoing declarations; but that we will stand by the rights and interests of our people to the last extremity.

5. That our mission, as ministers of the New Testament, is to preach the Gospel of the Son of God both to master and slave, and to devote ourselves wholly to our appropriate work of winning souls to Christ.

6. That we solemnly remonstrate against the continual aggressive discussion of the slavery question in the newspapers and periodicals of the Church.

7. That the publishing funds and establishments of the Church are common property, held in trust by the General Conference for our common and equal use.

8. That any such use of our common publishing funds, newspapers, periodicals, etc., as precludes our people from the benefits of them, while they are in no false or illegitimate relation to the Union, but are faithful to its covenants, is an abuse of trust.

It cannot be denied that they have changed their ground since the division of the Church in 1844. Then they were in the habit of expelling their members for buying and selling servants, and their ministers for owning them. Now, though they have the same Discipline, it is a dead letter. They are theoretically anti-slavery, and practically just in the position of the Southern Methodist Church. They cannot remain long in the Northern Church, in this attitude, unless that Church stultifies itself, as Baltimore has done; which is not probable.—Nor have we the least idea that the Conference can ever prosper again in Maryland and Virginia, committed, as it is, to an anti-slavery platform. Its present position will not satisfy either the North or the South. The East Baltimore Conference simply non-concurred with the changes in the Discipline proposed by the ultra-abolition Conferences.

WAR ON THE RIO GRANDE.

United States Troops in Mexico.—From the Brownsville Flag we learn that the Texas Rangers, under Capt. Ford and Lieut. Pugh, with the two companies of U. S. Cavalry under Capt. Stoneman and Lieut. Kimmel, had crossed the Rio Grande for the purpose of attacking Cortina at the Rancho de la Mesa, only six miles from the scene of the last action at the Bolsa, on the 16th. Says the Flag—

When they had arrived within half a mile, they surprised a picket guard, who immediately gave the alarm. Several shots were exchanged and two persons wounded—one a Mexican soldier, the other a woman who was trying to shut a door, out of which a Mexican officer was shooting at our cavalry—before it was discovered that the surprised party claimed to be Mexican National Guards, upon which the firing immediately ceased.

When our forces were at breakfast, about 150 Mexicans, horse and foot, made their appearance and desired a conference; they stated that they were Mexican National Guards, in search of Cortina, but could give no information respecting his whereabouts, and concluded by requesting our officers to take no further action in the matter till they could communicate with Matamoras, which our forces did not seem inclined to do, replying that they were pursuing Cortina, and should adopt such measures to take him as circumstances might seem to require. It was subsequently learned that these National Guards had been watching our forces during the previous day and night, and the conviction that they were only prevented from attacking our troops through fear, is very strong.

They drove in the pickets and made prisoners of all the occupants, including some thirty-five or forty armed men, but no Cortina. Shortly after daybreak the main body of the troops from Matamoras made their appearance and exhibited no little astonishment at finding the Americans in possession of their camp, and claimed the prisoners taken as a portion of their own men; but were unable to account for the sudden change of occupation in la Mesa, more especially as they had reported themselves whipped by Cortina the day previous, some miles below. On Monday the Mexican authorities sent a formal request to Major Heintzelman to withdraw our troops, which he has not yet seen fit to to do, and they are still encamped in Mexico; he, however, on Sunday last, sent up a battery of twenty-four pounders to reinforce them.

"It is useless and absurd longer to doubt the complicity of the people and authorities of Matamoros with Cortina and his acts. With very few exceptions they are Centralists at heart, and are but waiting the downfall of Vera Cruz, or the approach of a central army, to pronounce; and both are looked for daily. On the authority of the Mexican Consul at this place it is reported today that Miramon had dispatched a force of four thousand men to Matamoros and this frontier; if this be so, they will meet no resistance, but be welcomed by the Mexicans along the whole route, as Carvajal's men are starving and deserting by hundreds."

LITERARY NOTICES.

The Haunted Homestead; and other Nouvellettes, with an Auto-Biography of the Author. By Mrs. Emma D. E. N. Southworth, author of "Deserted Wife," "Lost Heiress," etc. Philadelphia: T. B. Peterson & Brothers, 306 Chestnut street. For sale in New Orleans by J. C. Morgan & Co., Exchange Place.

Mrs. Southworth is a Southern author, and a very popular one. She is also very voluminous, having published, exclusive of the present, about a dozen works of fiction. A child of sorrow, deserted as a wife, with two little children to support, without means, she was accidentally led to the use of her pen, and acquired fame, and, we imagine, fortune. She is now writing for the New York Ledger, under a munificent engagement. The present work, we imagine, will be as popular as anything she has written.—It is composed of two large and two small nouvellettes—the first two partaking of that marvellous tinge common to spiritualistic writers; though professedly founded on facts, and admitting, as the author thinks, of a natural solution. Mrs. Southworth's conceptions are vivid, and her style strong. Her excellencies and her defects arise from the same source. Her writings are sensational, and therefore ephemeral—attractive, but not sound and pure.

The London Quarterly Review. January, 1860. New York: Leonard, Scott & Co., 79 Fulton street. For sale in New Orleans by J. C. Morgan & Co., Exchange Place.

The contents of this number are interesting and valuable. In the first article—Three Colonies of Australia—there are the following striking statements about the production of gold:

The net gold produce of Victoria, a colony of Australia, from 1851 to June 30th, 1858, was 16,555,838 ounces, the value of which, in sterling money, was £62,428,852. The net quantity and value of gold exported from the two colonies of Victoria and New South Wales, from May, 1851, to 31st December, 1857, is 17,023,413 ounces, valued at £65,122,360. The price of labor is so high that "three tuns of quartz are at present thrown away to one that is crushed. Quartz that will not yield one ounce and a half to the ton, on an imperfect system of crushing and amalgamating, is abandoned for road metal.

In a letter bearing the date of 1839, Count Strzelecki alludes to the existence of gold in Australia. In 1844, the Rev. W. B. Clarke detected gold when crossing the dividing range to the westward of Paramatta, and addressed a letter on the subject to the Governor, but without effect. Neither Strzelecki nor Clarke had printed a word upon the subject "when Sir Roderick Murchison put forth his grand generalization. Without any other guidance than his own sagacious deductions from geological facts, this eminent geologist boldly predicted the truth.—In 1846, a year before even the Californian discoveries, when addressing the Royal Geological Society of Cornwall, he strongly recommended the unemployed Cornish miners to emigrate to New South Wales and dig for gold in the debris and drift of what he called the Australian Cordilliera, where he anticipated from their similarity with the Ural Mountains, that it would certainly be found in abundance. The visions revealed to the prophetic eye of science have never received a more remarkable fulfilment."

As to Cotton, which the gold of the world buys, the second article—Cotton Spinning Machines and their Inventors—a valuable paper, at this time especially—states:

In the year 1801, the facilities of manufacturing had been so much multiplied by various mechanical inventions, the entire stock in Liverpool had become reduced to one bag! In Smith Homans' "Cyclopædia of Commerce" (Harper and Brothers, 1858) some curious statistics of cotton supply are given. It is there stated, "the earliest record of sending cotton from this country to Europe is in the table of exports from Charleston, in 1747-48, when seven bags were shipped; another parcel, consisting of 2000 pounds, was shipped in 1770, and a third shipment of 71 bags was made in 1784, which England seized, on the ground that America could not produce a quantity so great. In 1791 the export of American cotton, almost exclusively to England, was 489,416 pounds. In 1800 it increased to nearly 18,000,000 pounds; 1850-52 to 927,237,189 pounds. In the year 1859 there were consumed in England 1,859,828 bales of cotton, weighing 1,192,000,000 pounds. The value of the cotton manufacturing industry of the world is estimated at $600,000,000. Taking the population of the world at 850,000,000, every man, woman, and child annually uses cotton goods to the value of seventy cents. Of the raw cotton produced, the United States supplies more than three-fourths. The value of raw cotton exported from the United States, in 1859, is about $100,000,000.

The other articles are: China and the War, the text of which is Mr. Oliphant's new book, "Lord Elgin's Mission to China and Japan;" The Roman Wall; Religious Revivals—a great paper, intrinsically and relatively; Life and Works of Cowper; Reform Schemes.

Narrative of the Earl of Elgin's Mission to China and Japan in the years 1857, '58, '59. By Laurence Oliphant, Esq., Private Secretary to Lord Elgin, Author of the "Russian Shores of the Black Sea," etc. New York: Harper & Brothers, Publishers, 1860. For sale in New Orleans by Thos. L. White, 105 Canal street.

The reading public have been awaiting with interest the appearance of this book, and it will not disappoint them. The Chinese and Japanese constitute more than a third of the population of the globe; to diplomacy, to commerce, to Christian missions, they are the most important people on the globe; the opportunities afforded Mr. Oliphant for observing and describing them were the best ever enjoyed by an Anglo-Saxon; and he has made good use of his opportunities.

The book is a portly volume, handsomely bound; the paper is good, the type is large and clear, and the illustrations give vividness to the description. The interest of Western nations in descriptions of Chinese life can never die, much as we have heard of them. Indeed, we have just begun the study of Chinese history and civilization. It will, for generations to come, have the charm of medieval romance, and all the practical importance of its relation to a third of the population of the earth. The same may be said of Japanese life and civilization. They are not so numerous as the Chinese, but all descriptions of them are stranger and more interesting than the best fiction. They are, indeed, a wonderful people.

These columns have borne frequent testimony to the importance of having taught, in all our Christian Colleges, the Spanish language and literature, in view of the increasing importance of Spanish America to Christian missions (think of the opening of all Mexico to Christian missions, upon the triumph of the Juarez Government, one of the planks of whose platform is religious freedom) —the same doctrine is true in regard to China and Japan. Their history and literature should now be studied in all our male colleges. In the meantime, Mr. Oliphant's book will interest and benefit both the student and general reader.

Harper's Magazine for April has reached us.—Artist-Life in the Highlands of New Jersey, and Gold Life in the Mines of California, form appropriate subjects for illustration, by pen and pencil, in the first two articles. Thomas Dunn English has a poem on the Fight at Lexington which stirs the heart like a trumpet, while the illustrations make a man think of "gathering" his rifle, and fighting revolutionary battles over again. Mr. Charles Nordhoff has a sorely-trying and a sweetly-soothing story of the sea and of the soul, called "Capt. Tom

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVCCATE.

MARCH 28, 1860.

RIOT AT ROME.

The spirit of discontent is rife even under the shadow of the Vatican. Whilst Pius IX. is engaged in his desperate and hopeless conflict with his imperial antagonist of the Tuileries, he has also to contend with a sharp fire in the rear. A correspondent of the London Times gives a graphic account of an outbreak among the students of the Roman University, in which about one hundred of them were at first engaged, but which soon enlisted them very generally. One of the government functionaries, who was seated in the library to receive signatures to an address in behalf of the Pope, was assailed by them. Violent epithets were poured out without stint, and from words they proceeded to blows. The functionary was assailed with kicks by some, whilst others more remote hurled books, rulers, and ink-stands at his head. They were threatened with a descent of the soldiers, but they declared that if one of them showed his face, they would pitch him over the balustrade into the paved court beneath. One of the Cardinals attempted to quiet the excitement by conciliatory words, but his voice was drowned by a storm of shouts and hisses. They ultimately compelled some of the government party to go after the offensive address, meanwhile retaining hostages to secure the return of the messengers. The paper being brought, was torn to pieces, and the fragments were afterwards burnt, the auto da fe being consummated amid such an uproar as the venerable walls of the Sapienza had never before shaken with. This is another of the portentous signs of the times.

SPEECH FROM THE POPE.

At the inauguration of the new North American Theological Institution at Rome, the Pope alluded at length to the existing differences with his rebellious subjects in the Romagna, with Sardinia, and above all with Napoleon, and said:

We will not depart a single step from the way which we have marked out for ourselves, and we will stand steadfastly by the mode of government we have hitherto supported, steadfast as the stone on which he founded this Church, to whom the King of Kings promised his assistance, whom he made his spouse, and against whom the gates of hell shall not prevail.

Alas! if we shall be called upon to say the final word. The vengeance of God will fall upon them, and we also will cry vengeance—yes, vengeance, vengeance. There his voice failed him; he paused a little and then continued: But what will be our vengeance? that of supplication and prayer? Yes, let us all pray, my dearest children. Pray, to the end that God may keep such evil far from his Church, such misfortunes as his enemies seek to bring upon it, and let us pray, because we can assure you that God always listens to us, and begins to lift the cloud which darkens our horizon, where even now appear some rays of light; let us pray that he will restore to our sorrowing hearts that peace and tranquility so necessary to the welfare of the Church, and in this hope I bestow upon you the Apostolic benediction.

A letter from Rome adds the following:

The French general who was sitting with one leg crossed over the other, not far from the Pope, at the first words I have underlined, looked at the Pope fixedly through his eye-glass; and when he received the blessing, kneeled slightly, looking with a meaning glance at the Pope, the audience and the capitolo, then, while all pushed forward, surrounding the Pope, some to kiss his feet, some his robe, his hand, and some to speak words of consolation to him, the general took French leave.

SCHAMYL.—The Kalouga Gazette announces the arrival in that town of Schamyl's family, consisting of fifteen persons, including his two wives, two sons, and five daughters, with their husbands and children. Schamyl was reading when the approach of the party was announced, and he appeared at first greatly moved by the intelligence, but soon recovered his composure, and knelt down to offer up thanks to heaven. He then sat down to the table, and had just begun dinner when his youngest son, who had ridden on first, entered the room. The reception was very ceremonious, though both were evidently much affected. After kissing his father's hand, the young man retired to some distance, and, standing in a respectful attitude, answered Schamyl's inquiries. The rest of the family were received in the same manner, the men first and then the women. When all were in the room, Schamyl directed them to join him in returning thanks to God for their prosperous journey.

THE PRINCE OF WALES' VISIT TO CANADA.—It is officially announced that the Prince of Wales is to visit Canada. He will be the first Prince of Wales who ever came to America, but not the first one who came near coming here. The first Prince of Wales of this line—George Augustus, afterward George II., did not live on good terms with his father, George I. They hated each other cordially and puteroully, and the Earl of Berkley, so goes the story, wrote out a scheme for the transportation of the Prince of Wales to America, where he was to be kept in confinement so close that he should never be heard of again. Lord Berkley was then at the head of the Admiralty, and retained his office though the King would not adopt his plan for the suppression of the family feud. When the Prince became King, he found the document among his father's papers, and was highly enraged on reading it, as a much milder tempered man than the Prince would have been. We have had on English King in America—William IV.—and a French King—Louis Phillipe—and a Spanish King—Joseph Bonaparte—and a French Emperor—Napoleon III.—but we never had a Prince of Wales.

MARRIAGE OF PRINCESS ALICE.—The Brussels journal contains the following:

The project of marriage between the Prince of Orange and the Princess Alice of England, appears fully decided on, as well as the visit which the young couple will pay to King Leopold, the great uncle of the bride, when their Royal Highnesses shall leave England for Holland. The marriage will, it is thought, take place on the 24th of May, the anniversary of the birthday of Queen Victoria. The Princess Alice Maude Mary was born on the 25th of April, 1843; the Prince of Orange, Rear Admiral and Major General and Commander of the Brigade of Reserve of the Dutch Army, on the 3rd September, 1840.

LOCAL.

HORRIBLE POISONING AFFAIR.—On Tuesday, after the graduation of the medical students of the University of Louisiana, a dinner was given in compliment to one of them, Dr. Hunt, by Mr. T. L. Lemley, the well known lawyer, at his residence on Jackson street, near Chippewa, in the Fourth District. Beside Mr. Lemley and his family and the young doctor, were a number of ladies belonging to different families in the neighborhood. At night, all those who had partaken of the dinner became sick, at their different residences; on Wednesday many of them got worse; on Wednesday night a little boy died; and the suspicions of the physicians were confirmed that the whole of the sick persons were suffering from poison, taken in some article of food at Mr. Lemley's dinner. The Chief of Police and his officers, and Coroner Beach, at once set about investigations. The following were the parties poisoned: Mr. Lemley, his wife, a daughter seventeen years old, and a child; Mrs. Young, his wife's sister, with her daughter, a young lady, and a little son five or six years old. This little boy was the one who died. Three negro servants of Mr. Lemley are also among the sufferers. Miss Semles, sister of the wife of the Rev. Mr. Markham, of the Presbyterian Church; Miss Hall, a young lady stopping with Mrs. Young, and her daughter and little boy at the house. Mr. James Phelps, her son, a youth of eighteen, and Miss Bonligny, a young lady residing with them. Young Dr. Hunt partook of everything with the rest. After the dinner, he took the evening train of cars for his home in Mississippi. He has not been heard from since. The article of food which contained the poison was the jelley called "Charlotte Russe." It was made by Mrs. Lemley and the other ladies. Mr. Lemley's cook is a mulattress named Ann, belonging to him; a very morose and illtempered creature. She is strongly suspicioned of having done the horrible crime.

Mrs. Lemley has since died, and others are expected to die.

THE LATE DISASTER ON THE LAKE.—The bodies of the people lost by the burning of the steamer Judge Porter, (which happened on Tuesday morning, 13th instant) on Lake Pontchartrain, within a mile and a half of the shore and within a mile of the Carrollton and Jefferson Railroad wharf, which the boat was approaching, having come round direct from Montgomery, Ala.,) commenced rising to the surface of the water on Monday.

Captain Shields was the last, except the pilot, to leave the burning boat. He stated that there was scarcely any of the panic on board, owing on such occasions; the fire was in the rear part of the boat, and the officers and passengers got on the forward guard, and prepared to jump and swim, some of them taking off their coats and shoes. After jumping over, two men got into a pirogue which had come to the rescue; the pirogue rolled over, and they were drowned. Just about the time the crowd were preparing to jump over, the boat ran aground; she swung round; the wind then swept the flames forward to the bow; this was at the time at which most jumped over; and it is believed that as there were good enough swimmers in the crowd to have reached the shore easily, they must have drowned by not being able to get away from the boat quick enough as she swayed around. The people on shore say that the fire was hardly perceptible till the boat swung round, when in an instant, being loaded with cotton, she was enveloped in flame.

FULL MEXICAN NEWS.

Capture of the Hispano-Mexican Steamers.

In last week's Advocate there was an account of the beginning of the seige of Vera Cruz, the head quarters of the Juarez, or Liberal Government, by Miramon, the leader of the Church party; and also of the capture of two Spanish war-steamers, sent from Havana to assist Miramon, by Capt. Turner of the United States war-steamer Saratoga, under orders of Commodore Jarvis. One of the Spanish Steamers was named the Gen. Santa Anna, and the other the Gen. Miramon, the first had previously been called the Marquis de Habana. The prizes are worth, it is said, $60,000, containing six mortars, six 32 pounders, 2000 stand of small arms, 1500 shells, etc. The loss of them it is thought, will render Miramon's seige of Vera Cruz hopeless, if not before.

Their Crews and their Statement.

The crew of the Spanish steamers, 250 men, Spanish, French, Americans, and Manilla coolies, seem to have been ignorant of the nature of the expedition. They say they sailed from Havana Feb. 26, were promised pay which they did not receive, and that they did not fight, but that the fighting was done solely by the officers of the vessels, and some of Miramon's officers who came on board just before the affair.

Their Approach to Vera Cruz.

They approached Vera Cruz on the 6th. A signal, and then a shot, from the castle, to show colors, and a signal from the United States sloop of war Savannah, they heeded not, but passed, anchored at Anton Lazardo, 15 miles below Vera Cruz, where Miramon had a signal flag. French, Spanish, and English vessels paid no attention. Capt. Turner, ordered by Capt. Jarvis, went in the Saratoga, towed by the Wave and Indianola, American steamers in the Juarez service, with about eighty men, to learn their nationality and purpose. Busy commealeating with the shore, though the moon was bright, they did not observe the approach of the Americans. They find steam up, however, evidently prepared to fly. When hailed, they began to move. A blank shot was fired to bring them to; they kept on.

The Pursuit and Fight.

The Indianola pursued the Gen. Miramon. Both the Spanish vessels fired on the Americans. The Saratoga opened a broadside upon the Gen. Miramon, on board of which was Commarin, and came near sinking her at the first shot. She returned the shot. The Indianola came up with her. The Miramon showed light, the Indianola returned her fire, and boarded her at the point of bayonet. The Indianola had her pilothouse carried away by a cannon shot. No one was wounded except, Gen. Goicourin, her owner, who received a slight wound on one of his hands, and three American sailors. The enemy under Marin fought with desperation, and the loss was great. Those killed on board their ships during the fight were thrown overboard. As the Indianola boarded the General Miramon, a number of the enemy rushed forward and jumped into the sea. Many were drowned, and some few next morning picked up. The total amount of prisoners is about 150.

While all this was going on, the Saratoga was paying respects to the Marques de la Habana. This was the vessel which cleared from Havana as a Spaniard. She did not offer much resistance. A single shot from the Saratoga brought her to, and then for the first time she hoisted the Spanish flag.

The affair finished, the Wave, until now in attendance on the Saratoga, went to the aid of the Indianola, from which the Gen. Miramon was making a desperate effort to escape, after once being boarded. The Miramon, in endeavoring to escape from them, passed within point-blank shot of the Saratoga, which immediately opened her batteries, and swept the Miramon's decks with a larboard broadside, at the same time delivering her starboard broadside into the Marquis de Habana. The Miramon continued the fight for some time, her pivot forward gun being well manned and handled. The officer in command of the gun, seeing the hopelessness of any further resistance, refused to continue the fight, whereupon, it is said, he was set upon by the desperate crew with knives and badly wounded. In her flight, however, she ran aground, and after a few shots, surrounded. She was not gotten off till two days afterwards, and then only by the aid of her consort, the Marquis de la Habana. She was finally towed into Vera Cruz, by the Indianola; while the Marquis de la Habana had the unexpected honor of returning the compliment, by towing back the Saratoga.

The first engineer of Marquis de la Habana was an American. He was killed by a shot from the Saratoga; a thirty-two pound ball which entered her bulwarks about midships, on the starboard and passed through the larboard side, making a round, clear hole, as if it had been cut with a circular saw. In its passage this ball carried off both legs of the unfortunate American who, in an evil hour, doubtless under the pressure of some desperate stress of fortune, had enlistened in Marin's enterprise. It is remarkable that he was the only person on the Marquis who was killed, and he was the only American in her crew. He lied to death lying on his back, which, with his blankets, is still to be seen, saturated with his blood, within a few feet of where he received his death wound. The name of this unfortunate man was not known to any on board. His trunk will be opened when the United States Marshal obtains possession of the ship, in order to obtain some clue as to his indentity.

The first engineer of the General Miramon was a Frenchman. He was also killed. The second engineer, also a Frenchman, was at last accounts still at his post, but under the command of an American engineer. Among the prisoners more particularly mentioned are Sir. Rafael and the Able Chaudron, well known at Vera Cruz. The important captive is Commodore Marin himself.

Captain Turner's Interview with Marin.

When Marin came on board the Saratoga, Capt. Turner asked him why he had thus fired upon American vessels, without any provocation whatever, and in violation of every rule of honorable warfare. Marin replied that his men were composed of all sorts of people, had been but recently shipped, were badly disciplined and could not be controlled. He confessed that he knew the Saratoga to be an American vessel and that he understood all her signals, but protested that he did not order a shot to be fired. Captain Turner listened to these protestations in silence and then added: "You have been guilty of a great outrage. You alone are responsible for this unhappy affair, and upon you rests the responsibility." Marin responded meekly, that he regretted it very much, whereupon Capt. Turner left him to his sorrows, and turned away. Marin is said to have lived at Havana, while the expedition was being fitted out, in the house of the Captain of the Port; and all the prisoners declare that the arms, munitions and stores were put on board with the knowledge of the Government.

They committed the first violence, fired the first shot, wounded American citizen on the decks of our own ships, and were justly punished and treated as pirates and freebooters. It will be worse than vain and foolish for the Spanish authorities to complain of the insult to their flag in this affair. Their several dispatches and protests to Capt. Jarvis will be treated with little attention and respect. The other officers of the foreign vessels at Vera Cruz, including the British and French commanders, approved and applauded the conduct of our Commodore.

Miramon Before Vera Cruz.

Our latest advices from Vera Cruz are to the 12th. Miramon was still before the city in force, preparing for its bombardment. The number of his men is put down at about five thousand; his artillery at fifty to sixty pieces. Some six or eight of these are heavy mortars throwing sixty-eight and eighty-four pound shells. It is believed he was depending upon the captured steamers for both shells and powder.

From both the city and the works of the besiegers there is firing throughout the day and the night. Sometimes also small batteries are sent out from the city to annoy the enemy at their works.

The city of Vera Cruz is entirely deserted, except by the soldiery. A perfect confidence seems to prevail in the ability of the city to make a successful defence. The confidence has been very much strengthened since the capture of the Marin expedition.

Bombardment of Vera Cruz.—Victory of the Liberal Forces.

SOUTH-WEST PASS, March 23.—The schooner Emily Keith Captain Lockwood, has arrived with advices from Vera Cruz for the evening of the 14th inst. She reports that Miramon, having established a battery of twenty guns, commenced the bombardment of Vera Cruz on on the 13th, which was kept up briskly during the night, the garrison returning the fire with spirit, and the fire of Miramon doing comparatively little damage to the city.

On the morning of the 14th a detachment of Miramon's troops which had been recalled from Alvarado, when near Vera Cruz, were attacked by a force of the Liberal army sent out of the city to intercept them, and after a brief combat the Miramon troops were driven back and completely routed by the Liberals.

Soon after this disaster, Miramon sent a flag of trace into the city, desiring a suppension of hostilities, which was granted by Juarez.

Miramon's proposal far a conference was also accepted, and a military congress, consisting of the principal officers of each army, also the representatives of the Foreign Powers at Vera Cruz, met on the evening of the same day to discuss the proposition of Miramon.

The result of the conference had not transpired when the Keith sailed.

Half an hour previous to the sailing of the Keith, it was currently reported at Vera Cruz that Miramon had abandoned the siege, deserted his army and take refuge an board one of the French vessels of war off Sacrificios.

Miramon's communications in the rear had been entirely cut off and his army was in a desperate situation, unable to communicate with the Capital or to receive supplies from the country, to any considerable extent.

The capture of the Marin piratical steamers was a fatal stroke to his enterprise, and it is believed he now only demands liberal terms for his followers.

The city of Mexico had pronounced against Miramon, and his army were deserting him at every opportunity.

No particulars of the movement against Miramon at the capital, but it was confidently stated as a positive fact.

One day Later from Mexico—Recommencement of Hostilities.

SOUTH-WEST PASS, March 24.—The schooner Virginia Antolnette, Captain Sloan, has arrived here. She sailed from Vera Cruz on the evening of the 16th inst., and brings one day later news than was received by the Keith.

No further details respecting the military conference, but it appears that on the night of the 14th it was broken up without having arrived at any satisfactory basis of settlement.

On the morning of the 15th the bombardment of the city recommenced from Miramon's batteries, and the fire was kept up with unabated fury up to the time of the departure of the schooner.

The fire was far more effectual and much heavier than on the 13th, and it is presumed Miramon had been improving the occasion of the suspension of hostilities to establish new batteries and strengthen his works in violation of the terms of the armistice.

Shell and shot were falling in various parts of the city, and already several persons had been killed, and the shell and round shot were doing much damage to the city. A great many shots had fallen among the shipping anchored in the harbor, under the Castle of San Juan de Ulloa, but so far as known, when the Virginia left, no damage had been sustained by the shipping.

Two Spanish war steamers had just arrived at Vera Cruz as the schooner sailed.

Capt. Flanders, late of the steamship Indianola, is among the passengers by the the Virginia Antonette.

Hungary and Italy.

PRESBURG, March 6.—The Evangelical community have unanimously refosen to submit to the imperial decree of the 1st of September, and to the Ministerial ordinance of the 2d of September.

TRIAN, March 6.—The clergy of Milan have appointed a commission for collecting subscriptions to assist the emigration from Venetia.

THE ITALIAN QUESTION.

INTERESTING AND IMPORTANT DOCUMENTS.

The London Times, of March 5, (brought by the Teutonia) contains the dispatches from the French Foreign Secretary to the French Embassadors in Turin and London, developing the new proposition of Napoleon III. in regard to the settlement of the Italian question, which were briefly mentioned in the summary of news by the steamship Asia. These dispatches are decidedly important, and we therefore give them in full, that our readers may have a clear understanding of the present aspect of the Italian question—the more necessary as new complications may now arise, a foretaste of which is, indeed, presented in the announcement, in the telegraphic summary of the Canada's news published this morning, that "Sardinia has rejected a portion of Napoleon's programme in relation to Italy," and that "the French troops in Italy have, in consequence, received orders to be ready to march at a moment's notice, the evacuation of Lombardy and the return of the French troops to France being threatened if Piedmont persists in opposing the views of France." Here are the dispatches:

France and Sardinia.

PARIS, Feb. 24, 1860.

To Baron de Talleyrand, Minister of France at Turin:

Monsieur le Baron—I have the honor to send you herewith a copy of the dispatch which I have addressed to the Embassador of the Emperor at London, and in which, making known to him the opinion of the Government of his Majesty on the reply of the Vienna Cabinet to our proposals, I point out to him the best line to be followed, according to my idea, to relieve all responsibilities, without depriving any one of his legitimate freedom of action, as also to get out of a situation which would shortly become as dangerous as it is now confused, if left to itself and to the chance of incidents. The moment has, then, arrived for every one to speak out, and I will now give you, without any reserve, the views of the Emperor's Government, so that the Turin Cabinet may form its own judgment as to how far it may suit it to conform thereto in presence of such revirons—I may say such solemn conjunctures.

The double object, which we have never lost sight of, and which we ultimately wish to attain, with the concurrence of Sardinia, is this: So to manage that, on the one hand, the results of the war may not be compromised in Italy itself; on the other hand, to obtain that they may, in a more or less near future, be consolidated by the official adhesion of Europe—or, in other words, to prevent complications which would give up the Italian Peninsula to anarchy, and to found a durable state of things, by placing it as soon as possible under the protection of international law.

The Cabinet of Turin can assist us in the accomplishment of this task, and the success would probably be certain. It is also free to adopt a different line, but the general interests of France would not allow the Government of the Emperor to follow it—and frankness compels us to say so. It is these two systems, between which the Government of his Sardinian Majesty has to choose, that I am now going to consider with you.

I am convinced, M. le Baron, that if the Turin Cabinet shows itself resolved to consider, and make every one consider, the organization which a portion of Italy is called upon to adopt as constituting the origin of a historical period without a preliminary term fixed for its duration in the conditions of order and of peace, the very nature of things will overcome many obstacles. That this organization should have such a character in the opinion of all men, it is necessary that it should not contain the elements of eventual and probable disorder, either within its own self, or in its external relations. The Government of the Emperor, for its part, is firmly convinced that one and the same cause would produce either effect, and that it would be unmistakeably manifest from the day upon which it should undertake a work not of proportion to its regular means of influence and of action. If Sardinia extends her territory too far, the work of assimilation would present obstacles which she ought not to overlook. She would, in fact, find herself less powerful, and, especially, less mistress of her resolutions; she will be dragged along; she will no longer direct, and the impulsion which she has made the strength and the success of Piedmont in these latter years will no longer emanate from Turin.

It is not at a moment, M. le Baron, when the destinies of the Peninsula are on the eve of a final solution, that the Government of the Emperor would hesitate to express itself with frankness which testifies, however, to the lively interest it feels in a friendly and allied Court; let us, then, frankly say that the sentiment which brought forward in certain parts of Italy the idea of annexation, and which gave rise to the expression of that wish, is rather a manifestation directed against a great Power than a well-considered attraction towards Sardinia. Such a sentiment, if not checked at the outset, could not fail to fall into errors which it would be the duty of the Turin Cabinet to oppose. Could it do so for any length of time, without being rightly reproached for denying and betraying the cause for which alone it was aggrandized and armed? No one can say, and what is likely is that it would be exposed to two eventualities equally to be deplored.

Taking everything into consideration, M. le Baron, with the firm intention of selecting that solution best suited to the pressing circumstances of the moment and of a calmer future, it will be admitted that it is high time to come to a settlement that may be offered to Europe with some chance of being accepted, and which would conserve to Sardinia the full exercise of the moral influence which she has a right to hold in the Peninsula.

Such a combination, maturely considered by the Government of the Emperor, is on follows:

1. Complete annexation of the Duchies of Parma and Modena to Sardinia.

2. Temporal administration of the Legations of the Romagna, of Ferrara and of Bologna, under the form of a vicariat (hereditary) exercised by his Sardinian Majesty, in the name of the Holy See.

3. Re-establishment of the Grand Duchy of Tuscany in its political and territorial independence (autonomie).

In this arrangement, the assimilation confined to Lombardy and to the Duchies of Parma and Modena, would no longer be a work to which Sardinia would be bound to devote all her efforts exclusively; the Turin Cabinet would preserve its liberty of action, and might exercise it in establishing tranquility in Italy, while organizing in a compact kingdom the Territories added to the hereditary possessions of King Victor Emmuel. The vicariat would be, in harmony with the municipal spirit which is a secular tradition in the Romagnas, as with the natural influence which the Power must exercise, that has become mistress of the greater portion of the valley (bassin) of the Po.

This manner of settlement would, moreover, have the advantage of guaranteeing to Sardinia the position which is necessary to her in a political point of view, of satisfying the Legations in an administrative point of view, and, in a Catholic point of view, it would constitute a temperament which we hope would fully satisfy all scruples and consciences. Such a result would not be indifferent to France, as she could not in principle admit a radical dismemberment of the States of the Holy Father without compensation; nor can it be indifferent to Sardinia. We shall neglect nothing that the other Powers, enlightened upon the impossibility of restoring completely the ancient order of things, and of not taking present necessities into account, shall exert themselves to make the Pope understand that such an arrangement, frankly accepted, would shield all the essential rights of the Holy See.

What I have said, M. le Baron, of the necessity of anticipating the dangers to which Sardinia might be exposed if she looked for further aggrandizement, is more particularly applicable to Tuscany. The idea of the annexation of the Grand Duchy, that is to say the absorption in another State of a land gifted with so powerful and so noble a history, and so attached hitherto to its traditions, cannot assuredly emanate except from an aspiration, the danger of which it is impossible for the Government of the Emperor to disown, and which it has by far from believing that it is shared by the mass of the population. That aspiration, there must be no delusion, whatever may be at the present moment, I doubt not, the correct intentions of the Sardinian Government, reveals on the part of those whom it carries along with it an arriere pensee of a war with Austria for the conquest of Venetia, and an arriere pensee, if not of revolution, at least of menace for the tranquility of the States of the Holy See and of the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies. It is impossible to deceive public opinion in Italy or elsewhere, and the question which it is our object to settle, would only be re opened, more embittered than ever.

The Government of the Emperor, without overlooking the difficulties which would remain to be overcome to secure the triumph of the solution to which, if the Turin Cabinet would assent, it would devote its most energetic and persevering efforts, entertains the confidence that those difficulties would not be insurmountable. Certain, moreover, of operating upon a basis of a nature to satisfy completely France and Sardinia, to pacify Italy for a long period, and not to hurt in too absolute a manner any of the interests which Europe has a right and duty morally to watch over, the Government of his Majesty would not only not hesitate to promise to take in a Conference or Congress the defense of such an arrangement, but it would proclaim it as unattackable, in its opinion, by foreign intervention. In this hypothesis, then, Sardinia would be sure of having as with her and behind her. You are authorized to declare this formally to Count Cavour.

Do I need now, M. le Baron, long details to explain what would be our attitude if the Turin Cabinet, live in its option, should prefer to run all the risks which I have pointed out while advising it to avoid them? The hypothesis in which the Government of his Sardinian Majesty would have to rely only on its own forces develops itself, so to say, naturally, and it would be painful for me to dwell upon it.

I therefore confine myself to say, by the Emperor's orders, that we will not consent at any price to take upon ourselves the responsibility of such a situation. Whatever may be his sympathies for Italy, and especially for Sardinia, which has mingled its blood with ours, his Majesty would not hesitate to evince his firm and decided resolve to take the interests of France as his sole guidance. As I have observed to Count de Persigny, to dissipate dangerous delusions is not an abusive restriction of the use which Sardinia and Italy may wish to make of the liberty we are proud of having assisted them in obtaining, and which is finally confirmed by the declarations which the Government of the Emperor has recently obtained from the Court of Vienna; it is simply, I repeat it, making good the independence of our policy, and placing it in safety of complications which we shall not have to resolve, should our counsels have been powerless in preventing them.

I shall not conclude this dispatch, M. le Baron, without saying a few words to you respecting Savoy and the County of Nice. The Government of the Emperor has regretted the premature and out-of-place discussion of this question by the public journals; but it cannot refrain from taking it as the expression of an opinion which daily gains in strength and weight. Historical traditions, which it is needless to recall, have accredited the idea that the formation of a powerful State at the foot of the Alps would be unfavorable to our interest, and, although in the arrangement developed in this dispatch the annexation of all the States of Central Italy to Sardinia should not be complete, it is certain that in the point of view of external relations it would be equivalent, in reality, to an analagous result. The same provisoes, however distinct they may be, claim the same guarantees—and the possession of Savoy and of the County of Nice, excepting the interests of Switzerland, which we always desire to take into account, also presents herself to us in that hypothesis as a geographical necessity for the safety of our frontiers.

You must, therefore, call the attention of Count Cavour to this point; but you will state to him, at the same time, that it is not our wish to constrain the expression of the popular will; and that the Government of the Emperor, moreover, would not fail, when the moment should appear to him to have arrived, to consult first the great Powers of Europe, so as to prevent a false interpretation of the reasons that would direct his conduct.

You will please read this dispatch to Count Cavour, and leave him a copy. THOUVENEL.

France and England.

PARIS, Friday, Feb. 24.

To Count Perigny, Embassador of France at London:

Monsieur le Comte—I have already had the honor of transmitting to you the two dispatches which M. le Comte de Rechberg has addressed to Prince Metternich, and which contain the reply of the Cabinet of Vienna to the explanations which the Emperor had commanded me to accompany the propositions which emanated from the Government of Her Britanic Majesty. I have abstained from retiurning with the Embassador of Austria to judgments, the sincerity of which I in no wise contest, but which are too far removed from our manner of viewing the matter to render it useful to attempt to rectify them.

I have preferred to pay homage at once to the sentiments of moderation which have animated Count Rechberg when, wishing to reproduce the very terms which I had employed, he has declared that "if he deplored the divergence of opinion of our two Courts as to the practical advantage of the combination by Lord John Russell, he clung, nevertheless, to the hope of which I had made myself the interpreter when I laid it down that if the difference of principle could and in some cases ought to lead to different judgments, it was not necessary that the result should be, when the honor of either side was safe, disastrous conflicts and these so far removed from the intentions of both France and Austria. Although it was coupled with the assurance that Austria would do justice to the motives which command the two Powers to abstain from an armed intervention in Central Italy that declaration which, I admit, shuts out all adhesion on the part of the Cabinet of Vienna to the use which we may make of the latitude which it concedes to us; but it arrises from this—and I have pointed this out to Prince Metternich, who has made no sort of objection to the justness of my reasoning—that the Government of the Emperor has now the power to examine the fourth of the propositions of her Britanic Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; it can especially, with a degree of liberty which it did not possess before the exchange of these explanations, discuss the mode of solution which that proposition implies.

This solution agrees with the principles which form the basis of your institutions, and, as I had the honor to write to you on the 20th of last month, we should not be in opposition to dispute their efficaciousness, if they were applied to other countries. We acknowledge, on the other hand, that the wish of the population has manifested itself in Italian affairs with great authority, and it is their wish which we ourselves have taken into consideration when we honestly made known to Austria the difficulties insurmountable to our eyes, which the liberal execution of the stipulations of Villa Franca and Zürich would encounter.

What, then, in this state of things is the aim, or rather, what would be the result of the proposition of the Cabinet of London? To call forth a fresh expression of the wish with the assent of France and England, in such a manner that this manifestation would receive from the previous adhesion of these two Powers a force in some sort legalized and regular. The Government of the Emperor has deliberately examined the situation which would be made for it in this eventuality, and has remained convinced that it could not succeed in settling from moral responsibility, unless the principle of universal suffrage which constitutes its own legitimacy be consecrated as the foundation of the new order of things in Italy. On quite another field the participation of France would be a manifest inconsequence to which its Government could not expose itself. Now what we are forced to consider as an absolute necessity, England, without opposing what the Governments actually established in Central Italy equally acknowledged with us, abstains from advising them to adopt. We know, besides, that these Governments would not lend themselves, except with a sort of repugnance, to a fresh manifestation which they consider to be useless, and of a nature to throw suspicion on the value of the necessity of preceding manifestations. The considerations which I have just pointed out, place us in the necessity of carefully weighing the consequences to which our unreserved acquiescence in the proposition of England might conduct us. To our eyes, one certain method alone can have the right to substitute a new principle of stability and order for another principle hallowed by time and the respect of peoples; but it we have the right and the duty to claim for ourselves the free exercise of our doctrines, we do not recognize it as our right to impose them on others; and we hold it, on the contrary, to be no less imperative a duty to leave them the liberty, as well as the responsibility, of their own opinions and their own actions.

I will add, M. le Comte, that the harmony which it is our lively desire to maintain between ourselves and the Government of her Britanic Majesty could not, nevertheless, prevent us from establishing the fact that our respective positions are not exactly the same. In fact, the course of events during the past year has thrown us into the necessity of sustaining the weight of a war. England, on the contrary, has been able, without harm to her interests, to remain in an attitude of expectation. God forbid that I should pretend that England ought to show herself indifferent to the happy or unhappy results of the experience to which she invites us to associate ourselves! But I shall say nothing but what is conformable to the nature of things in admitting that if this experience happened either to be wrecked in Italy itself or to provoke a European crisis, England would always be free to withdraw into the post of simple observation. This task assuredly would be less easy for France, and we have the right, without wishing to oppose ourselves to the wishes of Central Italy, and still less to dictate a solution, after consulting nothing but our own convenience—we have the right, I say, to take into our previous consideration, much more than England has any need to do so, the elements of internal order and of external peace contained in the different solutions which may be offered for the great problem which holds at the present day all minds in suspense.

The Government of the Emperor, M. le Comte, in the name of the services which it has rendered, as well as in the name of the interests which are not exclusively personal to it, thinks it has some claim to give some advice to Sardinia, and its honesty commands it to precise in some degree the amount of support which it would be possible for it to give under this or that combination. Illusions in so serious a matter would be dangerous for Italy and compromising for France; to dissipate them, therefore, is not an intention to restrain the liberty of Italy, it is simply to uphold that of France and free her actions preliminarily in anticipation of eventualities in which her interests would imperiously command her to keep away from complications from which she would have vainly endeavored to guard a friendly nation. The Government of the Emperor thinks it therefore necessary to explain itself frankly with the Turin Cabinet, to call its most serious attention to the consequences of the line of conduct, which, however, it is its own master to adopt, and to leave it in some measure a choice between two systems. It is with this object that I address to M. le Baron de Talleyrand the dispatch of which I annex a copy, and which I authorize you to read to Lord John Russell at the same time as this one.

Accept, M. le Comte, the assurance of my high consideration. THOUVENEL.

The Savoy Question.

We find in the London papers the following dispatch from Lord John Russell, the British Foreign Secretary, to Lord Cowley, the British Embassador to France, giving the views of the British Government on the Savoy question:

Foreign Office, February 13, 1860.—I have laid before the Queen your Excellency's dispatch of the 5th instant in respect to Savoy.

M. Thouvenel states, in substance, that the French Government have never concealed their opinions that if the territories of the King of Sardinia greatly increased, the addition of Savoy and Nice to France would be required for the security of the French Empire; and that the treaty of Zurich did not contemplate such an agrandizement of Sardinia; and therefore the project of annexing Savoy was no longer entertained; but that if the votes of Central Italy should enlarge the dominions of the King of Sardinia, and place him at the head of eleven millions of Italians, the security of France would require the annexation of Savoy and Nice to France.

I have to state, in reply, that, although the project of the annexation of Savoy to France has been sometime mentioned to your Excellency, yet it was in contradiction to the language of the proclamations of the Emperor of the French before and during the war in Italy, and that it is only very lately this annexation has appeared in the light of a probable arrangement.

It is only of late, therefore, that it has been thought necessary by Her Majesty's Government to state their serious objections to the project of transferring Savoy and Nice to France. Her Majesty's Government cannot conceive that the security of France—a country so rich, so populous and so military, possessing thirty-six millions of inhabitants, without counting her colonies—can be endangered by the existence on the other side of the Alps of a State of eleven millions of people, lately joined by a cement not yet dry, threatened, on the side of Lombardy, by Austria, and not very certain of its own independence.

It be said that the danger to France arises not from Sardinia alone, but from Sardinia as a member of a confederation. But it is not at all evident that a confederation of which Sardinia were a member, with only five million of inhabitants, might not be quite as formidable to France as a confederation with which Sardinia would enter with eleven million of inhabitants. The danger, if any, to France, would consist not in the small difference in the population of Sardinia, but in the strength, whatever it might be, of the other Powers who might have so combined against France.

I understand, however, from your dispatch, and from another dispatch received on the 11th inst., that the Emperor would consult the great Powers of Europe on this project, if seriously entertained, and that it never entered his thoughts to consult either the will of the King of Sardinia, or that of the people of Savoy and Nice. Further correspondence, therefore, may be reserved for future occasion. In the meantime, your Excellency will read this dispatch to M. de Thouvenel, and also that of the 28th of January, on the same subject.

If his Excellency expresses a wish to that effect, you will give him copies of both dispatches.

FOREIGN.

THE CRISIS IN ITALY.—The Circular dispatch of Count Cavour, in which he calls attention to the tyrannical acts of Austria in Venitia, especially to the forced enrollment in the army, as a punishment, of all who are suspected of hostility to the Government, had created a profound sensation throughout Europe.

The Opinione, of Turin, states, however, that the authorities of Chambery, Savoy and Nice are about to publish a proclamation on the subject of annexation to France, in accordance with Count Cavour's advice, repudiating it.

The official gazette also publishes the decree of Gen. Farini, in which he declares that the propositions for "annexation to Piedmont," or a "separate kingdom," shall be submitted to universal suffrage. The vote is also to be by ballot.

It is now generally believed that the Papal Government in the Legations is forever overthrown; that even it is no longer possible for it to establish a vicarate therein as proposed by France.

Prognostication of War in Italy.

The Cork papers, of the 8th inst., express the opinion that war is very probable between Austria and Sardinia.

Agents of the Sardinian Government are buying up cavalry horses in France, and great activity prevails in all the military departments of Piedmont.

It is stated that Count Avez has been entrusted by the Emperor Napoleon with the definite settlement of the question of the annexation of Savoy to France.

All former decrees against the liberty of the press in Florence have been rescinded.

Several Neapolitan noblemen have been arrested, and others are to be exiled.

Advices from Sicily state that the Attorney General of Messina had been murdered, and an attempt has been made upon the life of the Director of Police, by throwing at him a fulminating bomb.

Letters from Rome state that great agitation still prevails in the southern districts or marches of the Papal States, and the tri-colored flag was slightly hoisted in defiance of the Papal authorities.

More Troops for Morocco.

Advices from Madrid announce that the Spanish government is making preparations to occupy Tetuan permanently, and that several battalions in the Peninsula had received orders to be in readiness to march for Africa at short notice.

General Intelligence.

In the House of Commons, on Monday, the 5th, Fitzgerald said that he hoped Parliament would enter into a solemn protest against the intended annexation of Savoy to France.

Roebuck accused the Emperor Napoleon of having broken treaties.

The French Emperor's speech has not been favorably received in the several provinces of Italy.

The Paris Constitutional says that the message of M. Thouvenel, the French Minister, does not contain a Sardinian, but an Italian solution. It says that Sardinia will find in France an ally who will always be ready to aid her to overcome the opposition of Rome and Naples.

Advices received from Bombay state that two regiments of soldiers have been ordered to proceed immediately to China.

The quantity of gold known to be at sea, from Australian ports, bound to England, is estimated at £830,000.

The Italian Question.

PARIS, March 3.—The Monitour contains a message from M. Thouvenel to the French Embassador at Turin. M. Thouvenel proposes the complete annexation of Parma and Modena to Sardinia; the Vicarial government of Romagna by Sardinia, in the name of the Holy See, and the re-establishment of Tuscany in her political and territorial autonomy. France would not only support this combination in a Conference or Congress, but would also proclaim that no foreign Children's Column.

THE CASH-BOY.

A STORY FOR THE CHILDREN.

"Well, John, you can tell your mother that we do n't want you any longer."

Thus spoke Mr. Augustus Ledger, head book-keeper and respective "Co." of the Broadway dry-goods firm of Gazzile & Measure—meantime carefully arranging the hair over the left ear by the aid of a small mirror balanced against an inkstand.

A plaintive, scared voice came up through the bars of a desk, speaking one word of incredulousness—"Sir?" and a pair of pitiful little chapped hands fell to twirling a button on the shabby coat from pure nervousness.

"I say," continued the elegant Augustus, "you can tell your mother that we don't want you any longer. That petit-monsieur has never been found, and we can't trust you."

The poor little cash-boy turned away from his harsh judge with a spot of red on either cheek that told how he had felt the insult. The incident referred to was the mysterious disappearance of a pocket-book that Mrs. Velours had declared to have been stolen from her while in the store. She was positive where she had slid it while deciding upon the merits of some laces, and positive too that the little "tight-haired boy" was the only creature near it.—Three days had passed since then, and no traces of the missing article came to hand; and the exquisite Augustus declared that "it would not do to have such a shabby-looking boy about them any way," and he coolly crushed out hope in the boy's heart in those cruel words of which the most bitter were those, "You can tell your mother."

Mr. Ledger was a widower—had laid in a grave, to which she gladly went, a fair-haired wife. He had fancied her beauty once, but soon tired of it, and his restless, unsatisfied nature could not be true to any thing but his own supreme selfishness. So she had died one spring day when her baby-boy was three weeks old. Every body said she was a frail creature, and could not be expected to live. Augustus said so, and thought to himself how irresistible he should look in full mourning; and if there ever came a thought that perhaps a true manly heart and gentle protecting arm might have saved the poor flower, he banished it. He gave himself credit for being a "real good fellow," and so he was good to himself. His son grew up with hired nurses: and among any chance influences that drifted about him. He too was a "cash," pert and idle, but well dressed and graceful—he was the one who laughed loudest at Johnny's queer coat and patched boots. His father could not spare the time from his ledger and the cultivation of his mustache to remind him of any of those old-fashioned ideas about the religion of Jesus of Nazareth, or the glorious hope of the world to come. "To be sure," he thought, "all that was well enough for women;" "but—" And he would shrug his shoulders, and try to think of something else. There were times that would come to him when the echo of his dead wife's prayers came like a far-off sound of solemn music; but the orchestra of the theatre soon drove it away. Such was Augustus Ledger, widower, head book-keeper, and prospective "Co."

John was a little fellow, and this was his first start in life, so it was not strange the thought of "telling mother" brought the tears to his eyes. He went for his shabby cap and to say good-by to Lewis Grey, the only one in that vast hive of humanity who had stopped in the mad race for preferment to care for a poor little weed struggling for life on the borders of the highway. He it was who had slyly slipped a shiny dime now and then in the boy's hand for his mother; he it was who had defended him when Janins Ledger had made fun of the merino coat, stigmatised it as "woman-made" (that coat in whose history was bound up more of real pathos and maternal self-sacrifice than in many a moving tale of fiction)—and he, too, who had interceded for the three days' respite. "Good-by, Mr. Grey;" and the little thin hand trembled as Lewis grasped it in his own. Lewis was what every body called "awkward;" he never knew how to do a thing gracefully; couldn't dance better than a bear; and above all, couldn't endure to have any one know how soft-hearted he really was. If a beggar crossed his path, he would answer her gruffly "No;" and then, perhaps, turn back two blocks to bestow a gratuity, and hurry off again before she could say "Thank you." He was not handsome either. To be sure he had good broad shoulders and a shock of brown hair, and honest brown eyes that were not afraid to look at you; but his mouth was wide, his nose nothing to speak of, and his complexion not to be compared to the pink and white that appeared in the face of Augustus Ledger. He started as the feverish thin hand was laid in his own, and his first impulse was to catch the little fellow in his arms and fight somebody he didn't know who; his second thought was, that that course wouldn't be best: so he only said, almost gruffly, to cover his feelings at the sight of the frail boy's figure before him, "Good-by, John, don't give up the ship;" and then he wheeled straight round and turned his back to him, and Johnny quietly walked away. What made Lewis Grey stand and stare at a pile of gray and brown calicoes—why he should use his handkerchief so sonorously—or why he should remark to his neighbor, when he turned around again, "Very bad weather for colds this," I don't know, but that was the performance.

John walked out into the sunshine with a heavy heart; past the long rows of shops, where everybody seemed to have something to do and some place in this world; past the brown stone fronts where rosy children looked out of the windows; past the long markets, where provisions were so plenty it seemed as though no one ought to be hungry, in the world; and past the quiet old church-yard, where, long ago, the dead were laid, but where, now, the sod was unbroken from the first of summer sunshine until the last whirling leaves of autumn played at hide-and-seek among the tombstones. He stopped to rest and look through the iron fence at this quiet spot. A daisy, a real live daisy, grew within his reach, and as it bent toward him with the gentle wind it put him in mind of the days "when father was alive," and they lived in the country. He was thirteen years old now, but it seemed as though ages had passed since that happy time two years before, and the boy sighed wearily. The daisy kept nodding and nodding to him, as much as to re-echo Lewis Grey's words, "Don't give up the ship." Then, in a fit of childishness, he began to talk to the daisy. "Oh yes, it's very well for you to be so jolly: you don't have any trouble—we folks have to pay for being alive, when we don't care about being alive a single bit; and, daisy! you ain't tired either; your back don't ache as mine does, I know, or you wouldn't keep on bowing so! and nobody is ugly to you." As he spoke there came a great gust of wind around the corner, and, sweeping all before it, laid the flower down low in the grass. In a moment the breeze had passed, and then it was up again and nodding to John as merry as ever. He couldn't but smile at it, and at the same moment felt a light touch on his shoulder, and, turning, saw a young girl with a bundle and some books in her hand. "Well, my little friend," said she, in the genteel voice in the world, "don't you see how patient the daisy is!" and she smiled kindly as he looked up in her face. "I heard you talking just now, and I wondered whether you thought that God put you and the daisy both in this world because he had something for you each to do?" and her kind dark eyes looked inquiringly at the small grumbler. He rose from the stone coping where he had been sitting, and answered, frankly.

"Oh yes, Miss, I know—mother tells me such things, and sometimes I try to feel right but I have felt pretty bad to-day. I am not very well nowadays."

A boy's confidence is easily won, and as he walked beside Miss Katie Bonn, before he was aware he had told her of his mother's struggles for a livelihood—until now, sewing gladly for the smallest pay; how hard she worked to get the place for him, and to fit him up for it. "And now," said he, "she will be so sorry about it—to think that any body should call me a thief;" and here the trembling lip quivered too much to form the words. Sweet Katie Bonn! she listened till her own blue eyes were filling up too; but she put her hand on the boy's shoulder and said, cheerily.

"Keep up your courage, Johnny; I think I can get some sewing for your mother to do; and I'll come and see her to-morrow. Here are some tracts, and I'll write my name and number on one, and then you can come to bring home work sometimes. Good-by. I am going up home now."

The widow Mead had just finished her household work. The poor room was as bright as cleanliness could make it; the striped rag carpet was unlittered by a shred; through the open closet door the few dishes were shining and orderly; the single brass candlestick was bright as gold, and the bed covering was clean and trim. The widow had just seated herself to mend Johnny's stockings, and many a modest little bit of an air-castle was woven as well as the heel of the well-worn stockings; Johnny would get to be a clerk by-and-by, and then rise to be a "Co," and then they would have a home in the country Johnny loved so well, just without the city. There should be honey-suckles trained over the windows, and mignonnette beneath; there should be big bursting red roses every where, and a shady porch in the midst of them; and Johnny would be grown so tall and stout, and wear such nice coats and boots, and—and—so was the pleasant dream running on, when in the midst of it the door opened, and with the sound of its latch down fell the fabric she had built, for there was Johnny, poor little Johnny, tired and sick at heart. The tears would come now, and he sat down on the little stool at his mother's feet and cried bitterly, telling her as well as sobs would allow his trial and disgrace.

"Oh, mother! I can't stand it—I can't! Mr. Ledger is too bad; he knows I didn't touch the money; and I do believe his own boy, Jim, took it. You need not shake your head, mother, I do; he has had lots lately."

"My dear boy," said his mother, stroking down his fair hair with caressing hand, "my dear son, don't talk so: you must not accuse another when you felt so badly about it yourself. It will be found out, I am sure, who took it; and perhaps you can get another place soon; I am sure God will help us, if we trust in him and try to do right. It it pretty hard to forgive Mr. Ledger; but we ought to try to do it, and maybe he will be sorry himself."

Then she wiped his eyes and talked cheery and hopeful, though she knew what he did not, that the failure of his petty salary was starvation to them. She brought him some bread—the last loaf—and a little drink of milk, and sighed as she saw how weak and pale he looked. Poverty was coming pretty close now. She could get no work, and the few pence that were due for the last piece were all that she could depend upon for food for the morrow. Met with the trusting faith of a true Christian she meant what she said, when in her night prayer she asked, "Give us this day our daily bread"—ready to go out on the morrow to seek for it in every honest and laborious way; but trusting still that His hand would guide her step.

We left Lewis Grey wiping his eyes and clearing his throat behind the counter of Mezzlin & Measure, declaring that it must be he had taken cold. The slim little figure, clad in faded pants and coat of uncouth cut, the drooping eyes and hot hands haunted him; and Lewis was desperately vexed to think that he had let the boy go home without finding out where he lived. "By George!" said he to himself, "I don't believe he has enough to eat." He would fain have started off in hot pursuit in his usual helter-skelter manner, but a fat dowager demanded his undivided attention while she selected some sort of a "popolorum" fabric as he called it. She was dispatched at last well satisfied, and her place was taken by a fair young girl, no other than our sweet friend Katie Bonn, who, after leaving our little friend, bent thither her steps. She had been at the store several times before, and Lewis always blushed tremendously when she appeared. Her graceful form and movements seemed something wonderful to him, who never knew what to do with his hands and feet; her quiet womanly self-possession, a marvel he could not sufficiently admire. He had found out, in a roundabout blundering way, too, that she was "Miss Bonn" that her father was of the great and mighty firm of "Bonn & Bonn;" and moreover, that Augustus Ledger was thinking, in the most sublime assurance of success, that perhaps he might as well make up his mind to sacrifice his elegant self in consideration of the sum which might reasonably belong to "Old Bonn's" only daughter. Old Bonn's daughter had no idea of such a thing. She laughed a little to herself as she saw his gruwing devotion, and thought that there wouldn't really be any harm in bringing him to her feet, just to tell him "No, I thank you." Lewis was as dexterous in handling the silk as he could be; but nevertheless the folds would get turned in the most aggravating manner, and finally he managed to push a piece in her lap. Then he had to apologize, and as the little woman laughed merrily and returned it with quiet grace, he felt as though his collar wasn't half white enough, as though his hair wasn't brushed right; in fact, as though he wasn't worthy to stand before her at all.

She was thinking what a great, manly-looking person he was, and what good, honest eyes he had, and speculating whether, if he married at all, it would be for money or love. He didn't know all this, and was rather relieved when she turned away to purchase out of his department. Then he remembered too the discarded cash-boy, and started in a hurry to look for him.

As he passed out Katie heard one of the clerks say, "There goes Grey. He'll chase a dozen blocks after that cash-boy, I bet you!" In a moment it flashed through Katie's mind that this must be Lowie Grey—no other than the kind friend that little Joho loved so well. She stopped to think about it all so long that the clerk was obliged to recall her.

"Would she suit?"

"Oh no! please not that, something heavier." The fair hands were turning over coarse mualine and flannels, for she "remembered the poor," and, blessed with riches herself, blessed others in return. She hired poor women to make garments that were to clothe the helpless and needy. She paid liberally, and in many a poor home they thanked God for sending her to them in their times of destitution. And yet no noisy charity movement ever originated with Katie Bonn. The cloth was purchased, and as she passed Augustus she looked so sweet and womanly that he made up his mind to accure her ef once. Ooe hondred thousand dollars—sweet lace, little Methodistical—break her of that soon—um, ah, yes, would do very well.

Three weeks had slipped awey with its burden of joy and sorrow, cares and hopes. The sun of July was reflected back from the flag-stones and glorious brick of the city—the noisome odors enmo up from reeking streets, even to the windows as high up as the room where Johnny Mead lay ill. Yes, he was very ill. The excitement and grief of that weary dey hed hurried on a fever that had nearly worn him out. Like a ministering angel, Katie Bonn had come and gone—come from her luxurious home to these poor streets, she had given food and wine and work, had cheered the poor mother, and helped her bear thle saddest trial of all. Ah, what a blessiug to be rich, if we could only have the sweet charity and humble spirit of this young girl!

The boy'a eyes brighten as, propped up on pillows, he waits her coming—listens for her footstepe on the creaking stairs. Ah, she is here! Her bright face appears at his bedside, and her soft voice speaks: "How is my little friend? See, I have brought you some real country flowers that I gathered on purpose for you yesterday—when I was out of town;" and she put in his hand a bunch of roses, eyringia, thickly interspersed with buffer-cupe, clover-heads, and daisies. How he held them oil, cool and dewy as they were, to his hot cheek and lip—it did not need that he ehould thank her otherwise. His mother's eyes were full of tears as she thanked tha kind friend God had raised up for them. But Katie had better things still in store, for before she left them it was all arranged that she should cell and take the sick child and his mother in her carriage out to the violnity of her father'e estate of Clover Lawn. A little bit of e cottage, then, through Katie's instrumenteilty, had been fitted up for them, and she thought that she could give Mrs. Mead enough employment to supply her daily wents. What a happy prospect! Johnny declared that if it could only be found out that he had not committed the theft, and if he could only see Lewis Grey before he went awey, he should be almost periectly happy. He concluded et last to write a note to Lewis, which he did, in scramhliug, unformed characters, thue:

MR. GREY—I hope you have not forgotten me; I am little Johnny the cash-boy that you used to be so clever to. I am pretty sick—the Dr. says that maybe the country air will do me good; and oh! I have got such a kind friend—she is going to take me aod mother to Clover-land, or some such neme, next week. Oh, Mr. Grey! hasn't anybody found out about that money that I didn't take? Please come to see me. I am tired now, Good-by, dear Sir,

F. H. S.

This letter was finished with much wearinese and lobor, under the supervision of Katie's soft blue eyes, and her practical thoughtfulness added what he had forgotten, the number and street, and as Johnny was too tired to finish the superscription, it was written in her own fair round hand, and posted on her way home, and not a day passed after that without Lewis's kindly face. A week more and again we are at Johnny's bedside. Gono now are all the hopes of health or life. With bowed head and form, the mother looks at the child she loves as he llee eo faint and white. The doctor stands beside him; but lu his pityiug eye there is no ray of hope.

The window is wide opeu, and the sounds of huay life came up from the street below, dimly, and as though they came not from the same world as this within the eiok chamber. Katie is there, watching every movement, proffering the loed drinke, chauging the pillows, and pruying in her heart that He who doeth all things well would comfort the mother. Now and then the boy'a miud would wander off among the scenes he had loved; oud then, like a cloud, would come the great sorrow, and the stoutest heart would have melted to hear those pitiful, weudering, and troubled thoughts.

"Oh! I never etole—oh no, no, never. I didn't eee the money; did you, Jimmy? Now I must tell mother—she will be so sorry;" theu, eheuging his toncies, his eye would light up as he said, "'Tha daieies,' 'the daieies,' they are calling me. Mother, I must go; the daislea, they are calling me to stay with them." Then a muan—and a few moments of oalm and untroubled sleep.

All held their breath as the sick child slept; and when a low tap at the door was lollowed by the entraueo of Lewis Grey, who seemed eager to epeak eome good tidings, Katie laid her fluger on her lip onl pointed lo the bed. Tha noise of hie entraueo, however, awoke him, and he had become calmed and conscious in this interval. He held out his hand to Lewis, who eat beside him. Lewie began to speak to him, but the words choked him, and he whispered to Miss Katie to tell him that the thief had been discovered to be Jimmy Ledger, and that every body knew now that John was true. Johnny held out his arms, and with the ouo word, "Mother!" called her to loy her he ad beside him; then, with a faee of perfect peace he began to meke his childish preparation for that better laud.

"Good-by, Mr. Grey, you have been very gnod to me, and I hope I shall know you when you get to heaven.

"Miss Ketie, I should like you to plant a few daisies on my grave."

On the parting words between mother end eon we will not lutrude; ol the child's hope through Him who blessed little children, wu may speak; ol the simpln prayer that cheered him as he was "going to thu daisies," wheu, with the eyes raised, the weak voiee whispered, "Now I lay me down to eleep." It was no shame to Lewie Grey's manhood that he erled liko a child; lor his guardian angel was by him, theu uuseeu, to bid him look to that Savior that carried thie sufferer so gently down the dark valley. A few more murmuriegs, a few faint sobbing breaths, and the Cash-boy hed closed his eeeount.—Harper's Weekly.

WHITE CATS.

Albinism in man and in the inferior animals has been always attended by peculiar traits of character and constitution; but in no animal, except the cat, has it been accompanied with deafness.

Dr. Sichel, a French eatarallst, communicated the fact, some years ago, that, after many observations and experiments, he had found that cats with perfectly white coats and blue eyes are invariably deaf! Make any sound you will near them, except such as are of a nature to convey vibrations—as shaking the ground, striking the floor with a hammer—and the animal will remain perfectly indifferent. Crack a whip as loudly as you will, imitate the barking of a dog, clap the hands—in fact, make any noise except such as may convey vibrailous, and the result will be the same—indifeeoce on the part of the animal.

If, however, there is the smallest spot of black, brown, or gray on the coat of the cat, or if the iris be any other color than blue, or grayish-blue, then the power of hearing will be the same as to another animal.

This naturally had a cat, which he procured while a kitten; the coat was perfectly white, and the eyes were perfectly blue. This cat, which at sight of a dog made off with rapidity, paid not the slightest attention to his barking if she did oot see him. At the end of a few months the iris became of a deeper color, and the cat began to show signs of attention when a bell was sharply rong about a yard from her ear. But afterlunately the further progress of the experiment was interrupted by the death of poor poss, she having been worried in the street by a dog whose barking she had not heard.

Professor Hevalnger, a German, has drawn alteution to another extraordinary peculiarity of white animals; viz., their inability to resist the injurious effects of external agents, which to other animals are perfectly harmless.

And we are told by Carillo, by Marinosci di Martini, and by Meoni di Lecce, that lo Naples and Sicily eating of Hypericum crispum, or, as it is called there, Fusnulo, acted perniciously on white, but not on black sheep; causing in the former the wool to fall off, the head to swell, and death itself to supervene in a couple of weeks. On this account, in Tarentino, where this plant is very common, black sheep alone are kept.

Spinata, in his work on the Diseases of Swine, says that buckwheat, Polygonum fagopyrum, if eaten at its time of flowering, causes diseases in white and partially white swine, which are not produced by the same agent in black animals.

Another fact bearing upon the point of the inferiority of white animals, in strength and power of resistance, to otherwise harmless agents, is related by a Mr. Youatt. He says: "A cow, for the most part white, but having some black spots, fell sick, and became bald in every part of the white surface. On these parts the epidermis detached itself from the subjacent true skin, while the dark spots continued perfectly healthy." A similar fact is related by a veterinary surgeon named Erdt.

To this day, in Ireland, the thrifty housewife will always call out for the white calf to be killed; and if you ask her why—little versed in Natural History, but shrewd enough in experimental observation—she remarks, "The white calf is ever dawny (sickly), and the white cow is a bad milker."

A few years ago there was a dinner-party given in the city of Dublin by an eminent dignitary of the Church, famed for learning and eccentricity; and in the course of the evening, during the "feast of reason and flow of soul," the host proposed the following strange conundrum: "Why do white sheep eat more than black ones?"

Taken aback at once by the strange simplicity of the question, which, on account of the well known ability of the interrogator, was supposed to involve a most intricate maze of solution, not one of the noble, learned, and accomplished guests could give an answer! They were fairly nonplussed. Said the Archbishop: "Do you give it up? Do you give it up, Miss Lind" (for the world-famed and accomplished cantatrice was present.) "Do you give it up, my Lord Chief Justice? Do you give it up, Mr. Vice-Provost?" What! all give it up? Well, then, it is because there are more of them!"

METEOROLOGICAL.—At a recent meeting of the Boston Society of Natural History, a discussion took place in regard to the meteor of last August. It was stated that the noise of the explosion was heard over an area of two thousand square miles, and that the meteor was seen over an area of six thousand square miles. A single fragment only of the meteor is positively known to have fallen, and this was in Bethlehem, about ten miles west of Albany. The piece, picked up soon after it fell, was quite warm, and had a considerable sulphurous odor. It was irregularly shaped, and about the size of a pigeon's egg. Nearly three-fourths of its surface was covered with a black, non-lustrous, evidently fused crust; the remainder presenting the appearance of a fresh fracture of a light gray color, and a granular, semi-chrystalline texture. It was apparently silliceous, and not metallic. The specimeo was bought by the Regents of the State University of New York, and deposited in the State Cabinet at Albany.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

DR. JOHN FISHER ECKFORD, died, Jan. 19, 1860, at his residence in Polk county, Texas, in the 34th year of his age. He was born in Teonessee, May, 1826; in 1850 he was licensed at New Orleans to practice medicine, and in the same year married an amiable and interesting lady—Miss Sarah McGowan, who survives him; in 1858 he was elected County Commissioner for Polk county. Possessing a nicely balanced mind, a sound judgment and unwavering integrity, he was eminently fitted for the profession of his choice, and was remarkably successful. In his practice he was the friend of the poor, the orphan and widow. As a public officer he discharged his duty with zeal, energy and fidelity. As a man he was mild, sincere and honorable.

"He kept
"The whiteness of his soul and thus men o'er him wapt."

In the family circle he was loving and tender. Sacred be the sorrows of his house. He was a christian, an humble, pious, good men. He lived the life of a good man, and died the death of the righteous. When called to cross the dark oblivious tide that rolls between mortality and immortality, leaning upon the Savior's arm, he joyfully encountered the floods and passed through to endless joys. He spoke much of his firm trust in a dying Savior's love. While the hand of death was upon him, his countenance lighted up with joy; gazing up intently he told his wife that his brother and nephew (who had preceded him to glory) were beckoning him away, and asked if she did not see them. He eew heaven opened to him—it was, he said, a beautiful glorious place—that he would soon be there surrounded alone by the pure and happy. "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord."

Let us weep for tha widowed heart; for her whose "woe is like an unreal dream; but n dream, oh! how troubled and how soon to settle down to the repose of luiolerable reality." Let us weep for the stricken mother and sister; the mourning friends; but not for him who has exchanged the troubles of earth for the joys of heaven. He lived and died in full communion with the M. E. Church. With him Christianity was no cold abstraction, but a living, active, soul thrilling principle, which animated and directed his whole life. His faith was strong; his love ardent. In the ample folds of his noble and flowing Christian heart there was no sectarianism. The charity of his soul was alone bounded by the numbers of the human family.

In his youth he embraced the religion of the Lord Jesus. In manhood he served him with unfaltering devotion. He triumphed over death and with joyful heart passed from earth. In heaven he enjoys the full fruition of everlasting bliss.

Oh! may his mourning family and friends be re-united to him beyond the cold waves of death, is the prayer of a friend.

LIVINGSTON, Polk County, Texas. J. M. C.

SISTER LANE, wife of Rev. W. H. B. Lane, and daughter of William and Frances Browne, was born April 22, 1817, near Norfolk, Va., and died near Trenton, Miss., 27th Feb., 1860. She professed religion and joined the M. E. Church, at Camp Meeting, near Norfolk, in 1832 or 1833. Her father moved to Mississippi about the year 1834. She was much loved by all her acquaintances. She was devotedly pious, an affectionate wife and mother, a kind friend. Her Bible was her daily counsellor. During her husband's absence she always kept up family prayer, until her oldest son professed religion and joined the church, when she was assisted by him. The family altar first erected was never thrown down. Says her husband, "never did she manifest an angry feeling before her family. She always said that anger was not mentioned among the Christian graces." She has left a kind and affectionate husband, four sons and one daughter, and many friends. She died rejoicing in the God of her salvation. She called her companion and children to her bed side and gave to them her dying charge; and then said, "all is now right; I am done with this world," and breathed her last.

☞ Richmond Christian Advocate please copy.

SISTER ELIZABETH, wife of Bro. JESSIE WRIGHT, and daughter of Henry and Mary Gniwn, died 7th Feb., 1860, in her 45th yeer, at her residence near Butler, Choctaw county, Ala. She was deprived of the privilege of regulur church attendance for several months before her death, by efflictiou; but the domestic circle was the house of God and the gete of heaven. She was well prepered to contend with her last enemy, and as she entered the portels of eternity, shouted victory. Her husband and several children are left behind, enguged in the eame warfere. May they take courage.

I. J. RUTLEDGE.

MRS. ANN P. SINCLAIR, wife of Dr. Elias Sinclair, and daughter of Rev. M. D. Crawford, deceased, died in Kemper county, Mississippi, 15th Feb., 1860, in the fifty-seventh year of her age. She embraced religion when a girl, and lived a devoted member of the Methodist Episcopal Church until death. For ten months she was greatly efflicted by rheumatism, and for four months by dropsy, with which she died. About one month before her death she had a paralytic stroke, and at times was irrational, but at all times the subject of religion aroused her to consciousness, and her fervent prayers for help, and acclemetione of "Hallelujah and Salvation to God for ever!" could but impress her friends with her readiness to go in peace.

She has left an affectionate husband (with whom she had lived thirty-five years), four children and one adopted daughter, four sisters and two brothers, and friends, to mourn her decease.

H. HOLMES.

SOUTHERN CLOTHING ESTABLISHMENT.—26, 28 and 30 St. Charles street, corner of Common. Clothing and Furnishing Goods at Wholesale and Retail

Just received, per late steamers, one of the largest and most magnificent Stocks of FASHIONABLE SPRING AND SUMMER CLOTHING ever brought to the South, which, for Style, Material, Workmanship and Cheapness, is not surpassed. Goods are divided into Three Departments, all under One general view:

Store No. 26 St. Charles street, for Boys' Clothing;
Store No. 28 St. Charles street, for Men's Clothing;
Store No. 30 St. Charles street, for Furnishing Goods and Shirts.

L. W. LYONS,
Nos. 26, 28 and 30 St. Charles street, corner Common st.
Salesmen speak French, Spanish and English. [oc12

BOYS' CLOTHING EMPORIUM, 26 St. Charles-st. between Canal and Common.

This store is exclusively for YOUTHS', BOYS' AND CHILDREN'S CLOTHING; SHIRTS AND FURNISHING GOODS, WHOLESALE AND RETAIL.

Just opened a large and excellent stock of SPRING and SUMMER DRESS and SCHOOL CLOTHING, embracing every style and quality, all of which will be sold at VERY REASONABLE PRICES.

☞ Salesman speak French, Spanish and English.

L. W. LYONS,
oc12 Nos. 26, 28 and 30 St. Charles street, corner Common st.

SHIRTS! SHIRTS!! SHIRTS!!!—Just received, by late steamers, a large assortment of SHIRTS OF THE LATEST FASHION, of all the various qualities and sizes, White and Colored, Manufactured EXPRESSLY FOR THE NEW ORLEANS CITY TRADE, to St Men, Youths, Boys and Children.

L. W. LYONS,
oc12 Nos. 26, 28 and 30 St. Charles street, corner Common st.

TRUNKS, TRAVELING-BAGS AND VALISES, UMBRELLAS, and WATER-PROOF CLOTHING of the best styles and qualities, made to order and warranted

L. W. LYONS,
oc12 Nos. 26, 28 and 30 St. Charles street, corner Common st.

SHOE STORE.—E. C. CATE & CO., 18 & 19 CAMP-ST. Retail House. No 18 camp street, under City Hotel.

In the Department of FAMILY SHOES—
We have Ladies', Misses' and Children's Boots, Brogans, Gaiters, &c., in every variety, both for dry and wet seasons; also Gentlemen's, Boys' and Youths' light and heavy work, adapted to any season and in every style.

All of which goods have been manufactured under our own supervision, of such materials and in such manner as a long retail experience has shown us to be best adapted to durability and good shape during wear. As in quality, so in price, our goods cannot fail to please for an index, note the annexed

LIST OF BOOT PRICES:

Gents' Calf Pegged Boots for	$2 50
do Fine Sewed do	4 00
do Fine Dress do	6 00
do' Heavy Sewed Water-Proof Boots	5 50
do Best Pump Boots	6 00
do Super-Quilted Bottom Water Proof Boots	10 00
do Fine Congress Gaiters	$4 00 to 5 00

Gents' Quilted Bottom Congress; heavy and fine Calf and Morocco Brogans and Oxfords, &c

In the Department of PLANTATION SHOES—
Durability has been our especial aim. And having been made in sell to the Planters direct, we have sought to put them together in that manner that will prove the most economical, and will warrant them equal to any made to measure.

In this, as well as the other branches of our business, we have tried to be progressive, and have made some additions to the usual styles of Negro work, for which we claim advantages. Among them are:

Men's Long Russet Boots for drivers.
Men's and Women's half Russet Boots for swampy lands.
Men's Extra Heavy, three soles, Russet Brogans.
do do Kentucky Blucher Brogans.
Women's Heavy Unbound Dutch Lace Boots.
Men's Super Ditching Boots.

These goods, together with the regular Russets and Ditching Boots, House Servants' Shoes, &c., render our stock most desirable for all Family and Plantation purchases.

We have the same styles as above, by the dozen or package, for all merchants requiring Goods goods, at our Wholesale Rooms, No. 19 Camp street—opposite City Hotel.

EDUCATIONAL.

DOLBEAR'S COMMERCIAL COLLEGE, OF THE City of New Orleans, foupdtes in 1832—Chartered by the Legislature of Louisiana, with Agricultural and Mechanical Departments—Capital Stock, $250,000—is the new and spacious edifice known as STORY BUILDING south-east corner of Camp and Commoe streets, eotrance on both streets, open day and eveoing. Faculty—

RUFUS DOLBEAR, PRESIDENT.
MATHEMATICAL DEPARTMENT.
THO. E. BRACKETT, Professor.
BOOK-KEEPING DEPARTMENT.
RUFUS DOLBEAR, Lecturer.
J. W. BLACKMAN, Professor.
ENGLISH DEPARTMENT.
HON. J. N. CARRIGAN, A.M., late Sup't Education, etc. Prof. and Lecturer on Commercial Law, etc and M. H. MCCARTHEY, Professor.
FRENCH DEPARTMENT.
MARC. ROUX, Professor.
DEPARTMENT FOR PENMANSHIP.
RUFUS DOLBEAR, Lecturer.
J. B. GRIFFITH Professor.
SPANISH DEPARTMENT.
MANUEL MARINO, Professor.
GERMAN DEPARTMENT.
GEO. GESSNER, Professor.
LATIN AND GREEK DEPARTMENT.
M. MARINO and G. GESSNER Professors
ITALIAN DEPARTMENT.
RHETORIC, LOGIC, AND ELOCUTION.

This is the only chartered Commercial college in the South-West, and the oldest in the United States, and has stood for
FOR MORE THAN A QUARTER OF A CENTUDY
On its own merits alone.

Persons from 12 to 60 years of age, can attend to any branch they may wish.

Board can be had with the Professor, or other good families speaking English, French, Spanish or German, from $5 to $6 per week.

Catalogues with terms, opinions of the press and leading men of the nation, etc., sent to all who desire them.

N.B.—To prevent mistakes or impositions, Students intended for this College should bring this advertisement as special directions, as there are every winter temporary rooms open for a few months, all of course making wonderful prizes and promises, and posting flaming placards to enlighten the people of New Orleans and of the South! When three or more form Clubs and enter at the same time, ten per cent will be deducted from mtime.

☞ Citizens and strangers are invited to visit.

feb1 1y RUFUS COLBEAR, President.

SOULE'S COMMERCIAL COLLEGE, CORNER OF Camp and Common streets, entrance No. 81 Common street,—established in 1850,—open day and evening the entire year.

A full course of instruction in this institution embraces Double Entry Book-keeping, Commercial Calculation and Commercial Law, and Penmanship. Gentlemen can enter for the full course, or any branch they desire, and at any time, as there is no class system, no copying from books, and no memorising of arbitrary rules.

Merchants, Book keepers, and young gentlemen wishing instruction, are respectfully requested to call and examine our practical forms and peculiar manner of teaching.

For catalogues containing full information, and Balance-sheet Circulars, the most magnificent work of the kind ever executed in the United States, address, GEO. SOULE, New Orleans.

FELICIANA FEMALE INSTITUTE, JACKSON, LA. The exercises of the second term of this school will commence on the 23rd of March. Pupils entered at any time, and charged from the time of entrance.

Extensive grounds and houses have been added to the premises.

A good library, a new and complete apparatus, a full and competent corps of teachers, comfortable and newly-furnished apartments, afford the best facilities for a thorough education.

BOARD OF TRUSTEES:

WM. H. WATKINS, D.D., President.
J. N. EVANS, Secretary.
Prof. W. H. N. MAGRUDER, WM. LIPSCOMB,
JOHN W. BURRUSS, Esq., Col. S. M. BRYAN,
F. D. HAGAMAN, Esq. Rev. A. D. MILLER
Rev. JOHN C. MILLER, JOHN MCKOWEN, Esq
Hon. JOHN MCVEA.
6m THOS W. DROWN, Principal.

KENNER ACADEMY—A BOARDING AND DAY School for Boys and Young Men—VICTOR SCHLEICHA, Principal. This institution is located in the town of Kenner, Jefferson Parish, La., about ten miles from New Orleans by railroad, and sixteen miles by river. The location is extremely delightful and pleasant. The health of the place is unsurpassed during the whole year.

The course of study is thorough, embracing the English, French, Spanish, German, Latin, and Greek languages. Students can be prepared for any class in college, or for business pursuits.

The Academy Year is divided into Two Sessions of Five Months each, commencing on the First of October and March, respectively. Scholars will be received at any time during the year; none for less time than one session.

For further particulars see circulars, or address Principal.

PORT GIBSON COLLEGIATE ACADEMY, FOR Young Ladies, resumed its Exercises on the first Monday in Dec. last. A well chosen Faculty will spare no pains or care to make this institution a pleasant and profitable place for young lady students.

The buildings are large, well-ventilated, and well furnished. The grounds ample and beautiful.

For information and Circulars, apply to,
Rev. B. JONES, Port Gibson, Miss.

PROFESSIONAL.

JAMES J. HUTCHINSON, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, Livingston, Alabama., will Practice in Sumter and the adjoining counties. [au24]

DR. E. D. BEACH, HAVING RESUMED THE practice of Medicine, offers his professional services to the citizens of New Orleans.

N. B.—Special attention paid to diseases of the RECTUM, PILES, FISTULA IN ANO, ETC.—Fistula in ano permanently cured without the use of the knife, cautery, pain, or confinement whatever. Office No. 6, Baronne street near Canal. ap27.

J. E. BLAM, ATTORNEY - AT - LAW, BATON Rouge.
REFERENCES—Henderson & Gaines and Chinn & Bolton, New Orleans; W. S. Pike and A. Matta.....Baton Rouge.

B. D. & A. W. ROBERTS, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, Floyd, Carroll Parish, Louisiana. ja19

FUQUA & KILBOURNE, ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW, Clinton, Louisiana, practice in the Parishes of East and West Feliciana, and East Baton Rouge.

References—Payne & Harrison, Byrne, Vance & Co., W. and C. Letchford and Co., Broadwell & Haynes, and Pritchard & Flower, New Orleans. mar 7-1y

W. P. WINANS. J. T. HEATH.
WINANS & HEATH, ATTORNEYS AND COUNsellors at Law, Shreveport, La. Office—Market street.
Will practice in the courts of Caddo, De Soto, Bossier, Claiborne, and Bienville.

G. SPENCER MAYO, ATTORNEY - AT - LAW, Harrisonburg, La., will practice in the Courts of Catahoula, Concordia, Caldwell and Franklin Parishes.

COMMISSION MERCHANTS.

W. A. BROADWELL. A. P. HAYNES.
BROADWELL & HAYNES, COMMISSION MERchants (formerly Broadwell & Payne), No 40 Union street N. O. Having retired from business, I take great pleasure in soliciting for my former Partners, BROADWELL & HAYNES, the patronage and confidence of my friends, believing their experience, capacity and means, will merit its continuance, and enable them to give general satisfaction. [jel] M. U. PAYNE.

W. R. STOART, New Orleans. DR O. A. JAMES, Madison Parish, La.
STUART & JAMES, NO. 42 UNION STREET, New Orleans, have associated themselves together for the purpose of conducting a COTTON FACTORAGE & GENERAL COMMISSION BUSINESS; are prepared to make the usual Advances to planters, in the way of supplies, etc., and respectfully solicit patronage

B. M. LOWE & CO., COTTON FACTORS AND General Commission Merchants, No. 97 GRAVIER STREET, New Orleans. ap6

A. H. MAY & CO., COTTON FACTORS AND General Commission Merchants, No 94 Gravier street, New Orleans. au21y

J. G. PAYNE. J. P. HARRISON.
O. W. HUNTINGTON. WM R. DAWSON
PAYNE & HARRISON, COMMISSION MERCHANTS No. 81 Union street, New Orleans. dec7-1y

S. L. WALKER, New Orleans. ROBT. G. HUTCHINSON Caddo Parish, La.
WALKER & HUTCHINSON, COTTON FACTORS and Commission Merchants, No. 87 Carondelet street, New Orleans. jo28

J. BOYD & CO., COTTON FACTORS, RECEIVING and Forwarding Merchants, No. 4 Union street, New Orleans.

LEONARD FASH. F. S. LUPARDS.
LEONARD FASH & CO., COMMISSION MERchants, and D

NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY A COMMITTEE OF MINISTERS FOR THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH---C. C. GILLESPIE, EDITOR.

VOLUME X.—NUMBER 14. WHOLE NUMBER 472.

NEW ORLEANS, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 4, 1860.

$2 00 A YEAR, IN ADVANCE. OFFICE—112 CAMP ST.

THE RESOURCES AND PROSPECTS OF ALABAMA.

Former Legislature—Wealth of Resources—Improvement of Mobile Bay—Trade of the Gulf—Bill to encourage direct Trade—Two and Three per cent. Funds, and their Appropriation—Alabama Railroads—Railroad and Bank—Medical College—State University—La Grange and Glenville Schools—Deaf and Dumb School, and Insane Asylum.

Your readers in Alabama will be interested in a brief review of what was done at the recent session of their Legislature, for the development of the material wealth of the State. The unfortunate connection of the State with banking some years ago so prejudiced the public mind of Alabama against all moneyed enterprises by the State, that the Legislature had perhaps erred in the other extreme, and Alabama had consequently done less than almost any other Southern State for the development of her vast resources. With the exception of some trifling and, most generally, injudicious appropriations of the two and three per cent funds, nothing has ever been done by the Legislature of the State in aid of her various internal improvement enterprises. Under the wiser policy of the late Legislature, it is to be hoped that a new era has dawned in her history, and that henceforth Alabama will make rapid strides towards the very first position among her sister States in enterprise, improvement and wealth. Nature has done a vast deal for Alabama. The extent of her physical resources is just beginning to be understood by her own people, and when those resources shall have been properly developed, as they will be under the policy inaugurated at the recent session of her Legislature, Alabama will be second to no State in the Union in wealth, population and importance. She is already the leading cotton producing State; she has a large quantity of rich lands yet untouched; she has timber sufficient to build navies for the world; she has mineral wealth enough in itself to make her one of the richest empires on the globe; she has coal beds that surpass in extent those of Pennsylvania; she has water power enough to turn all the spindles of this country and England; she has in the north a provision district that is capable of feeding her entire population; she has a climate that is genial and salubrious; she has, in short, a combination of all the material advantages which are necessary to make her great, rich and powerful. This is what nature has done for her; now let me hurriedly review what was done by the late Legislature, to second these natural advantages.

Commencing, then, on her Southern coast: the Legislature made an appropriation of about $150,000 for the improvement of the bay and harbor of Mobile. This appropriation is upon the condition that the city and county of Mobile shall appropriate about $850,000 for the same purpose. These sums, it is estimated, will be sufficient to remove the obstructions which now prevent the approach of large vessels to the city. There is now a depth of about twenty-one feet of water, I think, on the outer bar, and it is proposed to cut a channel of sixteen or eighteen feet through Dog River bar, where there is a depth now of only about eleven feet. The parties making this movement have the most eminent practical and scientific authority in favor of the feasibility of the enterprise, and if they succeed, the chief barrier which has heretofore obstructed the comaerce of Mobile will be removed, and, with her otherwise great natural advantages, she will certainly become a great commercial emporium. The trade of the Gulf of Mexico is yet in its infancy. When the vast domain which nature has made tributary to the Gulf shall become settled and developed, the richest trade of the world will float upon her bosom. It will become to the commerce of modern times what the Mediterranean Sea was to the trade of the ancients; and Mobile and New Orleans will become what Venice and Alexandria once were, the mistresses of the richest trade on the globe. I am not dreaming, Mr. Editor, and the future will verify my predictions.

In this connection, it may not be out of place to allude to the Bill which was passed for the encouragement of direct trade between the Southern States and foreign countries, which I regard as one of the most important measures of the session, one which I hope may eventuate in great good to the trade of the South. The Bill exempts from taxation the sales of all goods directly imported into any one of the Southern States from foreign countries; and provides for the appointment of a salaried Commissioner, whose duty it is made to confer with similar commissioners on the part of other Southern States, and with other persons interested in the establishment of direct trade between the Southern States and foreign countries, for the purpose of collecting information and maturing a plan for the encouragement of direct comaercial intercourse between the ports of the South and foreign countries; and said Commissioner shall be required to report to the next session of the General Assembly of this State such information and propositions as he may have received, together with such suggestions as his inquiries may have enabled him to make in aid of the purposes of this act; and also, by communication with the merchants of the Southern States, to endeavor to enlist them in the encouragement of direct trade between the Southern States and foreign countries.

I understand that this appointment has been tendered by the Governor to an eminent gentleman in Mobile, whose qualifications for its duties are a sufficient guaranty that they will be faithfully and efficiently discharged. The great fault of our legislation on this subject hitherto has been, that we have attempted too much. We cannot suddenly revolutionize trade by mere acts of legislation. We can only inaugurate a policy, and leave time to accomplish its success. This is all aimed at in this bill, and I think it promises to do a great deal.

The principal railroad measure passed by the Legislature is what was known as the "Three per cent Bill." Perhaps the significance of this title may not be understood by your readers, and I will explain. When Alabama was admitted into the Union, it was agreed by the general government that five per cent of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands lying in the State, should be reserved for the purpose of making public roads, and canals, and improving the navigation of rivers, of which three-fifths should be applied to those objects within the State, under the direction of the Legislature, and two-fifths to the making of roads leading to the State, under the direction of Congress. By a subsequent act of Congress, the two-fifths which were originally reserved to the general government, were placed at the disposal of the State Legislature for the special purpose of constructing a line of improvements across the State, from West Point, in Georgia, in the direction of Jackson, Miss. This fund is known as the two per cent, and the other three-fifths, as the three per cent fund. The whole fund is held in trust by the State for purposes of internal improvement; the three per cent to be used generally for any works of internal improvement, and the two per cent. only to such improvements in our east and west line across the State. The bill to which I allude was designed to appropriate the whole of this three per cent. fund which was in the Treasury. A committee appointed to investigate the matter reported that there was $663,000 of this fund in the Treasury. The whole of this amount was appropriated by the bill which passed, in this way: the N.E. and S.W. Road, and the Alabama and Tennessee Rivers Road, each receive loans of about $250,000, and the Wills Valley Road, the Oxford and Opelika Road, and the Montgomery and Eufaula Road, each smaller loans, at the rate of five per cent. per annum, for five years. The interest accruing annually is to be paid to the Alabama and Tennessee Central Road, and at the expiration of five years the whole amount thus loaned goes as a donation to the last mentioned road. You perceive that the Central Road is mainly the beneficiary of the scheme, and this policy was adopted, not only because this road was regarded as the most important, but because it runs through a section of country which was the least able to furnish the means for its construction. This Central Road is destined to be one of great importance to the State; it may, in fact, be considered the great artery of the railroad system of the State. Its termini are, Montevallo and Decatur. Montevallo is a small town in Shelby county, situated on the Ala. and Tenn. Rivers Railroad, and is the point at which that road will be intersected by the South and North Road, of which I will speak presently. The Southern terminus of the Central Road is, therefore, the point at which the railroads running north from Montgomery and Selma concentrate. Decatur, the northern terminus of this road, is the point on the Memphis and Charleston railroad at which it is intersected by the Tennessee Central Road, running south from Nashville, and is therefore the point of rudintion to Memphis, Charleston and Nashville. Its geographical position must make this a road of importance, not only in the amount of trade which must pass over it, but in the connections which it will afford to sections of the State now almost entirely disconnected. The connection between north and south Alabama has long been a commercial, social and political necessity in this State; the Central road will supply this three-fold desideratum, and besides, bring into notice and settlement a most interesting and, at present, altogether undeveloped section of the State. From Montevallo to Decatur, for almost the entire distance, the road will run through vast unexplored coal fields and iron beds, which will some day add millions to the wealth of Alabama. This section of the State, though now the poorest, will, in all probability, become the richest portion of the State.

The North-east and South-west road is also one of the most important enterprizes in the State, commencing about the center of the western boundary of the State, it stretches in a north-eastern direction through Eutaw, Tuscaloosa and Elyton to Gadsden in the north-eastern portion of the State, at which point it meets the Wills Valley Railroad, which may be regarded as a prolongation of the N.E. and S.W. Railroad to Chattanooga. Like the Central Road, this line runs for a good part of its length through a country rich in mineral and agricultural wealth, but now almost wholly undeveloped. The whole of this line, as is also the Wills Valley Road, is under contract, and will be completed in a few years. When the road is finished it must command a very large share of the through travel from New Orleans to New York, for it approximates more nearly to an air line between those points than any other road which can be built. From its south-western termini, the connection will some day be completed to New Orleans, and then it will be beyond question the shortest route between your city and New York.

The Alabama and Tennessee River Road runs from Selma to Gadsden, where it intersects the north-eastern and South-western, and Wills Valley road. The cars are now running as far as Talladega on this line, and the whole line will be completed in a year or two. This, too, is a road of importance, and has already done a great deal to develop the country through which it runs.

The South and North Alabama road is the line from Montgomery to Montevallo, at which point, as already remarked, it will intersect the Central, and the Ala. and Tenn. Rivers Roads. This road was not mentioned in the "Three per Cent. Bill," but presented a novel scheme of its own, which was adopted by the Legislature, and from which its friends anticipate the certain and speedy construction of the road. The scheme was this: the Alabama Constitution does not allow the Legislature to charter but one Bank at each session, the consequence is we have but few banks, and they make enormous profits. The Stock of the Southern Bank of Alabama, located at Mobile, has proved so profitable that it has been quoted as high as $130 premium. There is therefore a great demand for bank stock. Mr. Gilmer, of Montgomery, who is at the head of the South and North Railroad, and is one of the ablest financiers in the State, conceived the idea of making this demand for bank stock tributary to his road, and when a charter was asked at this session for a new Bank in Mobile, his friends in the Legislature presented an amendment, requiring those who took stock in the bank to take an equal amount in his road. The Bank was chartered with this amendment, with a capital of $2,500,000, and since the passage of the bill I understand that the scheme works like a charm. Bank Stock in Mobile is in such demand that capitalists are eagerly seeking it, although for every dollar they take of it they have to subscribe for an equal amount of the stock in the South and North Railroad. This road will be built in a few years, and it will prove to be an enterprize of incalculable importance to Montgomery. Without this connection, Selma would soon have taken from her the whole trade of North Alabama; with it, Montgomery will retain her pre-eminence.

There were various other railroad enterprises of importance which came in for a share of legislative aid, but I should protract this article to an unendable length to mention them all. If my space would permit me, I should take pleasure in speaking more particularly of the benefits which these various enterprises will produce, in the development of different sections and interests in the State. It must suffice for the present, however, merely to say, that all together they constitute a system which will make Alabama a noble State. There are now about 2000 miles of railroad in contemplation, and shortly to be built, and when completed they will develop an amount of wealth that old fogydom has never dreamed of in the future of the State.

Such is a hasty and incomplete sketch of what the Legislature of Alabama did, at its last session, for the physical interests of the State. Nor was it forgetful of the other wants of her people. The educational interests of the State were not forgotten. Fifty thousand dollars were appropriated to the Medical College at Mobile, which was made the medical department of the State University. Fifty thousand dollars more were appropriated for the establishment of a military department of the State University. The University has now an income from its endowments, of $18,000, besides its revenue from tuition fees. Under the presidency of Dr. Garland it is annually growing in popularity. It is now one of the very best institutions of learning in the Union, and lacks nothing but numbers, which it is steadily acquiring, to make it one of the most distinguished.

Besides these appropriations the Legislature provided for the education annually of two young men from each county in the State, free of all expense for tuition or board; one half of the number to be educated at Lagrange, in Franklin county, and the other half at Glenville, in Barbour county, both of which are flourishing and deserving schools, conducted on the military plan. In the same connection I may mention an appropriation of $20,000 to the Deaf and Dumb school at Talladega, and $25,000 to the Insane Asylum at Tuscaloosa.

Thus you perceive that while the internal improvement enterprise of the State received a large share of attention at the hands of the Legislature, the intellectual and moral wants of the people were also well cared for. The Legislature contained a large amount of ability, patriotism and public spirit, and has made its impress upon the destiny of the State.

EAST ALABAMA.

Its growth—its lands—its agriculture—its population—its Methodism—its Schools and Colleges.—The Educational Institute.—The Educational Journal.

Twenty-five years ago the largest portion of what is now called East Alabama was a wilderness. In an extensive travel through this country, seeing the immense plantations now in a high state of cultivation, the number of elegant residences, the beautiful towns and villages, one cannot but wonder at the immense amount of labor and skill which has been employed here, within that short lapse of time.

The most of the land in this district of the State was never of the richest kind, yet much of it lying well, in a good climate for the great products of the South, well watered, with a healthy salubrious atmosphere, it has long presented fine advantages to the planter. These the hardy, enterprizing sons of the soil, who took possession of the country, have well employed; many of them have added greatly to their estates, and not a few accumulated large fortunes.

While it is true that much of the country is yet in an uncleared, virgin state, and much is yet fresh and unproductive, yielding fine returns to labor, still the slightest survey convincingly shows that even in this comparatively new country many of the lands are badly rubbed, and not a few apparently exhausted. The reckless disregard of all means to preserve their lands, and the old exhaustive methods of culture which have characterized the older States east, and on account of which they have lost, and lost for ever, the finest natural advantages of an agricultural character that ever a people were blessed with, have been transplanted here, and are fast working out the same disastrous results. It is wonderful to notice the difference in the present agricultural modes of Eastern Alabama and of Eastern Georgia. In the former, they are precisely now what they were twenty-five years ago in the latter; while in Eastern Georgia there has been, ever since that period, a constant upward tendency.

Necessity, however, and the example of the older States, are fast waking up a decided spirit of agricultural improvement in this country. Already the people are turning their attention to the various manures that are now being used so successfully in other States, and to the various improved modes of land preservation and land culture. Generally lying well, and with a soil of good foundation and mineral constituency, no country was ever more susceptible of improvement by the skilful use of artificial means. Guano, the phosphates, and other fertilizing manures, which the older States are now using so successfully, and which are now being introduced here, are destined to achieve great results for East Alabama. They will fix population, increase the productiveness and lead to the embellishment of the country; and with its natural advantages of climate, water, and healthfulness, make this one of the most attractive regions of the South.

It may with truth be affirmed, that no portion of the United States was originally settled by a finer population than that known as East Alabama. Coming into market at the time Georgia and South Carolina were beginning to experience the inconvenience of exhausted lands and a crowded population, large numbers of the very best people of those States rushed over here, making the society of East Alabama, from the very first, equal to if not superior to any portion of the older States. The very cream of the population of older States, whether reference is had to wealth, intelligence, or moral worth, gathered here. So that now it is perhaps true, that no portion of this green earth presents a greater proportion of sterling, enterprizing, intelligent men and women.

Here Methodism has had an organized and a prominent place from the beginning. The original population coming from Georgia and South Carolina, where Methodism prevailed, were, for the most part of a Methodist cast, and gave to Methodism from the very outset an impulse and a sphere which has made her dominant ever since. In no portion of the South, perhaps, has that church at this time a stronger hold, or a greater proportion of wealthy, intelligent, enterprising adherents.

Such a people, in such a country, with so many of the best elements of activity and progress, of course could not fail to develop a profound appreciation of the claims of education, and of the obligation upon them to provide the requisite facilities for it, on the widest and amplest scale. Accordingly, it may be safely affirmed, that no people ever made such rapid strides in that direction as they have within the last few years. To say nothing of the many respectable academies, manned by a highly intelligent class of teachers, scattered over the country, there have been established in its midst within the last few years, schools intended to meet the demand for higher education, both among males and females, that will compare favorably with the best colleges of America, and which in themselves obviate the necessity that the sons and daughters of East Alabama should any longer go abroad to be educated.

A number of these there are, but restricted by space, we shall notice specially only the two institutions of highest grade, that sustain an intimate relation to the Alabama Conference.

The Female College at Tuskegee, considered with reference to its internal appointments and general management, the style of education which it dispenses, its religious spirit and general tone, we have no doubt is one of the very finest female schools in the United States. As a Methodist school it was started at the right time and in the right place. Its founders deserve credit for their wisdom and foresight. It is meeting, and successfully meeting, a great public want in East Alabama, and its impress upon the country, already marked and decided, will deepen and widen with every successive year.

But the new Male College established at Auburn, and just now being launched upon its active career of usefulness, is the crowning glory of the educational enterprize of East Alabama. Founded in a profound conviction that education should be religious, and hence should be under the control of the church, and that its present location, in all respects so eligible, so healthy, so accessible, so finely surrounded by a numerous, wealthy, enlightened, Methodist population, was the very place above all others at which a Methodist College, under the control of the Alabama Conference, should be established; it has entered upon its career under circumstances of promise, and with prospects unparalleled, perhaps, in the early history of any similar institution in this country. With a magnificent building, a full and complete apparatus and cabinet, a good faculty, who seem determined, with God's blessing, to realize the hopes of its founders, it has, at the very first bound, planted itself in all that respects success, good order, efficiency, and prudent management, side by side, as its friends believe, with the very first institutions of the land. Thoroughly Methodist in its relations, having been formally adopted as its own by the Alabama Conference, at its last session; a glorious influence it is expected to exert in behalf of a high order of sanctified education in the State of Alabama. Indeed these institutions are an ornament to the State, distinguished signs of a high and advancing condition of Christian civilization.

Writing of these schools and of the growing spirit of denominational education in this region, the Educational Institute of the M. E. Church, South, whose paramount idea is to give greater prominence and universality to this scheme of Christian education, naturally occurs to mind. Say what we will, no idea is greater or more pregnant than this for our times; and this Institute, if rightly sustained, is destined to develop a capability in the great work of realizing it, now not thought of by much of the leading mind of our church.

The Educational Journal and Family Monthly, recently established in Atlanta, Ga., as the organ of that association, is a movement looking directly to its efficiency and permanence. If that journal lives, the Institute will live and grow, and living and growing, will become one of the mightiest agencies for the spread of education and Methodism now known to the machinery of the church.

Lovers of Methodism, friends of Christian education, ye who would provide for the elevation of your race and the increasing power and glory of the Kingdom of Christ when you are dead and gone, will you not rally to the support of this journal? The numbers that have been issued indicate the high standard of literary excellence to which it aspires, and which, indeed, it has already reached. There is intended to be no conflict between it and any of our church periodicals. It has its own distinct sphere, and is intended to supply a desideratum, important in itself, which no other periodical among us is designed to meet. A letter to Rev. J. Knowles, Macon, Ga., inclosing $2, will make good a subscriber for one year. All Itinerant Preachers throughout our Southern Church are authorized agents, and are entitled to fifty cents for every cash subscriber they obtain.

SIGMA.

INTRODUCTION OF PROTESTANTISM INTO MISSISSIPPI.—NO. VI.

Some of the First Fruits.

MR. EDITOR.—I trust I will not weary either your patience or that of your readers by a few closing remarks about some of the first fruits of Protestant Christianity in the Natchez country. Of the preachers, who planted a pure Christianity here, I need say no more; of some of the original members I will say a few words.

Hannah Swayze was the daughter of Rev. Samuel Swayze. She was born October 27th, 1733; married Jeremiah Coleman, senior, March 2d, 1755. Mr. Coleman died June 30th, 1777. She married Richard Curtis, senior, September 26th, 1782, who died November 10th, 1784. After his death she remained a widow until Jan. 15th, 1807, when she died, aged seventy-six years. She was first a Congregationalist, and after the dissolution of that Church at Kingston she maintained her Christian profession and piety until the advent of Tobias Gibson, when she united with the Methodist Episcopal Church. She was a burning and a shining light through all the trying scenes which intervened between 1733 up to the time of her death. Her great excellence was in the eloquence and power of her public prayers. One thing remarkable in her prayers was, that she always besought the Lord to bless her children and her children's children with salvation from sin and holiness of heart, to the latest generation, and, so far, her prayers have been answered in a remarkable manner. Some of the most pious people I have ever known I have found among her descendants, among whom have been six or eight Methodist preachers, and several Baptist preachers. Her daughter Penelope, who married John Gailling, was a woman of "like precious faith." Of her nine children who grew up to man and womanhood, seven have already died in the Lord, and the other two are just waiting the call of their Master to go home. Another daughter of hers named Hannah, married Gabriel Gailling. She was also a woman of holiness and greatly gifted in extemporaneous prayer. Early in the present century she removed with her family to the Prairie Jefferson, in what is now Morehouse parish, La., where she continued to live until her death in 1832. She came as near "exhorting all she had any intercourse with" as any one I ever knew, and such was the sweetness of her spirit, and the outbursting affection of her heart, that few attempted to resist her appeals. She lived in a separate apartment, but under the same roof with her son Jeremiah, who became a local preacher, and was a good man, full of faith and the Holy Ghost. Their house was for many years the place of preaching for the Prairie settlers, and a class room for the Church. She raised a family of grandchildren, who had lost both their parents, and often the first thing heard in the morning by the lodgers at the other end of the house was the lifting up of her voice in family prayer, and that when she was seventy years of age. Most of her descendants have become pious members of the church of her choice.

Lydia Covey, a daughter of Richard Swayze, one of the original owners of the Mundamus grant, lived to a great age near the original settlement of the grantee's at Kingston, and was long "a mother in Israel." Towards the close of life her mind closed in from the outer world, and she seemed to forget everything, even the names and persons of her own descendants, but her relation to God and heaven never escaped her memory. She always seemed to be at home on the subject of the Christian's experience and the Christian's hope.

These are only a few examples of "the unfeigned faith" which was found among the women of those early days, and which, blessed be God, is still found among their descendants to the fourth and fifth generations. The Lord grant that the fruit may be more abundant still! Did I deem prudent to extend these numbers I might say as much of the men of these ancient Methodist and Baptist families as I have said of the women. Many of them were pillars in the churches to which they belonged, and served their generation faithfully by the will of God before they fell asleep in death.

O, that we, their heaven favored offspring, may walk worthy of such ancestors, and serve our generation as well as they did theirs!

J. G. JONES.

LOUISIANA CONFERENCE HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

The design of this Society is to collect and preserve authentic written information relative to the origin, progress, and present condition of Methodism within the State. The importance of such an organization is apparent. It will prepare materials for a perfect history of our church in Louisiana. The advancing greatness of our holy will render this an indispensable addition to our denominational and State literature, and invaluable as a book of reference.

Fifty years hence the events now transpiring on our circuits and stations will be read with ardent interest by the succeeding generation of Methodists; and we are imperatively called by recording the events of our times to augment their edification and delight. No consideration could induce us to part with the precious volumes that embody our past ecclesiastical providences. The developments of our system as a divine agency in the moral regeneration of the world, should not be suffered to float into oblivion, and we will be justly censurable if it cannot be said by our spiritual children, "Our fathers have declared unto us the noble works they did in their days." In ages to come the dwellers around the majestic waters of Methodism in this land will be precluded from a knowledge of their fountains, unless we employ our pens to note the scenes while they gush into existence, and protect with the enduring wood of history the newborn current.

It is therefore proposed that the ministers and laymen throughout our connexion in Louisiana should prepare manuscripts of this character, and present them to the next Conference, to be deposited with the society of ministers and laymen that may be appointed by it for this purpose. These papers will doubtless contain sketches of the men who founded our societies, of original and prominent members to the present time; of revivals, and the principal conversions occurring in them and elsewhere; happy deaths; erection of church, parsonage, and educational buildings; missionary and benevolent societies; retrogression, and its local and peculiar causes; influence on other churches, and their relation to us; and the present condition and prospect of all our interests.

It is a mournful truth that every year removes from our converse many of the aged and devoted persons who can relate valuable incidents of their religious contemporaries, or were themselves engaged in toil and conflict to lay the foundations of Zion. A slight delay and after their departure we will mourn the loss of their intelligence, but the golden sands are swept away for ever. Reflection on these remarks will, it is hoped, be indulged by those who seek the good of the city from above, and know what Israel ought to do. The progress of intellect and the example of our brethren demand that these things be done quickly.

J. H. HOYD.

THINGS NEW AND OLD.

These thoughts which I present to you, my reader, I call "New and Old." Yet I should find it hard to say which were New, or which were Old. Each thought is nearly wholly new to me, wrought out in the mind of itself. You, doubtless, will have worked your way to many for yourself; perhaps even you will have met them long since in books that I have never seen. Let that be: we are not now contending for prior possession, we are not wrangling over patents. Let who will have the honor, if so be I help you, though ever so little, in your journey towards the goal of Truth.

There are some men who believe, that though God lives, he has ceased to reign; though a King de jure, de facto he is deposed and utterly without power. The earth is not the Lord's, they say; some devil's, rather; and though the everlasting doors should unfold, no King of Glory would come in. To such men all devotion is impossible; all religious service a dreary tale. Hands and litanies are equally heartless. A public benefactor would they deem him who should introduce and render fashionable the praying-machines of Japan, improved by all the modern appliances of steam-power.

Some men, called authors, have and eye to business even in the deepest sorrow. They put out their griefs to interest, by making them known to the whole world. They melt down the gold and silver statues which they once worshiped, and coin them into current money.

Style is the body; thought is the soul. As there are persons in whom the animal portion of their nature predominates, so are there sensuous writers who think only of the graces, and neglect the subject of composition. On the other hand there are authors who profess to disregard style, literary spiritualists, who are ever repeating that "the letter killeth."

Each of these errs. The error of the former is manifest. The fault of the latter is not so obvious, and deserves a word of comment.

Setting aside the fact that beauty in itself is good, without respect to ulterior effects, it should be remembered that beauty of style is to a book what beauty of face is to a woman. For both beauty is the master of ceremonies who introduces them to the world. A woman may not claim attention from those around her; a book can not. The one trusts to personal grace and attractiveness of form and feature to win the admiration, the respect, the love, which she must not seek. The latter, if heavy, though good, will not command a general notice, for the public, unaware of the goodness, soon become sensible of the heaviness, and decline further acquaintance. The public is not compelled to read books, however good they may be. It must be allured by the enticement of clear and vigorous thought; simple sentences austerely graceful; words that are always strong, and never redundant.

But this is not all. As beauty with women will lead to nothing more than an introduction, if there be only beauty, so, mere elegance of style will cause the reader to lay aside the book, if he do not find the sense corresponding to the words. Mere grace fails, when the more substantial qualities are absent. On the other hand, there are books, even as there are women, which will make themselves known by their own intrinsic merits, in spite of such disadvantages as the want of beauty or elegance. Straightway the style is forgotten in the thought. Nay, even as in course of time we became actually attached to the physical defects of a woman endowed with all bright gifts of mind and spirit, so the very cumbersomeness and awkwardness of a great and powerful book become endeared to us by the sentiment of long association. We would not change the ungraceful face for the cheeks of a Helen, or the bust of an Aphrodite: we would not barter the ungainly style for all the smoothly-flowing periods of an Addison or a Chesterfield.

Two negatives in theology do not make an affirmative, but, as in Greek, only make the negative stronger.—Protests against false doctrine are no substitutes for a right belief; and Anti-Anti-Christ is not the true Christ.

"The quarrels of lovers are the renewal of love," says the Latin grammar. In this case the parties concerned fall out, in order that they may experience the bliss of reconciliation. Quite different is it with some people: these will make up an ancient difference for the sake of creating a new one. To heal up old wounds, for the pleasure of cutting them open again, is their "Religio Medici."

The caricaturist holds the very lowest rank in literature. He is a witness to the existence of men with sense so dull, that they can perceive only the magnified and the distorted object. He takes it for granted, that those for whom he writes will fail to appreciate the real measure of character, and therefore he dwells exclusively on some prominent though quite unimportant and superficial traits. Dickens pays his reader a poor compliment, when he makes the individuality of his characters depend upon some physical peculiarity, as, for instance, the possession of prominent teeth; the habit of snorting like a steam-engine; and other such like accidentals. But while the author of Dombey and Son and Little Dorrit is thus too prone to imitate the school-boy making a rude sketch of his preceptor, by means of slate and pencil, the author of The Newcombes is a true artist, faithfully sketching every feature in its true proportion; aiming at the perfect delineation of the men and women that pass before him. In a word, the one writer is an artist, the other only a caricaturist.

It seems as if, in this world, thought and action were ever to be separated. The most practical man is almost invariably the one-sided; the narrow-minded, he who walks by the faith of prejudice, rather than by the sight of reason; he, who having once formed his opinions, is never moved from them, either because he can not understand opposing arguments, or because he obstinately shuts his eyes against all reason.

The many-sided man is always fearful of being overhasty or illogical in his decisions. He must have made acquaintance with and have throughly answered all possible objections before he will accept any proposition as a principle of action. Too late he learns that Art is long and Life is short, and that inaction is a worse evil than illogic. The man of thought is open to another danger. When he comes to converse upon disputed points with those who are not oppressed with too much brains, he is often disgusted to find that they have made up their minds without having studied the points at issue. True, they have arrived at a right decision. But this is not enough; the goal should have been reached by the right path. If the logical man endeavors to show that there are strong and weighty arguments on the other side of the question, he is sure to be met by a storm of indignant reproaches from men who have never learnt that "it is lawful to be taught by an enemy." Instinctively he shrinks from association with such narrow-minded sectaries. He hates the profane vulgar, which, says Sir Thomas Brown, "is opener to rhetoric than to logic," and delights itself in the tawdry tinsel of platform oratory. Unwittingly he sympathizes with an error that has been slandered, and is proportionably estranged from a truth that has borne false witness.

Is such a man, therefore, wholly truthful, or even merely useless? By no means. Were he merely a safety-drag upon the chariot-wheels of society, he would fulfill a necessary purpose. But he is more than this; for while by doing, is commonly meant the active, bustling, vigorous exertion of life, such as delights in velocity of motion, variety of occupation, frequent change of place, there is another species of action, unobtrusive, quiet and often invisible. Such is the action of the student who devotes himself to the study of nature's laws, deduces from thence their effects, and so attains to certain sure rules of action by which the "active" man is the first to be benefited, but for which he is the last to be thankful.

Let those who honestly believe and avow their conviction that man ought to give up his reason to God and his church, consider that the Almighty hath never delighted in maimed sacrifices. The work that he has created he would see perfectly acting, not shattered in one part that the other may act more easily. He would not have man destroy his intellect, under pretense of doing sacrifice in its perfect entirety.

So likewise as regards man's social position. The chosen saints of God have not been the most restless, but the hands of families, of armies, of nations. The most perfect man, considered socially, is he whose relations are most diverse and numerous. The brother is a more perfect man than the brotherless; he who has a friend than the friendless; the husband than the celibate; the father than he without offspring. All these relationships afford scope for the performance of duties; and therefore give room for trials and temptations, and therefore furnish a field for battle and for victory. To the man who feels that there is danger in thus joining himself to the world, duty is plain. Let him flee from it; only let him always bear in mind that he is inferior, and not superior to his fellow-men who discharges all the manifold duties of husband, father, friend. The hermit ranks very far below the hero, for, if the truth be spoken, he has run away from the field of battle—wisely, if he can not fight, but certainly not gloriously, since though discretion is a part of valor, only Sir John Falstaff would call it the better part.

Total abstinence, celibacy, seclusion, though virtues, are by no means the highest virtues; except, indeed, they be practised, not for our own safety, but for the good of others. Viewed from one stand-point, they are manifestations of cowardice and of the bondage that engendereth fear. Always (excepting as above) they are contrary to the "perfect liberty" where-with the God-Man came to set us free.

Man is never so afflicted as when he does no feel his sorrows. Want of feeling is want of life. Corruption sets in when pain has ceased.

All approach towards political perfection must be made by means of steady adherence to an improvement on principles already established, rather than by the adoption of new theories. Talleyrand declared that he had "sworn 'eternal allegiance' to eleven constitutions." And had he lived a few years longer, he would have had opportunity for vowing loyalty to well nigh the square of eleven. Systems of government, French polished, "warranted sound," beautiful-looking Pantisocracies, somehow do not answer. The great truth that what is to endure must have a gradual growth, a truth which Nature herself teaches in her living monument, the thousand-yeared oak, can not be violated. Well said Sterling:

> "How slowly ripen powers ordained to last,
> The old may die, but must have lived before.
> So Moses in the vale an acorn cast,
> And Christ was shadowed by the tree it bore."

It has been affirmed again, and it is a lesson hardly learnt through many a sad experience, that every civilized country contains in its laws and constitution the seed and germ of its own advancement; and that every violent revolution not only does not hasten on the consummation, but seriously retards it, and even in some cases endangers it altogether. As when the child impatient that the seed does not at once become a plant, digs it up, ere it has laid hold of the ground, in order to see if it is growing.

The gradual growth of English liberties, through Plantagenet strife, Tudor despotism, Stuart impotence, and Hanoverian stupidity, is a trite illustration of this principle. The last seventy years of French history would form another illustration e converso no less obvious.

Laymen should be very cautious how they undertake matters which are usually conducted by regularly authorized individuals. This proposition involves the very important principle of "division of labor." In a world where there is so much to be done, and so many people to do it, let each choose his own part, thoroughly master that, and then, when he comes to give the world the benefit of his experience and knowledge, he can speak with the authority necessary not only to support his own claims to proficiency, but to put down the pretensions of presumptuous and ignorant upstarts. Nevertheless, though based on an elementary principle of political economy, our proposition will sound narrow and exclusive to those who love to sneer at "state-craft," "priest-craft," and all other "crafts."

Most illogical are such people in their objections.—The very word which they use as a term of reproach should teach them better manners. For what is craft but power or skill? And, therefore, state-craft is merely a practical knowledge of state affairs; priest-craft, skill in all matters that relate to the priestly office. The craftsmen of mediæval times were the men trained to one or other of the various crafts, and who, having been tried and found able, were admitted to the fellowship of those who had gone through the same education, and were thus endowed with authority to reject or accept fresh candidates. You say that there are often men not recognized by the craftsmen who are quite as skilled and competent as the most venerable member of the guild. It may be so. If it be so, it is the "outsiders'" own fault or misfortune that they have not obtained recognition from those who alone can issue the royal letters patent of orthodoxy. Certain it is that for one case where the community suffer from refusing to avail themselves of the skill of a competent though unauthorized practitioner, there are twenty cases where the public, deluded by loud vaunts of omnipotence, receives great injury from resorting to ignorant quacks. The advantage of a corporation that possesses powers to examine and approve or reject candidates is too great, viewed as a precaution, to justify any person in resorting to the services of those who have not been thus approved, however skillful they may be.

The sharpest pain which we feel at the loss of a friend, springs from the thought that in a short time this very sorrow will have ceased to be. We can not bear to think that our love, which we deem boundless and infinite, should be outlived by time and space, the finite. Our grief becomes selfish, for it is mingled with self-contempt; we would nurse and strengthen it, in order that we might attain to something of the heroic. Our sorrow is not the anguish of a Constance, mourning for her murdered Arthur, who could truly say:

> "Grief fills the room up of my absent child,
> Lies in his bed, walks up and down with me,
> Puts on his pretty looks, repeats his words,
> Remembers me of all his gracious parts,
> Stuffs out his vacant garments with his form."

We must do more than plead guilty to Philip's charge. We are fonder of our grief than of him for whom we grieve. "So was it with me," says St. Augustine, when his friend was taken from him by early death; and that wretched life I held dearer than my friend."

What, then, do we learn from this? That even in our pursuit and most "disinterested" affections, self is the base and crown of all. Cæsar gathered his robes around him that he might fall as became Cæsar. We, when we grieve, would grieve forever, that so the intensity of our passion might be worthy of—our friend? nay, rather of ourselves.

How comes it to pass that perverts are always the bitterest of opponents? Is this rancor a partially assumed hatred, to be paraded before the world as an excuse for desertion? Or is it a natural antipathy, which is always felt to a cause which we have betrayed? Each supposition may be partially true. Certain it is that we never like to look upon the party that we have abandoned. It seems as if they might justly accuse and condemn us; and we hate the accuser and the judge. But charity suggests another hypothesis, which is probably the most correct. It should be remembered that when change of opinions is honest, and proceeds from deep conviction, there must have been a painful struggle, between the conscience and old ties, old predilections, old associations, old prejudices, old friendships. Especially hard to overcome must have been the feeling of dislike to the confession that hitherto we have been in error.—To vanquish all these strong objections, the force of truth must have been great indeed. Men do not lightly turn their backs upon their kindred, nor easily forget their father's home. Not for the sake of any vain caprice will they encounter fearful ontreaties, bitter reproaches. No foolish whim would ever induce them to acknowledge that they are so very fallible. If, in spite of all these deterring circumstances, the honest man becomes converted or perverted, or what you will, must we not infer that conviction must have been very, very deep? And if so, no marvel that for the future, the convert is fierce in defense. Most marvelous would it be did he not thus treasure that pearl of great price, for which he has sold all he once had.—Dublin University Magazine.

THE LAST PRAYER.

There was a lovely little child, not three years old, who was once lying with white cheeks and lips, and with dimming eyes, upon her cradle bed. She was dying; but how could such a little one understand that?

She did not understand it, but believed that it was evening, and that she was going only to her usual rest.

As her mother bent over her, the child whispered pleasantly, "Good night, mamma," and then she folded her waxen hands over her breast, that was hardly stirred now by the failing heart, and said,

> "Now I lay me down to sleep,
> I pray the Lord my soul to keep,"

and she never spoke again.

It is affecting to think of that; but several days since an incident occurred which is even more touching.

A youth who was soon to have led to the altar his chosen bride, was taken ill of a fever. Anxious friends did for him everything that love and skill could devise, but it became apparent that he must die. His mind was so affected that he did not know his friends. They tried vainly to bring him to himself. Not for a moment did he have command of his reason sufficiently to make any arrangements for his death, or to bid farewell to the friends whose hearts were breaking to lose him. He muttered and raved constantly until a few moments before his death. Then he became calm, and a very sweet and pleasant expression was upon his face—just like his own sweet and pleasant disposition, it was, and probably the friends who were watching his every breath, hoped that now at last he would know and speak to them. But he did not; he lifted his hands and folding them quietly across his breast, said, as the dying babe said, only he had strength to go through the prayer:

> "Now I lay me down to sleep,
> I pray the Lord my soul to keep;
> If I should die before I wake,
> I pray the Lord my soul to take.
> And this I ask for Jesus' sake."

He had closed his eyes; his breathing grew fainter and fainter. In a few moments all that was left on earth of the beloved of many hearts, and the desire of many eyes, was a still form of beautiful and smiling clay.

Alas, for us! what should we do when our friends lie thus before us, were there no sure promise of the Resurrection?

DR.

New Orleans Christian Advocate.

Terms—$2 00 per annum, in advance.

NEW ORLEANS:

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 4, 1860.

SENDING OUT ACCOUNTS.

We are now sending out the accounts of the Advocate as rapidly as possible. We send a list to the preacher, and individual accounts to the subscribers, at the same time. We send accounts to all who have not paid to January, 1861, it matters not how small the amount; because we wish all accounts to begin and end with the year. We are as careful as possible; but should there be mistakes, let us know immediately. Let all pay up to 1861, and the accounts will be much more convenient to our subscribers, and also to ourselves.

LET US HAVE THEM.

This issue of the Advocate is the first one in April.—The price from this number to the end of the year will be only $1 50. We shall increase the edition for the benefit of those who may subscribe during the month, etc. We want ONE THOUSAND NEW SUBSCRIBERS to begin at the date specified. An average of THREE EACH from all the preachers who receive the paper gratis as agents, would accomplish it. We place it at the lowest figure, that it may be easily done, and done at once. Every agent could do it within one week after reading this.—We merely state the proposition; we will not urge it. Can our friends be brought to do a great thing, so easily done, for a good newspaper of their own?

SOUTHERN LITERATURE.

The press is now everywhere acknowledged as an agent of vast power in literature, politics, and religion; hence all are forward to invoke its aid. It is an agent of untold power for evil when sin controls its issues, and in this way has been an agency of vast efficiency in building up the kingdom of darkness. The common secular press of the country which might, if properly conducted, be such a power for good, is probably, in a large number of instances, either decidedly promotive of evil by its course, or else, by a course of cowardly neutrality, it completely ignores the existence of crimes which threaten the overthrow of all that is good in the world or stable in the foundations of society; or if it profess to reprove these outrages on the virtue and peace of society, it is done in such a spirit of levity as renders the proffered reproof a very direct encouragement to offenders to repeat their offences. The good book hath said, fools make a mock at sin, and let me add that other fools laugh at this mockery. We don't intend this as a sweeping charge against all secular papers; there are honorable exceptions, but they are few compared with the great mass of secular prints. Go read the daily and weekly issues of the secular press throughout the country, and what a sickening puffing and glorifying of race horses and racers, gentlemen and cock-fighters and game-cocks, liquor dealers, and theatres, and star actors and actresses, although possibly some of them are notorious gamblers, drunkards and debauchees. Yet these, who are glorified as reformers of language, manners and morals, are constantly receiving the glowing endorsement of thousands of the newspaper conservators of the peace and virtue of society. But it is not the newspaper press alone which is aiding and abetting this process of corrupting the heads and hearts especially of the young. Tens of thousands of what are called the yellow covered literature of the day are scattering broad-cast over hill and dale, over swamp and prairie, on railroad and on steamboat, the deadly virus of which is corrupting with fearful rapidity the heads and hearts of all classes, and especially of the youthful portion of the community. To counteract this tendency to evil, the church has felt itself called on to make vigorous efforts to circulate a literature pure and elevated in its tone and character. The last General Conference bestowed a good deal of attention on this subject, and devised a plan which, it was supposed, would afford so many facilities for circulating our publications as would ensure their general dispersion throughout the country. The Annual Conferences, many of them, have responded; depositories have been established, houses rented, agents employed, books procured, and every arrangement made to induce the preachers and others to buy and circulate the books. But what will all this avail so long as the books remain on the shelves unsold? Now, I don't know the state of matters in the different Conferences, but I have recently visited one of them, viz: the one at Mobile, which I think it likely is doing as well as most of the others, and I understand they are doing rather a light business. They say their orders are rather too few and far between to justify the outlay which they have been compelled to make to carry out the designs of the Conference. It should be borne in mind that to meet the probable demands of the public it is necessary to keep on hand a considerable variety of books, requiring the employment of considerable capital in furnishing the depository, or the various depositories. This, of course, involves the necessity of large investments at the publishing house, in order to keep the depositories supplied; so that unless the books are promptly disposed of and paid for, the operations of the publishing house are crippled, and this state of things long continued must result disastrously to the publishing house and its branches. The Alabama Conference has given its money very liberally to build up the establishment, but unless more general and vigorous efforts are made to circulate the books, its results will greatly disappoint its friends. We make a great ado about Southern independence, and yet 'tis possible that among some of those who are most thorough salamanders, not a few would not hesitate to prefer trading with a Northern house, if thereby a few more dollars might be made or saved. Now, it seems to me that if I were a member of an Annual Conference, I should feel bound in honor and in conscience to give the preference always to my own Conference Depository; respect for the action and character of the body to which I belonged, by whose action such Depository had been established, would require this much at my hands, even if the act establishing had not at the time met my approval entirely. Now I recommend to our friends to think on this subject seriously. Remember the establishment at Nashville is a Southern experiment. You talk a great deal about being independent of the North, which you never can be as long as the North furnishes your literature; never—never. Your politicians can't make you independent after all their thunder. You must create and sustain an indigenous literature, and when that is done broadly and energetically, other things will necessarily follow, and Southern independence in the best sense will be established, and never till then. As long as the people of the South ignobly truckle to the manufacturers of Northern literature by giving to Northern books and periodicals the decided preference over those of the South, all our large talk is but empty swagger. Now we hold that Southern periodicals are, to say the least, as good as those bearing a Northern imprint, and if they are not, why? Is it not because many of our ablest authors contribute the fruits of their genius and study to build up and give currency to Northern papers, because such writers, many of them at least, can't afford to labor for nought, while their bread depends, to some extent, upon the labor of brain and pen? Northern publishers pay liberally because their subscription lists are large, embracing many hundreds of Southern subscribers. Now and then some public-spirited Southerner resolves to wipe off the reproach from his Southern home, and he puts forth a prospectus full of patriotism, inviting his countrymen to rally to the support of a sterling Southern periodical, and to enable him by their liberal support to establish and sustain it, by procuring the best talent of the country. The papers for a while land it and glorify the editor, and bid him God speed; but then these God-speeds don't pay the paper-maker, nor the printer, and in a short time we are advertised that this hopeful periodical has died for want of bread. Such has been the history of a majority of the magazines and family newspapers published at the South. May we hope that a brighter day is dawning on the land of cotton and rice and sugar cane? We would fain hope so, though we should like to see ground for a stronger faith on which to rest our hope.

Now, one main reason why we wish to see Southern literary enterprises sustained is, to call out and sustain the efforts of Southern minds. That we have an abundance of sterling talent at the South cannot be doubted, and all it needs to bring it abundantly into vigorous action is sufficient encouragement and material aid. And why is not this aid furnished? There is wealth enough in the country, and if our men of wealth would bestow but a moiety of that which they waste on cock fights, race horses, cards and liquor, there would be an ample endowment to call into active service a host of the ablest pens of the country.

But I must bring this long chat to a close. Again we invoke the serious attention of preachers and people to the great work of earnestly and diligently engaging in the wide dissemination of the literature which goes out with our imprint. This is a work in which our laity, both male and female, may engage with great propriety and hopeful success. True, I have known some aspiring genius of a preacher who felt that his stilts were too high to enable him to come down to bookselling; but such men are very apt to be good for nothing except to harangue the people from the pulpit. Take our people generally and they honor above all others the travelling preacher who does all the work of a travelling preacher. As ministers of God, we are called on to do everything in our power to spread through all the land the knowledge of the grace of God, and as this is one grand and efficient means of doing it, let us embrace it heartily and carry it forward with diligence and earnestness.

JAMES O. ANDREW.

Summerfield, Ala., March 27, 1860.

NEW YORK LITERARY CORRESPONDENCE

NEW YORK, March 23, 1860.

The great event of the last two weeks, in the literary world, is the publication of a new work by Nathaniel Hawthorne, after a silence of eight years. The lovers of Hawthorne had their curiosity fully aroused and everybody was eager to know what was the reward for so long waiting.

I have read the "Marble Fawn," as the new story is called. I think it, so far as style goes, the finest of all his works. There is indeed no such writer of English as Hawthorne, and the "Marble Fawn" is his most carefully written, his most exquisitely written production.

As for the story—it is weird; it is powerful; it is intensely interesting; and—I venture to say it only in a whisper,—it is unnatural and unsatisfactory; in some points forced, and in others vague.

Mr. H. complains that our dry and matter of fact America does not furnish material for romance, and if it were not for his own "Scarlet Letter," and "House of Seven Gables," I should call his complaint a very just one. But remembering the "Scarlet Letter," no one will forgive Mr. H. for shifting his ground from New England, where he is at any rate at home, to Italy, where it is very evident he never penetrated Italian life, and where his New England characters walk somewhat stiffly, and as in a masquerade. It seems to me that when our writers once see Italy they never get it safely out of their heads again, and I could wish that the better part of them might never see it, while I cordially join in the devout wish of a recent critic of Italian journeyings, who prays that in future all journeying Americans who purpose a book of travels thither, may literally "see Naples and then die."

Finally—is it wrong to ask that the "Marble Fawn" should have a purpose? A lady friend of mine, who is one of Mr. Hawthorne's admirers, sat up till twelve one night to finish the book, which had—so she said—a terrible fascination for her. "But," said she next day, "What is the use?" And it seemed to me a very pertinent question. Here is speech, after eight years' silence; speech of the finest kind, as to manner; but everybody asks, what does it mean? And one ruthless and conscienceless person whispered in my ear, "Monk Lewis and Mrs. Radcliffe did that kind of thing, not quite so elegantly, but much more effectively."

That is to say—finally—the Marble Fawn will not compare, as a genuine work of genius, with the Scarlet Letter; while, as a work of art, it must take the highest rank in American literature of that kind. One good result it will probably have: it will bring its author back to American soil—where he belongs.

Messrs. Derby & Jackson of New York have just published a most interesting volume, "Recollections and Private Memoirs of George Washington, by his adopted son, G. W. Parke Custis." We can never have too many facts about Washington. And the Recollections of Mr. Custis, which are here collected from the columns of the Washington Intelligencer, are of that kind which are of most value now; they refer to the private life of the great man, with whom it was Mr. Custis's fortune to be thrown into such intimate connection. To these Recollections rescued from newspaper columns, are added in the present volume others, and also quite a number of letters, never before published, from Gen. Washington to the father of Mr. Custis, and to others. The whole is thoroughly "edited" and abundantly annotated by Benson J. Lossing, Esq., the author of the Field Book of the Revolution, a gentleman to whose patient and zealous and timely research the history of our country owes more than to any other man—for he alone has preserved, with pen and pencil, more memorials of the men and the scenes of the Revolution than all our other historians put together; and whoever follows Mr. Lossing will gain a more accurate and satisfactory knowledge of how the Revolutionary patriots lived and moved, dressed, ate, drank, spoke, slept, starved, fought, died, than he can get by any other study: just as this fine volume of Mr. Custis's Recollections seems to bring one nearer to the Father of his Country, and shows more satisfactorily how the great man did, when he lived at home, among his family, friends, servants, and cattle, than half a dozen stately histories.

There are some wise letters from Washington to G. W. P. Custis, then a young man at College, which are now published for the first time, and all show once more how thoroughly conscientious, and how equally tender and wise he was, and how easily he could turn from those affairs which seemed enough to engross his every thought, to the affairs of his young ward who had not yet entered upon life's duties.

I have before me a prospectus which announces the publication, in a short time, of the first Part of a Commentary on the Holy Scriptures, in German, the preparation of the materials for which has been the work for the last ten years, for the Rev. Dr. Wm. Nast, of Cincinnati; and which will be his life work when it is completed. It is published by authority of our General Conference, which at the session of 1852 appointed this work for him in addition to his other labors.

The Part I have seen shows sufficiently his arrangement of matter, which seems to me admirable, because exceedingly simple and methodical. The plan is entirely new, and is stated thus:

"While in all other commentaries, verbal explanations, geographical and historical remarks, doctrinal exposition, and practical application of the text have been indiscriminately united, the expounding material in this work is distributed among four distinctive rubrics, so that the reader is not obliged to search through the whole in order to find an illustration in a certain direction.

a. In the first place, every Gospel is divided into paragraphs, each of which forms a connected whole, and the table of contents annexed to each Gospel, will enable the reader, by reference to the paragraphs, to find any discourse or event at a furtive glance. The text of each paragraph will be preceded, where it is needed, by some introductory remarks, which point out the connection with the preceding paragraph, and enable the reader to view the succeeding text from the right stand-point and in the proper light.

b. If the text the reader will find small ciphers and letters appended to certain words, pointing to parallel passages and foot-notes. These foot-notes contain all such annotations as may be considered by themselves; as, for instance, corrections of the authorized translation, historical and geographical notices and illustrations of certain customs. The foot-notes will be especially welcome to the Sunday school teacher.

c. The text of each paragraph is followed by the doctrinal exposition given by reference to the verse or verses inclusive of critical remarks, solution of difficulties, refutation of misinterpretations and of objections made by infidelity.

d. In most cases each paragraph closes with a practical edifying application of the preceding exegesis, mostly in homiletical form."

The Commentary proper is preceded by a General Introduction to the New Testament—an essay, which, as the synopsis of its contents will show, will be of very great service to the student of the Bible:

CHAPTER I. The ground on which the canon of the New Testament rests.

CHAPTER II. The genuiness or apostolical origin of the New Testament writings.

Sec. 1. The outward historical testimonies.
Sec. 2. The internal evidences.
Sec. 3. The integrity of the text.
Sec. 4. Refutation of the mythical hypothesis.

CHAPTER III. The historical credibility of the evangelists.

Sec. 1. The personal and literary character of the evangelists.
Sec. 2. Refutation of objections made on the ground of apparent discrepancies and seeming contradictions.
Sec. 3. Refutation of objections made on the ground of the pretended impossibility of the miracles reported by the evangelists.

CHAPTER IV. Jesus Christ—the subject of the Gospel history—himself the most irrefutable proof of its truthfulness and divinity.

Sec. 1. The historical character of Jesus.
Sec. 2. Summary of the oral teachings of Jesus, infinitely superior to all that the wisest men before him ever taught.
Sec. 3. The moral perfection of Jesus.
Sec. 4. The declarations of Jesus concerning his divinity.
Sec. 5. The miracles in the history of Jesus.
Sec. 6. The predictions of Jesus and their historical fulfilment.
Sec. 7. The incarnation of the son of God the great historical center of all divine revelation.

CHAPTER V. The inspiration of the New Testament writings.

CHAPTER VI. The relation of the New Testament to the Old.

CHAPTER VII. The language in which the New Testament was written.

CHAPTER VIII. The principles of correct interpretation.

CHAPTER IX. The different parts of the new Testament.

CHAPTER X. A harmonistical table of the four Gospels.

Distinguished clergymen of different denominations, to whom, as good German scholars, advance sheets of the work have been shown, express their pleasure at its completeness and ability, and also the hope that it is to be translated into English, which I understand is to be done.

Rev. Mr. Milburn's book, "The Pioneers, Preachers and People of the Mississippi Valley," is almost ready for issue, and will be a treat, and I think a success. I heard recently his lecture on "What a blind man saw in England," and enjoyed it vastly. There is a whisper going around here, that perhaps you are to see the Blind Preacher down your way, and if he lectures within fifty miles of your sanctum, Mr. Editor, I advise you to go and hear him.

This is the day of fine Editions. Oliphant's interesting account of Lord Elgin's mission to China and Japan, in which we for the first time get a full length portrait of the Japanese, has been got up in beautiful style and at a low price by the Messrs. Harper, who are also getting ready a fine edition of Bulwer's novels—something in the best style of type, paper, and binding, at a singularly moderate price. They will probably add other really sterling novels from time to time to this "Library Edition," which will be uniform in size and binding, and thus make handsome sets for shelves.

A new book is announced by the Harpers, by the author of Adam Bede. It is to be called "the Mill on the Floss." Great is the curiosity as to how it will compare with Adam Bede. There can be no doubt as to its merits, and I venture to predict for it a great run.

To come back to choice editions: Messrs. Brown, Taggart & Chase, of Boston, who have now in press a splendid edition of Lord Bacon's works, in, I think, seven volumes, and ably edited, promise also a new and complete edition of Carlyle's Essays, revised, enlarged, and annotated by the author. The work will be in four volumes, printed at the Riverside press, on fine tinted paper, in the style of the Boston edition of the "Curiosities of Literature." It will have a copious index and new portrait, and will be altogether the finest edition of Carlyle ever issued on either side of the Atlantic.

The Harpers will publish in a few days a very interesting "History of Inventions and Inventors," by that indefatigable collector of quaint gossip and out of the way facts, Mr. Timbs. It is a book which would have delighted me when I was a boy, and over which I have spent some pleasant hours even this last week. They will also publish, in a few weeks, a book to which the critics and lovers of History are looking forward with much more than ordinary interest. This is Vol. I of Parke Godwin's History of France. Mr. G. has been engaged on this work for the last ten years, and his reputation as a writer and thinker, causes the expectation that it will take rank with those great historical works by which Bancroit, Motley and Prescott have made their country illustrious.

"Beulah," by Miss Evans of Mobile, has reached a sale of 22,000 copies, and still it sells—so I am creditably informed. Messrs. Derby & Jackson, the publishers of Beulah, will publish in time for the next holidays, a splendidly illustrated work, "The Loves of the Poets." The steel-plate illustrations will be gotten up in the very finest style of the art. It is a collection of the finest love-poems of the English and American poets, from the earliest times to the present day. Stoddart, the poet, is responsible. The work could not be in better hands. Mr. Stoddart is a gentleman of fine and correct taste, a poet whose own poetry shows that he knows how to criticise himself, and in whose hands such a selection as is proposed cannot help being well made. It is therefore safe to look for a holiday book which shall not be merely a holiday book.

NOTES WHILE ON A FURLOUGH—No. VI.

San José, Costa Rica.

San Jose is situated near the eastern extremity of the plain of the same name, at an elevation of some 4,200 feet. It has a fine location, on a plateau that descends gently from the Plaza in every direction. The city is regularly laid out, though the streets are rather narrow, the side-walks in the central portions are wider than those of Havana. The streets are paved with small stones, in squares of about thirty inches, and in the Oriental style, with the gutters in the center. They claim a population of some sixteen thousand for the city proper; but as various suburban villages are connected with it by continuous streets, their population should, in propriety, be included, in which case the number may be put down at 25,000. The buildings, with a few ambitious exceptions, are all of one story, built in this style on account of the frequent earthquakes that occur in this country; and like all other towns and cities in Central and South America, are built of adobes.

San Jose has no claims to architectural distinction; there are no private buildings worthy of mention, and the only public ones worthy of note are the Cathedral, located on the east side of the Plaza; the National Palace, which includes the Hall of Representatives, the President's apartments, the rooms occupied by the heads of the different Bureaus, and by the Supreme Court; the University, Hospital and Theatre. The National Palace is a neat two-story building, but has nothing of the grandeur or magnificence that its pretentious name might lead one to expect. The University is a one-story building, built on four sides of a court, and has a pretty appearance.

The population of San Jose and the surrounding country bears the same general appearance already mentioned; all are quite dark, and many show evidences of belonging to the mixed races. As this is the capital of the Republic, as a matter of course, there is a larger number of families of unmixed blood here than at any other point in the country; they are generally cultivated and intelligent, and, as in all other cases, while the ignorant and bigoted and prejudiced are more or less against foreigners, these are liberal in their views and feelings. Though, aside from the unfortunate influence which Walker's forays into Nicaragua produced upon the public mind here, I think the Costa Ricans a very peaceably disposed, friendly people. The city has quite a trade in the retail way, but does very little at wholesale, except in the article of coffee. Saturday is the regular market day, when a scene of some interest and excitement is presented. Early in the morning the people commence pouring into the city from all parts of the surrounding country, as far as Heredia, Alajuela, and even Cartargo, twelve miles distant; they come on foot, on mules and on horses, and in carts, with their various articles for sale. The crowd numbers by thousands. They cover the Plaza, and throng the streets in every direction around it. Their commodities are spread out upon ox-hides, blankets, or in palm-leaf baskets, according to their nature. They comprise a variety of grains, vegetables, sugar, fruits, rice, chickens, eggs, manufactures, &c. Bartering, chaffering and chattering, go on in a manner amusing to witness and hear. Merchants of the city, or rather shop-keepers and pedlars of various descriptions, taking advantage of the occasion, set up booths around the Plaza, and offer their wares for sale. This is the great trade day in San Jose, for nearly all these thousands wish to purchase something, after selling off their own little stock. Notwithstanding this influx, and the attendant excitement, little or no rowdyism is seen or heard. Indeed this is one of the most quiet cities I was ever in. There is little drinking and less quarrelling and brawling. You could see more of these evils in a single day in almost any American city than in a month here.

The city is surrounded by mountains on three sides: the mountains of Barba on the north, in which formerly was a volcano, but which is now an unfathomable lake; the mountain of Cartargo, on the east, which has a suppressed volcano also, emitting smoke and gas; on the south the mountains of San Miguel. These mountains present exceedingly fine views; their broad slopes are cultivated far up, and being divided into small farms and fields, differing in color according to their respective crops, they present scenes picturesque indeed. Many of the mountains of Costa Rica are volcanic. I could see them from my window in the hotel. Earthquakes are of frequent occurrence; there have been four shocks since I have been in the city. The first was so violent that it rolled us from side to side in the bed, several times.

I have spoken of a University, but you must understand something very different from what we usually mean by that term. Its advantages and scholarship are about equal to those of a moderate High School or Academy with us. In passing it I heard the pupils going through an exercise in concert. They seemed to be boys, from 13 to 16 years of age. This institution, and a private school recently opened by an exiled Cuban, furnish all the means for the education of boys which the city and vicinity afford. For girls, I learn there is no school at all! There is a number of small schools where the alphabet and the simplest rudiments are taught young children; they are generally kept by small shopkeepers. This list comprises the sum total of the educational facilities of the capital of Costa Rica.

Romanism here is true to itself; as there are no Protestants to proselyte by schools, and no danger that its youth will come under the influence of heretics, the youth of the country are left to grow up almost without education; and the country generally is far worse off in this respect than the city. Of course Romanism never troubles itself about schools and education, except when something is to be gained in the way of proselyting. Will it be plead that they are poor and have not the means to support such institutions? But how is it that they can always find means enough for this in Protestant communities? No one can imagine how much Protestantism does for Romanism when it is brought fairly in contact with it, in the way of making it decent, by compelling it to omit numerous absurdities, and attend to various duties, until he sees it without competition and where it has nothing to dread from comparisons. There is, I learn, a general desire among the latter classes of the capital that their children should learn the English language, and I have no doubt that a school for girls, by an American gentleman and lady, would find a ready patronage.

The Sabbath is observed here about the same as I suppose it to be in all Catholic countries. All celebrations, inaugurations, and public merry-makings are reserved for this day. The Legislature of the Republic commences its session on the Sabbath, the Constitution was promulgated on that day, followed by public rejoicing, a procession, fire-works, &c., &c. There is always mass in the morning, and trafficking and pleasure-seeking through the whole day. Yesterday a large crowd was engaged all the forenoon in selling their commodities, on a vacant lot right in front of one of the principal churches of the city. Some of them had their articles spread out on the side-walk, against the end of the church, and I believe some parties occupied portions of the steps themselves! In the meantime the services of the day took their regular course in the church, and the traffickers went in and worshiped by turns. At eight o'clock each Sabbath morning there is a grand military mass performed in the Cathedral, at which the President, Heads of Departments, officers of the army, and soldiers from the quarters of the city, are expected to be present. During this performance the "Star Spangled Banner" is played as an Anthem by the military band. Careless, lazy-looking priests are seen about the streets, in their "man-millinery," wearing hats with brims two feet across, fastened up at the sides, so as to present to an American's eye a most ludicrous appearance. When they wish to raise funds they cause themselves to be carried about the city on the shoulders of several men, preceded by a band of music, and accompanied by several young girls dressed in white, and carrying plates to receive the contributions of the faithful. Of course I distinguish in these strictures between the honest and devout among the members of this church, and the corrupt managers who might reform its evils and abuses.

San Jose has a very fine climate; the variation of the thermometer in the 24 hours is seldom more than ten degrees, and its extreme range through the year is but twenty-two degrees, say from sixty-two to eighty-four degrees, and only on four or five days did it reach the latter figure. The warmest weather is in the month of May, the coldest in December. In coming up from the sea-board to the altitude of San Jose, and especially to Cartargo, caution is necessary to prevent unpleasant consequences, from the great and sudden change; not being advised of the fact I adopted no precautions, and had an attack of fever.

There are no pleasure-grounds within the city limits, the Plaza being an unprotected thoroughfare; but one mile out of the city there is a beautiful savanna used as a public parade ground. It comprises some 120 acres, is entirely level, and faced on three sides by residences, and orange, mango, and panana groves. It is a beautiful place for either riding or promenading. It was most refreshing to my feelings to find a little praying band in the midst of the dense moral darkness of this place. I had heard that there was a Protestant service in the city on the Sabbath, and after some trouble found the place. I found a little company of something over a dozen assembled. The service was conducted by a layman, a Dr. Brealey, an English gentleman. It was mixed, consisting of a hymn, an extempore prayer, a chapter in the Bible, the Litany of the English Church, then another hymn, and then at their request I preached to them. I felt it really good to be there, and was refreshed in spirit. Dr. B. is a truly pious man, of a truly catholic spirit. I preached for them subsequently, when the congregations were larger, and as the British Consul was present and the Litany embraced prayers for the Queen and Prince Albert, Dr. B., who read that portion of the service, extemporized a clause embracing the President of the United States also. I deem it an honor to have been the first regular Protestant minister that ever preached the Gospel in the Republic of Costa Rica. A sea-captain, by the name of Andrew, had addressed them before, but he was not a regular preacher. May the time be at hand when the voice of the messengers of mercy shall be regularly heard in this city, and throughout the Republic. But I will close this long rambling letter.

J. H.

LETTERS FROM TEXAS.—NO. XI.

I can scarcely, in conscience, say from Texas, since, for the present time at least, Texas is merely made our starting point; though I believe it is quite allowable now-a-days to select any subject you choose, and write upon any other that may strike your fancy.—as new hats are sometimes advertised under the head of "Alarming Intelligence!" or a fine assortment of gentlemen's clothing under "Exciting News! A General War in Europe!" In fact, the nuities are antiquated, and are gradually beginning to retire from society.

In another letter, I have spoken of Indianola. To my eye, it is one of the best looking towns I have seen in Texas. There is some thing about it, I can not decide whether it is a mere fancy, but some thing about it reminded me of Dieppe—perhaps, after all, it is only that both are upon the sea-shore—a very general and indefinite sort of resemblance, it must be confessed.

Nothing very remarkable happened at Indianola.—The hotel at which we stopped was a very good one, kept by a Frenchman. After tea I went into my room; you know how all the bed-rooms look at a hotel. It is the same thing repeated a thousand times in our lives, like the same dream which comes back, and back, and back, and we can not tell why, for there is nothing impressive in it. There is the same air of loneliness; the same "bolt your door!" pasted up before your eyes, to remind you that you may be intruded upon, and to bring up pleasant visions of prowling loafers and robbers, with which to commence your slumbers; the same emotion: "the landlord will not be responsible for any articles of valuable jewelry, or for any gold which is not deposited at the office"—this never disturbs my tranquility; the same carpet, that covers a part of the floor; the same bureau and glass; the same wash-stand; the same piece of soap, that passes over your hands like a piece of marble; the same bed; the same Bible, presented by the Bible Society (by the way, however, it strikes me I saw no Bible at the hotel in Indianola); the same traveling trunk in the corner—your own! which reminds you that you are a wny-farer.

Through the kindness of Rev. Mr. Carden, who is the minister of the Methodist Church at Indianola, I was furnished with a copy of "Beulah," to while away the time of my journey—yet nothing whiles away the time to an anxious heart; nothing but the "prayers of David, the son of Jesse," then seem readable, and these are mingled and interspersed with the more homely petitions of your own.

As we sat in the parlor at the hotel, two very pretty, fashionably-dressed girls left the room, and a gentleman present remarked that they were "very fancy ladies."—Afterwards I began to think of the meaning and origin of that term as applied to ladies. Well, let me see! what does it mean? a fancy lady? what do fancy articles in general mean? A fancy basket for instance—what is that? It is not a market-basket that has any thing to do with potatoes and meat; it is not a basket to carry the keys; nor a basket for plain sewing nor knitting—let me see! what is a fancy basket made for? Oh, a basket that is made for visiting cards is a fancy-basket! That is it. That gives one some inkling of the meaning.

At two o'clock, Thursday, P. M., we stepped on board the strong fine ship that was to bear us to New Orleans. I looked at my berth, as a monk may look at the coffin which he sometimes keeps in his cell; I read a chapter in Beulah; Dr. Lyons kindly came down stairs, and talked to me very cheerfully and entertainingly; but still I knew that the sea was around me, and that the still waters of the Bay were only an introduction to the Gulf-billows. We sat down to tea, but I did not eat with much appetite. There were those horrid little barriers running along the table to remind one that the plates and cups and saucers have a trick of occasionally sliding off. I was rather disgusted, upon the whole, and retired to my state-room. I have an indistinct recollection of the ship's having landed the next morning for an hour or two at Galveston. I remember to have sat upon the deck, encouraged thereto by Dr. Lyons, and to have looked out upon the beautiful houses of the Island City, wishing that some friend or acquaintance would saunter down to the ship—but none sauntered down.

This hour or two, however, was only a short relief from the dreadful state of drunkness into which I had fallen, just outside Matagorda Bay, and which continued to the mouth of the Mississippi, when one experiences all those delightful effects which you might imagine to result from eating tobacco and opium, mingled. Once in a while the tantalizing stewardess came to inquire if I could not take something now. I answered very placidly: "No, I thank you; I will just lie quiet." Of course I would! I could do nothing else. At last I heard one of the sailors say: "I see the muddy waters!" Blessed sounds! I hope his sweet-heart kissed him twice when he landed.

Sunday morning we landed at New Orleans, some five or ten minutes perhaps too late for the cars of the Mississippi railroad. I regretted it; for although utterly opposed to Sabbath-traveling, I felt that in the circumstances it was a work of piety to go on rather than to stop. David ate the shew-bread and was blameless, nevertheless; our ignorant judgments are often wisely and kindly over-ruled. That day there was an accident on the rail-road which detained the cars until they were overtaken by the evening train. I spent the day sad, and for the most part lonely, at the City Hotel. I wrote a note to the agreeable Editor of the New Orleans Advocate, but did not know where to send it on the Sabbath. The servant insisted that he would receive it in an hour or two through the post. I did not believe he would, but had not spirit to contend. The note was sent. He probably received it when I was in the center of Mississippi.

JANE T. H. CROSS.

LETTERS FROM CUBA.—NO. I.

Methodism in Savannah—Dodging the Pope—Embarkation—"Good night! my native land, good night!"—Sea-sick—Hole-in-the-Wall—Cardenas—Matanzas—Havana.

MR. EDITOR: Several months of debility, resulting from the pertinacity of chill and fever, have prepared your correspondent to appreciate the full benefit of a few weeks of relaxation and travel. By the kindness of our good friend Dr. Sassnell, of the East Alabama Male College, I obtained a furlough, he consenting to preach for me during my absence. Leaving Auburn at half-past twelve, on the 22d February, I reached Savannah, Ga., in 19 hours in time for early breakfast. Savannah being my native home I, of course, passed a few days very pleasantly with the friends of "auld lang syne." Here the immortal Wesley spent his time and labor to little purpose, endeavoring to elevate the standard of morals among his own countrymen, and to enlighten the savages of the New World. More than a century has passed away, and, through a series of failures, Methodism has at last obtained a solid foundation in the city of Oglethorpe. Yet, there is still much room for progress. The discouraging influence of pope and prelate is still a barrier well nigh insurmountable. To illustrate the power of this influence upon the heart of the Roman Catholic laity, I will mention a circumstance which occurred here during my visit to Savannah last Spring. Two lady friends, who had been, in a measure, associates of my youth, we having lived for years as near neighbors, were desirous of hearing me preach; there was one difficulty in the way—they were confessing Catholics (and, I believe, true christians), and must by no means enter into a "heretic" chapel. Curiosity, however, prompted a compromise, and they took a convenient stand on the side-walk, where, through an open window, they could see the preacher and hear the sermon. This was settled the question whether the altar pollutes the preaching, or the preaching the altar. They listened to the heresy, but not inside of a heretical chapel. When the wearer of the triple crown, the effeminate papa of the Vatican, will lose his spiritual power over these lost tribes of Israel, the Father in heaven only knows.

A week of pleasant re-union with the old folks at home passed by, and at ten o'clock on the morning of the 1st March I was installed as "supercargo" of the schooner Alice Anne Bandel, Captain Alchorn, bound for Havana with a cargo of rice. A fair wind from the North-west took us out of port in fine style, and by three in the afternoon we crossed the bar, and under a press of sail stood out to sea. I sat on deck, and watched the receding land, until the dark lines of terra firma had faded away, and we were shut in from the sight of land, walled in by the restless billows of the Atlantic Ocean. How strangely one feels when, for the first time, he bids his native land "good night!" Not with the misanthropy of Childe Harold did I look upon the receding shores of Georgia. At one hearthstone, at least, a flame is burning which will burn the brighter when I return—at least one watch-dog will know my voice, and leap for joy, instead of "tearing me where he stands." Alas! how deeply must he drink of the cup of woe who can bid farewell to the "fatherland" with emotions of pleasure!

But the first evening at sea, however promotive of sentimentalism, is not exactly the right time to indulge it—So I hurried down to the cabin, and prepared to write some letters, determined to dishonor all the drafts of old Neptune on my loyalty. The old lord of the sea was in fine humor, and I dreamed of "passing muster" without attracting his attention. Vain conceit! There was a slight rolling motion of the vessel, and this seemed to me to increase, until all things, visible and invisible, were enjoying the lively exercise of universal churning. For supper I had little appetite, and eight o'clock found me in my berth, feeling decidedly queer. My old friend, the ague, was due at that hour, but seemed to doubt whether or not to come aboard. To say that I was sick would not express the idea, and I know no other word to use. From side to side I turned, and resolved to weather the storm, but alas! what can one do when he writhes beneath the terrible grasp of sea-sickness? Nothing—absolutely nothing. Medicines are vanities, coffee absurd, and my Havanas (tell it not in Gath) are a perfect nuisance. Morning came; but morning only brought with it a larger, stronger nausea. Thus passed away Friday and Saturday, and the beautiful Sabbath morning came with thoughts of home and friends, and solid earth; the bright faces of Anclara; and, above all, relief. Now I could walk the deck, using my "sea-legs," as the kind captain has it, like an "old salt." And the Sabbath saw left us seven hundred miles from "the home of the free, and the land of the brave." One word of advice to the confident landsman. Never boast thyself of impunity from sickness—it will come. Let it come at its pleasure; meet it bravely; and do nothing for it. Preventives are humbugs, and remedies are useless. Keep on deck, on your feet, and "tough it out."

All day Monday we were coasting the Island of Abaco, one of the British possessions, and at four in the afternoon we passed the Hole-in-the-wall light-house, at the extreme South-western corner of the land. The island is barren, almost entirely uninhabited, the captain informs me, although it is sixty miles long and some sixteen wide in the widest part. The light-house receives its name from a point of land, or rather a wall of rock which juts into the sea like a rampart; and about midway the wall is a cavity which can be seen with the naked eye three miles off, through which the water rushes with considerable force.

On Tuesday we made the Bahama Banks, the water varying from fourteen to thirty feet. The Banks are about ninety miles across, and the wind dying away, we cast anchor about midway on Wednesday, waiting for a breeze. Here I saw for the first time the beautiful star-fish, lying on the bottom, like real stars in a firmament below us.—Eight or nine weary hours passed away before the winds quickened, and then we moved off slowly until we reached the Gulf Stream on Thursday. Here a monster sun-fish; twelve or fourteen feet in length, swimming or rather floating along upon the surface, was the only relief to the monotony of view until evening, when a dark, cloudy spot in the horizon was announced as the first view of the Island of Cuba. It was a bill above Cardenas, about 120 miles below Havana. Next we passed the Pan of Matanzas, near the city of that name; and after beating against the tide all night, with a feeble wind, we sighted Castle Moro on Friday morning, and slowly worked our way by the gloomy looking castle, through the narrow entrance to the Bay, and cast anchor at a little after two o'clock, in await the visitation of the officers of the custom-house belonging to "la excelsa Reina de Castilla," the most excellent Queen of Spain. It being the dinner-hour of these officials, and as the law allows them two hours and a-half for that very interesting operation, I shall give your readers a longer respite, promising my "impressions" in future letters.

W. P. HARRISON.

Havana, March 10, 1860.

LETTER FROM DR. POWELL.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me to tender you my thanks for sending me the back numbers, embracing the "Notes from one on a Furlough." Our Brother Hamilton's letters, coming from that highly interesting region of the globe, cannot fail to edify all the readers of your most luvaluable journal. The Doctor, like yourself and your many contributors, wields a ready and graphic pen. Indeed, his correspondence alone, I opine, will be worth more than five times the subscription price of your paper, which I regard as one of the very best of the family of Advocates, though all are doing good wherever they go. My deepest regret is, that so many religious families fail to take a religious paper. Many who are in affluence, who have the ability, entirely neglect it. Would to God our people could be aroused to a sense of duty in this great matter, and may the day speedily come when every religious family, especially among God's poor, shall receive a weekly messenger from the religious press, diffusing light and knowledge in every household. But I seated myself to inclose you a small pittance, with a request that you send the Advocate to the following female friends, and greatly oblige yours, &c.,

N. B. POWELL.

Channenaggee, Ala., March 23, 1860.

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

APRIL 4, 1860.

MADISON COLLEGE, SHARON, MISS.

Mr. Editor: Having occasion to write a short notice to the members of the Mississippi Conference in regard to another matter, I beg the privilege of a few thoughts and words concerning the above named Institution. You remember that at our last annual conference a proposition was made, that if the friends of the Church and of education would raise an endowment fund of fifty thousand dollars, the trustees of Madison College would transfer the entire property—worth from twenty-five to thirty thousand dollars—to the Conference. Many members doubted the propriety of accepting the offer, on the ground that we might embarrass our operations in behalf of Centenary College, and by undertaking too much, fail to accomplish anything worthy of the Church or the cause of education. Upon reflection, and after a more perfect understanding of the proposition, seeing that it imposed no burden, involved no pecuniary responsibility on the Conference, the offer was accepted, and the Presiding Elders of Vicksburg, Sharon, Yazoo, Greenville, and Starkville Districts authorized to receive contributions to the endowment fund.

There can be no question as to the ability of the church and her friends to endow handsomely Centenary and Madison Colleges. There certainly can be no difference of opinion as to the obligation that is upon us to do thus much for so great a cause. Centenary College is the joint property of Louisiana and Mississippi Conference. Each Conference ought to feel therefore the same interest in the success of that noble institution. And yet Mississippi Conference can sustain Madison College also.

It seems that the Conference and the Church would be recreant indeed if they did not foster so important trusts committed to them in the providential way that the property of Centenary was, and that of Madison now is, to be passed into their hands. The locality and all of the advantages enjoyed by Centenary have been so frequently the subject of remark, and the theme of Educational Reports from Conference, that I need not speak of them here.

But I wish to say a word for Madison College. A sense of duty arising from more sources than one influence me to do so. This Institution is located near the geographical center of my native State, in the heart of the most lovely portion of the State. Wealth, refinement, intelligence and piety, unsurpassed by any other portion of the land, surround it. It is a shame that our people have not long since erected here a monument, not (as some would say) to their liberality, but to the goodness and mercy of God, by providing on the most extensive scale the facilities for acquiring a thorough and finished education.

Some may have their prejudices against Sharon. There may be blots on the page of its history, and yet there are associations that hallow the spot where sleeps the dust of the sainted Minter, Kinsman, and Samuel Divine, Greer M. Rogers, and John H. Magruder, whose prayers and tears have oft baptized the effort to establish literary institutions here that should be a blessing to the Church and the world. It constituted no small part of the vision that rose before the philanthropic spirit of Dr. Minter, who was a holy man of God, that amid the groves of that rural seat which he mostly planned, many a lovely girl would be trained for woman's proper sphere, and many a noble boy should be educated in all that would fit him for usefulness on earth and happiness in heaven.

When we think of all that has been done to promote the cause of education at Sharon, and the character of those who have put forth these efforts, we feel that while God's word is sure we must succeed in this enterprize if its friends will but persevere. Besides the worthy dead who devoted themselves earnestly to the work of sustaining the schools at Sharon, there still live some whose noble example is worthy of all honor, and will certainly provoke others to good works. The Messrs. Baldwin, J. S. Pritchard, the indomitable Jacob Matthews, H. H. Mootgomery, with the "vim" characteristic of the man, and the staid, steady Weggins; these all have wrought day and night, and still work, most of them to build up and sustain the schools at Sharon; and how that Sharon Female College, under the Presidency of Bro. Gard, is doing well, these brethren and friends direct their efforts and solicit the countenance and encouragement of the church in behalf of Madison College.

We risk nothing in saying that the Faculty of Madison College will compare favorably with most of the institutions in the land. The venerable President T. C. Thornton has labored and toiled for years to get the College fairly established. Who that has heard him talk and pray in behalf of Madison College but has felt, surely blessing—God will bless" Madison College. For his sake, who was my friend in other years, long, long ago, and whom I still love as a brother in Christ, I would rejoice in the success of this effort to endow Madison College.

The amiable, sweet-spirited J. M. Pugh is Professor of Mathematics, and one of the best instructors of youth in our land; faithful and zealous both as a preacher and professor. Pres. Thornton and Prof. Pugh have been identified with the College since its inauguration. In the department of Ancient Languages Prof. Hunnicut presides. He is a fine specimen of the Southern Christian scholar and gentleman; a Georgian, and specially recommended by Bishop Pierce for the place he fills. Hugh W. Pierce, A. M., is the Professor of English Literature. He is in all respects worthy and well qualified. A native to the manor born—a Mississippian by birth and education; as warm and generous a heart pulsates in his breast as in any man we know. From his boyhood I have known him. By industry, integrity, and the cultivation of mind and heart amid adversity, he has gained a position that is truly enviable. He, too, has been associated with Messrs. Thornton and Pugh from the beginning in the enterprize of sustaining Madison College.

Here then we have a College already doing well, having all the advantages of one of the finest locations in the State; a faculty who have been tried and proven; all Southern men; all Methodists but one (Mr. Pierce, who is a worthy member of the Episcopal Church); men who have shown their love for the cause of education by obliging to this College through all its fortunes. Shall we not improve the opportunity to make this institution fully the properly of the Church. May God bless the effort; and may Heaven smile graciously upon every effort to sustain and build up Centenary College.

H. J. HARRIS.

TO THE MINISTERS OF THE LOUISIANA CONF.

BRETHREN: You are aware that at the last annual session of the Educational Institute of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, held in the city of Atlanta, Ga., in July, 1859, that body, after due deliberation, determined, conditionally, upon the publication of a journal under their auspices and control, expressly intended to favor and foster the great educational interests of our Zion, and to spread the benefits of popular science and sanctified learning among the intelligent masses of our people, while the endearing claims of a pious home and a cheerful fireside should not be forgotten.

Those conditions having been fulfilled, the Educational Committee, to whom was entrusted the future management of the journal, proceeded vigorously to the execution of their work, secured the services of a faithful and experienced editor—Rev. J. Knowles; and after some unanticipated embarrassments and delays, have already issued the two first numbers of the Educational Repository and Family Monthly, which, we hope, will meet with your grateful approval. As its name imports, it will be issued monthly, and will be executed on excellent paper, and with fine type, by one of the best printers in the South. Each number will contain sixty pages of reading matter, much of which will be original and supplied by some of the ablest pens in our connexion.

By a recent official act, designed to secure it as wide a circulation as possible, the Itinerant ministers of the several Southern Conferences have been constituted regular agents for the Institute. The subscription price of the journal is $2 per annum, and each minister is authorized to retain for his services fifty cents on every subscription procured and forwarded to the treasurer, Green B. Haygood, Esq., of Atlanta, Ga. As this publication supplants no other recognized organ of our church, and is intended to be an efficient auxiliary in promoting the great cause of education, as well in our common as in our high schools and colleges, and all in subordination to the claims of religion and the authority of Heaven, we cannot but hope our brethren of the Louisiana Conference, with those of her sister Conferences in the South, will cheerfully exert their best efforts to advance and sustain so laudable a work.

While decided in its religious tenets, the Repository will never, we trust, forget the christian courtesy and brotherly kindness due to all sister denominations, or fail to favor their praiseworthy efforts to promote the same great interests which it espouses.

In Georgia the Rev. J. Blakely Smith has been constituted agent for the State, and while neglecting no other public duties, will "gladly give a prominent place to the claims of the journal." Prof. W. H. C. Price, of Auburn, Ala., has been, since the inauguration of the enterprize, and still remains general agent for the work.

In conclusion allow us to say that we have sent the first number of the Repository to such preachers as were known to us, and will gladly transmit a copy immediately to any gentleman who will accept the agency tendered, and on the terms proposed, and who will give his name and post office, by letter, addressed to Green B. Haygood, Esq., Atlanta, Ga. With fraternal regard, &c.,

A.

LETTER FROM BALTIMORE.

Mr. Editor: Our two Conferences closed their sittings last week. The following are the names of those who were chosen delegates to the General Conference—Revs. Alfred Griffith, Thomas Sewall, John S. Martin, N. J. H. Morgan, Norval Wilson, and E. R. Veitch, of the Baltimore Conference; Revs. C. B. Tippett, Henry Slicer, T. Mitchell, T. H. Sargent, George Guyer, George Hildt, and James H. Brown. Both sessions were characterized by harmony of action. The resolutions of the East Genesee Conference recommending the General Conference to admit lay-delegation into the Annual and General Conferences, was non-concurred in by both Conferences. The resolutions on slavery from the Cincinnati, Providence, and Erie Conferences, were each and all unanimously non-concurred in by both Conferences.

A Committee in the Baltimore Conference reported the Baltimore Christian Advocate to be in a flourishing condition. A number of petitions from different places in Virginia were presented to the Baltimore Conference, urging the necessity of an immediate settlement of the slavery agitation, or the separation of the Conference from the Methodist Episcopal Church at the North. These memorials and resolutions were referred to a committee of seven (one from each district), in connection with the seven lay delegates. This committee recommended moderation under present circumstances, assuring the people that the Baltimore Conference will stand by them and defend to the last their rights as christians and citizens, and that any violation of these solemn rights by the General Conference, as now held by them under their discipline, would be considered as just cause of separation from the Northern Conferences.

The next Annual Baltimore Conference is to meet in Staunton, Virginia, on the first Wednesday in March, '61. The East Baltimore Conference is to meet at the same time in Chambersburg, Pennsylvania.

Our State Legislature closed its session at Annapolis, according to constitutional limitation, on last Saturday night, 10th inst. Several stringent free negro bills which had been before the House of Delegates, were defeated. A bill was, however, passed preventing future emancipated free negroes to remain in the State, and granting free colored persons the privilege of returning to voluntary servitude. Our City Railway Company, Messrs. Brock & Co., of Philadelphia, failed to obtain a charter. By a vote of two-thirds of both Houses, Judge Stump of our Criminal Court has been removed by Gov. Hicks. We may now hope for better law and order.

M.

Baltimore, March 14, 1860.

THE CHINA MISSION.

Mr. Editor: Having read and pondered President Thornton's appeal in behalf of the China Mission, is it presumptuous in one reared amid the secluded shades of humble life to offer a few thoughts on the same subject? The tiniest flower and the lowliest shrub are permitted to join in the great drama which Nature is ever enacting; and may I not hope that the suggestions of youth may meet with kindly consideration from older heads and wiser hearts? Truly does your venerable correspondent, whose name is a household word in many homes and hearts, say, "Here is a reality." Yes, a noble and a fearful reality! Here is food for the thought of young divines, and stimulus for the noblest aspirations of woman. What a comment on the fashionable frivolities of life does the example of these young missionaries afford! What a proof of the power of God in awakening the soul of man to a consciousness of his vast responsibility, and in arousing the latent energies of woman to a degree of activity commensurate with the depth and earnestness of her nature! We once knew a young minister whose cheek would glow and whose eye kindle when he spoke of the China Mission, and his conversation betrayed that there was a struggle going on within in reference to its claims upon him. We have since learned that he is married. Is he ready to go? And is the trusting heart, whose fate is irrevocably linked with his, willing to relinquish the ties of friendship and the blessings of home, to find on heathen shores the post of duty and of happiness. Read the life of the first Mrs. Judson; follow her o'er burning sands, and stood beside her when, with faltering breath and glazing eye, she would catch a glimpse of the loved and absent "Teacher;" then imagine the smiles of the Saviour and the shouts of the Redeemed which greet her entrance into the New Jerusalem, and say will you go. Poets have sung and minstrels chanted, with sweetest melody, the praises of "Mary." Sainted mothers, cherished sisters, and valued friends, have borne the same name; but in the "last great day" who shall appear to us more lovely, or who shall receive a sweeter reward and a brighter crown, than Mrs. MARY LEMOTTE?

ELLEN.

THE SOUTHERN METHODIST CHURCH IN THE CITY OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. Editor: You will please allow me to acknowledge through your paper the donation of two hundred dollars in behalf of the above enterprize, contributed by our Church in Montgomery, Alabama. If you can find space for the following extract from Brother Smithson's circular, it may excite some of your readers to aid us in the erection of our Southern Metropolitan Church:

The enterprise is an important one, and ought to succeed; and for the following reasons—

For the last ten years we (the Southern Methodists) have had a Church here, but it has been kept in comparative obscurity, owing to the lurking of its members to place the Church upon a firm basis. In consequence of this fact, we have not been able to exert that influence and command that respect in the community which we should have done had we been differently situated.

Again: Our obscure position here at the Metropolis of the Union has reflected seriously upon the reputation of our Church as a Southern organization; wherein strangers and distinguished foreigners have been led to suppose that the Southern Methodist Church was held in low repute in her own country—on Southern soil and in slave territury—and, therefore, we were, as a Church, but of little consequence in America. As they see the churches represented here, at the Capital of the country, so do they place their estimate upon the standing and influence of said churches in America, and carry away with them the impressions here made upon their minds, and publish them wherever they go. Being judged by such a standard, can you estimate the damage that we, as a Church, must suffer under the circumstances? Can you conceive of the prejudice that thousands must entertain and cherish against "our" Church, judging us from such a stand-point? Other denominations in this city do not to this day seem to understand why the great Southern Methodist family are so poorly represented here in Washington city. Again and again they enquire of me, "Why don't you people in the South place your Church upon a stronger basis here? Why (say they,) your present position—the back ground in which you are thrown—really reflects seriously upon the reputation of your whole Church." This is a pertinent fact, and it is deeply mortifying to me, and should be to every Southern Methodist. Owing to the facts here stated, we frequently lose our own members, and Southern friends—young men and women—who come here from the South, now and then wander off to more prominent and influential Churches, and are lost to our Church altogether. Is there a Southern Methodist in the land willing that we should any longer occupy this obscure position in Washington city? I opine not.

Now, brother, I am in favor—strongly in favor—of changing the present state of things, and of placing our Church in this city upon a sure and firm basis; of raising her in rank with the leading and most prominent churches in the city. It can be done, and in justice and honor to Southern Methodism it should be done at once. We should build a Southern representative Church here in Washington city this year. The work ought not to be delayed. And all the Conferences ought to be alike interested in the great enterprise, and by all means should contribute alike, in order to secure its speedy and triumphant success. When the Church is completed, the members here are generally in favor of having the station supplied from all the Conferences alternately.

Providence permitting, I shall be in your city shortly, to receive donations from any who are willing to contribute to the cause. Yours in Christ,

JOHN BAYLEY.

Summerfield, Ala., March 24, 1860.

CLINTON, LA.

"IGNATIUS" talks cheeringly. We feel inclined that way. He says: As your cheerful "phiz" has never been seen within the incorporated limits of our beautiful little town, permit me to trouble you with a description.—Clinton is twelve miles from Jackson, in the same parish, about twenty-one miles from the Mississippi River, having a railroad connection with Port Hudson, a population of about 1,800, three churches—Methodist, Baptist and Presbyterian; stores in abundance, no licensed grog-shops, and consequently few loafers (bakers' excepted). The majority of the people are regular church-goers, and very many of them professors of religion. Of about fifteen members of the bar, seven are professors of religion and three are local preachers; and our presiding Judge is a pious, God-fearing man.

We have four female and one male school, and nearly three hundred pupils. The Principals of all the schools are members of the Church. There are two Sabbath-schools, with about one hundred and fifty scholars. A large Masonic Male College will be completed by about the first of July next.

The health of the place is remarkably good. We have a most remarkable boy-preacher, a member of the Methodist Church, not more than fourteen years of age. I had heard much said about little Bontoer's preaching, and to satisfy my curiosity I attended one of his appointments at his father's house a few Sabbaths since. When the hour for service arrived, he modestly arose and gave out his hymn, and went through the opening service in a very solemn and unembarrassed manner; he announced his text and divided his subject with the correctness of a man of mature years, and preached a sermon surpassing my expectation and that of others who had heard him for the first time. I thought of what the Psalmist says of the children of the mouth who feareth the Lord. Surely out of the mouth of babes &c., is the truth of the Lord being established, and may He raise up many such throughout our land and country, is my sincere prayer.

Thus you will see, Mr. Editor, that we have one of the most desirable places in the South. Those who have children to educate could not select a better place anywhere within the bounds of the Mississippi and Louisiana Conferences. Trusting you will not be satisfied entirely as to all I have said, but that you will make it convenient to come up and see for yourself during the summer months, I remain yours &c.,

IGNATIUS.

STATE STREET COLORED CHARGE.

Mr. Editor: State St. Charge is prospering. About 36 received on probation last quarter; conversions every month; classes well attended; leaders industrious; and we are threatened with a coming shower. God speed it. Take it all in all, this is the most pleasant charge it has been my lot to serve. How would you like to have 1200 or 1400 hearers every Sabbath? to be sung into Paradise by a thousand voices, making melody sweeter than any this side the heavenly world? to have to meet 17 classes once a week, and 30 leaders once a fortnight? to keep the register of 1100 members; and above all to preach in an atmosphere of prayer to a people that love you, and come to hear the Word, and not to criticise the manner of its delivery? The greatest inconvenience under which we labor is want of room. We have a large house but want one much larger.

It may interest some persons, to know that the charge is self supporting, and will raise this year nearly $2400 for different objects. I write this that it may provoke some of our white charges to love and good works. There are some tokens of good in the other Charges. That venerable man of God, Rev. John Hersey, is here, and is preaching day and night. He will soon visit your city. God grant us a gracious rain of salvation.

B. B. ROSS.

Mobile, March 15, 1860.

A CARD.

To those kind brethren who have undertaken the sale of my book, "The Methodist Pulpit South," for the benefit of our Washington City Church, and in whose hands a large number of copies were placed last year, will pardon me when I earnestly request them to render me a statement of their sales at an early day. I am anxious, dear brethren, to see what we have done, and to learn what are the prospects of doing still more. Do not delay, if you please, to send in a statement of your sales, and also such funds as you may have in your hands for me.

WM. T. SMITHSON.

☞ Other papers will please copy.

FOREIGN.

Approaching Crisis in Italy.

NEW YORK, April 2.—The United States mail steamship Bavaria, from Hamburg, Southampton and Havre, arrived at this port today.

The Bavaria left Southampton on Sunday, 18th inst., and brings one day later political news than was brought by the Arabia.

The Bavaria brought no commercial news.

The most important political news received by the Bavaria is rapidly approaching crisis in Italy, which seems to be the all absorbing topic on the continent.

It is thought that Prince Carignon will assume the position of Governor-General of Central Italy, lately occupied by Gen. Buoncampayne.

The Paris journal, La Patrie, says that the question of unexation of Savoy to France has been definitely settled in Tuscany.

Negotiations are on a fair way of conclusion.

Great indignation is being manifested in Tuscany toward the Pope, in consequence of another circular, lately issued by him, which, together with other important measures taken by him, are considered in high quarters as inevitably tending to verify the programme laid down in the pamphlet entitled "Le Pape et le Congres." This last circular of the Pope will probably cause him to lose every portion of his domain, with the exception of Rome.

Letters received from Rome says the agitation is so great in that city that it is doubtful whether the French army will be able to restrain the people much longer.

The second warning, which immediately precedes excommunication, is said to have been sent to Turin.

DOMESTIC.

Congressional.

WASHINGTON, April 2.—In the Senate to-day the bill recently introduced, providing for a final adjustment of the private land claims in the States of Florida, Louisiana, Arkansas and Missouri, was passed.

Connecticut Election.

HARTFORD, Conn., April 2.—The election for Governor and other State officers was held to-day in this State.

Unusual excitement prevails throughout the State, and great anxiety is manifested as to the result.

Up to ten o'clock to-night the returns from the several counties, so far as heard from, are too meager to predict any definite result. The vote is believed to be very close.

Later From California.

ST. LOUIS, April 2.—The Overland Mail, with advices from California, has arrived at Malby's Station, the terminus of the San Francisco Telegraph line.

The news possesses no features of importance.

On the 19th inst., a fire broke out in the city of San Francisco, by which eight of the largest buildings were destroyed.

SAN FRANCISCO, (via Placerville) March 13.—The Sugar market closed buoyant; the demand for various qualities was fair.

The Celebrated Divorce Case.

ST. LOUIS, April 2.—The celebrated divorce case of Carstang vs. Shaw has been decided in favor of the defendant, reversing decision of the Lower Court by which Miss Carstang was awarded $100,000.

Large Fire in Jacksonport, Arkansas.

MEMPHIS, April 2.—a fire broke out in the town of Jacksonport, in the State of Arkansas, by which almost the entire business portion of the place was destroyed.

The loss is estimated at $100,000; of which amount about $60,000 is said to be covered by insurance.

Fatal Affray in Nashville.

NASHVILLE, April 2.—Dr. Henry Carew was shot and almost instantly killed on Saturday last at the Commercial Hotel, by P. P. Frewett, of Spain.

Dr. Carew was professionally called out by Frewett to attend upon him, and while writing out a prescription was shot in the back part of the head by Frewett.

There are many rumors as to the motive of this dreadful deed, of which the most prevalent is that Frewett had the mania potu.

EDITORIAL NOTICES.

ADVERTISING IN THE ADVOCATE.

The business public are slowly learning that the Advocate is THE GREAT ADVERTISING PAPER OF THE SOUTH AND WEST. Advertisements in it are more valuable than in any half dozen other papers.

1.—It has the largest circulation west of Charleston, and South of Cincinnati; larger than any other two weeklies in New Orleans, and is increasing rapidly—will, in a few years, double its present circulation.

2.—Of medium size, and not crowded with advertisements, an advertisement is not lost in it, but can be easily found.

3.—In our "Editorial Notices," which we give to every advertisement, we specify the page and column on which an advertisement may be found. We seek to make every advertisement valuable to the advertiser and to the paper.

4.—The circulation is spread out over Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, principally; Georgia, Florida, Tennessee, Kentucky, Arkansas, partially.

5.—It is the only weekly of large and widely spread circulation in the great and growing metropolis of the South.

HARPER'S MONTHLY.—The contents of the April No. of this very popular magazine will be found advertised in the fifth column, third page.

ALABAMA DEPOSITORY.—In the sixth column, third page, is a list of new books on sale at the Mobile Depository.—All sound Southern books.

QUARTERLY REVIEW FOR APRIL.—Read the advertisement of this first-class periodical, in fifth column, on third page.

CARPETING.—J. D. Dameron & Co., are offering Carpets, etc., at reduced prices. See advertisement, fifth column this page.

STOKE'S INFIRMARY.—This excellent institution has a card in fifth column of this page. Read it.

SAND'S SARSAPARILLA.—See advertisement in sixth column of this page.

ACCOUNTS.—They are now going out, both to preachers and subscribers.

JAPANESE ARMOR.—The North China Herald, published at Shanghai, says that of the many beautiful productions of art in which Japan abounds none has excited greater or more deserved admiration than a complete suit of armor, purchased upon his late visit to that country by Mr. Ward, United States Minister to China. This curious and magnificent suit is of inlaid chain and lacquered copper plate; and, although evidently of great antiquity, is yet in a complete state of preservation. The helmet is of polished steel, engraved and richly inlaid with gold. Upon the summit is an aperture for the insertion of a small staff with a Japanese flag. The mask and gorget are of the elastic plates of steel. The armlets, anklets, and gauntlets are likewise of steel, with concentric loops in front for the purpose of entangling and breaking a sword or lance. The cuirass or body armor is of copper, covered and ornamented beautifully with silk. The designs and chasings are of the most exquisite workmanship, and the entire panoply has been pronounced by those familiar with the armories at Malta and the Tower of London the most perfect and unique specimen extant. It is said to have belonged to the grandfather of the present Emperor of Japan. Accompanying the armor are two handsome Japanese swords and a pair of heavy silver stirrups inlaid with gold. We learn that it is the intention of his Excellency to present it entire to the Historical Society of Georgia, his native State. It is the only suit of armor ever obtained from Japan.

RECEIPTS, BY THE POST-OFFICE,

From March 28th, to April 3d, 1860.

H—J B Bowen, $2; A F H Brandon, $2; H D Berry, $5; J J Burkhalter, $1 00; A F DeHaany, $10.
C—S H Cox, $20; R D Carver, $2; T W Castles, $10; J J Cassady, $3; W Coleman, $1 50.
D—M A Dawson, $2; C L Dabbs, $5; T F Dixon, $2.
F—F G Ferguson, $5.
G—P G Garrison, $8; N Goodwin, $2.
H—I A M Henderson, $9; G Hawkins, $6; C W Hodge, $10.
J—W H Johnson, $5 12; J A Jones, $1 50; J G John, $20.
K—S J Kane, $2.
L—E V Levert, $4.
M—W G Millsaps, $10; W G McGanghey, $6; J W McNeill, $4 60; W McNeill, $5.
P—N B Powell, $3; J A Peebles, $5; A A Pilley, $2.
R—W H Robbins, $1 75.
S—J J Snelgrove, $2; H Stanton, $2; J W Solomon, $1.
T—J H Tremble, $2; J W Threadgill, $8 21; J W Turnley, $2.
W—J O Woodward, $10; P J Walker, $5.

OUR OWN NOTICES.

A LITERARY TASTE.—All your children should acquire it. It is a charm and a joy. The Advocate is a literary as well as religious paper. It is worth more than thousands of books now called popular literature.

CONFERENCE AGENTS. How much these could do for the Advocate! Yet how little they do! And yet how much they require the Advocate to do for them! Let us make a "reciprocity treaty."

NEW SUBSCRIBERS.—They are coming in at the rate of nearly a hundred a week. Cannot each preacher send one each week. Let the laity—ladies and gentlemen—join in the work.

TAKE TWO.—We frequently hear it said, or have it written to us, "I wish to take your paper, but I am already taking the ——— Advocate, and I should regret to give up an old friend." Of course you should not. But who, in this rich and prosperous country, cannot afford to take two good papers? That practice is a quarter century behind the times. Sustain your own paper by all means; but every body needs a good, paper from New Orleans, whatever else they may have. Send for the New Orleans Advocate.

A CITY EXAMPLE. A brother who is a clerk in one of the largest dry goods establishments in the city, and superintendent of a Sunday-school, and who has no leisure at all, is constantly bringing us the names and money of new subscribers to the Advocate. "Do thou and do likewise."

Patronizing Conference interests, like quarterly meeting notices, hereafter will be advertised, three insertions at one time, and noticed editorially, gratis, provided the advertisements are not more than three squares. Otherwise, the regular rates will be charged, in advance at that. Those now owing, must pay up before advertising at all.

BRETHREN AND FRIENDS IN NEW ORLEANS, the New Orleans Christian Advocate is published in your own city. You call that city the "Commercial Metropolis of the South." Ought not your paper, circulating as widely as your trade, to have a large circulation at home? Our brethren and friends abroad, who know and esteem those of you engaged in business say, "I suppose you have a fine circulation and hearty support in New Orleans?" You see what is expected of you. Is it not a just expectation? The Advocate ought to have ten times its present circulation in New Orleans. Will not every present subscriber recommend others to take it? They will do so, if you ask them.

OUR CITIES AND TOWN AND VILLAGES. Have you ever thought of the number of cities, towns, and villages within the bounds of the circulation of the Advocate? They are counted by hundreds. How easy it would be for the pastor, the local preachers, and the members and friends, to greatly enlarge, if not double our list in each place! Try it, and let us know the result. Try it now, in the beginning of 1860.

IF YOU WANT PARSONAGES, circulate the Advocate. It is on that side.

DO YOU WISH A LARGE MISSIONARY COLLECTION? Get all the people to take the Advocate, and by the time you are ready for the collection, the people will be prepared.

HOW TO PROMOTE A REVIVAL? Nothing is better calculated to do it than general circulation of the Advocate among the people. Besides its general religious reading, its revival intelligence is inspiring.

ADVERTISING.—By advertising, this paper was largely supported in the days of its weakness. By advertising it is to be made strong enough to enlarge. Many of our friends do us injustice here. We sometimes receive a long advertisement of a Church interest, expected to be inserted gratis, when, for the same space, we are getting from other people $250 a year. This is a fact. Our advertising columns are worth to us from $600 to $1000 a year.

COMMERCIAL.

MONDAY EVENING, April 2th, 1860.

We condense the following statement from the New Orleans Price Current of the 4th instant:—

The week opened with a fair degree of animation in the market for our leading staples, but operations since have been checked by less favorable advices from Europe, and adverse weather, as well as by a poorly assorted stock of cotton for sale and limited supplies of the better qualities of Sugar. In Tobacco the movement has been very limited. In Western Produce we have noticed a dull market for Flour and a drooping tendency in most articles of Provisions.

COTTON.—With respect to prices, we have to remark that for the lower grades, and for mixed lots averaging about Low Middling to Middling the market has been in favor of buyers while clean Middling and the better grades, which are very scarce, have been firm at our outside figures. We, however make no further change in our quotations.

The receipts at this port since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas,) are 1,850,625 bales, against 1,457,027 bales to same date last year, and the increase of the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 691,120 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same dates last year, there is an increase of 628,525 bales to Great Britain, and of 114,351 to France, while to other foreign ports there is a decrease of 44,004 bales.

New Orleans Classification:

Inferior	6 @ 6	Good Middling	11¾@12
Ordinary	6¾@ 8¼	Middling Fair	12⅛@12⅝
Good Ordinary	7⅞@ 8⅝	Fair	—@—
Low Middling	8¼@ 9⅜	Good Fair	—@—
Middling	10¼@10¾	Good and Fine	—@—

SUGAR.—The sales of the week amount to 7000 hhds. We quote for Inferior and Ordinary 3 to 4¼; Common to Good Common 5 to 6; Fair to Fully Fair 6¾ to 7; Prime to Choice 7¼ to 8; Centrifugal and Clarified 5¾ to 9 cents per pound. The above quotations apply to round lots, but small orders of 5 hhds and under, could not be filled without paying a further advance of ¼ to ⅜ per pound.

MOLASSES.—Total receipts of the week 10,000 barrels. The prices obtained during the week were: Inferior to Fair, 25 to 33 cents per gallon; and Prime to Choice, 34 to 35 cents; half barrels, 28 to 36 cents per gallon.

FLOUR.—About 12,000 bbls have been sold during the past week, at from $6 40 to $6 55 for superfine, $6 25 to 7 00 for ordinary to good extra, and $6 75 to $7 50 per bbl. for choice extra brands.

GRAIN.—The receipts of Corn continue light. About 47,000 sacks have been sold at from $0 68 to 0 70 for ordinary, and $0 85 for good white. Oats have been in moderate request at 57c to 58c per bushel for good to prime St. Louis. Bran sells at $1 70 to $1 75 for ordinary to choice lots. Wheat sells at $1 15 per bushel for prime red.

PORK.—The principal sales reported through the week were at $17 75 to $18 75 per bbl. for Mess.

BEEF.—We quote Prime Mess at $14 00 per bbl. for extra brands.

BACON.—Shoulders 8 to 8½; Ribbed Sides 10 to 10½; Clear Sides 11 to 11½; Sugar-cured Hams 12 to 12½ cents per pound.

LARD.—We quote 10¼ to 10½c for prime to choice prime, in tcs., and 11¼ to 11½c for kegs.

BUTTER.—Western generally selling at 12 to 16 cents per pound, according to quality; and Choice 11 to 11½c.

BAGGING AND BALE ROPE.—We quote Kentucky Bagging at 13½ to 14 cents per yard; India Bagging, 12½ to 13½c; Bale Rope, hand spun, 7½ to 8c, and machine made, 8½ to 9 cents per pound.

GUNNY BAGS.—Limited parcels sell at 10 cents for light and 10½ to 11c. for heavy and extra heavy bags.

COFFEE.—We quote fair at 11¾ to 13, and prime at 13½c per pound.

NAVAL STORES.—A good demand for Spirits Turpentine, mostly on speculation. Sales of some 600 bbls at 45 to 46. Latterly holders have been asking 47½ to 50c per gallon, the market closing at the outside rate. Of Rosin some 3900 bbls have sold at $1 55 to $1 60 for Common and No 2, and $1 72 to $2 per bbl of 280 pounds for Low No. 1. The finer qualities are scarce and in request. Tar dull and nominal. Stock of some 5000 bbls on hand.

LIVE-STOCK.—Beef Cattle—Western, 7 to 9½c. per lb. net; Texas—ordinary to fair $15 to 16, and choice $18 to 35 per head.

Hogs, selling at 9 to 10c. per pound net.

Sheep—Selling at $4 00 to $5 50 per head.

Veal Cattle—Selling at $8 00 to $13 00 per head.

Milch Cows—at $30 to $85 per head.

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.—No. CXIC. APRIL. CONTENTS.

ARTIST LIFE IN THE HIGHLANDS.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Highlands of New Jersey.—On the Road.—Upper Fall, Clinton.—Lower Fall, Clinton.—Hook.—Dog Trotters.—Showering.—Dripping.—Green Pond.—The King of the Pollywogs.—Lord Stirling's Forge.—Entrance to Hibernia Mine.—Interior of the Mine.—Mouth of Adit, Swede's Mine.—Interior of Adit.—Surface Works, Byram Mine.—Pursuit of Knowledge under Difficulties.—Diagram of Mine.—A Miner.—Pushing Ore Car.—Gallery in Byram Mine.—Surface Works, Dickerson Mine.—Offsets.—Driving a Drift.—Turn-Table.

HOW WE GOT GOLD IN CALIFORNIA.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Camp on the Stanislaus.—The First Gold Hunters.—Panning.—Winnowing Gold.—Cradle-Rocking.—Washing with Long Tom.—River Operations.—Murderer's Bar.—Hydraulicing.—Packing Earth.—Quicksilver Machine.—Flutter-Wheel.—Tremont Mill.—Helvetia Quartz Mill.—El Rastra.—Ocean Beach Mining.—Gold Smelting.—Tunnelling.—Interior of Tunnel.—Hydraulic Mining.—A Fresno.

THE FIGHT AT LEXINGTON. By THOMAS DUNN ENGLISH.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Fight at Lexington.—Battle-Ground at Concord.

CAPTAIN TOM: A RESURRECTION. By CHARLES NORDHOFF.

KATHIE MORRIS. By T. B. ALDRICH.

LITTLE BROTHER. Part III.

THE ALEXANDRIANS.

YET'S CHRISTMAS-BOX.

——'S REMARKABLE EXPERIENCE.

THE LITTLE ART-STUDENT.

AN ICY FLAME.

ON TWO CHILDREN IN BLACK. By W. M. THACKERAY.

ORIANA INN; A DISPUTED POSSESSION.

THE LOST STEAMSHIP. By FITZ-JAMES O'BRIEN.

LOVEL THE WIDOWER. By W. M. THACKERAY. CHAPTER III. In which I Play too Spy.

ILLUSTRATION.—The Omnibus.

MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.

LITERARY NOTICES.

EDITOR'S TABLE.

EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.

EDITOR'S FOREIGN BUREAU.

EDITOR'S DRAWER.

MASTER CHARLEY'S FIRST PANTALOONS.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—The new Garment.—Cook's Admiration.—At Night.—In the Street.—Appearance of Pockets.—Contents of Pockets.—Vanity.—A Fall.—Consequences.—Degraded to Frocks.

FASHIONS FOR APRIL.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Spring Fardessus.—Home Dress.—Medallion Under-Sleeve.—Lace Under-Sleeve.

One Number after the present will complete the TENTH YEAR, during which HARPER'S MAGAZINE has made its monthly visits to the American public. The experience of all this period has convinced the Publishers that the periodical was established upon sound principles. While other publications which aimed at local and sectional objects, have died only a brief and struggling existence, HARPER'S MAGAZINE has never lost the favor which it gained at the outset. Policy and Principle both compel the Publishers to maintain unchanged the general character of the Magazine as a national work, the organ of no party in politics, or sect in religion. Contributions will, as heretofore, be welcomed from every quarter; and while the Publishers hold them alone in no way responsible for the private views of their Contributors, they will continue to exercise the most watchful care that nothing shall find place in the Magazine which shall render it an unwelcome visitor in any household.

The general favor which the Magazine has received has not induced the Publishers to remit their exertions. Each successive Volume has been prepared with more labor and at a greater expense than its predecessor. To the Press and the Public, who have so generously appreciated and so liberally rewarded their exertions, they again present their warmest acknowledgments. No Number of the Magazine has met with more general approval than that for the last month. Almost every article contained in it has been made the subject of special commendation.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year.....$3 00
Two Copies for One Year.....5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each).....2 00
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten SUBSCRIBERS.

Harper's Magazine and Harper's Weekly, together, one year, $4 00.

BOUND VOLUMES OF THE MAGAZINE.

SIXTEEN SEMI ANNUAL VOLUMES of the Magazine have been published. We will send by Mail, postage paid, to any place in the United States, within 3000 miles of New York, any of these Volumes, neatly and uniformly bound in Muslin, upon the receipt of Two Dollars per Volume. When complete sets are purchased, we will make a discount of Twenty-five per Cent., for warding the Volumes by Express, the freight being at the expense of the purchaser.

These SIXTEEN Volumes of the Magazine contain matter equivalent to more than One Hundred ordinary Octavo Volumes, and are illustrated by more than SIX THOUSAND ENGRAVINGS, executed in the highest style of the art.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, N. Y.

QUARTERLY REVIEW FOR APRIL.—A Liberal Proposition.—The QUARTERLY REVIEW for April is in press and will be issued in due time. Its table of contents is very inviting. The first article is entitled, Extempore Speaking—being a masterly paper on Hunter; Art. II. Prescher und Prediger—a review of Dr. Murray's late work on that subject, by the Rev. J. E. Edwards; Art. IV. The Prophetic Messiah; Art. V. The Rev. Ignatius A. Few, LL. D., being Bishop Andrew's personal reminiscences of that great man

Poetry.

SONG OF THE EVENING STAR.

When the sun glides on like a golden swan,
With its crimson wings all furled,
Till he sink in a sea of transparency,
The lake of the upper world!
Then the spheres ring a chime to the march of Time,
As the dying day expires;
And earth's guardian powers in their high watch-towers
Light heaven's ethereal fires!
And I come from my rest in the burning West,
The queen of the starry choirs!

My light is fair 'mid the dreamy air,
The delicious air of even,
While the sphere-clouds around in a sleep profound,
Are glassed in the blue of heaven!
Then the moon from afar, like a silver bar,
Spans the breast of the waveless sea!
And the forests deep lie hushed in sleep
As still as eternity!
But every eye in the earth and the sky
Is gazing alone on me!

Oh! the west is blessed when my diamond crest
Is set in its sapphire shade,
While there I spy from the folded sky,
The tints of daylight fade!
Thus might angels keep from heaven's golden steep,
Their watch over all below!
Through the endless blue where orbs shine through,
Which mortals never can know!
And lovers say that the orb of day
Hath not half so soft a grace,
As I, when I shine, with light divine,
From my holy dwelling-place!

The blackbird sings with folded wings,
Beneath the greenwood tree,
But 'tis I inspire with the burning fire,
For his eye is fired on me!
The stream receives through its margin leaves,
Miss image sweetly there,
Till the small birds between their folds of green,
Gaze in wonder at thing so fair!
But I look most in love from my throne above,
On the child at evening prayer!

But when night draws near through the atmosphere,
As no other spirit may,
The glory's too bright for my raptured sight,
And I faint and fade away!
And I sink down through the dissolving blue,
Upon ocean's liquid wave,
Till ere once more its sapphire door,
With her gorgeous colors pave,
Then I shine from afar—heaven's loveliest star—
Love triumphing o'er the grave!

Children's Column.

THE KING AND THE GOOSE-HERD.

"Cobbler! stick to thy last."

Most if not all our readers have heard this proverb applied, when some one has attempted what was out of his province. But assuredly none of them ever saw it so royally exemplified as it was in the true history I am about to relate, the principal actor in which was no less a personage than Maximilian Joseph of Bavaria, the grandfather of the present king of that country, and one of the most loving, as well as one of the most beloved monarchs, that ever wielded a scepter. On one hot summer day, King Maximilian, clad in very plain habiliments, had gone out alone, (as was his wont,) to walk in the fine park which surrounds his castle of Tegernue,* and after a time, drew a volume from his pocket, and seated himself on a bench to read. The sultriness of the air, and the perfect stillness of the place, made his eyes heavy, and laying down his book on the bench beside him, the monarch fell into a doze. His slumber did not last long, however, and on awakening, he rose to continua his walk, but forgot his book, and left it lying on the bench.—Wandering onwards, from one division of the extensive park to another, he at length passed beyond its limits, and entered on those grassy downs which stretch down to the margin of the lake.

All at once, the king remembered his book, and the possibility that it might be seen and appropriated by some stranger passing by. Unwilling to lose a book he valued, and equally unwilling to retrace the way he had come, while the path to the castle lay temptingly before him, the king looked round in every direction, for some one whom he could send for the volume; but the only human being within view was a boy, tending a large flock of geese. The monarch, therefore, went up to him, and said: "Hearken, my lad: dost think thou could'st find for me a book I left lying in such and such a part of the park? thou'lt get two 'zwanzigers,'† for bringing it to me."

The boy, who had never before seen the king, cast a most incredulous look on the corpulent gentleman who made him so astounding a proffer, and then turned away, saying, with an air of comical resentment: "I am not so stupid as you take me for."

"Why do you think I consider you stupid?" asked the monarch.

"Because you offer me two zwanzigers for so trifling a service; so much money can not be earned so easily," was the sturdy reply.

"Now, indeed," said the king, smiling good-humoredly, "I must think thee a simpleton! why do yen thus doubt my word?"

"Those up yonder," replied the boy, pointing in the direction of the distant castle, "are ready enough to make sport of the like of us, and yo're one of them I'm thinking."

"And suppose I were," said the king; "but see, here are the two zwanzigers; take them, and fetch me the book."

The herd-boy's eyes sparkled as he held actually in his hand a sum of money nearly equal to the hard coin of his master's herding, and yet he hesitated.

"How now," cried the king; "why don't you set off at once?"

"I would fain to do it—but I dare not," said the poor fellow; "for if the villagers hear I have left the plaguy geese, they will turn me off, and how shall I earn my bread then?"

"Simpleton!" exclaimed the king, "I will herd the geese till you return."

"You!" said the rustic, with a most contemptous elongation of the pronoun; "you would make a pretty goose-herd; you are much too fat, and much too stiff; suppose they broke away from you new, and got into the rich meadow yonder, I should have more trespass money to pay than my year's wages come to. Just look at the Court Gardner there, him with the black head and wings; he is a regular deserter, a false knave; he is for all the world one of the court trash, and they, we all know, are good for nothing. He would lead you a fine dance! Nay, nay, it would never do."

The king felt ready to burst with suppressed laughter; but mastering himself, asked, with tolerable composure: "Why, can I not keep geese in order as easily as men? I have plenty of them to control."

"You," again said the boy, sneeringly, as he measured the monarch from head to foot; "they must be silly ones, then; but perhaps you're a schoolmaster! Yet, even if ye be, it is much easier to manage boys than geese; that I can tell ye."

"It may be so," said the king; "but come, make short work of it: will you bring the book or will you not?"

"I would gladly do it," stammered the boy, "but——"

"I'll be answerable for the geese," cried the king, "and pay all damages, if such there be."

This decided the question; and so, after exacting a promise that his substitute would pay special attention to the doings of the stately gander, whom he designated as the "Court Gardner," and pronounced an incorrigible breaker of bounds, and prime seducer of the flock, he placed the whip in the king's hands, and set off on his errand.

But scarcely had he run a few yards when he turned back again.

"What is the matter now?" called out the king.

"Crack the whip," resounded in return. The monarch swung it with his best effort, but procured no sounding whack. "I thought so!" exclaimed the rustic. "A schoolmaster, forsooth, and can not crack a whip!" So saying, he snatched the whip from the king's hand, and began, with more zeal than success, to instruct him in the science of whip-cracking. The king, though scarcely able to contain himself, tried in right earnest, and at length succeeded in extracting a considerably sharp report from the leathern instrument of authority; and the boy, after once more trying to impress the duties of his responsible office on his temporary substitute, ran off at full speed in the direction the king had indicated.

The monarch, who could now indulge in a hearty laugh, sat himself down on a tree-stump which the goose-herd had previously occupied, to await the return of his messenger. But it really seemed as if his feathered charge had discovered that the whip was no longer wielded by their accustomed prompt and vigilant commander, for the treacherous "Court Gardner" suddenly stretched out his long neck, and, after reconnoitering on all sides, uttered two or three shrill screams; upon which, as if a tempest had all at once rushed under the multitude of wings, the whole flock rose simultaneously into the air, and before the king could recover from his surprise, they were careering, with loud screams, toward the rich meadows bordering the lake, over which they quickly spread themselves in all possible directions.

At the first outburst, the royal herdsman called "hall," with all his might; he brandished and tried hard to crack the whip, but extracted no sound which could intimidate the Court Gardener. He then ran to and fro, until, teeming with perspiration, and yielding to adverse fate, he reseated himself on the tree-stump, and, leaving the geese to their own devices, quietly awaited the return of his messenger.

"The boy was right, after all," said he to himself: "it is easier to govern a couple of millions of men than a flock of 'plaguy geese,' and a court gardner can do a deal of mischief."

Meanwhile the boy had reached the bench, found the book, and sped back in triumph, little dreaming of the discomfiture his substitute had experienced. But when, on coming close up to the king, he looked round in vain for his charge, and still worse, when their vociferous cackling led his eyes in the direction of the forbidden meadow, he was so overwhelmed that, letting fall the book, he exclaimed, half-crying with grief and vexation: "There we have it! I knew how it would be! Did I not say from the first you understood nothing? And what is to be done now? I can never get them together by myself. You must help, that's a fact."

The king consented; the herd-boy placed him at one corner, showed him how to move his outstretched arms up and down, whilst he must shout with all his might; and then the boy himself set out, whip in hand, to gather in the farthest scattered of the flock.

The king did his best, and after terrible exertions, the cackling runaways were once more congregated on their allotted territory.

But now the boy gave free vent to his indignation, raised the king soundly for neglect, and wound up all by declaring: "Never shall any one get my whip from me again, or tempt me, with two zwanzigers, to give up my geese. No! not to the king himself!"

"You are quite right there, my fine fellow," said the good-natured Maximilian, bursting into a laugh; "he understands goose-herding quite as little I do."

"And yet laugh at it, to the bargain!" said the boy, in high dudgeon.

"Well, look ye now," said the monarch, "I am the king!"

"You!" once more reiterated the indignant goose-herd; "I am not such a flat as to believe that—not I. So flit up your book and get along with you."

The king quickly took up his book, saying as he handed four additional zwanzigers to the astonished lad: "Don't be angry with me, my boy; I give you my word, I'll never undertake to herd geese again."

The boy fixed a doubting gaze on the mysterious donor of such unexampled treasure, then added, with a wise shake of the head: "You're a kind gentleman, whoever you may be; but yen'll never make a good goose-herd!"

* The same romantic residence to which the still suffering King of Prussia resorted last summer.

† An Austrian coin, value 7d. or 8d. sterling.

A VISIT TO HEENAN'S TRAINING GROUND.

The London Field, of February 19th, contains an article under the head of "An Evening with Heenan." After detailing circumstances under which the writer and the American met, the narrative proceeds:

Perceiving that I very nearly knew where to draw for him, he invited me to his castle. I did so next day, and found it to correspond exactly with his description, viz: "A fortified farm within a high wall of flint and clay, like the squares on a chess board." No bell was on the gate, nor was it needful to blow a horn, as did Jack the Giant Killer, to gain admission, "once upon a time." My giant's gate was not fastened. I pushed it aside, and on walking across what was once a lawn, the door was thrown open to me by one of his friends, a well-educated and well-spoken New Yorker. The party consisted of three, the gentleman aforesaid, the Benecia boy, (about four feet around the chest) and his trainer, a small man, who walked as though he never could tire. I was curious, but I hope not offensively so, asked many questions, and was answered most courteously. They had found the place by accident, and chose it for its lonesomeness. The house itself is worth seeing; the old porch, with a massive stone seat on each side, the four steps to the keeping-room, and the various descents to its enormous cellars, bespoke it of ancient date, and accustomed to good cheer. It was built before the days of "strikes" and "documents," for the walls are of immense thickness, and have doubtless heard many a funny story from the glorious race of monks of old. It stands within hearing of a peal of Cathedral bells, and is supposed to be coeval with the sacred edifice. The archæologists have found amusement in the neighborhood, and many an Oldbuck has raised antiquities almost within gunshot of Heenan's isolated home. Coffins and spears of ancient date and unknown fabric have there been lifted from their beds of flint, and flint abounds at the foot of the "breezy Downs" on which the Athletic States' man delighteth him to walk. From the windows of his refuge, which I fancy was in former days the dairy farm of the jolly inmates of the neighboring cloister, this well-conducted gladiator pointed out to me the range of hills on which he takes his early morning's walk. From the other side of the house he showed me the gently-flowing river, wherefrom the speckled trout were taken to deck the tables of the refectory. On either side of the stream, and as far as the eye could reach, stretched meadows, on which many a herd of kine, aye, and perhaps the Abbot's mule, has grazed. All these the open-hearted fellow seemed fond of dwelling on; and he finished his lecture by saying: "Yours is a fine country, but do you ever have any fine weather?" He next initiated me into a few of the arts and sciences connected with athletic exercises. "Now," quoth he, "you have seen the play-ground, allow me to show you the school." Not learned in pugilistic lore, the slight of his gymnasium was to me an interesting novelty. A large barn, replete with every luxury appropriated to the art of self-defence—that is the term used by the professors, to soften down the more rough word "boxing"—was the school to which he conducted me. The articles of furniture bore but slight resemblance to anything I had seen at Gillow's or Dowbiggin's, but they were such as, being constantly used, would strengthen the frame, expand the lungs, give liberty to the shoulders, develop the muscles; in short, render a man so active and healthy that he could endure excessive exertion without showing fatigue. One bay of the barn was full of agricultural implements, the other was the Boy's playroom on a wet day. There he had weights and palleys to get him into wind; he had no boat to pull to get him into water, although he sat at his work as do the gentlemen who start from Putney; there he had a swinging sack to practice at, and fancy he was engaging the renowned Tom Sayers; there he had some very pretty clubs, which he called his dumb bells, of about the same size as one imagines that of Hercules to have been when he tamed the Nemæan lion. With these toys he played as would a small boy with a battledore. I yielded to his kind invitation to handle his playthings, but after a very few circumvolutions my feeble arm did not seem to care about it. I pleased non-gentleness to the ways and means of training a human being; but I should imagine that a few weeks' practice with the sort of tools I have attempted to delineate, would give a man such a preparation that "Observer" would describe him as being "fit to run for a man's life." My afternoon's lounge did not terminate with the lesson on the dumb bells, for I was invited to take a second peep at his parlor, and test the quality of his Bohea. From my youth up I have loved Bohea. A fair white cloth bedecked his massive oak table—even that item bore no trace of being town-made; and, in the absence of a bison, a grass-fed ox supplied a dish most palatable to a man with an appetite. The meal was soon discussed, and we had a chat about things over the water, or what he called "home." This aspirant to fistic honor is no illiterate visitor; and if I may be allowed to venture an opinion, after seeing his quiet and decent demeanor, I must yield to the notion that if he be not too much of a gentleman for the work he has set himself, he will achieve it. His age is 25; he therefore has a decided advantage in point of youth. He has also length of arm to serve him, and only requires that most necessary ingredient in the manufacture of a pugilist—science, to render him a most formidable opponent.

KIT CARSON.

The New Mexican correspondent of the Boston Journal, who rode with Kit Carson from Santa Fe to Taos, thus speaks of that famous mountaineer:

When on his feet Mr. Carson has a somewhat dumpy look—the result of what the Hoosier girl described in Mr. Douglas as "an in-fy-nite small chance of legs;" but he sits upon a horse like a king. I never saw a man presenting a more regal aspect than this veteran mountaineer, when upon his favorite animal, dashing along like the wind. Kit enjoys the reputation of being one of the most daring riders in this region; and as I had not mounted a horse for four months, and was still weak and reduced in flesh from a month of sickness at Fort Smith, I anticipated a ride which would prove something trying.

In this respect I was not disappointed, for we flew along over rocks, through canons, across ditches, and up and down break-neck hills, at a speed which sent my blood bounding through my veins, and tingling to my very fingers' ends. A running horse, according to the proverb, is an open sepulchre; but it may also be a new and more vigorous life. If there is any other physical enjoyment equal to horseback riding, among the wild scenery and in the clear air of the mountains, I have yet to experience it. My little steed proved of good mettle, showing no disposition to fall behind; and I consoled myself with reflecting that the powerful American horse was much more likely to stumble than my diminutive pony, and that in case of a misstep, Kit must fall nearly twice as far as I before striking the ground.

He speaks with great enthusiasm of his long experience as a trapper among the mountains, declaring that the happiest days of his life were spent there. He states that during the ten years in which he followed this fascinating career, he was associated with from one to three hundred men. Fresh beaver and buffalo meat, without salt, bread, or vegetables of any kind, constituted their ordinary diet. Once or twice a year, when the trains arrived "from the States," they enjoyed such luxuries as flour and coffee, perhaps for a single meal, though they cost one dollar per pint. During the winter, when visiting their trapsthey a day, they were compelled to break through the ice, and wade in the cold water up to their waists. Notwithstanding these hardships, and infractions of almost every hygienic law, and the irregular habits of some of them, he cannot recollect that during the whole ten years a single man of the three hundred trappers ever died from disease! They were often picked off by hostile Indians; but their life in the wonderfully healthy open air seemed to render them proof against sickness. Trapping was then a very lucrative pursuit; but like all men who earn money easily, few or none of them ever saved it.

Like most persons of real courage, Mr. Carson is modest and retiring; never speaking of his own exploits, except in reply to direct questions. He gives reminiscences, however, of some exciting battles with the Indians, in one of which four trappers, in a log building, kept a hundred and fifty Blackfeet at bay for half a day, and finally defeated them. He deems all Indians cowards by nature, and asserts that they never attack even those of their own race, except when they have a decided advantage of position or numbers. They seldom take prisoners; to obtain scalps is their highest ambition in war. His experience in the matter of diet has been more varied than those of most men. He thinks the flesh of a wild horse the best meat he ever tasted. A fat mule is not altogether unpalatable; but when the animal is old and poor he does not even deem its flesh inviting. The most sorrowful repast he ever took was upon the Pacific slope, when necessity compelled him to kill and eat a faithful horse, which had borne him many hundred miles. He is a zealous admirer and devoted friend of Col. Fremont, and speaks of the pleasant years they spent together with great enthusiasm.

Much of our road was over barren plains; but we passed through some fruitful valleys, dotted with fine farms, which displayed speckled corn and wheat dying in the sun. Twenty-five miles out we made a noon halt, to eat a lunch of bread and dried meat, and smoke our mid-day cigars, upon the grassy bank of a shallow stream. The spot is called the Canada, or "hollow," and is celebrated as the battle ground where, in 1847, four hundred Americans under General Price attacked nearly 2000 Mexicans, who had taken an apparently impregnable position upon a neighboring hillside. The Americans, from the shelter of the perpendicular bank, kept up a straggling fire during the afternoon; but just before night grew tired of inactivity, and charged up the hill, completely routing and killing many of the Mexicans, while they lost but a single man.

Fifty miles out we passed through the Eisnbindo, or "funnel," another battle ground of '47. The Mexicans, to the number of five hundred, took possession of the steep hills on each side of a passage, so narrow that only two men can go through it abreast, and waited the coming of two hundred Americans. The Americans were of course exposed to their fire from both sides, and had every conceivable disadvantage of position; but they dislodged the Mexicans with great slaughter, and lost only one of their own men.

HAIR-BRUSHES AND COMBS.—Children should be taught, from their earliest remembrance, the importance of keeping the hair clean, not so much by the use of the comb as the brush. Two sorts of combs are used, fine and coarse, made either of ivory or bone; when the brush has been well used, there is seldom any necessity for the fine tooth comb, and the intention of using the coarse comb is merely to disentangle the hair and prepare it for the brush.—Nothing is more injurious to the skin of the head than the frequent application of the small tooth comb, the points of the teeth of which scratch and otherwise irritate the scalp, tending more than any other cause, to the formation of scurf.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

Tribute of Respect.

On the 23d March, 1860, the students of Madison College appointed a Committee to draft resolutions expressive of their feelings on the melancholy event of the death of their lamented President, whereupon the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted, to-wit:—

Whereas it has pleased the Almighty Ruler of the Universe to remove from our midst our venerable President—the Rev. T. C. THORNTON, D.D.—and whereas we desire to express our heartfelt grief in so sad a bereavement, and our deep regret at his lamented death, therefore be it resolved:

1st. That while we mourn the loss of our aged and beloved President, whose name will ever be sacred to our memory, it is ours to cherish his paternal admonitions and submissively bow to the will of God.

2nd. That as our President was doubly dear to us, both in the capacity of a guardian and instructor, in his death we and the College to which he has so long been devoted, have sustained an irreparable loss; the Church an able and efficient minister, and the missionary cause a zealous advocate.

3d. That we regard President Thornton to have been no ordinary man; that his long life (spent as it was for the good of the human race) gives evidence of his martyr-like devotion to the principles of Christianity, and that we mourn his death as only the great and good can be lamented.

4th. That as he was an advocate of equal government and the rights of the South, never intimidated by any false fear in his zeal for the cause of justice, and a strong defender of our own institutions, and an able friend of Southern education, he has endeared himself to the people of the South.

5th. That as he was so loved by us for his gentle and fatherly reproof, for his learned and clear instructions, that it be our highest aspiration to emulate his great and good example.

6th. In token of our appreciation of the many virtues and highly esteemed character of President Thornton, we wear the usual badge of mourning for the space of thirty days.

7th. That we tender to his venerable lady our warmest sympathies, and sincerely hope that the grace of God may be sufficient to sustain her in this trying hour; and that we give his family and other relatives our condolence, and beg them to remember that he whom we mourn is not lost, but gone before to the bright clime of joy and bliss.

8th. That a copy of the above preamble and resolutions be forwarded to the New Orleans Advocate, Vicksburg Whig, Mississippian, Canton Citizen, and Eastern Clarion, for publication; that a copy be placed in the archives of the College, and also that one be sent to the relatives of our beloved President, accompanied with a letter of condolence.

9th. That H. C. Buck, J. A. Hunnicutt, G. B. Hebron, in behalf of the Senior Class; L. H. Garrison, J. P. Parker, jun., E. T. Easley, S. B. Bryan, of the Sophomore; and George Jackson, W. H. Wilson, of the Freshmen, be appointed a Committee to carry the foregoing resolutions into effect.

H. C. BUCK, Chairman.

J. A. HUNNICUTT, Secretary.

Sharon, Miss., March 27th, 1860.

☞ Exchenges please copy.

Tribute of Respect.

Forasmuch as it hath pleased Almighty God in his wise providence, since the last meeting of this Quarterly Conference, to take from our midst our most dearly beloved brother and faithful co-laborer, BENJAMIN F. JONES, who had been a faithful steward of this circuit for twenty-five years, and recording secretary of this Conference for fourteen years; therefore it is resolved:

1st. That while we deeply feel the loss of a congenial and influential spirit from the church militant, we nevertheless bow with reverence and humility to the divine will, and unitedly give thanks to God for the long and useful life and peaceful end of our departed brother.

2nd. That we appreciate his long, diligent, and effective labors in the various subordinate offices in the Church, especially as class-leader and steward.

3d. That above all else we appreciate his sweet, christian spirit; his conciliatory manners; his deep, warm-hearted, consistent devotion to the cause of our Redeemer; and that we will strive to follow him as he followed Christ.

4th. That we tender our Christian sympathies to the family of our departed brother, and that we will give his widow and fatherless children an interest in our prayers.

5th. That a blank page of our minute-book be inscribed with the name of our deceased brother, and be dedicated to his memory.

6th. That these resolutions be spread on our minutes, and that the Fayette Times, New Orleans Advocate, and Nashville Advocate, be requested to publish them, and that a copy be furnished the family of the deceased.

Unanimously adopted by the second Quarterly Conference of Fayette circuit, Mississippi Conference, held at Cane Ridge Church, the 25th March, 1860.

B. M. DRAKE, P.E.

WM. J. GIBSON, Sec.

Tribute of Respect.

Whereas, it has pleased Almighty God to remove from our midst our friend and beloved Sunday-school companion, LIZZIE P. NEATHERZ, therefore resolved:

1st. That in the death of Sister Lizzie this school has lost one of its most faithful members, whose affable manners and virtues had greatly endeared her to our hearts.

2nd. That while we exult over the peaceful end triumphant death of our late associate, yet with her sorrowing relatives and friends we mourn, because of the bereavement, and give them our heart-felt sympathies, commending them to God who causes "all things to work together for good to them that love God."

SUSAN E. MILLER,
MARY JANE HARPER,
VICTORIA J. LYNN,
} Committee.

The subject of this notice was born Jan. 20th, 1845, and departed this life March 19, 1860, in Waterproof, La. She was amiable in her manners and warm in her affections. She was the youngest child of P. W. and E. M. Neathers; and is her parents', brothers', sister's and relatives' affections centred. Lizzie loved God's house and people. Her sickness was severe and protracted, and on the morning of the 12th inst., just one week before her demise, as the meridian sun threw his rays behind the eastern hills over our earth, the Sun of Righteousness shed into her soul his rays of divine light and truth, and from thence until her death she was in ecstacies of joy.

W. J. M'F.

Died, In Clark county, Ala., Feb. 7th, 1860, of typhoid fever, NEAL CALHOUN, aged 57 years.

The deceased moved from Cumberland Co., N. C., to this county in 1819. He had been a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church more than 35 years; and as a class-leader, a Sunday school teacher, a worker in prayer meetings, and for the general interest of Zion, he was ever at his post, and these all found in him an earnest, devoted member. As a citizen, (in the language of another) "it is questionable whether a better one ever resided the same length of time in Clark county. As a husband, father, brother, and neighbor, he had, and well deserved, the esteem of all who knew him." The same meek, Christian spirit that had characterized his life was developed in his death, and the religion of Jesus was his strong deliverer, yet the grave had no victory, and death no sting, but even then he could give thanks unto God that giveth us the victory. Then wife, children, relatives and friends, sorrow not, he sleepeth in Jesus.

JOHN A. CALHOUN was born in 1826 or '27, in Clerk Co., Ala., and died of typhoid fever, March 1st, 1860.

He was early instructed in the principles of the gospel by religious parents. Joined the M. E. Church in sons 15 years since, and lived in her favor as a Christian until his death. He was not sensible of his approaching dissolution, and said nothing of his state, yet those who knew him best entertain great hopes that though his bark was early wrecked by the common foe of man, his spirit has realized the boon of the gospel in all its power to save. He had been married some three years, and has left an infant, and an affectionate and young wife, with many relatives and friends, in whose memory and affections will ever live the remembrance of a kind husband, father, brother and friend. May his short life and unexpected death inspire them to holy lives that after death these ties may be renewed in that rest which remains to the people of God.

CHRISTIAN, wife of Daniel Calhoun, was born in Cumberland county, N. C., June 23d, 1811. She was raised under the Presbyterian faith, and joined that church in youth. She married and removed to this State in the winter of 1840, and joined the M. E. Church in the autumn of the same year. She died of typhoid fever, March 5th, 1860. She left an affectionate husband, several children, and many relatives and friends who mourn her loss, but not without a well grounded hope, for her life was that of a Christian. She endured her afflictions with Christian fortitude, and often, when in her right mind, spoke of the coming dissolution with the faith and firmness of a true soldier.—She had no enemies, but was loved by all who knew her, and regarded as the salt of the gospel: Though the Church has lost one of her brightest lights, heaven has added another redeemed spirit to the blood washed throng. Her life should be imitated, and her death desired by all.

J. P. JONES.

DR. WM. HENRY M'COMBS, the subject of this notice, was born in the city of Nashville, Tenn., Feb. 11th, 1830. It was his happiness to be born in a pious family, to be taught the duty and the privilege of prayer, to be a Sunday-school scholar, and constantly to attend on the preaching of the Word. All these gracious instrumentalities resulted in his happy conversion to God in the year 1846, in his 16th year, when he joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, of which he lived a faithful and consistent member.

He was a graduate of the Nashville University; afterwards of the Nashville Medical College; but being ambitious of the best advantages, and the most thorough cultivation, he went to Paris, France, and graduated in that celebrated school of medicine. He married, and settled in Texas; but in a few years it was obvious that consumption had marked him for one of its countless victims. All that travel, skill, and kindness could do, was done, but done in vain. He died in New Orleans, Jan. 6th, 1860. His closing hours were calmed with heavenly peace, and cheered with immortal hope. He leaves a wife and "little one" to mourn his loss, but he leaves them the heritage of an unsullied name, and the blessed hope of meeting where they "die no more."

Nashville and Texas Advocates will please copy.

J. B. WALKER.

CHARLOTTE SAVAGE, wife of James Savage, of Coffee county, Ala., died Oct. 7th, 1859, aged 52 years.

She joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in the year 1841, was happily converted to God in 1842, and was a consistent member up to the day of her death. She was an affectionate companion, a kind and tender mother. She strove to lead her children aright, and to train them to love and serve the Lord. As a neighbor she was beloved by all who knew her; she was always ready to visit and to administer comfort to the sick and needy; and as a church member she was a faithful attendant at the house of worship, and was an example of piety to be imitated by all who enjoy Christian perfection, or that perfect love that casts out all fear that hath torment. I have often seen her happy in the love of God. A few weeks before her illness I saw her engaged in a meeting, and when seekers were invited to the altar for prayer, and invited to go with the female mourners to the grove, she would go there and pray with and for them, and would often return to the Church with good news. The Church Militant has lost one of its brightest jewels.

R. D. CARVER, Pastor.

ROBERT J. WILLIS departed this life in Newton Co., Miss., March 1st, 1860, with typhoid pneumonia, after an illness of 41 days, in the 41st year of his age. His end was peace.

J. D. WILLIS.

Died in Caddo parish, La., March 19th, 1860, HENRY P. DEAL, aged 19 years, 11 months and 10 days. He was born in Davidson county, Tennessee. April 9th, 1840, and came to Shreveport in the Spring of 1851. He professed religion and joined the Methodist Church in October, 1859, in which he remained a faithful member. He was a true example of the faith which he professed. He leaves a father, mother, sister, and brothers to mourn his loss. But they have comfort in his last words which were in prayer and praise.

THOMAS A. YOUNG.

EDUCATIONAL.

DOLBEAR'S COMMERCIAL COLLEGE, OF THE City of New Orleans, founded in 1832—Chartered by the Legislature of Louisiana, with Agricultural and Mechanical Departments—Capital Stock, $250,000—in the new and spacious edifice known as STORY BUILDING, south east corner of Camp and Common streets, entrance on both streets, open day and evening. Faculty—

RUFUS DOLBEAR, President.
MATHEMATICAL DEPARTMENT.
GEO. E. BRACKETT, Professor.
BOOK-KEEPING DEPARTMENT.
RUFUS DOLBEAR, Lecturer.
J. W. BLACKBAN, Professor.
ENGLISH DEPARTMENT.
HON. J. N. CARRIGAN, A.M., late Supt. Education, Lec. Prof. and Lecturer on Commercial Law, etc.
and M. B. MCCARTHY, Professor.
FRENCH DEPARTMENT.
MARC. ROUX, Professor.
DEPARTMENT FOR PENMANSHIP.
RUFUS DOLBEAR, Lecturer.
J. U. OBRISTIE, Professor.
SPANISH DEPARTMENT.
MANUEL MARINO, Professor.
GERMAN DEPARTMENT.
OTTO GUENSER, Professor.
LATIN AND GREEK DEPARTMENT.
M. MARINO and G. BESSNER, Professors.
ITALIAN DEPARTMENT.
RHETORIC, LOGIC, AND ELOCUTION.

This is the only chartered Commercial College in the South-West, and the oldest in the United States, and has stood for

FOR MORE THAN A QUARTER OF A CENTURY

On its own merits alone.

Persons from 12 to 60 years of age, can attend to any branch they may wish.

Board can be had with the Professor, or other good families speaking English, French, Spanish or German, from $5 to $6 per week.

Catalogues with terms, opinions of the press and leading men of the nation, etc., sent to all who desire them.

N.B.—To prevent mistakes or impositions, Students intended for this College should bring this advertisement as special directions, as there are every winter temporary rooms open for a few months, all of course making wonderful promises and promises, and posting flaming placards to enlighten the people of New Orleans and of the South! When three or more form Clubs and enter at the same time, ten per cent will be deducted from tuition.

☞ Citizens and strangers are invited to visit.

feb1 1y RUFUS DOLBEAR, President.

SOULE'S COMMERCIAL COLLEGE, CORNER OF Camp and Common streets, entrance No. 86 Common street,—established in 1856,—open day and evening the entire year.

A full course of instruction in this institution embraces Double Entry Book-keeping, Commercial Calculation and Commercial Law, and Penmanship. Gentlemen can enter for the full course, or any branch they desire, and at any time, as there is no class system, no copying from books, and no memorizing at arbitrary rules.

Merchants, Book keepers, and young gentlemen wishing instruction, are respectfully requested to call and examine our practical forms and peculiar manner of teaching.

For catalogue containing full information, and Balance-sheet Circular, the most magnificent work of the kind ever executed in the United States, address, GEO. SOULE, New Orleans.

FELICIANA FEMALE INSTITUTE, JACKSON, LA. The exercises of the second term of the sub-session year will commence on the first of March. Pupils entered at any time, and charged from the time of entrance.

Extensive grounds and houses have been added to the premises.

A good library, a new and complete apparatus, a full and competent corps of teachers, comfortable and newly-furnished apartments, afford the best facilities for a thorough education.

BOARD OF TRUSTEES:

WM. H. WATKINS, D.D., President.
J. N. EVANS, Secretary.
Prof. W. H. N. MAGRUDER, WM. LIPSCOMB,
JOHN W. BURRESS, Esq., Col. S. M. BRYAN,
F. W. HALLAM, Esq., Rev. A. G. MILLER
Rev. JOHN C. MILLER, JOHN MCKOWEN, Esq
Hon. JOHN MCVEA.

6m THOS. W. GROWN, Principal.

KENNER ACADEMY—A BOARDING AND DAY School for Boys and Young Men—VICTOR SCHLEITER, Principal.

This Institution is located in the town of Kenner, Jefferson Parish, La., about two miles from New Orleans by railroad, and sixteen miles by river. The location is extremely delightful and pleasant. The health of the place is unsurpassed during the whole year.

The course of study is thorough, embracing the English, French, Spanish, German, Latin, and Greek languages. Students can be prepared for any class in college, or for business pursuits.

The Academic Year is divided into Two Sessions of Five Months each, commencing on the First of October and March, respectively. Scholars will be received at any time during the year; none for less time than one session.

For further particulars see circulars, or address Principal.

PORT GIBSON COLLEGIATE ACADEMY, FOR Young Ladies, resumes its Exercises on the first Monday in Oct. last. A well chosen Faculty will spare no pains or care to make this institution a pleasant and profitable place for young Lady students.

The buildings are large, well-ventilated, and well furnished. The grounds ample and beautiful.

For information and Circulars, apply to,

REV. B. JONES, Port Gibson, Miss.

PROFESSIONAL.

JAMES J. HUTCHINSON, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, Livingston, Alabama., will Practice in Sumter and the adjoining counties. [mar24]

DR. E. D. BEACH, HAVING RESUMED THE practice of Medicine, offers his professional services to the citizens of New Orleans.

N. B.—Special attention paid to diseases of the RECTUM, PILES, FISTULA IN ANG, ETC.—Fistula in ano permanently cured without the use of the knife, cautery, pain, or confinement whatever. Office No. 6, Baronne street near Canal. ap27.

J. E. ELAM, ATTORNEY - AT - LAW, BATON Rouge.

REFERENCES—Henderson & Gaines and Chinn & Bolton, New Orleans; W. S. Pike and A. Matta.....Baton Rouge.

B. D. & A. W. ROBERTS, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, Floyd, Carroll Parish, Louisiana. jal9

FUQUA & KILBOURNE, ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW, Clinton, Louisiana, practice in the Parishes of East and West Feliciana, and East Baton Rouge.

References—Payne & Harrison, Byrne, Vance & Co., W. and C. Letchford and Co., Broadwell & Haynes, and Pritchard & Flower, New Orleans. mar 7-1y

W. P. WINANS. J. T. HEATH.

WINANS & HEATH, ATTORNEYS AND COUNsellors at Law, Shreveport, La. Office—Market street.

Will practice in the courts of Caddo, De Soto, Bossier, Claiborne, and Bienville.

G. SPENCER MAYO, ATTORNEY - AT - LAW, Harrisonburg, La., will practice in the Courts of Catahoula, Concordia, Caldwell and Franklin Parishes.

COMMISSION MERCHANTS.

W. A. BROADWELL. A. P. HAYNES.

BROADWELL & HAYNES, COMMISSION MERchants (formerly Broadwell & Payne), No. 40 Union street, N. O.

Having retired from business, I take great pleasure in soliciting for my former Partners, BROADWELL & HAYNES, the patronage and confidence of my friends, believing their experience, capacity and means, will merit its continuance, and enable them to give general satisfaction. [jal] M. U. PAYNE.

W. R. STUART, New Orleans. DR. O. A. JAMES, Madison Parish, La.

STUART & JAMES, NO. 43 UNION STREET, New Orleans, have associated themselves together for the purpose of conducting a COTTON FACTORAGE & GENERAL COMMISSION BUSINESS; are prepared to make the usual Advances to planters, in the way of supplies, etc., and respectfully solicit patronage

B. M. LOWE & CO., COTTON FACTORS AND General Commission Merchants, No. 97 CRAVIER STREET, New Orleans. ap6

A. H. MAY & CO., COTTON FACTORS AND General Commission Merchants, No 94 Gravier street, New Orleans. au21y

J. U. PAYNE. S. P. GARRISON.
G. W. HUFFINGTON. WM. R. DARRAGH

PAYNE & HARRISON, COMMISSION MERCHANTS No. 51 Union street, New Orleans. dec7-1y

S. L. WALKER, New Orleans. ROBT. O. HUTCHINSON Caddo Parish, La.

WALKER & HUTCHINSON, COTTON FACTORS and Commission Merchants, No. 37 Carondelet street, New Orleans. jo28

J. BOYD & CO., COTTON FACTORS, RECEIVING and Forwarding Merchants, No. 4 Union street, New Orleans.

LEONARD FASH. P. B. LAURANS.

LEONARD FASH & CO COMMISSION MERchants, and Dealers in Western Produce, 61 Magazine street, New Orleans. Oct 24.

LANE, SALTER & CO., SUCCESSORS TO LANE, MAYFIELD & CO., Cotton and Sugar Factors, and General Commission Merchants, No. 79 St. Charles street, New Orleans. jy5-1y

JOHN F. WYCHE & CO., COTTON FACTORS and Commission Merchants, No. 119 Common street, New Orleans.

SPALDING'S PREPARED GLUE.—SAVE THE Pieces! Economy! Dispatch! ☞ "A STITCH IN TIME SAVES NINE."

As accidents will happen, even in well-regulated families, it is very desirable to have some cheap and convenient way for repairing Furniture, Toys, Crockery, &c.

SPALDING'S PREPARED GLUE meets all such emergencies, and no household can afford to be with out it. It is always ready, and up to the sticking point. Them is no longer a necessity for limping chairs, splintered veneers, headless dolls, and broken cradles. It is just the article for cane, shell, and other ornamental work, so popular with ladies of refinement and taste.

This admirable preparation is used cold, being chemically held in solution, and possess

NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY A COMMITTEE OF MINISTERS FOR THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH—C. C. GILLESPIE, EDITOR.

VOLUME X.—NUMBER 15.
WHOLE NUMBER 478.

NEW ORLEANS, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 11, 1860.

$2 00 A YEAR, IN ADVANCE
OFFICE—119 CAMP ST.

"WILD BILL."

In the month of June, 1810, when I was about twenty-four years of age, I located at what is now known as Woodville, Wilkinson county, Miss., and erected the first building in the place; it was a log cabin, and intended for a country school house. A short time previous to my arrival there, that very extraordinary occurrence, the capture of the person known as Wild Bill, took place. Thinking that perhaps a sketch of the circumstances connected with his history would interest your readers, and as the incidents properly belong to the history of Mississippi, I have concluded to furnish you with some of the facts for publication. And I would add, that there is no one now living who had a better opportunity than myself of knowing the facts, having known Bill for eight years after he was taken. The circumstances connected with this extraordinary person are these:

A party of bear hunters were hunting in one of the Mississippi swamps, about ten miles below Fort Adams, where, though ten miles from any settlement, they discovered the tracks of a barefoot child around the lagoons and ponds. They naturally concluded that a child was lost in that dismal swamp. They immediately returned to the settlement, aroused the neighbors and started in search of the lost child, who, when discovered, fled and sought refuge with a herd of wild hogs, who fought for him as they would have done for one of their own family. After considerable difficulty he was secured, though he fought with the ferocity of a tiger as long as he could struggle. He was entirely naked; his hair was long and bushy, nor could he speak one intelligible word, though he was apparently about twelve years old. Bill, as he was afterwards called, was taken to the neighborhood of Woodville, and placed in the care of Mr. Benj. Rollins, who treated him with great kindness. At his house Bill learned to eat cooked food, of which, of course, he had previously no knowledge.

He remained at and near Woodville until he was grown; but he never became sufficiently reconciled to the customs of civilized life to adapt them to any extent. He had a great aversion to work, and if at any time Bill's stay at a neighbor's house was longer than was agreeable, his immediate departure was ensured, by an intimation that there was work to be done and that his assistance was desired. He took no pleasure in dress; preferring to go without shoes or hat. His greatest vice was his love of ardent spirits, and he would fight any man when encouraged to do so, but never on his own account, being of an amiable and forbearing disposition. He never learned to talk well, but could make himself understood by those who knew him.

The most reliable account that Bill ever gave of himself was, that his father and mother and two children beside himself were traveling down the Mississippi in a "dug out," and that they stopped to camp near where he was found; his father got drunk, killed his mother and then threw her into the river, and while he was killing the other children, he ran into the swamp, where he had been ever since. How long he had been there he did not know. He became friendly with the wild hogs, and he said they treated him "very good." He slept with them in cold weather in a hollow tree, and they kept him very warm. His food was the same as that of the hogs—fish, frogs, crawfish, nuts, berries, &c.

I have been credibly informed that in 1819 Bill found his way to New Orleans, and died there of the epidemic which prevailed that year.

I sincerely give you the facts of this remarkable occurrence, as they came under my own observation, and will leave it to others to speculate upon the history and probable origin of this strange individual. I will add that I always thought Bill deficient in intellect; whether he was naturally so, or became so from long association with brutes, I cannot determine; but I am inclined to the latter opinion, for how could any but an intelligent child have managed to have subsisted in that desolate wilderness.

JOHN BOOTH.

☞ Woodville papers please copy.

THE VOTE FOR ITALIAN UNITY.

As far as depends on the vote of the population the fate of Central Italy is now decided. The result of the elections in all four provinces of Tuscany, Parma, Modena, and the Romagna, is now sufficiently known. By enormous majorities, by a vote almost amounting to unanimity, the people have decided for annexation to the Sardinian Kingdom, and have utterly rejected both the claims of their legitimate Sovereigns and the scheme which has been lately put forward by the Emperor of the French. So important a political act has not been performed since the autumn of 1852, when the French nation, by a vote almost as decisive, overthrew the Republic, which had been founded less than five years before, and established the Imperial Monarchy which now rules their country. The present appeal to universal suffrage will, however, have the sympathies of Englishmen more than any former display of the kind. It cannot be doubted that the act of the population is sincere. A nation which has suffered more than any other in Europe, the whole of whose modern history has been a long record of oppression—a nation which has not only never known public liberty and national independence, but whose private life has been embittered and degraded by all that the petty tyranny of Courts and the bad activity of a police can perpetrate, has at length been able to pronounce in favour of union and Constitutional Government. No one—not even Lord Normanby, not even the organs of the Viennese Government, will venture to say that this extraordinary vote does not express the real feeling of the Italian people. There is no question of force or fraud, of terrorized peasants and cheating ballot-boxes. The Pope, the Austrian press, the Ultramontane clergy, and their few sympathizers in this country, will not be able to say that the Italian people are mad, possessed, led away by the teachings of Atheists and revolutionaries; but they will be obliged to confess that, right or wrong, the whole mass of them utterly reject the Government under which they have hitherto lived, and desire to link their fate to that of the Monarch against whom Austria would willingly let slip the dogs of war, and at whose head the Pope is ready to hurl an excommunication. Where all are so completely in favour of annexation it is impossible to say that any one province exceeds the other in enthusiasm. But, undoubtedly, the vote in Tuscany and in the Romagna, has a greater importance than in the two minor provinces. The French government had already assented to the union of Parma and Modena with Victor Emanuel's kingdom, and consequently the voting there may be taken as merely formal. The addition of these small States to Piedmont seems to excite no jealousy on the part of the Power which desires the Alps as a protection against a too powerful Italy. Austria has made up her mind not to interfere, the population is known to be friendly to Piedmont, they have no traditions of provincial rivalry to keep them apart, and their addition to King Victor Emanuel's dominions may be taken as a matter of course. But we own that we have been much relieved by the approach to unanimity in Tuscany and the Romagna, for the destiny of these provinces still hangs in the balance. The French Emperor cannot be considered to have given up his plan of an independent kingdom in Tuscany, and of a Piedmontese regency in the Papal province. If any considerable number of voters had pronounced in favor of these views the destinies of the two provinces might be very doubtful. A party favorable to Papal suzerainty and to a new Duchy of Tuscany would, when disclosed by the ballot-box, have given encouragement to all the enemies of Italian unity. The apparatus for working on continental populations has been carried to such perfection in certain quarters that we may be sure that a fourth, or even a fifth, of the Tuscans or Romagnoli, if supported by France or Austria, would have the power to counteract the wishes of the great majority. But, happily, and we should think somewhat to the surprise of the French government, the propositions emanating from Paris have found hardly a partisan in the two provinces. By the telegrams which we publish it will be seen that in Tuscany not one elector in 25 voted for the separate kingdom. The list is made up, with the exception of 108 communes, and stands thus:—For annexation to Piedmont, 259,061; for the separate kingdom, 10,729. Now, we do think that this is a most remarkable and important result. Nothing can show the fixed resolution of the Italian people more than the Tuscan vote. The Duchy and its celebrated metropolis have a long and glorious history. Every Florentine has been accustomed to consider his city as a capital, as rivaling Rome in the presidency of Italian cities, as the pure fount of Italian literature, and the classic home of art. Nor has Florentine jealousy of other cities wholly died out. Many very practical politicians have been in favour of preserving the present Italian sovereignties, and being content with uniting them in something like a federation, and this solely on the ground that neither Milan, Florence, nor Turin would ever recognize the claims of any city but itself to be the capital of the monarchy. This sentiment has been appealed to and encouraged by the manifesto of the French Emperor. Florence has been told that the greatest potentate of the Continent thinks she should still remain a capital city, and that the banks of the Arno should still be honored with the residence of a Court and the throng of visitors from all parts of the world. To give up, or, at least, to stand the chance of giving up all this, and at the same time to offend the master of half a million of men, has been the choice of the Tuscans. They have voted unconditional annexation to Piedmont, and the small minority which has listened to the counsels of M. Thouvenel only serves to show the preponderance of the opposite opinions. Florence is content to take its rank with the other cities of Victor Emmanuel's kingdom in order that the darling object of Italian unity may be attained.

Nor is the result of the elections in the Romagna less noteworthy. In that province of Bologna, which suffered so much from Austrian oppression and priestly mischief, the Pope has received a severe lesson. The votes for annexation to Piedmont are 78,478; for a separate kingdom, only 70. In the province of Ferrara 48,000 people have voted with the like results. We trust that we now see the end of the Papal pretensions over this province, and that the Ministers of Pius IX. will learn from the loss of this fair region how necessary it is to rule with wisdom, justice, and mercy. But a year ago the Pope felt himself secure from the anger of his ill-treated subjects. Their complaints and the remonstrances of the world, including the first Catholic Power of Europe, failed to move him. "Non possumus" was the answer to every appeal in favor of justice and good government. Now the retribution has come. The territory of St. Peter is rent in twain; in a whole province hardly a fraction of the people can be found to declare in favour of their former ruler, and they leave the spiritual head of Latin Christendom without a regret to find happiness and prosperity under other auspices.

One remarkable circumstance remains to be noted. The priesthood seems to have frankly adhered to the popular cause. The peasants, we learn, went in masses to vote for annexation, headed by their priests. We congratulate the Italian clergy on this tardy wisdom. They have learnt, it seems, that no body of men, however well organized, however subtle and energetic, can long control the impulses of a resolute people; and when the folly of resistance is demonstrated the only step is to resign themselves, and endeavor to lead the movement they cannot stem. This acceptance of Italian nationality by the clergy will, we trust, satisfy even Irish Ultramontanes of the uselessness of any further agitation. In no country has the Catholic laity been so besotted as to refuse their sympathies to the Italian people in this long struggle for freedom, and we may hope that the counsels of the Catholic Powers will finally restore religious peace to the enfranchised nation. A great victory has been won. Napoleon III., who owes his throne to universal suffrage, and who is now appealing to it in his design of extending his frontier, cannot but recognize the unanimous vote of the Italians, and aid them in bringing to a settlement this dangerous and long-vexed question.—London Times.

THE ITALIAN QUESTION.

The official documents received by the City of Washington, and the accounts by the Bavaria, show that there is a perfectly good understanding between France and Sardinia, not only as to the developments of the Sardinian policy in Italy, but likewise as to the annexation of Savoy and Nice to France. The London News announces that the annexation of the two Sardinian provinces to the French dominions is already as good as accomplished; that Sardinia has consented to part with those portions of her territory, and to permit their future political relations and affiliations to be decided by a vote of their inhabitants. With this view a special treaty is to be made; a vote of the municipalities will then be taken, which, it is not doubted, will result in favor of the new programme, and the contracting parties will afterwards communicate to the European Powers "the nature of and motives for this territorial arrangement between them."

Under this arrangement France will come into possession of all the passes of the Alps. Mont Blanc, mounts St. Bernard, St. Gothard, Cenis, and the passes between them, leading down to the broad plains of Northern Italy, lie in Savoy. With these in her possession, France will have an impregnable barrier against invasion from that side, and from her citadel on the summit of the Alps will dominate over the countries which lie below. To the southward, the possession of the County of Nice shuts the gate against an enemy advancing along the coast of the Mediterranean or through the passes of the Maritime Alps, while France holds the key in her own hand. These are no trifling advantages. They fully explain the desire of the French Emperor to acquire Savoy and Nice, apart from the mere ambition of territorial aggrandizement. The material benefits to be derived from these acquisitions are inconsiderable. The sterile soil of Savoy offers no temptations, and even the olive groves and fertile valleys of Nice are not worth the chances of a war.

But what is important to France beyond all the advantages of mere territorial extension, is the commanding position she will gain by these arrangements—the security they confer against attack, the facilities they afford for offense.

In addition to the important intelligence of the understanding between the two Powers, with reference to Savoy and Nice, we find in our files, a series of documents on the subject of the settlement of Central Italy, which confirm the opinions we have recently expressed concerning the interpretation placed by Sardinia on the French Emperor's programme, as indicated in Mr. Thouvenel's dispatch to the Baron de Talleyrand. The reply of Count Cavour to that dispatch we have already published in full.

From the tenor of Cavour's reply, it was perfectly evident that he did not intend to abandon the idea of the consolidation of Central Italy, under the government of Piedmont, and that he was perfectly willing to accept the responsibilities which M. Thouvenel indicated as the probable consequences of a complete development of that policy. But the grounds upon which Sardinia will justify her course, and the interpretations she puts upon Louis Napoleon's propositions, are more clearly shown in a dispatch from Count Cavour to the Baron Ricasoli, at Florence. Sardinia does not reject the French programme; on the contrary, she accepts it as she understands it—that is to say, in its alternative sense. Cavour, after informing the Tuscan Minister of the French propositions, says that he has, on the part of the King, replied to Baron Talleyrand that Sardinia would not oppose any obstacle to the proposed settlement; that she would transmit the propositions to the Governments of Tuscany and the Romagna, and would entrust them to the wisdom of the men who administer public affairs in those provinces. At the same time he hopes that the Tuscan government will take into consideration the counsels given to it by a generous ally, to whom Italy is indebted for her new destinies, and declares that, whatever the vote may be, the King of Sardinia is willing to abide by it.

The Baron Ricasoli replies in a manner which shows that he thoroughly understood the feelings of the Tuscan people, and which, taken in connection with the subsequent vote, dispels the idea of M. Thouvenel that Tuscany's history and traditions would cause her to adhere to her autonomy, in spite of the dawning prospects of liberty and reform offered by the consolidation of Central and Northern Italy. He declares that Tuscany is intelligent enough to perceive that the period of municipalism is past, and that the idea of nationality has taken its place. Farini, the Dictator of the Romagna, replies in similar terms. Nevertheless, he declines to submit to a vote of the people, the proposition for a Papal vicariate, administered by Sardinia. The vote would be taken simply for annexation, or a separate government. The question of a vicariate he considers one affecting the relations of the King with the Pope, more than of the King with the people, and he therefore leaves it to be determined by subsequent negotiations. The following paragraph contains the substance of the argument on this point:

"In the second place, how can a matter, so abstract and delicate as the report in question, be proposed to universal suffrage? Nations cannot be consulted except on simple and clear ideas; and here, on the contrary, it would be necessary to accompany the proposition by complicated explanations defining the nature and limits of authority, and of which, to say the truth, I can not now form a very precise idea. Besides, all the public acts of the Court of Rome have so completely destroyed every possibility of this or any similar combination, that to bring forward such a proposition as a vantage with the wishes of the people would only tend to excite disturbance.

These documents were the preludes to the votes by which the Duchies and the Romagna decided in favor of annexation to Sardinia. So far from exhibiting any weakening of the alliance with France, or any fear of opposition on the part of the French Government, they show that precisely the reverse is the case. We may expect to hear very soon that the Sardinian troops have taken possession, with the consent of France, of the three Duchies and the Romagna, and that Savoy and Nice, with the consent of Sardinia, have become French provinces.—Delta.

REIGN OF TERROR IN NAPLES.

Tarquinius, says the Roman history, received the messenger in his garden, and, as he walked up and down, he struck off the heads of the poppies with his staff. Sextus knew what it meant, he accused some of the leading men to the people; others he caused to be assassinated, others he drove into exile; in line, he deprived the Gabines of all their men of talent and wealth; and judging from the experience of the last ten years, this passage of history has been well studied by the Government of the Two Sicilies, for its policy has been exactly of a similar kind, and with some verbal alteration the passage quoted above might have been written of the Governments of Ferdinand II. and Francis II.—Every one remarkable for talent, or education, or love of liberty has from time to time been made away with, until London, Paris, Turin, and Florence, and even Vienna, now possess Neapolitans who would do honor to any country, but whose simple presence here would be a living protest against the wretched and ferocious Government which now affects to direct the affairs of this country. On Saturday last seven victims of despotism, not fourteen, were sent out of the country; for at the last moment the sentence was suspended in the case of the others. Those who left were—the Marchese Vulcano, the Marchese Monterossi and his brother, Cavalier Mezzacape; De Simone, an advocate and literary man, and nephew of the confessor of the late King; De Filippis, an advocate, and his brother, a Government employe, promoted by a Royal rescript on the very day of his arrest, and paid as well; and Varca, ex-Attorney-General of the criminal Court of Capua. They were arrested, some in the street, and some in their houses.—Vulcano was told not to make a noise (it was near midnight), and was not permitted to enter his house for his cloak; all were taken to the prefecture, and told that the Prefect wanted to speak to them. To some he said that their residence in Naples was incompatible with public tranquility; others were kept waiting—it was not convenient for the Prefect to see them, and a commissary of police informed them later that they must leave the country on the following day, and that passports would be given them. No accusation was made—"a special order of the king so required it; he was determined to maintain order, and they would be quieter out of the country." Some protested against the illegality of the procedure—a useless term; two requested permission to go to Rome by land, as their health was delicate, but the favor was refused. One of these, always infirm, had been put into a low small room with six others, where the closeness of the atmosphere and the effluvium from the privy, which opens into the room, are so insufferable that prisoners are compelled to keep the window open during the nights even of winter. The gentleman of whom I speak threw up blood as a consequence, and his voice and appearance but too well attested his suffering. In this room and two others adjoining, alike infected, noblemen, gentlemen of His Majesty's bedchamber, advocates, and literary men, spent the night in the company of others who have been there for months, and one since 1849, I am told—kept there as a deedy dark or spy. As the seven prisoners of whom I spoke were taken out of the Prefecture, another was brought in, Stanislan Gatti, a literary man, received on the first circles of Naples. On Thursday night I met him at Baron Brenier's, the French Ambassador's reception.—He had not slept in his own house for a week, in order to avoid the police; and in twenty-four hours he was in one of the fetid chambers of the Prefecture. I cannot describe the despair and consternation of the people; for they feel that union is impossible in face of such an organized system of espionage as that which exists here, as the result of many years of tyranny and corruption; whereas partial risings would only expose them to be mowed down by the cannon from the forts, or shot like dogs by the soldiers in the streets. The state of affairs cannot be appreciated by persons at a distance, and those who prate about union and resistance should first study in detail the circumstances of this people on whom the curse of man seems to rest. It is easy to talk of union in the streets of London, but Naples—God help her!—the very birds of the air are hirelings of the Government.

The young King drove by the landing-place about the time that his beloved subjects were embarking. Less than a year ago an opportunity was presented to him of becoming the most popular and the most powerful Sovereign in Italy, and what is he now? The conviction which was entertained by a few a short time since is now general, that the existence of the dynasty is incompatible with the liberty—nay, with the very life of the nation. Are they traitors to his crown who counsel His Majesty? Is his confessor an instrument in the hands of an Austrian, and of certain generals who have grown old in iniquity and corruption? It is so asserted, and that not lightly. A distinguished personage says that, "there is good ground for believing that a settled plan exists for disgusting the King, and persuading him to abdicate in favour of the Count of Trani." If so, it is part of a plan which began to develop itself at the beginning of his reign, and of which there appears to be no doubt. His Majesty, it is well known, professes to follow religiously the system of his father; but he always acts under advice, and that advice cannot, it is difficult to believe, be otherwise than treacherous.—But I have too many facts to report to indulge much in speculation. On Sunday morning, a day of repose in most countries, here of ruffianism and persecution, Signor Zir, the highly respected landlord of the Victoria Hotel, was pulled out of bed at six o'clock in the morning. The British Minister is residing under his roof.—Zir was arrested in 1848; his brother is now in exile, and he himself for many years has scarcely spoken above his breath. Teodorico Cacuce also was arrested; he is the legal adviser of the French Legation, and one of the accusers of Poerio might have been deemed safe. Errico Pessina, an advocate, a young man of distinguished talent; Giovanni de Falco, formerly Attorney-General in 1849; and the priest Leopoldo Perez, an ex-Jesuit, are in the last hour, and I pause for other names before I send off this letter. Meanwhile let me ask at what a spectacle are the British and French Ministers assisting? Sent back prematurely, as I have always been of opinion, they have ever since their arrival been the witnesses of nothing else but gross outrages on law and humanity.—Their advice has been despised, their remonstrances laughed at and their protests of last Friday followed up on the Saturday by exiles and fresh arrests. Is this a dignified position for the Minister of Great Britain to hold? Personally, Mr. Elliott has acted manfully throughout, and deserves well from the friends of liberty; but his position is an ignominious one. On Sunday afternoon Baron Brenier went to the Palace and requested an audience of His Majesty, but after waiting for two hours the Minister of the Emperor of the French left without obtaining his request. He then wrote to the Commendatore Carafa, asking for the liberation of Cacace, who was the adviser of his Legation. The letter was laid before the King at once, who sent for Ajossa, the Director of Police, who remained with the King till near midnight. It was then communicated to M. Brenier that Cacace should be placed at his disposal, and that he should send him out of the kingdom where he liked. M. Brenier replied with dignity that he would not act the sbirro, and immediately gave Signor Cacace his full liberty. The Spanish Minister made two attempts to see the King, but also unsuccessfully; and Mr. Elliott, too, requested an audience. During the night of Saturday, the capo lazzaroni, seven or eight in number, were arrested, and a number of the popolani who formed a part of the political processes in 1849. Some of these had been acquitted, and others had completed their term of punishment. Duke Proto was liberated on Monday morning, and received the cold shoulder from all his friends and acquaintances in consequence. His Royal Highness the Count of Syracuse took him through the Toledo in his carriage, but the Duke was so mortified and hurt by the evident reprobation of his countrymen that he went to the prefect, confessed he had demanded permission to remain in a moment of weakness, and asked for his passport. Of course, there were "no instructions." Whether these excesses are officially will not say, but they follow two incidents—the arrival of the Count of Syracuse with the Sardinian Minister, and the speech of the Emperor of the French. Denunciations have been as thick as blackberries during this week, and in answer to all demands of an explanation the only answer returned is "Sic jubet the Viceroy of God in the Two Sicilies."—Cor. London Times.

It is a very common error to suppose that love and friendship are based upon identity of dispositions and ideas. Similar minds, like parallel lines, never meet.—There must be divergence if there would be convergence; and then the two lines meeting, make a right angle.

THE NEW ARCTIC EXPEDITION.

At the meeting of the New York Geographical Expedition on the 23d inst., Dr. Hayes made the following interesting remarks:

Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen—It is now a little more than four years since Dr. Kane returned from the North, reporting the discovery of an open Polar sea. Physicists had long before been generally agreed that such a sea probably existed, and the northern coasts of Europe, Asia and America having been determined with considerable accuracy, it was assumed that the great body of water which they invested was mainly free from land; and hence, being free from all centres of ice accumulation, must be mainly open, at least during the summer. The first substantial confirmation of this theory was obtained by the Russians, who, under Hedenstrom, in 1810-11, and again—under Anjou and Urangel, in 1820-24, discovered an extensive open area, or polynia, to the northward of the New Siberian Islands. It was left to our countryman, Dr. Kane, to bring from an opposite meridian more conclusive proof, and his researches assume the dignity of a great discovery. Dr. Kane, whose first voyage as surgeon of the expedition under Lieut. DeHaven, in 1850, had given to him some important information upon the currents and ice movements of Baffin's Bay, carefully collated such accounts as had been published respecting the various efforts to penetrate the ice-barrier; and he thus arrived at the conclusion that the true route lay up the theretofore unexplored Smith Strait, which opens at the head of the Bay.

To America is due the credit of having reduced the evidence to practical results. The second Grinnell Expedition, began in 1853, added new proofs to those previously known, in favor of the route by Smith Strait; and at the present time there is sufficient warrant for asserting that it is by this channel that the pole is to be reached. It is true that, in this direction the ice-belt is broader than at any other point; but this fact gives to the route peculiar advantages, since the polar current, acting rapidly to the south through Baffin Bay, loosens the ice, and opens passages through it, such as are not found to the same extent in other quarters, where the direction of the current is northerly. Although ice is often met in the line of Baffin Bay as low as the banks of Newfoundland, yet no serious obstruction to navigation is presented until we have reached the latitude of Upernavik, 72° 40'; and beyond this whale-ships penetrate annually, and with little risk, as far as latitude 76°, in order to get to their fishing-grounds about the mouth of Lancaster Sound. Between the highest latitude attained by the whalers and Smith Strait, the water is mainly free during the summer, and the distance, not exceeding 150 miles, is readily traversed. Dr. Kane's efforts in this direction were experimental, and his winter harbor was selected on the eastern side of the channel, in latitude 78° 37.

His subsequent explorations proved his position to have been an unfavorable one; for he was exposed to the full force of the Polar current, which comes down from the north through the newly discovered channel of Kennedy. The ice carried down by this current not only prevented his release, but in consequence of the obstruction presented by the land, it was broken into hummocks to the northward, which rendered traveling in that direction excessively laborious. The same cause which operates to free the ice upon the Greenland coast will free the coast of Grinnell Land. Upon visiting this shore in the spring of 1854, I found a smooth sheet of ice extending along the land as far up as latitude 80°. This ice was of but one winter's freezing, and hence, upon the closing in of the winter of 1853-54 there was open water as far as that parallel. It is the knowledge of this fact which leads me to believe that a much higher latitude can be attained on the western side of the strait than on the eastern. Beyond Cape Frazer, lat. 79° 42, the coast tends almost due north, and the current, flowing through the channel without obstruction, will no doubt leave the ice smooth and favorable for sledge operations. It is upon the coast of Grinnell Land that I will secure a harbor; and, as already observed, I have every confidence that a vessel can be taken along this shore with ease and safety, nearly to the 80th parallel.

The first summer will be exhausted in making this locality, and the winter will close around us early in September. From this time until the first of the following month we will remain inactive. Upon the earliest return of sunlight, the advance parties will be sent forward, and by means of dog-sledges, provision depots will be established at available points along the land. These parties will be followed by the main expedition for the exploration of the Polar Sea. A boat mounted on runners will be transported over the ice, until we have reached the object of our search, when, if such fortune awaits us, we will launch our little vessel upon the unknown waters, and bidding God speed, will push off directly for the Pole. If the season is backward, its southern margin may not extend as far south as the point at which it was discovered by Dr. Kane; but I do not anticipate that in any case our sledge travel will be extended further north than lat. 82 deg. Beyond this latitude there are, as already observed, conclusive reasons for believing that an open sea exists. The land does not, in all probability, extend far beyond the parallel mentioned, and all experience shows that it is only near the land that we find the Arctic waters completely closed. It is, indeed, not too much to say, that so large a surface of water as the Arctic Ocean cannot be frozen over, even during the winter; and with the advance of summer the ice rapidly dissolves. I come now to speak of the utility of the proposed effort. Happily on this head I am spared any reflections of my own.

The subject has been maturely considered by the leading scientific societies of the United States—by your own body, by the American Association for the Advancement of Science, by the American Philosophical Society, by the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, by the Philadelphia Academy of Natural Sciences, by the Boston Society of Natural History, and by the New York Lyceum of Natural History; and these conclusions expressed by a large number of our most eminent citizens, are to the effect that the objects contemplated are not only important to mankind, but are such as to warrant a full sanction and hearty encouragement to the project. I will merely state that, beside the survey and exploration of the Polar Sea and its adjacent lands, the proposed line of exploration covers a field in which the solution of important questions of magnetism and meteorology, and of natural history can certainly be effected. Indeed, there is no department of science to which valuable results will not be contributed. I am fully aware of the peculiar causes which have tended to mislead the public mind, in relation to the dangers of Arctic exploration. These causes justify the hesitation which was felt in former years; but now that the truth has been made known by so many reliable observers; now that the means of travel have been so fully perfected, and the facilities for promoting health and comfort have become so well known, is it too sanguine a disposition which leads me to believe that I shall see again the little flag which, in 1854, I planted upon the coast of Grinnell Land? or to hope that it may even be my fortune to carry it thence to the point of extreme northerness?

VICTOR EMANUEL AND THE POPE.

The Paris correspondent of the London Star gives a summary of the contents of some letters, which, it is stated, have passed between Victor Emanuel and the Pope. He says:—The publication of the confidential correspondence between Victor Emanuel and the Pope, which has found its way to Munich, and been issued there, has occasioned an immense sensation in the Catholic world. These letters are only three in number—the first written so long ago as the day fixed for the meeting of the Congress, and expresses not much more than the grief and humiliation experienced by his Holiness at the affront put upon the Church in the late transactions. A remarkable feature in this letter is, however, the absence of that personal benediction which it is the custom to bestow upon the sons of the Church to whom the Pope condescends to write. The second is the answer dispatched by Victor Emanuel to this epistle. This is of great length and enters into the closest details relevant to the position in which the King then stood. The defence of his conduct with regard to the Romagnas is simple enough, and little calculated to convey hope or security to the fusion of his Holiness. "The Romagnas," says the letter, "have befallen the authority of the Pope destroyed by a spontaneous movement of the populations. The King has never for a moment accepted the position offered him by these populations. But Victor Emanuel could not remain an indifferent spectator to their fate." The King then retraces the vast efforts made by his father for the deliverance of Italy, and the immense inheritance of danger and responsibility, which, after a death brought on by the struggle in which the latter years of his life had all been spent, he bequeathed to his son. The King is bent on the emancipation of Italy, and this task is already more than half accomplished, thanks to the help afforded by his generous ally, the Emperor of the French. Then Victor Emanuel goes on to quote the names of several illustrious prelates of the Church, who have declared that the Church stands in no need of temporal grandeur to sustain her spiritual power. He hopes, therefore, that Pius IX. will enter into the views of these prelates, and that he will renounce all temporal power in the Romagnas, and humbly begs that his Holiness will consent to the government of Piedmont in those provinces under the lordship of the Pope, to whom the King will secure a splendid budget, and for whom he can prepare likewise an unexceptional place in the new organization of Italy. Thus, by the Pope's letter, he demanded the aid of Victor Emanuel, in restoring the Romagnas to submission and order, and the King's answer conveys the counsel to renounce the idea of temporal power altogether! Now comes the third epistle, most curt and pithy of all three. In this the Pope finds that the King's letter displays a want of "health" (sic), that it must have emanated from a wandering brain and from a troubled heart. The Pope will never consent to renounce his temporal power nor resign any portion of his dominions. Victor Emanuel seems to have forgotten that his soul is laboring already under several ecclesiastical reproofs, and, moreover, seems to be under a delusion with regard to the gravity of the danger with which he stands threatened—that of a censure more terrible than all the rest, to which Victor Emanuel will, infallibly, be exposed, should he persist in the pernicious line of policy he has adopted.

AN EXTRAORDINARY SCENE.

An extraordinary meeting was recently held at midnight, in St. James's Hall, London—an assembly of "ladies women," to hear exhortations and prayers in their own behalf. It consisted of hundreds gathered from the streets; they received some simple food, and then were addressed by the Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noel, who was surrounded by more than thirty clergymen.—Mr. Noel, about an hour after midnight, commenced his address by drawing the picture of a virtuous woman from her childhood, pointing out the unspeakable love of the father and mother for the child, the association with sisters and brothers, the affection of the husband, and not last the love which she herself bears her own children; and then he compared that picture with the position of those who had erred from the paths of virtue. It was quite possible, however, he assured his hearers, that some of them might yet be happy; they might ask him how? and say it was difficult to become so, and so it was, he admitted; but it was not impossible, for they had a Friend who was even more tender than the mother, and stronger in his love than the father, and one who would never desert them. He was a friend who would rescue them if they trusted in his boundless confidence. That friend was Jesus their Savior, who had died for them. He was with them in that room, as certain as possible, and just ready to be their friend; therefore, he entreated them to turn to their Savior. Their whole future depended upon whether they would have him or not. He could take them to glory from a life that must end in perdition; could cleanse them of their sins and carry them to God. If they asked him when to do it, he should say at once, and they would be happy for the rest of their lives; if they believed in him they would be saved. The Savior himself said, "God so loved the world that he gave his only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." Would they accept the offer or not? He entreated them to accept it at once, and be happy forever; their cheeks never fading, their consciences would sleep in peace, and they would live long to enjoy the esteem of those who were good. Let them take the resolution at once, and they would never regret it. The honorable and reverend gentleman then read letters from several girls who had been reclaimed, stating the happiness they felt; and then he went on to say that his young friends might ask how they could follow the course he pointed out? Of course, it would require some sacrifice to be made; but they must expect that, and help each other, and it would not be a matter of regret ultimately that they had made the sacrifice. They might think they would never be loved again; he told them they would. Therefore, let them say, like others, "Let us make tha sacrifice;" for was it not better to be happy, forever than to walk on to the end which was perdition? In conclusion, he exhorted them not to depart without heeding what he had said. Might the Lord accept his prayers, and might he also accept those unfortunate young creatures he was addressing; and to them he said, "Give up that which is contrary to the will of Jesus, and say, 'I will take heart and be a child of God.'"

The Rev. W. Brock, the Rev. Mr. Haughton, the Rev. W. O'Neill, and others, then offered up prayers; and the effect produced by the earnest and touching appeal of the first-named gentleman, delivered in a deep tone of voice, was most touching. It was announced that any present who repented of their sins would be received into the London Reformatory or the Trinity Home, and that further arrangements would be made for the reception of others elsewhere if funds could be provided. The meeting broke up about three o'clock. The conduct of those present was highly creditable, and quite void of levity or contumely.

Later word assures us that good results immediately followed this truly Christian experiment. A correspondent of the London Times says: "Twenty-three, 'not worse-out and hopeless outcasts,' but young women, several of them of the higher class (one the daughter of a magistrate) and well educated, were on Tuesday night received into the homes. The average age of these young persons is nineteen years; thirteen are under twenty; the oldest twenty-six." Mr. Daniel Cooper, secretary of one of the refuges, also says: "We received eleven girls from the Midnight Meeting, ten of whom were under twenty years of age, and the other was only twenty-four. As to the class of 'unfortunates,' one is the daughter of a magistrate, and another is the daughter of a solicitor; that is, according to their statements, which we have no reason to doubt. They were well dressed, with one or two exceptions."

This example is well worthy of the consideration of the Christian public in all great cities. The greatest problem of Christian charity is presented by these suffering victims of vice. Modern Christianity does not meet that problem as bravely as it should. We are staggered too much by its apparent difficulties. More simple Christian courage, more tender sympathy for these outcasts, for whom Christ died, are what the Church needs.

MISSIONS IN TURKEY.

The friends of missions will be interested in the following extracts from a letter written by a lady who has resided a long time in Constantinople, to a relative in Baltimore. Her letter first remarks upon the late conspiracy against the Sultan and the probable change to our missionaries which would have occurred if that conspiracy had succeeded in placing on the throne his brother, who is a bigoted Musselman, and not likely to be at all tolerant to the missionary cause. She then proceeds as follows:—

"The missionaries have had for a long time upwards of a thousand Turks in their schools, studying both the Old and New Testaments. Some of these occasionally visit our mission station, and I have had opportunities of knowing that they can quote the New Testament better than many Christians could. Some also have visited there lately who had never conversed with a Christian until about two weeks since, when they came to Mr. D. and others in their office. These Turks say that they believe in the inspiration of the Scriptures, in the Trinity, in Christ as the promised Messiah and the Son of God. They believe in the Holy Spirit, who has inspired them to believe in and to understand the Scriptures, as they have had no other teacher, nor even conversed with a Christian until they saw Mr. D.

"The Bible has been translated into the Turkish, Armeno-Turkish, Greek, and others of the most important languages of the East, and extensively circulated, and these are some of the results.

"While visiting for a few days at the house of one of our missionaries in Bebec, (one of the villages on the Bosphorus) I saw a young man who two years ago aided in stoning a native Protestant preacher out of his village. This very act afterward awakened his conscience. He began to read the Scriptures, and his heart was changed. He came to our missionary at Bebec, and is now a preacher of that faith he once condemned.—The incident was talked over in my presence.

"There is now a Christian Turk living at Bebec, who, with all his family, have embraced the Christian faith. He is now a preacher and goes freely over Constantinople, and everywhere, to preach, without being molested by any one, although he is well known. Turks come to him daily to hear the Bible explained, and his son is studying for the ministry.

"I think Mohammedanism has received a blow it will not survive. A Turk was employed by the missionaries to sell Turkish Bibles and Testaments which were bound so as to resemble Turkish books. This man seated himself on the bridge, (a bridge of boats across the Golden Horn, which divides the city of Constantinople proper from the European quarter,) and one of our missionaries, seeing him, stationed himself at a little distance to watch his success. He saw Turks of every class buying of him as soon as they looked at the books.

"It seems to be that the time for the regeneration of the Turks has come. It is God's work, and it will prosper."—National Intelligencer.

ANNEXATION OF SAVOY TO FRANCE.

The following is the text of the proclamation which the Governor of Chambery has issued to all the communes of the province:

Inhabitants of the Province of Chambery: Sent here by the King's Government for the purpose of drawing closer the ancient ties that unite these populations to the monarchy, I could not foresee events that are strange to me, and which render the accomplishment of my mission so difficult.

A secret agitation has for some time past possessed the minds of the inhabitants of Savoy. This agitation was caused at first by the question of territorial reconstructions, raised by the journals, and afterwards by the publication of official documents, that have created a painful anxiety respecting the fate of your noble country.

Anxiously mindful of your destinies, the King's Government, which has never strayed from the paths of justice and loyalty, before it forms any resolution, will make an appeal to a sincere manifestation of the wishes of populations, according to such legal form as the parliament of the kingdom shall be willing to establish.

You will then be called upon to elect between this monarchy of Savoy, to which you are bound by the affection of ages and by an unlimited devotedness, and the nation that has so many claims on your sympathies either on account of its proximity or of recent benefits.

However poignant may be the regret felt by the heart of the King, should the provinces that were the glorious cradle of the monarchy be able to decide on separating from the rest of the States, he would not refuse to acknowledge the validity of this manifestation, expressed in a pacific and regular manner; but nothing would so much afflict the heart of our magnanimous King as to see, while loyally appealing to your wishes, disorders occurring which might disturb the solemn manifestation frankly demanded of these populations, and at the same time prevent him from really knowing your wish.

Ready to maintain order and the respect due to the laws, I shall in every case depend on the calm and tranquil attitude that becomes a people which has to pronounce upon the destiny of its country.

COMMERCE AND THE HOLY LAND.

Lieutenant W. F. Lynch's lecture, discussing the commerce of the East and its influence on the future of the Holy Land, has been published. The Lieutenant gives in its pages the most condensed yet lucid account we have ever read of the various commercial routes to the East, from the time when the first Arabian ca

New Orleans Christian Advocate.

Terms—$2 00 per annum, in advance.

NEW ORLEANS:

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 11, 1860.

SENDING OUT ACCOUNTS.

We are now sending out the accounts of the Advocate as rapidly as possible. We send a list to the preacher, and individual accounts to the subscribers, at the same time. We send accounts to all who have not paid to January, 1861, it matters not how small the amount; because we wish all accounts to begin and end with the year. We are as careful as possible; but should there be mistakes, let us know immediately. Let all pay up to 1861, and the accounts will be much more convenient to our subscribers, and also to ourselves.

LET US HAVE THEM.

The price from 1st April to the end of the year will be only $1 50. We shall increase the edition for the benefit of those who may subscribe during the month, etc. We want ONE THOUSAND NEW SUBSCRIBERS to begin at the date specified. An average of THREE EACH from all the preachers who receive the paper gratis as agents, would accomplish it. We place it at the lowest figure, that it may be easily done, and done at once. Every agent could do it within one week after reading this.—We merely state the proposition; we will not urge it. Can our friends be brought to do a great thing, so easily done, for a good newspaper of their own?

A WORD TO OUR FRIENDS.

Sending out our accounts brings to light errors and mistakes, of different parties, here and there. Let all our friends be assured that we are making vigorous and persevering efforts to have everything of the kind corrected, by our plan of having the subscriptions begin and end with the year. If every one owing, however small the sum, will pay up to the end of the present year, all danger of similar confusion will be removed, once for all. We urge our friends, agents and subscribers, to help us, promptly and patiently, through the labor and trouble of accomplishing this desirable work during the present year. There are no better kept books than ours. We are doing all we possibly can to work out of the unavoidable confusions and annoyances of an unlimited credit system. We are annoyed a thousand times more than any of our friends. If we can be patient and pleasant, they surely can be also. Let all communicate with us promptly and fully, whenever necessary. Let not a mistake, crodispute, or discontent, or debt, exist at the end of the year. Let us begin 1861 with an absolutely clean list.

New subscribers come in constantly and increasingly. Many of the preachers are exerting themselves. Some are striving to send ten, some twenty, some fifty, and some one hundred new subscribers during the year.—Nothing prevents us from doubling our list but the failure of unanimity in this noble effort of some of the preachers. Some of the laity are exerting themselves nobly in this good cause. Fair ladies, all over the land, are sending us new subscribers. Would it not be well, and worthy, and wise, for all our subscribers to help us in this way? What is the use to talk about sustaining "Southern literature," and then do nothing for it?

Let us say a few words about the paper. We intend to enlarge it shortly, if our present efforts to improve it are practically appreciated by our friends. We hope that our increase in circulation during the present season will justify us in the proposed enlargement. When we do enlarge, we wish to be able to bring out a paper as large as a folio weekly ought ever to be, and to make it as beautiful as fine paper, type, and press-work can make it.

We are also constantly adding to our present able corps of writers. Compensation for literary labor is the only plan by which a powerful and useful paper can ever be established. Give us the ability to adopt this plan, and we trust to be able to do something for the honor of Southern journalism. Remember the words of Bishop Andrew in the last issue.

GOD ERECTS NO STATUES.

To-morrow, Thursday, the twelfth day of the month of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty, a statue of Henry Clay, the greatest orator, statesman and patriot of the South-western States of the American Union, is to be erected in New Orleans, the great city of the South-west. Its place is in the centre of Canal Street, which, when the appliances of art shall reach their intended perfection in its adornment, will be, it is said, the finest street in the world. Andrew Jackson, the greatest hero of the South-west, has already been similarly honored by an equestrian statue, in Jackson square. According to human judgment and ambition, these things are wise and well. But, the greatest names and the sweet-loves ever known to this world, have no monumental commemorations. God himself buried Moses, "in a valley, in the land of Moab, over against Bethpeor; but no man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day." When the warrior dies, his comrades, with muffled drums and reversed arms, show banners taken, toll of battles won, and rehearse his noble deeds. Amid the first and most honored of the land—sages, poets, and statesmen—they lay him to rest, where costly monuments of bronze and marble speak to a world of departed greatness. But Moses, the man of God, the bravest warrior, the most truthful sage, the inspired poet, and the greatest philosopher that ever earth knew, sleeps in a nameless spot,

"By Nebo's lonely mountain,
On this side Jordan's wave."

Moses, whose life, from his very birth, was one of hardship, struggle, and toil; who religiously refused to become the heir of royalty; who meekly declined the honor which God designed should be bestowed on the savior of Abraham's children; who, under God, safely delivered them from their cruel bondage, and the tyrant's power; who patiently listened to the complaints and bore the reproaches of the children of Israel; but who, finally, provoked to anger at the rock at Meribah, incurred the displeasure of the Lord, and forfeited his entrance into the promised land, whose fertile fields and pleasant rest had been the goal of his hopes, for more than forty years—this friend of God was permitted only to view the land, and then called to rest in his unknown grave.

Christian friend and mourner, do you grieve that your husband, your child, or your friend, lies in an unknown spot? Do you weep because you cannot plant myrtles, and strew flowers above the unmarked grave, and sigh that no marble speaks of the worth, and guides to the resting-place of the departed one? Remember that he who, favored as no other has been, talked with God, face to face, at the same time the greatest and the meekest man, has, for thousands of years, lain where man knoweth not his sepulchre.

THE QUARTERLY FOR APRIL.

From some cause unknown, this number has failed to reach our table. We hope yet to receive it. We have, however, read a borrowed copy. We know not whether the change be in us, or in the Quarterly, but we have read this, and the number preceding it, with more interest than any previous ones. In fact, we are delighted with it. We are encouraged to believe, too, that this kind of reading is approximating to popularity among us—one of the best signs of intellectual progress that could possibly exist. We hope to live to see the time when we shall have among us a popular Quarterly—not by a lowering of its tone, but by an elevation of the standard of popular taste and intelligence, and by the promotion of habits of study among all classes of the people. We do not write, at this time, a criticism of the Quarterly, so much as a general exhortation to procure it, read it, and circulate it. The honor of the Church and of our section of the country is involved in its success. The failure of the Quarterly would be an immense discouragement to all our rising hopes of the progress and character of Southern literary culture.—With as numerous a people as ours, what must be said of their intelligence and literary taste—what must be said of the influence of our schools—nay, of our pulpit—if, in all, there is not enough of devotion to the higher class of periodical literature inspired to sustain a Quarterly Review! Lightly as others may regard it, we should never again have our present confidence in the fruitfulness of the Southern mind, if the Quarterly should be allowed to fail. Southern institutions are in need of this kind of defence against charges of their materializing influences, more than the thoughtless imagine. Let not literary men come to believe that there is no hope for them in the South. "A word to the wise is sufficient."

WEST COAST OF AFRICA.

We lately alluded to the arguments of Rev. C. W. Thomas in behalf of Southern Methodist missions on the West Coast of Africa. The Southern Christian Advocate strongly advocates the same views. We have nothing to say, particularly, for or against, at present. The Missionary Board, soon to assemble in annual session, will doubtless discuss the whole question of enlarging our foreign missionary operations, and this among the rest. The following statement will give an idea of the present missionary forces and successes on the west coast of Africa: Wesleyan Methodism (English): missionaries, 20; local preachers, 75; school teachers, 160; members, 18,000; school children, 5000. Church Mission (English): missionaries and native assistants, many of whom are ordained, 120; teachers, 200; communicants, 3000; scholars, 6000. Methodist Episcopal mission (American): missionaries, 23; teachers, 22; members, 1400; scholars, 850. Baptist mission (American): missionaries, 23; teachers, 20; members, 700; scholars, 500. Presbyterian mission (American): missionaries, 25; communicants, 150; scholars, 200. Episcopal mission (American): missionaries, 13; teachers, 27; communicants, 250; scholars, 550. English Baptist mission: missionaries, 6; teachers, 15; members, 130; scholars, 300. Basle Society (Lutheran): missionaries, 3; members, 40; scholars 300. American Association mission (Mendi mission): missionaries, 17; members, 100; scholars, 150.—Scotch Presbyterian (United Secession) mission: missionaries, 15. Total number of communicants, 23,770. Total number of scholars, many of whom are learning trades, 13,850.

When we add to the above the 15,000 converts, and 15,000 school children under care of Wesleyan, Independents, Episcopalian, Presbyterian, French Protestant, German Protestant, and Moravian missionaries in South Africa, we see what grounds the Church has for encouragement in such an enterprise.

A JAPANESE STEAMER AT SAN FRANCISCO.

By the overland mail from San Diego to San Antonio we learn that on the 17th of March, the Imperial Japanese steam propeller, Candinmurrah, Capt. Kat Lintarro, bearing the broad pennant of Admiral Kimmoorahselloko Casni, intended as a present from the Emperor to the President, accompanied by Lieut Brooks, U. S. N., arrived at San Francisco. She is about 250 tons, has 10 guns, and 60 men, exclusive of officers. The Herald says:

Yesterday the members of our Board of Supervisors, headed by Mr. Teschemaker, the President, visited the Japanese steamer, "Candtumarrgh," lying in the stream, a short distance from Vallejo street wharf. The day was exceedingly beautiful, the water being as smooth and bright as a mirror. The visitors were received at the gangway with the ceremonies usually practised on board American man-of-war, and conducted to the quarter deck, where they were presented to Lieut. Brooks, U. S. Navy, who introduced them to Capt. Katlintarro, and by him conducted to the Admiral, and their rank made known. The interview was marked by courtesy and refinement, the Japanese appearing quite pleased. Between 3 and 4 o'clock, P. M., the Admiral's boat was hailed away, and in a few minutes pulling for shore, with the Admiral, his interpreter, two captains, and several other Japanese officers, besides Lieut. Brooks, U. S. N. They landed at Vallejo street wharf, in the presence of a large number of our citizens, and were received by the Board of Supervisors, who had preceded them, and who ordered carriages to be in attendance.

On mounting the steps, President Teschemaker stepped down to the boat to assist the Admiral; but one of the captains signified to Mr. Teschemaker that he should follow behind the Admiral. Lieut. Brooks, however, informed the Japanese that Mr. Teschemaker was of equal rank with the Admiral, who immediately accompanied him, the two walking side by side. A lane was opened amid those present by order of the supervisors, and the Japanese officials conducted to their carriages, each vehicle moving in the order of rank of the occupants. They were modestly attired, and we presume were not in full dress, but their garments were composed of rich stuffs. Every one carried two swords and a walking cane, and some of them wore elegant patent leather gaiters instead of the Japanese shoe. They are very intelligent and good-looking men, much superior in personal appearance to the Chinese, and seemed to enjoy all they saw, but still evinced a good deal of Indian stoicism. They were driven to the International Hotel, where the Admiral alighted; but the greater number of his officers accompanied several of the Supervisors through our principal streets, the carriages attending them wherever they went.

Large numbers of our citizens collected to witness the novel and tasteful sight, which marks the commencement of another important era in the history of the world. Lieut. Brooks observed to the visitors that they must not think strangely of the curiosity they excited, for it was because the Americans liked the Japanese they were so anxious to see them. It is to be hoped that our citizens, of all classes and degrees, will vie with each other in politeness and courtesy to these strangers, and create among them so favorable an impression that when the embassy shall arive, its members will receive accounts calculated to foster the favorable disposition already exhibited by this strange but interesting people.

DEATH OF PAULDING.

Just as the fellow members of Washington Irving in the New York Historical Society have taken occasion of the recurrence of his 77th birthday to pay a graceful tribute to his memory, the death of his early literary associate and life-long friend is announced.

James Kirke Paulding, who on the 4th breathed his last at Hyde Park, New York, was born in Duchess county, in that State, August 22, 1778. At an early age he entered one of the public offices in the city of New York and soon formed the acquaintance of Washington Irving, whose elder brother Mr. Paulding's sister had married. The Salmagundi Papers—the publication of the first series of which was commenced in 1807—were at the time very popular, and were mostly the composition of Irving and Paulding, who sometimes joined hands in the preparation of a single article. They have not, however, been included in Mr. Irving's works, and were incorporated in the edition of Mr. Paulding's writings which was issued by the Harpers a number of years since.

Mr. Paulding's principal productions were his "Lay of a Scotch Fiddle," a satirical poem, and "Jokey," a burlesque of Scott's "Rokeby," in six cantos; the "Diverting History of John Bull and Brother Jonathan," "The Backwoodsman," a descriptive poem, the second series of "Salmagundi," of which he was soul author, "Konigsmarke," a romance founded on the history of the Swedish settlements on the Delaware, "The Dutchman's Fireside," "Westward Ho," "The Life of Washington," and "Slavery in the United States." In regard to the latter, it is a little significant that the first edition was strongly hostile to the peculiar institution, while from the second, which was issued after its author became Secretary of the Navy under President Van Buren, all sectionalism was carefully erased. At the close of his term of office, in 1841, Mr. Paulding retired to private life. His only publications after that were "The Old Continental," a novel, which appeared in 1846, and "The Puritan's Daughter," issued four years later.

Mr. Paulding's earlier works abound in boisterous mirthfulness, not always in accordance with modern canons of good taste or genuine wit. His novels are not without interest, but they are wanting in dramatic unity. The reader often finds himself losing the thread of the story, and when he has finished the narrative, is at a loss to discover what moral it is designed to teach. The "Satires on England," which attracted much attention, and were warmly appreciated on their first appearance, are now chiefly valuable as illustrations of the feeling that existed thirty or forty years ago between the United States and Great Britain. "The Dutchman's Fireside," though in a measure forgotten, has always been regarded as the best, and will probably be the most popular of Mr. Paulding's works.

DR. RIVERS.

Dr. P. F. Eve kindly called at our office, says the Nashville Advocate, on his return from Florence, last week, and gave us an account of the misfortune which befel Dr. R. Saturday evening, March 24, and of the state of the patient. He had started in a buggy, into the country, where he was to dedicate a Church on Sabbath. The horse ran away, starting from his gate, and he was violently thrown from the buggy, breaking an arm and leg. The latter was broken a few inches above the ancle—compound fracture—and the bones thrust through the boot into the ground. Fortunately, he was near his home, and instantly cared for by the best attention. An attempt is being made to save the dreadfully fractured limb, without resorting to amputation, which, at first, it was feared would be necessary. A note from General Rivers, 28th ult., encourages us to hope that the useful life of our friend and brother will be spared. May it be, long! He had then very little fever, and suffered less pain than was to have been expected. His physical and moral constitution afford the best conditions for recovery, and medical and personal attentions are extraordinarily good. At any rate, Dr. Rivers must be confined to his bed for a good while.—His brother thinks he will be able to hear the recitations of his classes in his room, a month hence. The sympathy of the Florence community, and of the many friends of Dr. R. elsewhere, has had a painful shock in this event. The students of the University, in formal meeting, 25th ult., passed resolutions and addressed a touching note of condolence to their beloved preceptor. The exercises of the institution will not be interrupted.

LOGIC OF OUR INSTITUTIONS.

A good story, all the better for being undoubtedly true, is told of an interview between a very distinguished American and the present Pope. His Holiness, designing a special compliment, had expressed his desire that the American should visit him, at a fixed hour, and in a familiar way. This was accordingly done. The Pope met his visitor most graciously, and very soon expressed his great gratification that Roman Catholics enjoyed such unrestricted liberty in the United States. Without waiting to calculate the embarrassment which his remark would occasion, following hastily the first impulse of his nature, the American accepted the compliment to his country, and expressed the hope that His Holiness would reciprocate this privilege of liberty to his own spiritual children, by granting an equal liberty to Protestants in the Roman States. The embarrassment of the Pope was instant, and the American discovered the uneasiness which he had occasioned. Following, then, his next impulse to remove this embarrassment, the American added, "But we each carry out the logic of our institutions." "Yes, yes," exclaimed the Pope, lifting and dropping repeatedly his hands, as if extravagantly gratified by a happy deliverance; "yes, yes, we carry out the logic of our institutions—we carry out the logic of our institutions!"

And so we do! That is the difference. Protestantism carries out its logic in freedom; Romanism, its logic in despotism; the one has made the United States, the other has made Rome.

DR. CARTER AND SOULE UNIVERSITY.

We had been aware, ever since the winter, that our friend and brother, Rev. Geo. W. Carter, D.D., then Professor of Intellectual Philosophy in the University of Mississippi, contemplated the probability of resigning his post to accept the previously proffered one of President of Soule University, in Texas. Several months since he decided, definitively, to accept the new position. We mention these things, well known to us, because his recent resignation, at the time of the difficulties at the University of Mississippi, had been considered as caused by them. This is altogether a mistake.—We know nothing of the merits of the difficulties alluded to. We are assured, however, that the Mississippi University is an excellent institution, whatever may be the incidental weaknesses of otherwise useful officers, and that it has no better friend than Dr. Carter.

Soule University affords a fine opening for usefulness, and the institution has been singularly fortunate in securing such a President. Located in the centre of the State, accessible by railroad, with the support of the whole body of Texas Methodism, from the Sabine to the Rio Grande, no similar institution has before it a more promising future.

BURNING OF LAGRANGE FEMALE COLLEGE.

When, during the summer of 1859, we visited LaGrange Female College, Ga., witnessed the festivities at its commencement, and enjoyed the refined hospitality of the society of the beautiful town of LaGrange, we little feared that we should so soon be called upon to record its destruction. It was burned a few days since. The loss is estimated at $50,000, and we regret to learn that there was no insurance. Everything was lost but the boarding-house. The exercises of the institution were immediately resumed. It will be re-built at once; twelve thousand dollars were subscribed by the citizens next day. The country interested in the College should come to the help of the noble citizens of LaGrange at once, and with a will. The building burned, though claiming little in the way of architectural taste and beauty, was, nevertheless substantially built of stone capacious and commodious, and imposing in appearance, being situated on a beautiful eminence in full view of the whole town. We trust that economy and architectural taste will harmonize in the new building, and that insurance will not be neglected in our Colleges hereafter.

CONFEDERATION OF YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION IN THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA.

This body is to assemble in this city to-day, in the Carondelet street Methodist Church. It is expected that 400 or 500 delegates will be present. Though not strong in the faith of Christian organizations outside of the Christian Church, nor satisfied as to their permanence, nor convinced of the ultimately healthful influence of even the highest success, yet the spectacle of such an assembly, so large, representing so many different Christian communions, and such differences in climate and circumstances, is one of deep interest to every Christian mind. It is symbolic of that rapid and enlarged growth in brotherly love which is characteristic of the different Churches in latter years, and which, without affecting present ecclesiastical organizations, will ultimately bind all of them together in "the unity of the Spirit." With the spirit which brings this large body of Christian men together, we have the most through sympathy. We trust that the meeting of the Confederation will be greatly promotive of the spirit of brotherly love throughout all the Churches of North America, and bring them into closer acquaintance and fellowship with each other. We promise our readers a full account of their proceedings.

PROGRESS.

Every one who speaks of the present age, designates it as an age of progress; and certainly the triumphs that have been achieved on every field of investigation, and in every department of enterprize, within the last sixty years, amply vindicates the justness of the designation. The accelerating velocity with which the car of improvement moves is prophetic of the fact, that the world is hurrying fast to some wonderful and glorious consummation.

The far-sighted men who stand upon the tall watch-towers of observation to note the march of events, call our attention to the many triumphs which distinguish and illustrate this onward age.

Educational processes simplified—improved methods of communicating knowledge—books numerous, various, and accessible—the physical divisions of the globe discovered, and nearly all explored and described—the means of communication between all the great and interesting localities of the earth direct and rapid—the steamboat penetrating every river—the steamship plowing the waves of every sea—commerce trading in the products of every clime—rails enough laid down even in our own country to belt the great globe itself with bands of iron—the electric wire, a combination of the optic and the auditory nerves of the world's great brain, almost encircling the earth, and nations most remote brought into the proximity of immediate neighborhood—the press, as a sun for splendor among the stars of modern civilization, fast flooding the earth's most distant and benighted regions with light; in short, the philosopher of progress announcing that the dawning light of the world's moral and political regeneration is already brightening upon the horizon of the near and glorious future.

Doubtless the march of improvement shall still be onward, as man shall better understand the elements around him, and acquire a more complete mastery over them. The fields shall be plowed by steam, the productiveness of the earth increased, and subsistence be multiplied and cheapened, and the toiling millions have increased leisure for mental improvement and social enjoyment. The solitary places shall yet be gladdened by the presence of rejoicing multitudes, the barren waste shall smile with verdure, and blossom as the rose. Thus shall the earth continue to be filled with the triumphs of mind, and cheered with the benedictions of providence, until we may hope that the blessings of an enlightened Christian civilization shall bless all the nations, and the dwellers on every zone that belts the globe yet rejoice because this light has come.—

"Fly abroad, thou mighty gospel;
Win and conquer, never cease;
May thy lasting, wide dominions,
Multiply, and still increase;
Sway thy sceptre,
Savior, all the world around."

ITINERANT.

LOCAL ITINERANTS.

It is the fashion with some writers and speakers to exhaust their vocabularies in grumbling at local itinerants. This, in the main, is downright injustice. Who is to blame for the situation of these men? Nobody in the world but Brother Stinginess! The men who are now in some sense burthens on the Bishop's cabinet, and who bear the stinging lash of newspaper writers, were once true itinerants. They never intended to be anything else, but having been guilty of the crime of marrying, and God having cursed (?) them with children, they were compelled to settle. But why so compelled? Simply because Brother Stinginess happened to have lived in several of the circuits to which they were sent. He was always "a big man" in the Church, and wherever he moved was immediately made Steward. He was indefatigable to collect a dollar from one, four bits from another, and an old pair of shoes from another. He never failed to give his "quota," two dollars a year, to the preacher! The result of such benevolent energy was to bring the preacher into a fit of sober thought. He thought—he thought he must locate! Ah, how his heart was saddened. But, no; a happy thought strikes him. He has a little money; he can purchase a little home, save the expense of travel and change, and still itinerate, through less extensively. And there he is!—Alas, poor man; in the midst of his joyful gratitude to God for suggesting a plan so good, he is assailed at Conference, and called a renegade. Newspaper scribblers publish him to the world as a nuisance, and faith only keeps him from deserting the gospel plough.

The fact is, that most of the local itinerants are useful men, who do more hard work than half the men who pride themselves on being "afloat." Louisiana is indebted, far beyond her ability ever to pay, to several just such men. Thousands have been converted under the preaching of these beluhored brethren; and thousands still are ministered to by them.

Come, brethren, let us quit this perpetual cant about local-itinerants. If men locate for the comforts and pleasures of a home only, and not because they are driven to it, let us give them a full discharge. But those who are worthy—the legion—let us rejoice that, under all their difficulties, they still labor in their master's vineyard.

R. P.

The Sunday School Celebration at Jefferson City Methodist Church, last Sunday afternoon, was a model and triumph. The crowd was great, the singing and speaking were excellent. Every body was delighted, and —seed was planted, broad-cast, that will bring forth an unexpectedly large harvest.

Rev. William A. Harris, recently President of La Grange Female College, Ga., has assumed the Presidency of Martha Washington College, Abingdon, Va. He was beloved, successful, and useful, in Georgia; we trust he will be equally so in Virginia.

Rev. P. P. Neely, D.D., spent Sabbath before last in this city, and preached in the Carondelet-street Church in the morning, and in the Felicity-street Church in the evening, to the delight and benefit of the audiences.

Rev. John Henary, of Baltimore, who is on a tour through the South, and whose preaching has been greatly blessed, especially in Mobile, where many have turned to God, is now spending some days in this city.

Rev. C. W. Thomas' excellent book on the West Coast of Africa has been so highly spoken of in these columns, editorially, and by our New York correspondent, that, upon the reception of a copy, little is left us to say, else than that it is for sale in New Orleans by H. D. M'Glinnis, 36 Camp street.

The Eclectic Magazine for April is fully equal to the already high reputation of this valuable monthly.—It gives, in a cheap form, the very cream and top-sparkle of foreign periodical literature.

Moore's Sewing Machine, at $35, is advertised in this issue, sixth column of this page. It is warranted to be excellent.

NOTES WHILE ON A FURLOUGH—No. VII.

Costa Rica, March 1, 1860.

Costa Rica has quite a variety of climate; and is adapted in different parts to the production of almost everything necessary to meet the wants of man. On either seaboard, and in some other low parts of the country, the climate is really tropical, and all the fruits and products peculiar to such a climate, are found, together with rice, cocoa, &c. In the valleys of San Jose, Cartargo, and Orosa, which have an elevation of from 4000 to 5,300 feet, the climate is much milder; here, not only most tropical fruits abound, but coffee, Indian corn, and most of the vegetable productions of the temperate zone flourish. Higher up the mountain slopes, where the soil is almost equally productive as in the valleys, wheat, oats, Irish potatoes, &c., of excellent quality, are produced. Sugar-cane grows at all altitudes, from the sea shore to the highest mountain slope. The soil of the country generally is of the richest quality, bearing a very strong resemblance in some places to the best alluvial, and in others to the best prairie lands in the Southern and South-Western States. Pasturage, especially in the rainy season, is excellent, and hence they have an abundance of fine cattle. With a Manzana—two acres of land—and their labor, the laboring class of the country, who are industrious and economical, not only support their families, but lay up money. This they may do, as they indulge in no extravagances and few luxuries; indeed they know little of what Americans mean by "comforts," though they have abundant means for their enjoyment. Every idea of this kind is swallowed up in the desire to accumulate. Nine-tenths of the whole population, male and female, go barefooted; when going on a journey, when it becomes necessary to protect the feet, the men prepare soles of untanned oxhide, which they fasten to the feet by strings coming over the instep and between the toes. As a class they are believed to be better off than the same class in any other country in Christendom. The country greatly needs a much larger population; there are large bodies of the very best land unoccupied, which can be had at a very moderate price, and the government is disposed to encourage immigration in every practicable and safe way. The limited means of the government, with the smallness of the population, have prevented the development of the resources of the country, and the promotion of such improvements as are really necessary for the accommodation and comfort of the public. There are very few such roads in the country as are demanded by public convenience and for the purposes of trade. To us it seems incredible that a country should be settled two hundred years, by Europeans, and yet not have a carriage road; but such is the case in Costa Rica. It has one from Punta Arenas to the capital, over which they carry the coffee crop in carts, but it is not suitable for carriages; in fact there are none in the Republic, except a few in San Jose.

Costa Rica may be regarded as healthy on either seaboard; the inhabitants are liable to the diseases peculiar to tropical climates; but leaving there, and going to the interior, we find a very pleasant, healthy climate, liable to few epidemics. Indeed the only one with which the capital was ever visited was the cholera, and by that only once. I have noticed numerous cases of goiter, a disease peculiar to Switzerland in the old country, I believe, and generally ascribed to the use of snow-water there; but as there is no such thing in this country, it must arise from some other cause. It not only occasions great deformity, but in some cases the protubernace becomes so large as to be such a burden that it is necessary to support it with a sling. A peculiarity about the disease here is, that it invariably afflicts females. I have not seen a single male who had it. The medical men with whom I have conversed, profess their entire ignorance of the cause of the disease.

This country might produce various crops for exportation, with profit, as indigo, tobacco, &c.; but the number of laborers is not equal to the demand for such crops, as they must be promptly gathered when ready. Coffee is the great staple product for export. The process of preparing it for market is much more varied than I had any idea of. In order to procure the plant the berry is sown broadcast; this is done in the month of April. In June, when the plants are some three inches high, and put forth the first form of leaves, they are transplanted into what is called the nursery, and placed about seven inches apart. Rich virgin soil is desirable for this, as if placed in poor soil, the plant never recovers from the injury; then it is allowed to grow one year, when it is transplanted a second time, and placed in its final position; it is then set in rows, about six or seven feet apart; three years from this they bear their first crop. Very much depends upon their trimming, topping, and cultivation, as to the extent of the crop, the length of time they bear, &c. The crop ripens in the month of November; the berry then has much the appearance, in size, color, &c., of the wild cherry. Each berry contains two grains of coffee; when gathered, it is at once passed through a pulping machine, which consists of a copper cylinder, with teeth, working against an upper and lower breast. In this operation the principal part of the hull is carried off by the cylinder, while the coffee is thrown in an opposite direction, through a space left between the two breasts. The coffee is then put into a cistern or vat, and left about twenty-four hours, generally, in water. It is then washed well, and that which is imperfect floats upon the surface, and is separated from the better quality. Afterwards it is spread out to dry; if the sun does not do this sufficiently, it is put in a stove contrived for that purpose. When thoroughly dried, it is passed through a pair of mill-stones (usually wood), to break and loosen the remaining hulls. After this, it is winnowed in a cane-wood winnowing machine. It is then put in a large circular trough, and two large stone wheels, or wooden ones shod with iron, are made to revolve rapidly upon it, fifteen or twenty minutes, when it is again winnowed, and finally women and girls then pick it all over and separate the black and imperfect berries. This is the process with the best quality, which is then ready for the London market. Such an article never goes to New York, only the inferior quality. Costa Rica Coffee brings as high a price in the London market as Java. I think I never drank better. The whole crop of the Republic, or nearly so, finds its way to England. Indeed England has monopolized nearly all the trade of Central and most of that of South America, and Mexico, and is reaping a golden and silver harvest. An English steamer on which I traveled lately, had on board two and a-half millions in silver; two millions of the amount came from the western coast of Mexico. England's trade with Mexico amounts to over $32,000,000 per annum, while that of the United States, her nearest neighbor, amounts to only $9,000,000. Her West India steamers, twenty in number, touch at some sixty different ports in Central and South America, and Mexico, regularly; while we have not a single line from any port in the country to Mexico, though it offers as a most lucrative trade.

The Government of Costa Rica is nominally Republican; but their ideas of republicanism differ widely from ours. When one party comes into power, to prevent trouble from those thrown out of office, they exile them. If a priest or politician becomes troublesome, by writing or saying anything unpleasant to those in power, they send him off at once, either to the very outskirts of their inhabited territory in the country, or to visit foreign parts. This saves all discussion. Whilst I was in San Jose, a Spaniard published an article in a newspaper which the Government did not like, and by eight o'clock the evening he was on his way to the frontiers of civilization. But with all their faults there is much to commend in both the country and people of Costa Rica.

J. H.

THE CHINA MISSION.

Mr. Editor: I am just in receipt of a letter from my son in China, containing also a letter for you, which I send you; you can make such disposition of it as you think best. I am glad to find such a liberal disposition manifested to sustain the China mission. At a meeting held at Pearl River church, Madison county, Miss., a missionary collection was taken up, after an appropriate sermon by Bro. C. K. Marshall, amounting to two hundred dollars, to pay the expenses of my daughter-in-law back to China, from which place she had just arrived, bringing her two children to remain in this country with relatives, while she returns to her husband in that land of darkness and idolatry, to suffer and labor for the salvation of the heathen. She also brought with her two of the Chinese boys, to remain and be educated in religion and literature that they may go back a blessing to their kindred and country. Brothers Marshall, Walton, Camp, Pugh, and other ministers, were present on that occasion. The Chinese boys, Charles and John, were present, and brought before the audience; they repeated the Lord's prayer and the ten commandments, and read from a Chinese Bible the word of God in their own language. It is astonishing what perfect knowledge these Chinese youths have of the historical facts recorded in the Bible. Christianity has made its mark in China, thank God! In consultation with Bro. Marshall, we concluded to place them, for the present under the private instructions of Dr. D. E. Kelly of Tennessee Conference; he having been a missionary to China, and speaking the language, can instruct them with more ease than they could be anywhere else, until they learn our language more perfect. President Thornton's dying letter in your paper, Mr. Editor, is telling upon China. I received through the post-office at Canton, on yesterday, in money and drafts, to the amount of two hundred and twenty-five dollars and thirty cents from four individuals for the China mission. Bro. Puverance of Camden, sends five dollars for himself and five for his wife; Rev. H. J. Harris sends me fifteen dollars from his work; Mrs. Lucretia M. Lum sends a draft for fifty dollars, and Mrs. M. A. Sessions of Warrington sends a draft for one hundred and fifty dollars and thirty cents, and she a widow.

John R. Lambuth.

Madison county, Miss., April 4th, 1860.

LETTER FROM CHINA.

Mr. Editor: I have not written to you now for more than a month. The home mail has just arrived, and brings me one copy of the New Orleans Christian Advocate, dated 15th October. It seems you had not then heard of the unfortunate battle which had been fought by the English at the Pi-ho, off Peking, in which they were defeated. (Pi-ho means north river.) It is there where the forts are built, and is the only navigable stream toward the Capital. At the mouth of that river they are now preparing to resist the English by throwing up their mud forts, and drilling all the countrymen and Tartars on the coast. Peking is about one hundred and twenty miles from the forts, and news is conveyed to the Emperor in twenty-four hours from that part of the coast. The English have surveyed the coast north of the forts, with the intention probably of attacking the forts in the rear. In the last Advocate, I see you are very sanguine in reference to China, only to be disappointed by news which you have heard before this; but these reverses are undoubtedly for our good, and God makes them work to his glory. We had asked for much, and we were looking for much, from the beneficent hand of God; but perhaps we were trusting too much to ourselves and exulting too much in the strong arm of man. These changes must be from the hand of God, and for some good and wise purpose. We do not see it now, but the veil which hides these things from us will one day be drawn aside, and the providences which seem so strange to us now, will then be made plain. During the past year two of our best missionary brethren have been removed to their reward in heaven. They were of the American Board: Brothers Aitcherson and Macey. They were both young, and just prepared to enter into their work, but God took them to himself. Also a sister Syle, of the Episcopal mission, who was taken to her reward in heaven but a few days since. It is a mystery to us which can only be revealed in eternity. God teaches us by these important lessons that he does not work by numbers. There is the mystery; that while He commands us to pray that laborers may be called into the vineyard, he taketh to himself some who are in the very midst of usefulness. Such an one's work perhaps is complete on earth. It also teaches us to be ready, with our lamps trimmed and burning.

As regards our work for the present, we are almost confined to Shanghai. Singolinsin, the Emperor's uncle, has stirred up the people in all parts of the empire against foreigners. He had charge and direction of the forces against the English, and is now the General in Chief of the whole army. He was successful some five years since against the Insurgents when they made an attempt to approach the Capital, and now being successful against the English, he has gained great celebrity among his people, and they are ready to denominate him the Dragon of China. He is a Tartar prince, and always has an enormous body-guard about his person. In 1858 he was not in command of the forts, but in 1859 he volunteered his services to set to right the forts and bar up the river against any foreign force. Much of his own money was used for this purpose. If he is conquered in the first battle which is now in contemplation, then China is in the hands of the English. But if he makes a successful resistance, and repels the English, then the foot-hold which we now have on the coast will only be held by a strong force of foreign arms.

Missionaries have endeavored to go to other cities and have been refused admittance into them—places where we have preached weeks at a time, and to hundreds and even to thousands. They do not even seem to know that America has a treaty. They do not fear America, it is England they fear. The English and French are now collecting their forces in China and preparing to proceed up the Pi-ho in the Spring. A large number of the forces have already arrived. They are building barracks now at Shanghai for a portion of them; so we will have some protection in Shanghai.

Now I must turn more particularly to myself, and the work of saving the souls of the dying heathen. This world is of a strange composition. While one is seeking to save, another is seeking to destroy. The work of destruction does not become the age in which we live. The second week in this month we observe as a day of fasting, humiliation and prayer to God. It is observed at the same time throughout all the East, and we hope in our beloved land, America. While we pray for the heathen, destruction is going on. Much devolves upon the missionary of the Cross in trying to elevate the heathen in such times as these, and make them a Christian people. The hindrances are many. We see them every day, but through the strength and blessing of God, we are enabled to persevere in this good work. It is an arduous one, but a noble and honorable one. The moral degradation of Chinese is exceedingly great. The ineotlou of the minds of the people to whom we present the gospel, fills us with astonishment, and we are ready to say, God hath given them ears to hear, but not hearts to understand, and they are so filled with vice that they are ready to destroy that without which they themselves must be destroyed. Their desires are earthly, sensual, selfish. They were never before taught to think of the immortality of the soul. They do not desire to make any change in their views; and when we try to present the gospel of our Savior to them, in all its beauty and loveliness, they are not at all inclined to appreciate it, and look upon you with a suspicious eye. The heathen with whom we have to deal are full of pride and sin. A Christian people cannot conceive of the greatness of the difficulties with which we have to contend. Thrown among them as we are, without the helps of Christian ministers in Christian lands, we have to begin at the foundation to eradicate the errors into which the heathen have fallen. We have to make books, rectify their previous way of thinking, and teach them to think rationally upon their soul's eternal interest. O, that our Christian brethren would pray more particularly for the missionary among the heathen; that his hands may be held up while the temple of God is being erected, and the old heathen fabric is being pulled down. The foundation of that glorious temple of our God is now being established. We see, day by day, one stone, and then another, being laid; and pillar after pillar goes up. But this is not done without difficulty, care, and constant watching. It requires every energy, and often it seems impossible to make any headway in demolishing the old ruins. It sometimes infuses itself into the new, and we are often perplexed at its complication and deep-seated sophistries. We often wonder if our work will ever have any end. It is a work of labor, and the laborer often in digging deep finds parts of the old building which he never before discovered. So we daily find difficulties which only the power of God can totally destroy and overcome. The Christian Missionary among the heathen ought to be a man of unceasing prayer, living near to God. His dependence alone ought to be on God. Pray for us, dear Christian brethren. We want life put into these dry bones. We want to see a great shaking among them. Will you then pray for us? May God bless us all, and help us to be faithful watchmen on the walls of His Zion. Let all the church hold up the heathen in prayer, and let their conversion be the burden of our desires to God.

J. W. LAMBUTH.

Shanghai, China, Jan. 4th, 1860.

MINUTES OF THE MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

SABBATH-SCHOOL REPORT.

MR. EDITOR:—With your permission, I wish to call the attention of the members of the Mississippi Conference, together with the membership, to the statistical exhibit of our minutes; and in doing so I trust I am prompted by the desire of usefulness. Whatever of blame may rest upon us as a Conference, and attach to us as members of the Church of God—in whom is entrusted the world's welfare—I trust I shall preserve a keen sense of my individuality, and that my personal responsibility will be lost among you as a mass. I trust that those who read this may do likewise. Newspaper articles are too often hurriedly read; but when stubborn facts are arrayed in solemn lines—facts vital to the prosperity of the church—they demand and deserve to be pondered. And I am persuaded, where there are both a lively conscience and reflection, that such facts are not read in vain. With this as a basis of hope, I ask your attention to the Sabbath-school report for the present, and if consistent with other claims, I will, at another time, call attention to some school cause the other disclosures.

It will be remembered that the Sabbath-school report was regarded by all as meagre and defective, when it was read upon the Conference floor. Yet the report itself intimates a prosperity, when it rejoices in "a slight tendency forward" in the interest of the Church. So far, then, as its defectiveness may tend to form a plea for our continued indifference and negligence, we may regard it as about the best exponent of the prosperity of the Sunday Mississippi Conference has ever made.

There is a slight discrepancy between the report and the statistics. This arises, however, from a want of proper information coming before the committee. The statistics show that there are 3,081 scholars, 607 officers, 93 schools, 12,937 volumes in library, 890 Visitors taken, and $797 92 raised within the bounds of the Conference for Sunday-school purposes. Now, the exhibit which the statistics make discloses the most criminal negligence upon the part of the ministry and the Church. I think I can show, by fair calculation, that instead of 3,081 scholars, there should be 20,651; instead of 607 officers, there should be 4,130; instead of 93 schools, there should be 823; instead of 12,937 volumes, there should be 82,604; instead of 890 Visitors, we should take 20,651; instead of $797 92, we should raise annually $35,205 in the bounds of our Conference.

By adding the members and probationers, we have in all 18,007 members that come positively under Methodist jurisdiction. Now, by reference to the church register, I find that in the church of which I am pastor about three-fourths of them are heads of families. Taking this as an average, we have 6,877 Methodist families within our bounds. If you allow 2 S. S. scholars to the family, you will have 13,754 Methodist children who ought to be in the Sabbath school. Take 3,081 from them, and you have 10,673 children of the church uncared for. Again, it seems to me a fair supposition to say, that there are half as many families in no church, whose children might be brought up under our influence and to our schools, as we now have in the church. Allowing 2 children to the family, this would give us 6,877; which would make in all 20,651 children in the bounds of our Conference who ought to be in our Sabbath schools. Accordingly, there are 17,570 children neglected by the Methodist Church, within the bounds of the Mississippi Conference. What wholesale havoc such negligence makes among the lambs of the flock! One would almost think the Church had given herself to the task of seeing to it, that the children committed to her care in the providence of God, should grow up in Scripture ignorance. How can the Church expect that God will answer her prayers, or send prosperity upon her, while such negligence is perpetuated!

To supply the actual demand of the Church, if you take the present ratio of 5 scholars to the officer, we should have 4,130 members engaged in teaching in Sabbath schools; whereas we have only 607, out of 18,000 in the Conference, while there are 17,313 members who are living almost as an incumbrance to the church.

Again, allowing 4 volumes to the scholar, which is the present ratio, we would have 82,604 volumes in library. There would be 79,667 volumes read by the children in our care, that now are not in the bounds of the Conference. And allowing 1 Sunday School Visitor to each scholar, there would be 19,781 more copies taken within the bounds of the Conference than are now taken.

And allowing $8 50 to the school (the present ratio), there would be raised annually, for Sunday school purposes, $34,407 more than are raised. And if each Sunday school was made a missionary society, as all ought to be, and paid the sum of $8 50 each into the mission-treasury, there would be contributed, by the Sabbath schools of our Conference, $35,205 to the cause of missions annually. Thus the children of Mississippi Conference could pay as much for the cause of missions as the Alabama Conference now pays. We are, my brethren, almost doing nothing.

But let us look at this subject more minutely. Let us try and give the facts an array that will call a more special attention to this wholesale negligence. Let us look at it in the several districts of the Conference.

In the Natchez district, according to the above rule, there are 817 Methodist families in the district; and by allowing 2 scholars to the family, there are 1634 children who ought to be in the Sunday school; while in the district there are only 315, leaving 1319 children of Methodist parents uncared for. Now, if you add half as many for the families out of the Church whose children might be brought into our schools, you have 2451 children in that district that should be in our schools; and instead of 55 Visitors, there should be 2451 taken in the district; and allowing 4 volumes to the scholar, there would be 9804 volumes in library.

In the Fayette district there are 1101 Methodist families; 2202 Methodist children, minus 538, leaves 1664 Methodist children in this district uncared for. By adding the number of children out of the church, you have in this district 2765 children neglected. There are 192 Visitors in the district, when there should be 3303. There are 1074 volumes, when there ought to be 13,212—more than the Conference now has.

In the Vicksburg district there are 775 Methodist families; 1550 Methodist children that should be in Sunday schools, and 923 of them neglected by the church; to which if you add the number out of the church, you will have in that district 1698 children neglected. There are 233 Visitors taken, when there should be 2305. There are 2050 volumes in library, when there should be about 10,600.

In the Greenville district there 100 Methodist families; 200 Methodist children who should be in the Sunday school; 153 of them neglected. Add the number out of the church, and you have 253 children neglected by the church in this district. There are no Visitors taken when there should be 300.

In the Yazoo district there are 693 Methodist families; 1386 children, and 1050 of them uncared for; adding the number out of the church, you have 1744 neglected in this district. Number of Visitors taken 32, when there should be 2076.

In the Starkville district there are 1070 Methodist families; 2152 Methodist children, 1927 of these neglected; adding those out of the church, there are in the district 3003 children uncared for by the Methodist church. And to supply 3228 Sunday school scholars in this district, there are only 5 Sunday schools. There are 6 circuits and missions in the district, with not less than 54 appointments, not to say Methodist societies, who have not a single school. There is not a Visitor taken, when there should be not less than 3000.

In the Sharon district there are 643 Methodist families; 1286 Methodist children, of whom 1006 are neglected; add those out of the church, and there are 1649 children uncared for in this district. There are only 180 Visitors taken, when there should be 1929 taken.

In the Biloxi district there are 887 Methodist families; 1771 children, 1198 of which are neglected; with those out of the church, there are 2385 children neglected in this district. There are 42 Visitors taken, when there should be 2385. There are 760 volumes in library, when there should be 9,510.

In the Clinton district there are 660 Methodist families; 1320 Methodist children, 782 of whom are neglected; add those out of the church, and you have 1442 children in the district uncared for. There are 150 Visitors taken when there should be 1980.

For the sake of brevity, I have not given the deficiency of each district in the same or all of the items in the statistics. In conclusion, let me say that, living in the same glass fabric, I have no stones to throw; but I hope that these facts may promote a universal and strenuous effort to remove this criminal negligence. It is made the duty of the presiding elders "to promote, by all proper means, the cause of missions and Sunday schools." With these disclosures, has that function in the church been a name merely, or a power? Has this enterprise of the church had anything like justice done it? Is it not time, my brethren, that we inaugurate a new era in a cause commensurate, in its interests, with the true prosperity of the church and the immortal destiny of thousands? Where is the preacher, or the member of the church, so lost to responsibility, that he will not feel, repent, and resolve to do, under these disclosures?

In conclusion, I beg of each minister that he will read the article in each of his congregations, and of the presiding elders that they do the same; and that all endeavor to organize schools where there are none. And then tell every body who will act, who can think, and has the spirit to live for the good of others, that we will meet in a Sabbath School Convention, in the city of Vicksburg, on the 9th of May next, then and there to inaugurate a nobler destiny for this sacred cause. The Convention will be addressed by Drs. Watkins and Marshall, Col. C. S. Tarpley, of Jackson, Miss., and the Hon. J. O. Fuqua, of Clinton, La.

ONE OF THE COMMITTEE.

LETTERS FROM MRS. CROSS.—NO. XII.

All day long I had been in my room in the City Hotel in New Orleans, alternately reading the tender, pleading words of David, and pacing the floor, or pausing at the window to watch the shadow as it climbed up the wall of the court.

At length the afternoon came on, and I sat in the parlor, waiting for the coach that was to convey me to the railroad, listlessly regarding the beautiful butterflies of fashion that flattered in and out with their many colored silken wings. I looked with more interest, from time to time, at a gentleman who sat apart on a sofa, and who appeared to my eyes like one hunted down by misery. The biographer of the Prince of Viana says, "The pen which writes his history should be dipped in tears," and with such ink, perhaps, should the inner life of the world be written.

But I see Dr. Lyons at the door. He comes to announce to me that the coach is ready, and all nervous and trembling, I run down stairs. We get into the coach; the baggage is long in being arranged; we have to wait for an other passenger; the Doctor is saying, "I wish this fellow would drive on," and I am catching my lip between my teeth. After a while we move forward. The streets seem interminable, and piles of slime are everywhere scraped up along the way-side. I said to myself, "There is the yellow fever again ready to crawl out." An end was put to these reflections by our arrival at the depot. While Dr. Lyons was kindly procuring my ticket, &c., I remember to have seen some baskets of very rosy apples and very golden oranges, and to have heard some question addressed to me in Spanish as to my taste for "naranjas," but I only uttered an impatient "no!" for all the orange groves of Granada would have no attractions for me then, nor all the golden apples of Atalanta, unless I could have paid my passage to Kentucky with them.

Dr. Lyons has at last closed his kind offices, and said "adieu" to me. I am on the railroad, alone, flying through the darkness, but a lady behind me entered into a very pleasant conversation with me, and when she fell asleep, I pressed my face against the window, and looked into the night, looked at the great waste of waters around me, dotted with black cypress knees, and at the tall cypresses which stood like the guardians of desolation. Mingled with this was seen, by the magic of reflection, a lofty, splendid bridge, beautified by marble columns, and adorned with gilding; and this bridge was spanning a river which we were crossing all night long, and whose margin we never reached. The sombre scene around me was contrasted in my own mind with Chateaubriand's glowing description of the forests of Louisiana, with their bright green foliage, and their graceful vines, loaded with gold en and crimson blossoms, and their birds of many hues glancing like houris through the trees, and all things beautiful as a Mahommedan paradise. Well, every land and every heart must have its time of desolation; and there is seldom a season when, at least, a forget-me-not or a daisy may not be found somewhere.

Whether the Mississippi railroad is rougher than other railroads I will not attempt to decide; but it appeared to me, during the night, that we were occasionally running over stumps or getting out among the cypress knees. I presume, however, that this was not actually the case.—About midnight, perhaps, the cars stopped for supper. As I stepped out, the conductor happened to be passing with a lantern, and seeing me, said, "You can come along now if you want to." I wanted to, and came along; procured my supper and returned to the cars, realizing rather forcibly that I was travelling alone.

At Jackson, the next morning, two very agreeable young ladies and a gentleman who was with them left. I tried to get a sight of this capitol of Mississippi as we passed, but I only got a glimpse of an indefinite looking cupola, and here and there a fragment of a brick wall forming a part of somebody's house.

Then we overtook the train which had preceded us; two or three of the cars were crushed, and the passengers were waiting by the wayside to be taken up by us. I had an opportunity of inquiring on which side the cars had run off. I wished to know if the fact, in that case, verified Lieut. Maury's theory that, as a general thing, cars in going north run off upon the east side of the track, and in going south, upon the west, and was pleased to find that it was confirmed, not only by the instance before us, but a man assured me that he had been upon the railroad for seven years, and that all the accidents he had known in that time had happened conformably to this principle. For the next day and night we had a long train crowded with passengers, and I think I have never seen the same number of persons more completely governed by the same spirit—namely, that each person shall procure one place, at least; two, if practicable; and four if possible, to himself. This is an admirable disposition, since, if every one attends to his own interest, the good of the whole will be secured; but I had not supposed it characteristic of Mississippians, nor do I yet. I am inclined to think the travellers on that day's train were exceptions to all the general rules that prevail throughout the Southern States.

The next morning we took breakfast at Huntsville, and once more the mountains looked down on me smilingly as they did seven years ago. There is something in the sight of mountains that ministers the soul, and brings it nearer heaven. I had been weary and drowsy, but to sleep amidst such scenery was impossible; and as we wound around the Look-out Mountain, and I saw it kissing the the skies, while the old forest trees stood like tried sentinels in the court below, and the waters were gurgling and glimmering through the valley, I felt that if the ecstatic sense of beauty, which filled my heart could only be expressed, it would flood the world with lilies; but—

"Who has not felt how vainly words essay
To fix one spark of beauty's heavenly ray!"

JANE T. H. CROSS.

LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.

ALEXANDRIA, MONROE DISTRICT.—Rev. N. A. Cravens writes: Our second quarterly meeting was attended with some success—nine accessions to the church.

PREACHING TO THE COLORED PEOPLE.

MR. EDITOR: An interesting letter from Bishop Andrew is published in the Advocate of March 7th, on "Preaching to the Colored people." This subject lies near my heart, and I trust near the heart of every Methodist preacher. I am glad that venerable man has written an article on this subject; I would be glad if he would write again. The importance, the responsibility, and the necessity of the subject he forcibly presents; the plan, too, he shadows in outline. The plan—that of preaching to negroes in chapels erected for the purpose—he says has been adopted only in a few places. To make this plan to be universally adopted is the great object sought after. Will this object be attained by our usual method of travelling around our circuits and organizing missions and building chapels wherever we can? Is it being obtained? A presiding elder told me not long since that some of the preachers on his district never or seldom ever preached to the negroes at all, how much less of organizing missions and building chapels! I hope this apathy is not general. Do we in Louisiana widen our missionary fields in proportion to the increase of the number of slaves by emigration into the the State? We do not. Compare Missionary statistics with the statistics of emigration, and the difference will be apparent. Then look at the increase of population by by births, and the vast territory yet unoccupied by us, and we will arrive at this conclusion—that instead of the negroes of this State becoming Christianized, they are absolutely becoming heathenized. The premises force us to this conclusion, and they are correct. The usual method then is not accomplishing the object desired.

Can we devise a better? In the report of the Committee on Missions, for 1859, is found this resolution:

"That we recommend the appointment of a suitable man to visit the planters of our State, and lay before them the importance of the religious instruction of their slaves, and form circuits wherever practicable."

This resolution went to the cabinet, but unfortunately for the poor negro, it came back unheeded. The plea was, "We have not men to spare to appoint one to this work." But had one volunteered to go to China, I wonder if he would not have been spared! And the papers would have sounded his praise all over the country. But this was carrying the gospel too close to home to be of much importance. This resolution has many an opposer in a private way; and I am glad on the Church's account that it is private. They say that we have not preachers enough to supply that work. This is an oversight; I know of local preachers enough in one district in the Louisiana Conference to fill all the colored missions that can be organized in that district. They are acceptable men, and are anxious to do the work. The fact of not having the negroes preached to does not lie so much in the planter as in the Church and her ministers. I have had but one circuit since I have been in the Louisiana Conference; it was easy to organize a mission on that, and they built chapels too. I hear of calls by planters almost every month, for preachers to preach to their negroes; and if properly approached, I doubt not would build chapels.—As to the support, there is no doubt about that; it will be sure. I do think if that resolution had been executed we would now be preaching to thousands of slaves, where we only preach to hundreds. Action has been the secret of the success of Methodism heretofore, and action must be the secret of success in carrying the gospel to the negro now.

S.

LETTER FROM SAN FRANCISCO.

THAT PRESS—THANKS.

MR. EDITOR: In my call for a press for the Pacific Methodist, I promised that when the money began to come, your readers should hear from me again in tones of thanksgiving. Well, thank the Lord, it has begun to come, just as we expected. It is just like the noble sons of the South, and just like Alabama to lead off in the good work. And the time has come to redeem that promise; and while I write my heart swells with gratitude that the ball is started, and I expect that, before this, many others have given a helping hand, and yet others, from whom you have not heard, are devising liberal things to keep it rolling to its intended consummation. Amen—let it be so.

Shall I undertake to tell how I felt when unfolding your issue of 1st February, my eye fell upon the letter of Judge Groce, and read what he proposed, and your exhortation? I imagine that I felt somewhat as the lame man did who held Peter and John, after he was able to stand upon his own feet, and "walk, and leap, and praise God." The strength begins to come to our ankle bones, and we believe and trust in God that the day is not far distant when we shall go forth upon our own feet, "walking and leaping, and praising God."

We first thank God for His favor to us in this matter, and then, Mr. Editor, we thank you for reiterating our call, and sending it forth to the thousands of your readers, with your exhortation in our behalf. Then, ten thousand blessings upon him who furnished the first material aid, and thousands upon all who follow.

Now, this is not moonshine. We feel it, and feel it in our "heart of hearts." And I can assure the brethren and friends who aid us in this matter, that it will "redound to the thanksgiving of many," and that many prayers will daily ascend from numerous and sincere hearts, for the blessing of God upon those who help us in this time of need. More anon.

L. CATELY.

HOMES FOR THE EVANGELISTS.

MR. EDITOR: In these times of so much writing and talking about "homes for the evangelists," some facts touching the history of such benevolent planning in the Mississippi Conference, may be worth notice. For instance: I once knew a noble-hearted, generous Methodist, a preacher, whose praise will last long years to come, who conceived the idea of founding a village for social educational and religious purposes. The plan was adopted; his idea took form, and a delightful village in our bounds is the result. But they would need an academy, a church, a burying-ground, and "home for the evangelists." A generous donation of sixty-six acres of ground, lying just where it ought to, was made. The church was built, the dead were buried, and houses were erected for the presiding elder of the district and the preacher on the circuit—"homes for the evangelists." All this in his day. The deed was properly executed, and the trustees therein named held the property "for the use and benefit of the church." The good man died, and other trustees were appointed, and other purposes were to be served.—The "homes" were sold in 1856, and the lands, all except a fraction, went into other uses.

This looks as if "homes for the evangelists" were held loosely, especially as there is now no such home in the district or circuit alluded to.

MISSISSIPPI.

REV. MR. HERSEY.

The aged gentleman whose name heads this article, has been sojourning in this city for about three weeks. He is about seventy-four years of age. He preached every evening but Saturdays, with the exception, perhaps, of two. He preached three times on Sabbath, and lectured one or two Sabbath-schools. He eats no animal food of any kind, drinks no tea nor coffee, eats no warm victuals on the Sabbath.

He is never fatigued. I pronounce him one of the most astonishing men of the age. He is a preacher in the evangelical and apostolic sense of that term—a workman that needeth not be ashamed, rightly dividing the word. His whole object and aim is to glorify God and save souls. He is gray-headed, looks feeble, but he makes his hearers love him and his cause.

Let all go and hear him. He preaches all the narrowness and straitness of the Gospel, yet with so much love and evident solicitude for the soul, that he does not offend.

A. HEARER.

Mobile, April 5, '60.

A CITY EXAMPLE. A brother who is a clerk in one of the largest dry goods establishments in the city, and superintendent of a Sunday-school, and who has no leisure at all, is constantly bringing us the names and money of new subscribers to the Advocate. "Go thou and do likewise."

FROM THE RIO GRANDE.

Just as we go to press we learn, by the Arizona's advices, that a battle was probably fought on the 6th instant, between the American troops under Capts. Stoneman and Ford, and the Mexicans, at Reynosee. Capt. F. had gone over with about seventy men, to demand the surrender of some of Cortina's bandits known to be there. The Mexicans raised a force of two hundred, Ford went back for reinforcements, Stoneman then formally demanded the surrender, under threat of attacking the place with his whole force—300 men. The Mexicans plead for time to consult them, thereby, and sent to Matamoras for reinforcements. At last advices they were about to engage in conflict.

FROM JAPAN.

The letter, of which the following is a copy, had been circulated in Kanagawa and Yokohama:

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Kanagawa, 20 December, 1859.

SIR: An official communication has been received at this Consulate from the American Minister resident at Yeddo, that he has obtained a pledge from the Japanese Government that the treaty of Yeddo shall be carried out in all its integrity, and that the following points were specially agreed upon.

1st. That the free purchase of all kinds of Japanese produce shall no longer be obstructed. 2d. That all Japanese articles may be exported without limit as to quantity, except rice, wheat, copper coin, and Japanese gold and silver uncoined. 3d. That Japanese officers should not act as the sellers of any article, nor interfere in any business transactions. 4th. That the exchange of money should be carried into immediate effect; only 20,000 (ten thousand) Itzebous will be exchanged at this port per day. This will continue until arrangements are made for making the supply equal to the demand. 5th. The quarter to be occupied by foreigners to be immediately settled.

In addition to the foregoing, the Minister informs me that for the purpose of giving currency to our dollars among the people, they should be stamped with Chinese characters showing their value. This has been agreed upon, and a stamp will be sent to Kanagawa as soon as it can be prepared. It is optional with Americans to have their dollars stamped or not, and it is expressly understood that all dollars stamped or unstamped will be exchanged for Japanese coin, weight for weight.

Your Obedient servant,
E. M. DOSS, U. S. Consul.

LATER FROM CHINA.

By the arrival at San Francisco, on the 15th ult., of the ship Flora, sixty days from Hongkong, we have dates to January 14, sixteen days later than previous advices.

The Overland Trade Depot, of January 14, says that since December 30 nothing had transpired to throw light on the movements of the Chinese, but no doubt existed about their resolution to try the issue by an appeal to arms.

Trade continued uninterrupted. The tea-men held the little good black tea they had with great firmness, and were not making their customary arrrangements regarding next season's crop.

Money was scarce, owing to the proximity of the Chinese New Year. Rice continued high. Ships are taken up at improved rates to go in quest of the article. Increased emigration had sprung up for Sidney, and the stock of unemployed ships had sensibly diminished; still rates were miserably low.

The U. S. Consul had hoisted his flag at Swatow, and it is understood that the British Consul will follow the example shortly. The customs will be conducted under foreign inspectorship.

FROM COCHIN-CHINA.

The news from Cochin-China is more favorable. At Turon, the allied French and Spanish force had entrenched themselves and await reinforcements. Admiral Page had taken a portion of the force with him, and moved to Saigon, where, after erecting some requisite fortifications, it said to be his intention to open trade. It would appear that there are many native converts about Saigon, and that a number of them had been enrolled to bear arms in the French service.

FOREIGN.

Political Intelligence.

In the political circles of England the question regarding the annexation of Savoy to France is the principal topic of interest.

The London Times admits that the annexation of Savoy to France must be quietly allowed, but denounces the act as a spoliation wrong almost as bad as a march upon the Rhine, or a sudden attempt on the city of Antwerp.

The complicated affairs in Italy are assuming a high tone of importance, and continue to attract much of the public attention on the Continent.

The King of Sardinia has formally accepted the conditions of the annexation of Tuscany. The provisions of the treaty have met with his entire approval.

The French army was daily quitting Lombardy, and were proceeding to Savoy.

The Paris Constitutionel says that this step has not been taken by France to express any coldness toward Sardinia, but because the independence has been irrevocably assumed.

The troops of Sardinia stationed in Savoy have commenced to evacuate that territory.

Advices received from Paris, explaining the necessity for the annexation of Savoy, have been published, but they contain nothing of importance.

The Government of France has disavowed the theory of a natural frontier.

Savoy Ceded to France.

The annexation of Savoy to France is generally regarded as an accomplished fact. The London Times says the Emperor Napoleon must be permitted to carry off his prey. All the appointments of officials for Savoy that been completed in Paris.

Victor Emanuel Excommunicated.

The Paris Constitutionel states that the Pope had addressed a monitory to King Victor Emanuel, intimating that henceforth all relations between his Holiness and the royal family must be broken off; that his majesty will understand that he has openly violated the laws of the Church, and is to multiply excommunicated.

The Holy Father reserves to Himself the duty of taking into his consideration the interests of the universal Church and the good Catholics of Piedmont, before proceeding to severe measures, which in any event weigh from henceforth upon the person of the King. Le Nord says the moment the Pope's bull is fulminated, the cities of Milan, Genoa, Leghorn, Parma, Bologna, and Florence have agreed to illuminate and give it the character of a national celebration to the event.

It was said at Vienna that the French troops at Rome would return to Civita Vecchia if the Pope excommunicated Victor Emanuel. Another report is that the Neapolitan troops will at once enter the Papal States if the Sardinians take possession of Romagna.

The Municipal Council of Nice had voted against annexation to France, and sent a deputation to Turin on the subject.

Commercial Intelligence.

BOSTON, April 9.—The European mails by the steamship Niagara are due at this point this evening, and those of the South will be forwarded by to-morrow morning's train.

LIVERPOOL, March 29.—The amount of Cotton now in this port is estimated at 840,000 bales, of which 703,000 are of American production.

On Saturday the Cotton market closed steady at the following quotations by the Brokers' Circular:

Fair Orleans, 7¾; Fair Mobile, 7¾; Fair Uplands, 7; Middling Orleans, 7¼; Middling Mobile, 7; Middling Uplands, 6¾.

LONDON, March 25.—The English money market closed active. The demand was fair throughout the week. The funds have evinced no change since the sailing of the last steamer.

Consols for money closed at 94 three-eight to 94 five-eighth. Consols for account closed at 94 five eighth to 94 three-fourth.

The Paris Bourse has somewhat recovered from its late state of depression. The 3 per cent. rentes closed at 69f. 30c.

THE BLIND NEGRO BOY TOM.

Though his head and face have an idiotic look, and though he is simple-minded and almost idiotic in general respects, his brain is a perfect cabinet of sweetest music, to which his clear and faithful ears cater continually, and which whatever it receives it retains with a correctness and distinctness which utterly baffles and dumb-founds all the processes known in regard to the faculty of memory which the auditors may have entertained. The boy's power in this respect seems to be one of those natural gifts or providential compensations which atone for deficiencies in the other organisms, at the same time that they baffle the closest researches of psychological science for a clear solution of the mystery. He excites the greatest wonder among ladies and gentlemen of thorough musical culture, and accomplished in the difficult uses of the piano; not only for the readiness with which he furnishes, from his brain repertoire, any popular piece that may be called for, or the remarkable correctness, vigor and sweetness with which he performs, but by his truly wonderful faculty of hearing a new piece of music only once, and then playing it himself as correctly as if he had known it all his life.

A few nights since a crowd of musical ladies and gentlemen were luxuriating in the surprise and pleasure of a first visit to Tom. The manager requested that if there was any one present who would sit down at the piano and play some piece of music which was not common or popular, and not likely to be known to Tom, the boy would listen to it, and afterwards play it himself. One lady accepted the challenge. She played a Spanish piece of some length and difficulty; one of those heavy chef d'œuvres in which a sweet and delicate melody flings its way through a hurricane of heavy accompaniments and variations. A severer test could not possibly have been offered to the boy. As he listened, he leaned his elbows on the end of the piano, with his hands clutched in the wool over his ears, his sightless eyes rolling upward, and his whole body writhing and twisting as if in pain. When the lady finished, he took the stool and repeated the piece in a manner which astonished everybody. But the lady detected a few faults, and mentioned the same. The manager politely asked her to play the piece again. As she seated herself, he said to the boy, "Now, Tom, listen well." He listened with all his former intensity; and when the lady finished, he seated himself, and this time played the piece perfectly.

His performance of a martial air, in which he imitated the liveand drum; of the "Anvil Chorus," with the anvil accompaniment; of "Yankee Doodle" with one hand and "Fisher's Hornpipe" with the other, at the same time; and of numerous popular pieces which combine thundering heaviness and lightning rapidity, were astonishing.

Tom's brain is as wonderful upon his tongue as it is upon his ears and fingers. You may recite a passage of Latin or French to him, and he will repeat it perfectly, following your emphasis and pronunciation exactly; if there is any fault, it was yours in giving it, he knows nothing of the languages. He sings "Gentle Annie" and other songs with a voice so sweet and clear, and a pronunciation so pure, that if you were to shut your eyes you might fancy some white and cultivated school-girl was singing, instead of a little woolly-headed monkey of an Ethiopian.

DEATH OF THE ORIGINAL SAM.

Of the demise of Hon. Lewis C. Levin, of Philadelphia, on the 14th ult., the Philadelphia Press of the 15th says:

Mr. Levin was a Southern man by birth, having been born in Charleston, S. C., November 10, 1808. He received a liberal education, having graduated at Columbia College, S. C. He adopted the profession of the law, and he practiced it in Maryland, Louisiana and Kentucky. He first came to this city about eighteen or twenty years ago, and he soon attracted much attention from the prominent part he took in the temperance cause. He possessed much power as a public speaker, and his graphic lectures upon the subject of temperance always attracted crowds. In the year 1843 he attached himself to Native Americanism, and if he was not the founder of the party in that year, he was at least among the most influential of its founders. Mr. Levin became the editor of the Daily Sun about that time, and made the paper the organ jointly of Native Americanism and temperance. On the memorable Monday, May 6th, 1844, Mr. Levin was making a speech in the market-house at Kensington, when the meeting he was addressing was fired upon, and Shiffler, Rhinedollar, and other Natives were killed and created party martyrs. This act was the commencement of the series of terrible riots, murders and church-burnings which disgraced Philadelphia in May, 1844, to be repeated in July of the same year, at the time of the bloody affair at the Church of St. Philip de Neri in Queen street, Southwark. In that occasion Mr. Levin used all the power of his eloquence to restrain the fury of his own partisans.

During the excitement of this period Mr. Levin was untiring. With his pen and tongue he labored exceedingly for the cause of Native Americanism. He was among those arrested on the charge of treason in 1844, but he was never tried. In 1845 Mr. Levin was elected to represent the First District in Congress. He served with credit to himself from 1845 to 1847, and again from 1847 to 1851. He generally formed a part of the Committee on Naval Affairs. He was succeeded by Mr. Florence, who now occupies a seat in the House. After his retirement, Mr. Levin did not make a prominent appearance in politics until the campaign of 1856, when he inaugurated a movement against Fremont. He held a meeting in National Hall, which broke up in a disturbance. Mr. Levin being ejected from the platform by the supporters of Fremont. This was the last appearance of Mr. Levin in public. He has been in a declining state of health for the past few years, and his death was daily expected.

MARRIAGES.

"It is not good for man to be alone."

March 14th, at the residence of the bride's father, in the Parish of East Feliciana, La., by Rev. A. T. Simmons, Mr. JOHN D. DU BOSE and Miss MELVENA S. COLLINS.

By Rev. N. A. Cravens, on Bayou Rapides, Mr. JAMES W. SIMS, of Texas, to Mrs. CAROLINE A. HAWORTH, of Rapides Parish, La.

On the 11th of March, by Rev. T. H. McCleadon, at the residence of Mr. Isaac Collins, Ouachita parish, La., Mr. C. BISHOP to Mrs. N. S. ROBERTSON, all of this parish.

By the Rev. J. H. Bowen, Mr. JACQUES B. BOWEN to MARY R. PURSEY, all of Jefferson county, Miss.

In Biloxi, Miss. on the 1st of April, by the Rev. Matthew D. Thomason, Capt. THERON L. BALFOR to Miss ARABELLA KINZ.

RECEIPTS, BY THE POST-OFFICE,

From April 3d to April 10th, 1860.

A—J C Ardis, $1 75; A Adams, $3.
B—L R Bell, $2; J H Bowen, $1 50.
C—J G Carlisle, $5; J D Cameron, $10; A Canaon, $10.
D—T F Dixon, $0; W P Dickson, $10.
F—F G Ferguson, $10.
H—H Harrison, $10; C F Hallberg, $10; E. Hearn, $4.
J—J P Jones, $3.
K—J E Kenney, $2.
L—J J Laidlow, $3;
M—H H Montgomery, $15; W D Matthews, $15; M F MacDonnell, $3.
N—E M Newman, $1 35.
P—J C Pitts, $5; R D Patrick, $2.
R—T J Rutledge, $10.
S—H A Sibley, $3 75.
W—A West, $4; W W Worthington, $1 50; D Williamson, $2.
Y—N B Young, $7.

COMMERCIAL.

MONDAY EVENING, April 9th, 1860.

We condense the following statement from the New Orleans Price Current of the 8th instant:—

The market generally has exhibited only a moderate degree of animation during the week just closed, though we have noticed a fair demand for the better qualities of Cotton, which are scarce, and an increased movement in Tobacco. Sugar has been dull, with a drooping tendency in prices, and in Molasses the supply and demand have been limited, with a fluctuating market. In Western Produce we have noticed a dull and heavy market for flour, but a rather active movement in grain, and more firmness in the rates for the leading articles of provisions.

COTTON.—With respect to prices, we have to remark that for the lower grades, and for mixed lots averaging about Low Middling to Middling the market has been in favor of buyers while clean Middling and the better grades, which are very scarce, have been firm at our outside figures. We, however make no further change in our quotations.

The receipts at this port since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas,) are 1,850,625 bales, against 1,457,027 bales to same date last year, and the increase of the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 091,120 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same dates last year, there is an increase of 628,525 bales to Great Britain, and of 114,351 to France, while to other foreign ports there is a decrease of 64,664 bales.

New Orleans Classification:

Inferior	8 @ 8	Good Middling	11¾@12
Ordinary	8¾@ 9¼	Middling Fair	12¾@12¾
Good Ordinary	9¾@ 9¾	Fair	—@—
Low Middling	9¾@ 10¼	Good Fair	—@—
Middling	10¾@11¾	Good and Fine	—@—

SUGAR.—The sales of the week amount to 7000 hhds. We quote for Inferior and Refining 3 to 4¼; Common to Good Common 5 to 6; Fair to Fully Fair 6¼ to 7; Prime to Choice 7¼ to 8¾. Centrifugal and Clarified 5¼ to 6 cents per pound. The above quotations apply to round lots, but small orders of 5 hhds and under, could not be filled without paying a further advance of ¼ to ⅜ per pound.

MOLASSES.—Total receipts of the week 10,000 barrels. The prices obtained during the week were: Inferior to Fair, 25 to 33 cents per gallon; and Prime to Choice, 34 to 36 cents; half barrels, 28 to 36 cents per gallon.

FLOUR.—About 12,000 bbls have been sold during the past week, at from $6 40 to $6 55 for superfine, $6 25 to 7 00 for ordinary to good extra, and $0 75 to $7 50 per bbl. for choice extra brands.

GRAIN.—The receipts of Corn continue light. About 47,000 sacks have been sold at from $0 68 to 0 70 for ordinary and $0 85 for good white. Oats have been in moderate request at 57c to 58c per bushel for good to prime St. Louis. Bran sells at $1 70 to $1 75 for ordinary to choice lots. Wheat sells at $1 15 per bushel for prime red.

PORK.—The principal sales reported through the week were at $17 75 to $18 75 per bbl. for Mess.

BEEF.—We quote Prime Mess at $14 00 per bbl. for extra brands.

BACON.—Shoulders 8 to 8½; Ribbed Sides 10 to 10½; Clear Sides 11 to 11½; Sugar-cured Hams 12 to 12½ cents per pound.

LARD.—We quote 10½ to 10¾c for prima to choice prime, in tcs., and 11¼ to 11¾c. for kegs.

BUTTER.—Western generally selling at 12 to 16 cents per pound, according to quality; and Cheese 11 to 11½c.

BAGGING AND BALE ROPE.—We quote Kentucky Bagging at 13½ to 14 cents per yard; India Bagging, 12½ to 13¼c; Bale Rope, hand spun, 7½c to 8c, and machine made, 8½ to 9 cents per pound.

GUNNY BAGS—Limited parcels sell at 10 cents for light and 10½ to 11c. to heavy and extra heavy bags.

COFFEE.—We quote fair at 11½ to 13, and prima at 13½c per pound.

NAVAL STORES.—A good demand for Spirits Turpentine, mostly on speculation. Sales of some 600 bbls at 45 to 46.—Latterly holders have been asking 47½ to 50c per gallon, the market closing at the outside rate. Of Rosin some 1000 bbls have sold at $1 55 to $1 60 for Common and No 2, and $1 72 to $2 per bbl of 280 pounds for Low No. 1. The finer qualities are scarce and in request. Tar dull and nominal. Stock of some 6000 bbls on hand.

LIVE-STOCK.—Beef Cattle—Western, 7 to 9½c. per lb. net; Texas—ordinary to fair $15 to 20, and choice $18 to 35 per head.

Hogs, selling at 9 to 10c. per pound net.

Sheep—Selling at $4 00 to $5 50 per head.

Veal Cattle—Selling at $8 00 to $13 00 per head.

Milch Cows—at $30 to $35 per head.

SPECIAL NOTICES.

NOTICE.—Persons having business with the NEW ORLEANS DEPOSITORY, will please direct to KEENER & PARKER.

VICKSBURG DEPOSITORY.—All orders should be addressed thus—"Agent Book and Tract Depository, Vicksburg, Miss."

Book and Tract Society of the Mississippi Conference, at Vicksburg.

It is with heartfelt thankfulness that we are able to record the prosperity of this Society, which has really become one of "the Institutions" of the age. It has a high sphere of usefulness before it, and if our brethren and friends abroad will do their duty, much and great good will be accomplished by it. At a recent meeting of the Board of Managers, it was resolved "that the sales should all be for Cash or City Acceptances," which is the only safe plan on which the business of the Society can be successfully carried on. There are many accounts of long standing which have not been paid, and as no small a profit is charged on the books sold, the Society cannot afford to lose any of them, and if our brethren and friends will think of the matter properly, they will all agree with us that the Cash plan is the only true one. We hope our brethren will send on their orders. Is it not a duty as well as a privilege to disseminate Christian

Poetry.

MRS. ELEANOR M. REED.

BY SALLIE M. WHITE.

"Blest dead! They sure have need of thee
In the place where thou art going,
Though earth of angels has too few
And heaven is overflowing."

Dear, sainted one, my soul is sad
For sympathy;
But tears shall never dim thine eyes,
Nor sorrows heave thy breast with sighs;
All hearts should now be truly glad,
Blest dead, for thee.

I heard thy voice's melody
In days gone by,
Hymning thy spirit's praise to God—
Treading the path thy Savior trod,
Thou hast at last triumphantly
Gone up on high.

A holy star has been removed
From earthly even,
So gently and so radiantly
The light still shines resplendently,
Winning the spirits thou hast loved
To a fair Heaven.

When spirits such as these go home
From earthly woe,
We follow up the heavenly heights,
Till a long train of golden lights
Are to the shining portals come
From shores below.

I loved thee here on earth, my friend,
In wastes of sin;
The memory of pleasures fled,
Like farewell blessings on my head,
Shall sadly rest till time shall end
And heaven begin.

Thou'rt blest, and I am happy then,
Though tear-drops swell
From eyes that muse on love within,
Remembering pleasures that have been;
And hoping still to meet again—
Till then farewell.

Children's Column.

A LITTLE GIRL AND THE BIBLE CAUSE.

Rev. C. D. Oliver writes to us: "You cannot fail to share with me real gratification in perusing the following letter from a little girl in your State. I send it to you for publication, believing that you will cheerfully give it a place in your columns. May it influence other good children to do likewise. God bless the dear little daughter and her noble mother, who is seeking to encourage her child to the performance of Christian deeds. I will endeavor to give this contribution the special direction asked."

Quebec, Madison Parish, La.,
March 21st, 1860.

MR. OLIVER: Mama read me your call "to the lovers of the Bible," in the last number of the Advocate, and as I love the Bible, and love to hear the nice little Bible Pictures read that the Editor so kindly writes for little children, I enclose you one of my little gold dollars, to buy a Bible for some orphan child that has no kind parents to tell her of God and heaven. I am quite a little girl—only seven years old—but Jesus died for me, and Mama teaches me I am old enough to be useful. We live in a wild, new country, and have no Sabbath-school or Church to attend, but hope in a few years to have all the advantages of an old settled country.

Your little friend,
MOLLIE KATE MORRISON.

A STUDENT'S ADVENTURE.

Some ten years ago I spent a long vacation on the coast of Ireland; somewhat disappointed with early fallures and with myself, I affected the solitary. I tried hard at twenty to get up the then impossible character of foolish old, misanthropical Timon. I soon, however, discovered the hopeless-antness and impracticability of this. The wild precipices and mountains of that grand coast exorcised my demons, and the limitless, full Atlantic beating restlessly on its iron bounds, roused me to action. Presently I dropped into the doings and crafts of the rough fishermen and cragsmen of the neighborhood, and soon gaining their hearts by some unusual feats, I acquired the high character of being "a gay, venturesome lad,"—no unworthy fame.

My rather confident address and courage, such as they were, underwent a peculiar trial when and as I least expected. I was living in the vicinity of the celebrated swinging-bridge, Carrick-a-rede. The troops of tourists visiting it reminded of the world from which I was, I fear, after all, an unwilling exile. The danger of crossing the bridge with my dog and gun afforded some excitement.—The glorious views of shore, sea, and isles, delighted me; the deep mossy heather on the headlands made a luxurious couch for either reading or dozing upon under the summer sun.

One day from my favorite eyrie I had watched a gay party descending the slope to the bridge, mixing and changing colors as they went, like the view in a kaleidoscope. I could distinguish laughter and sweet voices pleasantly ringing out; and I confess it needed the solace of my favorite book and all my fortitude to render me contented in my solitude up among the sea-gulls.

I had resumed my last place, and stretched myself very comfortably on the moss of my tall, out-standing, pillar-like cliff, when suddenly my old dog Tasso rushed close to me, and fixed his big dark eyes anxiously in the direction of the bridge. We both trembled at that moment, for a piercing scream smote us. The sea-birds darted out from the rock face, and after a short silent flight, circled at their shrillest and loudest. Could I be deceived? It was surely human! Another scream still possibly more lutensely painful. It was a woman's voice!

"Can it be," I thought, "that some of them are over cliff?"

Grasping my gun, I rushed down hill, as men only run to save life. Again and again, as I flew over the broken ground, I felt the same bitter cry striking, as it seemed, into my very heart. A few bounds over the slippery seagrass along the edge of the precipice, and I stood at the head of the ladder which leads down to the swinging-bridge.

Heavens! what a sight!

Right in the midst of it was a young, fair-haired girl. With her two small white hands she desperately clutched the slender cord which the fishermen use as a balance, or guide; the pressure of her whole weight drove it out from the floating strip of board on which she stood.—Sometimes with her hands spread out she swayed, face downward, over the abyss, with its white raging waves a hundred feet below; sometimes the wind and the double oscillation laid her backwards, with her hands clenched on that wretched, worthless cord, and her pale, sharp face straining upward, as her long hair streamed out, pointing down to the sea. The bridge itself was shaking and swinging, giving forth that clank and moan peculiar to it in storms, writhing about like some serpent struggling with the poor girl's efforts. On the platform of the rock beneath the ladder stood the rest of the party, each in a different attitude of a lent, horrified expectancy, incapable of the slightest attempt at rescue.

At a glance this never-to-be-forgotten scene was all understood. Another scream, another look of wild appealing despair from the poor girl, and I was out upon the narrow plank. Under the double motion and weight the rope shook and were depressed, so that I could scarcely walk; the rattling on which the foot-boards lay, strained to the utmost in sharp angles clearly marked against the rushing white and green underneath.

There was no time to think or pause. With very rapid strides I came on. I could hear her praying now; her courage and strength had given way under the reaction of hope; she was almost to faint. I measured the terrible vacancy into which she was about to fall breathing. I was prepared to abide the desperate plunge the bridge would give the moment she dropped.

In the last extremity of fear and hope, I shouted in a voice that stirred my own heart too:

"Courage, brave girl; courage, one moment longer!"

Just then I was within six feet of her, standing on six inches wide of a deal plank that bent under me like whale bone, my only hold the loose swinging cord from rock to rock across the gulf, below a black walled chasm of rugged rocks, with a dizzy whirl of roaring foam between them. Judge, then, my dismay and astonishment when I saw this girl, as I spoke, leave hold of the hand-rope and walk unassisted towards me along that narrow shaking path hung out in air. I could not credit my senses; it was unheard of—it was too daring—it was impossible for any human being. Before I could recover or decide how to act, she had flung herself upon me her arms about my neck, her whole weight resting upon me like lead. I could scarcely retain my balance, and I could not attempt to relieve myself. I felt she was about to faint—I felt, for from her position I could not see. I knew no human power could save us if she did. Moved, then, for my own life as well as hers, I whispered in that stern, strange, inward tone which arises in the extreme of anxiety or great peril:

"If you faint or give way, we are both lost!"

The effect was wonderful. Bravely the poor young, frail creature fought with her weakness, beating back the faintness there on that thin, quaking plank, with the three eddies rushing far below, and their hoarse voices filling the wide air about us; only my arm round her waist to stay her against the swaying ropes beneath.

"Now, are you ready to try it?"

"I am ready," said the brave girl.

Gently and gradually I loosed her hold of my neck and arms; I put the hand-rope into her grasp, with directions to let it slip through her hand, merely resting on it as she walked, and with her left hand slapped tightly in my left, which was stretched out behind for her hold, inch by inch and foot by foot, without a single sigh or even flutter, she reached the platform where her friends stood, like statues, waiting us in breathless awe.

I had only time to lift her from the bridge when she gave way in real earnest, and for a long time she lay, pale and rigid as a corpse, on the black rocks.

Whenever symptoms of recovery began to appear, her friends were very profuse in their acknowledgments. One old gentleman—the Pater-familias, I suspected—eyeing my rough shooting coat and worn leggings, began about "any remuneration I could fairly ask," fumbling, at the same time, in his pocket. I fear I consigned him rather abruptly to the tender care of a certain unmentionable personage, and in great dudgeon with what I conceived much too large a party of heartless cravens, I called old Tasso from admiring and nosing about the young girl. I had assisted, and stomping up the ladder with him in my arms, (he could never climb it, though he always got down splendidly, poor old fellow,) I reached the top. A very sweet faint voice followed me:

"Oh, sir, I wish to thank you!"

This sounded soothingly and real; but stay my hot, bashful young blood would not. I dimly remember taking off my hat, and replying, with many blushes,

"Not at all; don't mention it, I beg," and immediately I moved away.

I suppose you think the above-mentioned young lady is now Mrs. ——. It should have been so, perhaps, but it never was, or is likely to be, unless she turns up and rewards me niter this long delay. I never heard her name, or anything of her beyond this adventure at the swinging bridge; and as I am far out of the world's notice, it is very improbable that we should know more of each other now.

But let no one disbelieve on this account the simple truth of our strange meeting on Carrick-a-rede, to which I have added nothing.

THE SUNSET GLEAM.

Two strangers were introduced by the crack of a rifle.

Briggs, a lawyer, rusticating in the country, was in the forest hunting partridges, one afternoon, with decidedly ill success. Finally the sun, red in the face with overmuch shining, consoled to set, leaving Briggs to take care of himself. Just then a squirrel ran nimbly up a very tall tree, and looking saucily down, challenged our hunter in the most approved squirrel dialect:

"Fire away, Mr. Briggs, I'll risk you—you're a lawyer and no sportsman—do your prettiest, young man!"

Briggs couldn't stand that.

Raising his rifle, he touched the spring, and while the sharp crackle was dancing through the forest, down came the poor thing.

Emma was out on her palfrey taking an evening ride. That she was quite alone is no marvel, for these were peaceful rural districts, and the girl was spirited. The crackle of the rifle, multiplied by the echoes, together with a sudden sight of a hunter's shirt, quite overset the equanimity of "Jenny," her steed. Jenny danced, reared, plunged, and curveted. With a steady eye and lip compressed, the lady held her rein in a firm hand; but the animal was thoroughly frightened, and Emma was thrown.

The girl opened her eyes upon a hunter's shirt, with a man in it, a gray cap with an irregular lace under it, and a Minie rifle.

The man opened his eyes upon a dishevelled brunette, with a bleeding temple.

If Briggs's face was not handsome, his heart was, as was shown by the courtesy, gentleness, and discretion, with which he cared for the young girl. And if Emma was not so comely as the average of heroines, she was quite as brave and gentle as the best.

In the door-way of her home—the farm-house over the hill—sat a white-haired old man, talking by signs with a deaf mute by his side. It was the father of Emma, to whom Mr. Briggs resigned his charge with becoming manfulness and modesty. A noble old man. Little less than seventy years of age, and evidently shaken by the earthquakes of life, there were yet the nomistakeable marks of warmth, breadth of heart, and native greatness, which characterize Nature's chosen nobleman.

This was the introduction. Not particularly romantic, nor yet impressive in its effect upon either of the persons.

"A very good girl, I should think," mused Briggs, on his way to the village hotel; "rather interesting."

"Rough features," thought Emma, as she lay resting on the lounge; "but all the better for that I dare say. A fig for handsome men!"

A week or two wrought a change in the state of affairs. Briggs found himself deeply interested in this problem: Given, a young lady of a very quiet, unreadable exterior, to find her nature. Emma found herself wondering why the young man talked so much with her father, and so little with herself. "How his features kindle!" thought the girl. "I believe he is handsome, after all!" and the point of her cambric needle pierced the tip of her plump little finger. "Miss Roberts is positively pretty," thought Briggs, in the midst of a learned remark, addressed to the old gentleman, on the economic use of corn-stalks.

A week or two more, and Briggs had found rich veins of ore under the rather impenetrable surface of his little friend; while Emma had learned to flush at the sound of a single familiar footfall.

A little while after Emma sought her nest one night, with a fluttering bird where her heart used to be; while in his walk to his room, Alfred Briggs saw a richer beauty in moonlight and star twinkle than had ever crept into his soul before.

The aged father had been a man of enterprise. Many of his earlier years had been spent in commercial turmoil. His later resort to rural life was taken as a rest in declining strength, involving neither harrassing care nor burdensome idleness. One great burden had followed him, however, to his country home—a weigut of apprehension hanging heavily over his accumulated years. By one of those frequent accidents of property transfer, the title to a large portion of his estate had become the subject of litigation, and there was real danger that the honest gatherings of industrious years would be wrenched from him by the technicalities of legal procedure.

The blow fell at this point of our story, breaking in upon the otherwise pleasant flow of events. The old man withstood the rush of ill fortune with the iron tenacity of age, but came out of the overwhelming dismantled, as a ship comes up from the engulfing of a mountain wave. It was not that the venerable man was sordid, that this grasping of his gains was so keenly distressing—it was not for the loss of the property as property; but life-long commercial effort gives a tie between a man and his estates analogous to the patriarchal, and even the paternal. Not poets alone, but men of business as well, personify inanimate things.

Under the pressure of the wrong, the old man, finding the injustice perpetrated through keen technical pleading at the bar, became strongly impressed against the legal profession, and this impression soon ripened into ungovernable prejudice. Indeed upon this point there appeared to be an approach to derangement; and yet, coupled with such grandeur of sense in all other respects, it was hard to count it absolutely so.

Its earliest manifestations brought tears to the eyes of one of the best and most trusting of maidens, whose weeping had been lately tears of joy rising copious from deep springs of feeling in her richly loveable nature. Alfred became the object of the old man's most earnest dislike, and even of his evident hate. Under the spell of this prejudice the father annulled the heir's will.

Entreaties, reasonings, tears, were alike unavailing. Mouths, full of stolen interviews and painful uncertainties, produced no change.

Love is reckless of expedient, and Alfred renounoing the law at a dash, entered upon the career of a journalist. But the unreasoning prejudice had listened upon the person. There was no hope. To cap the climax of misery the old man, reverting to the forms of his early religious teachings, pronounced his paternal curse upon his child if she ever gave her hand to Alfred Biggs.

The die was now cast. The most dutiful of daughters could never lose the spell of that anathema, however unreasoning, and Alfred could never ask the violation of that command. The anathema would follow them to the end of life. Emma told the distressing story; one glance into the other's eye, and each was understood from the instant.

A few months thereafter the old man was stricken with sudden disease. For days death and consciousness hung in a trempulous balance. A long stupor lay upon him, broken only by fitful motions now and then. But one morning, as the sun streamed in at the eastern window, the old man opened his eyes with the dear old familiar light in them. Emma burst into tears. The lips of the father moved while his fingers closed on her hand. He had lost the power of speech. To vain he struggled to articulate; not a sound escaped. This was evidently the last flash of the setting sun, and the words which were struggling for utterance were of infinite value. In vain. Suddenly a thought lit his anxious face, and resorting to the alphabet of the fingers he gave the word "Alfred." Never was courier sent in more breathless haste; and when the lover had reached the bedside the feeble fingers moved to the words "My son." Then the old man sank into dreams, from which, after a few intervening minutes, he woke to see "the Great White Throne, and Him that sitteth thereon."

THE PRICE OF A VOTE.

Amoog the stories told of the canvassing in Paris for the seat in the French Academy, made vacant by the death of De Tocqueville, is the following by the Boston Traveler's correspondent:

A lady, one of the most beautiful women in Paris, warmly advocated Father Lacordaire's claims to the vacant seat, intending her eloquence for the ear of an eminent member of the Academy, who happened to be in the room. In conclusion, she directly appealed to him to give the friar his vote. He replied: "Georgiana, Duchess of Devonshire, the most beautiful and most intellectual woman of her day, took a most active part in the canvass for Charles James Fox. In her zeal for the eminent orator, she even went so far as to solicit in person the votes of the humblest freemen. She was of the greatest service to the Whig party; her winning beauty, her rank, and the splendor of her equipage, made her indeed an irresistible advocate. In the height of the canvass she appealed to a butcher for his vote. He said she might have it if she would allow him to kiss her. She accepted his terms. He kissed her. Fox got his vote." The advocate of Friar Lacordaire understood the apologue, and holding out her cheek to the very celebrated but very ugly academician, said: "Take your price!" The bribe was instantly taken. Finally, the Reverend Father secured his triumphant election.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

ANN WEATHERELL, daughter of John and Margaret Weatherell, was born in Durham County, in the North of England, November 2nd, 1794. Her parents were in very moderate circumstances. In the twenty-first year of her age she was converted, and joined the Wesleyan Methodist Church. From some quarter, I am not informed what, she was exposed to severe persecution. I have heard her say she had to walk five or six miles to hear preaching; but none of these things moved her. In 1816 she was married to John Robson, a former neighbor who had been absent in America for about six years. The attachment was an early one between the parties, and I am under the impression that an engagement took place before Mr. Robson came to this country. Soon after her marriage she accompanied her husband to Fayetteville, North Carolina, at which place he had resided for years, and was a successful merchant. Her change from poverty to affluence did not affect her christian character. She was an example of piety in Fayetteville for many years. Pecuniary misfortunes came over the family. Mr. Robson lost his property; but he honorably gave up all to his creditors, even to the watch he wore. He was released by them, and came to the city of Natchez in 1821. They recommenced life with three borrowed chairs for seats, one small room renting for three dollars per month, and an old goods box for a table. Mr. Robson set out in a few days, with a small pack of goods on his back, as a peddler.

This reverse no more moved Mrs. Robson than did her sudden elevation. Energy, industry and frugality, soon brought returning prosperity. Mr. R. soon became a successful merchant; then a successful planter. All these changes made no change in the christian character of Sister Robson. She learned how to abound and how to suffer want. She was kind to the poor, especially a mother to the itinerant ministry. Her house to them was always a welcome home; her hand opened to supply their wants. To her children she was exceedingly affectionate, rearing them in the fear and admonition of the Lord. Two of them already follow her godly example, and the third, we have good hope, will not remain long behind. In the latter part of her life she was subject to a nervous disorder, which sometimes deprived her of reason. In one of these attacks she died suddenly, on board a steamer, returning from the residence of her daughter, Mrs. Bass, in Madison Parish, La. This occurred on the 18th February, in the sixty-sixth year of her age. She was interred, in presence of a large company, beside her husband and several children, who had gone before her, at her late residence, Prospect Hill, Adams Co., Miss.

"There sweet be thy rest, till he bid thee arise,
To hail him in triumph descending the skies."

B. M. DRAKE, P.E.

Magnolia Springs, Miss., March, 1860.

BERNARD YOUNG, a native of Virginia, died, of typhoid pneumonia, near Wetumpka, Ala., 3d March, in the eightieth year of his age. He was a member of the M. E. Church for more than fifty years. Much of the time he was a class-leader. Father Young was a practical, energetic, persevering man. He never said or did anything without having some motive in view. Commencing life comparatively indigent, he succeeded, by industry and economy, in amassing a large fortune, demonstrating in his own experience that "the hand of the diligent maketh rich." He loved the church, her ministry, and her ordinances. A few Sabbaths before his death he knelt with his wife at the communion-table. It was a refreshing season to them, as their tears and other evidences gave abundant testimony. No one dreamed that in so short a time they would drink the wine new in their Father's kingdom. She preceded him only two days. During the latter part of his illness he was conscious of his condition; knew that he must die; did not rebel or murmur; but made all necessary arrangements in the disposition of all his worldly matters, and then calmly resigned himself to the will of God. The last night he spent on earth was devoted mostly in prayer for death. To the weeping inquiries of a young grandchild, whose destinies he had guided from a motherless infancy, he returned the answer: "I want to go—I want to go and be at rest!" Into the long desired and patiently waited for rest of the people of God he has entered, leaving a large family of children and grandchildren the rich legacy of a life whose steady, calm beam burned constantly and unflickeringly, until lost in the brighter radiance of the Sun of Righteousness.

R. M. SAUNDERS.

"And art thou gone, young bud of hope,
Before the reckless hand of time
Had withered thy sweet petals up,
And scathed that lovely brow of thine?"

KATE MILLER, daughter of the late James Miller, Esq., and Mrs. Catherine Miller, of Waterproof, died after a short illness of two days, at the residence of her mother, March 24th, aged thirteen years, two months and seven days. When about eight years old she joined the Methodist Church, since which time she has been, to all human appearance, a devoted Christian. One who knew her intimately says: "she was better read in the Scriptures than any child of her age I ever knew. I have often been astonished at her pertinent quotations, and her evident understanding of them." Though always delicate, and often much afflicted, she was remarkably sprightly, and her mind unusually well developed. Her love to her friends was most ardent, and she was among the most unselfish of human beings. About twenty minutes before she expired, she reached out her hands and said, "Pa, pa! take your little daughter home!" She then uttered a prayer of most surprising consistency and touching pathos. Her very last words were, "An humble and contrite heart, O Lord, thou wilt not despise." Her friends deeply mourn, but not without good hope. She was a beautiful specimen of early and consistent piety. May heaven sustain her much afflicted mother and sisters! She is Gone like the green leaves that freshen'd the wild wood,

Gone like the sweet songs that gladden'd our childhood,
Gone like the bubble that breaks on the stream,
Gone like those pictures which are not, but seem;
And return never more!

B. M. DRAKE.

Magoolia Springs, Miss., March, 1860.

MRS. MARGARET ANN SMITH, daughter of Bartholemew and Margaret Yogor, was born 9th November, 1842, and married M. M. Smith 28th Oct., 1858. She was a dutiful daughter, and an affectionate wife. She died of typhoid fever Feb. 23d. The day of her death she said to her husband, parents, brothers and sisters, "I am now going to die, and go to heaven. You must come—go with me. But if you cannot go now, you must come to me, that we may part no more." Thus she left the world as if going to sleep in expectation of a glorious rest.

MANSON M. SMITH, her husband, of the same disease, died on the 23d March, in peace with God and man. He was a moral young man; truthful in all his intercourse with society. He professed conversion to Christ Jesus about two years and eight months ago, and continued a Methodist of good character until his death. He was much beloved of all who knew him. No doubt he was God's instrument in the salvation of his wife.—How soon these two and their infant have met in heaven!

JOHN H. MASSEY.

WALLACE FLOWERS, youngest child of Mrs. A. Flowers, died on the 30th January last, at the residence of M. T. Fritz, in the thirteenth year of his age. Few children there are who are more filial than he was, or bade fairer to make glad the heart of a widowed mother. But thy will be done, O God; for thus hast said, "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven."

M. T. F.

MEDICAL CIRCULAR.—THE TREATMENT OF CERTAIN DISEASES.

Rheumatism (all the various forms of this complaint either inflammatory; acute, or chronic); Sciatica; Neuralgia; Lumbago; Diseases of the Kidneys and Spine, as also of the Pericardium, and Heart.

Dyspepsia, (Indigestion), all the various stages of this complaint, whether of recent or of long standing; General Debility, and Nervous Affections; Scrofula, Cutaneous Eruptions, and all diseases arising from an impure or vitiated condition of the blood and vital fluids.

DR. MORTIMORE, OF LOUISVILLE, KY.,

Whose success in the treatment and cure of the above complaints is now generally known throughout the Union, yielding to the solicitation of many who were afflicted to meet and take them under treatment in New Orleans, has, since his arrival, had a large number of patients from city and country to visit him at his rooms;

No. 9 Camp street, opposite City Hotel, N.O.,

Hereby give a notice that he will Continue his offices till the first of May next, where all who are thus afflicted can consult him, and if they desire it, avail themselves of his treatment. In all cases he further uses his own preparation of Remedies, adapting to the peculiarities of each case of each separate disease.

Dr. M.'s success, as above stated, is now generally known throughout the Union, in the fact that, aside from the various other diseases above enumerated, he has, by personal treatment, and the use of his remedies, furnished on order to Physicians and Druggists, already cured upwards of Twenty Thousand persons, who were afflicted with that painful and paralysing disease—Rheumatism—alone. These comprised cases of every existing form of the disease, from the recent inflammatory, acute form, to old chronic cases of ten, twenty and even thirty years standing, where all other remedies known had failed, as also visits to the various celebrated Springs and "Water-Cures" established, and the treatment of the most eminent physicians, both in this country and Europe, had failed to give relief, and had left many of them helpless cripples.

The statement of this last may seem incredible to some, yet those who doubt it can call or send for one of his "Medical Journals" in the columns of which will be found convincing evidence editorials from the leading presses in the country, letters and certificates from physicians of high standing, clergymen of various denominations, and other voluntary evidence from vast numbers of prominent citizens, occupying stations in every range of science and art, who have been restored by his treatment. Thousands of such letters have already been published.

Mr. M. makes no appeal to the public, or the afflicted, for patronage or favor only in the publicity of his place of business for the season, and in doing which he believes he but serves the cause of suffering humanity. Wherever he locates a office he commands a large patronage, even of those coming from a long distance—from nearly every State in the Union and from Europe central and south America and even during the past few weeks, that he has been in this city one who went from out the Union helped a cripple, have been entirely restored to the use of both limbs and feet so as to walk and visited the sights for years. Without receiving any pecuniary benefit.

For the aged and those who have already failed, or may apply during his stay in New Orleans, Dr M provides ample assistance to attend to all, and will hereafter, on call, visit at wards, Boarding-houses and private residences, those who are unable to come or be brought to his office. He discards the use of mineral, Narcotic or poisonous medicines—his own vegetable preparations principally in all his practice, believing that in these, if properly applied to treat a disease, may be found for the cure of nearly all diseas es that afflict the human family.

OFFICE AND CONSULTATION ROOMS,
No. 9 CAMP STREET NEW ORLEANS,
(Opposite City Hotel, as used before.)

February 1st, 1860.

Having a large list of patients, since my arrival to the city and finding it necessary to be in my office at all hours of the day and evening, and thus preventing me visiting many applicants at their residences, I have now associates with me Dr. M. L. LEWIS, with whom I have been intimately acquainted for a number of years; in whose judgment and skill as a practitioner of time, from personal knowledge, the most implicit confidence. We shall therefore, in future, be enabled to attend all professional calls, of visiting patients coming from a distance, as well as at hotels or city residences. Dr L. has, for a number of years past, given his special attention to the treatment of Chronic Diseases of rectal a, and probably few practitioners have been more successful in this department of medical skill and science. Those who are thus afflicted may do well to consult him.

Persons at a distance who are afflicted and cannot visit the city, can write out or have written as full and complete a statement of their case as possible, and send by mail—giving also the name of post-office, parish or county and state—and on receipt of this the case will be considered and no answer returned by mail, giving terms of treatment etc.

Apply to or address DRS. MORTIMORE & LEWIS,
No. 9 Camp street, New Orleans, La.

We shall prepare and furnish our own Remedies in all cases—Those we can send, on order by packet or express, as we may be directed, to any part of the country.

☞ We shall retain our office here until 1st of May next. fe 2m

EDUCATIONAL.

DOLBEAR'S COMMERCIAL COLLEGE, OF THE City of New Orleans, founded in 1832—Chartered by the Legislature of Louisiana, with Agricultural and Mechanical Departments—Capital Stock, $2'0,000—In the new and spacious edifice known as STORY BUILDING south east corner of Camp and Common streets, entrance on both streets, open day and evening. Faculty:—

RUFUS DOLBEAR, President.
MATHEMATICAL DEPARTMENT.
GEO. E. BLANCHET, Professor.
BOOK-KEEPING DEPARTMENT.
RUFUS DOLBEAR, Lecturer.
J. W. BLACKMAN, Professor.
ENGLISH DEPARTMENT.
HON. J. N. CARNIGAN, A.M., late Sup't Education, La; Prof. and Lecturer on Commercial Law, etc
and M. B. McCARTHY, Professor.
FRENCH DEPARTMENT.
MARC. ROUX, Professor.
DEPARTMENT FOR PENMANSHIP.
RUFUS DOLBEAR, Lecturer.
J. B. GRIFFITH Professor.
SPANISH DEPARTMENT.
MANUEL MARINA, Professor.
GERMAN DEPARTMENT.
GEO. GESNER, Professor.
LATIN AND OBEEK DEPARTMENT.
M. MARINO and G. GESNER Professors.
ITALIAN DEPARTMENT.
RHETORIC, LOGIC, AND ELOCUTION.

This is the only chartered Commercial college in the South-West, and the oldest in the United States, and has stood for

FOR MORE THAN A QUARTER OF A CENTURY

On its own merits alone.

Persons from 12 to 60 years of age, can attend to any branch they may wish.

Board can be had with the Professor, or other good families speaking English, French, Spanish or German, from $5 to $6 per week.

Catalogues with terms, opinions of the press and leading men of the nation, etc., sent to all who desire them.

N.B.—To prevent mistakes or impositions, Students intended for this College should bring this advertisement as special directions, as there are every winter temporary rooms open for a few months, all of course making wonderful pretenses and promises, and posting flaming placards to enlighten the people of New Orleans and of the South. When three or more form Clubs and enter at the same time, tuition per cent will be deducted from tuition.

☞ Citizens and strangers are invited to visit.

feb1 1y RUFUS COLBEAR, President.

SOULE'S COMMERCIAL COLLEGE, CORNER OF Camp and Common streets, entrance No. 80 Common street,—established in 1856,—open day and evening the entire year.

A full course of instruction in this institution embraces Double Entry Book-keeping, Commercial Calculation and Commercial Law, and Penmanship. Gentlemen can enter for the full course, or any branch they desire, and at any time, as there is no class system, no copying from books, and no memorizing of arbitrary rules.

Merchants, Book keepers, and young gentlemen wishing instruction, are respectfully requested to call and examine our practical forms and peculiar manner of teaching.

For catalogues containing full information, and Balance-sheet Circulars, the most magnificent work of this kind ever executed in the United States, address, GEO. SOULE, New Orleans.

FELICIANA FEMALE INSTITUTE, JACKSON, LA. The exercises of the second term of the scholastic year will commence on the first of March. Pupils entered at any time, and charged from the time of entrance.

Extensive grounds and lious es have been added to the premises.

A good library, a new and complete apparatus, a full and competent corps of teachers, comfortable and newly-furnished apartments, afford the best facilities for a thorough education.

BOARD OF TRUSTEES:

WM. H. WATKINS, D.D., President.
J. N. EVANS, Secretary.
Prof. W. H. N. McGRUDER, WM. LIPSCOMB,
JOHN W. GURLEY, esq., Col. S. M. BRYAN.
F. V. D. HAGAMAN, Esq. Rev. A. G. MILLER
Rev. JOHN C. MILLER, JOHN McKOWEN, Esq
Hon. JOHN McVEA.

6m THOS. W. BROWN, Principal

KENNER ACADEMY—A BOARDING AND DAY School for Boys and Young Men—VICTOR SOULELIER, Principal. This institution, is located in the town of Kenner, Jefferson Parish, La., about ten miles from New Orleans by railroad, and sixteen miles by river. The location is extremely delightful and pleasant. The health of the place is unsurpassed during the whole year.

The course of study is thorough, embracing the English, French Spanish, German, Latin, and Greek languages. Students can be prepared for any class in college, or for business pursuits.

The academy Year is divided into Two Sessions of Five Months each, commencing on the First of October and March, respectively. Scholars will be received at any time during the year; none for less time than one session.

For further particulars see circulars, or address Principal.

PORT GIBSON COLLEGIATE ACADEMY, FOR Young Ladies resumed its Exercises on the first monday in Jan. last. A well chosen Faculty will spare no pains or care to make this Institution a pleasant and profitable place for young Lady students.

The buildings are large, well-ventilated, and well furnished. The grounds ample and beautiful.

For information and Circulars, apply to,
Rev. B. JONES, Port Gibson, Miss.

PROFESSIONAL.

JAMES J. HUTCHINSON, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, Livingston, Alabama, will practice in Sumter and the adjoining counties. [aug4]

DR. E. D. BEACH, HAVING RESUMED THE practice of Medicine, offers his professional services to the citizens of New Orleans.

N. B.—Special attention paid to diseases of the RECTUM. PILES, FISTULA IN ANO, ETC.—Fistula in ano permanently cured without the use of the knife, cautery, pain, or confinement whatever. Office No. 6, Baronne street near Canal. ap27.

J. E. ELAM, ATTORNEY - AT - LAW, BATON Rouge.

REFERENCES—Hundorson & Collins and Chinn & Bolton, New Orleans; W. S. Pike and A. Matta, Baton Rouge.

B. D. & A. W. ROBERTS, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, Floyd, Carroll Parish, Louisiana. jal9

FUQUA & KILBOURNE, ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW, Clinton, Louisiana, practice in the Parishes of East and West Feliciana, and East Baton Rouge.

References—Payne & Harrison, Byrne, Vance & Co., W. and C. Leichford and Co., Broadwell & Haynes, and Pritchard & Flower, New Orleans. mar7-1y

W. F. WINANS. J. T. HEATH.

WINANS & HEATH, ATTORNEYS AND COUNsellors at Law, shreveport, La. Office—Market street.

Will practice in the courts of Caddo, De Soto, Bossier, Claiborne, and Bienville.

G. SPENCER MAYO, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, Harrisonburg, La., will practice in the Courts of Catahoula, Concordia, Caldwell and Franklin Parishes.

COMMISSION MERCHANTS.

W. A. BRADBWALL. A. P. HAYNES.

BROADWELL & HAYNES, COMMISSION MERchants (formerly Broadwell & Payne), No 40 Union street N. O. Having retired from business, I take great pleasure in soliciting for my former partners, BROADWELL & HAYNES, the patronage and confidence of my friends, believing their experience, capacity and means, will merit its continuance, and unable them to give general satisfaction. [jel] M. U. PAYNE.

W. S. STUART, New Orleans. DR. R. A. JAMES, Madison Parish, La.

STUART & JAMES, NO. 42 UNION STREET, New Orleans, have associated themselves together for the purpose of conducting a COTTON FACTORAGE & GENERAL COMMISSION BUSINESS; are prepared to make the usual Advances in planters, in the way of supplies, etc., and respectfully solicit patronage

B. M. LOWE & CO., COTTON FACTORS AND General Commission Merchants, No. 97 GRAVIER STREET, New Orleans. ap6

A. H. MAY & CO., COTTON FACTORS AND General Commission Merchants, No 94, Gravier street, New Orleans. ap21y

J. D. PAYNE D. W. RUTHERFORD. J. P. HARRISON WM. A. HARRISON

PAYNE & HARRISON, COMMISSION MERCHANTS No. 61 Union street, New Orleans. dec7-1y

R. L. WALKER, New Orleans. ROBT. C. HUTCHINSON Caddo Parish, La.

WALKER & HUTCHINSON, COTTON FACTORS and Commission Merchants, No. 47 Carondelet street, New Orleans. jc28

J. BOYD & CO., COTTON FACTORS, RECEIVING and Forwarding Merchants, No. 4 Union street, New Orleans.

LEONARD FASH. F. H. LAURANS.

LEONARD FASH & CO COMMISSION MERchants, and Dealers in Western Produce, 61 Magazine street, New Orleans. Oct 24.

LANE, SALTER & CO., SUCCESSORS TO LANE, MAYFIELD & Co., Cotton and Sugar Factors and General Commission Merchants, No. 79 St. Charles street, New Orleans. 1y6-1y

JOHN F. WYCHE & CO., COTTON FACTORS and Commission Merchants, No 14 Common street, New Orleans

SPALDING'S PREPARED GLUE.—SAVE THE Pieces! Mending! Issued!

☞ "A STITCH IN TIME SAVES NINE."☜

Accidents will happen, even in well-regulated families, it is very desirable to have some cheap and convenient way for repairing Furniture, Toys, Crockery, &c.

SPALDING'S PREPARED GLUE

meets all such emergencies, and no household can afford to be with out it. It is always ready and up to the sticking point. It re is no longer a necessity for dumping chairs, splintered vessels, headless dolls, and broken cradles. It is just the article for cane, shell and other ornamental work, so popular with ladies of refinement and taste

This admirable preparation is used cold, being chemically held in solution, as possessing all the valuable qualities of the best cabinet maker's Glue. It may be used in the place of mercury mucilage, being vastly more adhesive.

"USEFUL IN EVERY HOUSE."

N.B.—A Brush accompanies each Bottle. Price 25 cents.

Wholesale Depot, 48 Cedar-street, New York.

Address HENRY C. SPALDING & Co
Box No. 3,606, New York.

Put up for Dealers in Cases containing four, eight, and twelve dozen—a beautiful Lithographic Show-Card accompanying each package.

☞ A single bottle of SPALDING'S PREPARED GLUE will save ten times its cost annually to every household.☜

Sold by all prominent Stationers, Druggists, Hardware and Furniture Dealers, Grocers, and Fancy Stores

Country merchants should make a note of SPALDING'S PREPARED GLUE, when making up their list. It will stand any climate jan 25 1y

SINGER'S SEWING MACHINES.—THESE MAchines have recent and great improvements for Fine Sewing, and their sale is now very rapidly increasing. They are used in preference to all others at the largest and most fashionable dressmaking establishments in New Orleans, also at all the large Hotels and principal boarding-houses, and in hundreds of private families, and give universal satisfaction.

They are sold, if desired, on a trial, with any and all other Sewing Machines.

WALTER BENNETT, Agent
33 Camp street.

PHOENIX HOTEL, COLUMBUS, MISS., J. F. ARNOLD, Proprietor. Give us a call, and I'll see that "none go away dissatisfied."

MISCELLANEOUS.

NEW CARPETING.—J. D. DAMERON & CO., 141 Canal Street have received a large and choice assortment of English Velvet and Tapestry CARPETING, of the celebrated manufacture of Crossly and Sons, and others.

Bigelow Brussels and Wilton's—New Patterns.
Three-Ply and Ingrains, of the best makers.
Rugs, Baizes, Floor Mats, etc.

CURTAIN MATERIAL.—We would call attention to our extensive stock of all descriptions of Brocatelle Satin de Laine and Worsted Curtain Material, Lace and Muslin Curtains, Table and Piano Covers, Cords, Trimmings, etc.

WINDOW SHADES AND CORNICES.—In this branch of our business, great pains is taken to get up the Newest Styles, and our stock has no superior.

OIL CLOTHS.—3 feet

NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY A COMMITTEE OF MINISTERS FOR THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH SOUTH----C. C. GILLESPIE, EDITOR.

VOLUME X.—NUMBER 16.
WHOLE NUMBER 479

NEW ORLEANS, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 18, 1860.

$3.00 A YEAR, IN ADVANCE
OFFICE—115 CAMP ST.

LETTERS FROM CUBA.—NO. II.

Havana, March 12th, 1860.

In my last letter I left the "Bandel" anchored in the Bay of Havana in 7 fathoms water, waiting to be visited by the captain of the port. Of course no one could land until this visitation was made, and I employed myself in looking at the shipping in the harbur. It would be difficult to give a stranger any adequate idea of this beautiful bay. The entrance is very narrow—about two hundred yards wide; but the bay gradually enlarges until it forms a basin capable of anchoring an immense number of vessels. At the present time there are more than two hundred vessels at the wharves and in the stream, and three times as many could find convenient anchorage. Castle Morro, built of stone upon a point making out into the sea, commands the entrance to the bay. It is a formidable fortress, I should think unequalled anywhere, as it would be impossible to take it by storm from either land or sea. The walls are about 60 feet above the sea and the streets of the city. From the harbor Havana presents a very gay appearance. The houses are built of stone, two or three stories high, on the water side, and painted all colors, green, blue, yellow and white. In some instances these colors are to be seen in the same house, mingled in picturesque order.

The next feature that attracts attention is the great number of boats, covered over with canvas at the stern, carrying passengers from place to place in the bay. I am told that there are 1500 of these boats, and that they pay about $15 per annum for the privilege of conveying passengers. All the American steamers are required to anchor on the opposite side of the bay from the city, and if any communication is had, it must be through these watermen. From daylight until midnight these boats are plying to and fro, propelled by oars, or a single sail. Thirty vessels of the Spanish navy are anchored in the bay, of all sizes from the 74 gun ship to the smallest craft. Some of these men-of-war are dangerous looking fellows, with the noses of the iron dogs peering from the port-holes. To-day one of the steamships of the line left the harbor, it is said for Mexico.

Five o'clock comes, and the shrill whistle of a steamer announces the coming of the captain of the port. The little steamer puddles alongside; the captain draws his papers, and business commences. How many tons? where from? when did you leave? what have you on board? any passengers, supercargo, etc.? Whilst these questions were being answered, another official came alongside in a boat manned by ten men, with the Spanish government flag at the stern. I seemed to be an object of interest to these fellows, who commenced eyeing me as curiously as if they had never seen a white man before. Various conjectures were entertained as to my position in the vessel, which were finally silenced by the officer who had gotten aboard, who informed his companions that I was an "Americano," and "sobrecargo" of the vessel. Lest your readers may not distinctly understand the real value of this dignity, let me state in the first place that a foreigner must obtain a passport where he embarks; for this passport he is permitted to pay four or five dollars. On arrival here the passport must be supervised, which costs as much more. If he passes beyond the city limits he must obtain a permit, for which he is allowed to pay ten or twelve dollars, and thus he is taxed at every step of his progress. Every vessel, however, is allowed to have a "supercargo," who is sometimes master of the vessel and sometimes merely an agent, to buy a cargo or transact any other business appertaining to the vessel. In my case, my name was entered on the articles of the schooner with the privilege of going and coming whenever and wherever I pleased, without the cost of passports, etc. This was a considerable relief to me, although the officers are by no means so strict in the island as the laws require them to be.

The captain of the port having pronounced the schooner's papers "all right," the inspector takes a look or two, moves towards his boat, the captain lowers his, and he and I are rowed to the shore. Here the Babel begins. The mingling of voices, old and young, creoles, negroes, and Spaniards; some of them making ineffectual attempts to talk English, and every possible gesticulation of hand and head, cause a stranger no little bewilderment at the outset. And here let me say that the language called Spanish, and taught in the books, is by no means the language you hear spoken in Cuba. You may be able to read a Spanish book, and even familiar with the pronunciation of the pure Castilian, but it does not therefore follow that you can make yourself intelligible to this mongrel population. They have a dialect of their own, which is certainly not unpleasant to the ear, but differs in many points from the real Spanish. Perhaps this is true more or less of all languages; the written being more precise, exact, and polished, than the spoken tongue. Foreigners meet with this difficulty, doubtless, in our own country; the occurrence of provincialisms, cant phrases, and ungrammatical expressions, is calculated to bewilder any one. But here you are not to expect to find literary men, for the heaviest possible embargo is laid upon knowledge. Of this more anon.

Here is a veritable volante—the strangest of all possible means of locomotion. Two wheels, five or six feet in height, with a sort of gig placed two feet in front of the axle-tree, and shafts from ten to twelve feet in length, fastened to the saddle of the horse. An immense saddle upon which a negro rides, having his legs cased in boots that swallow up his thighs and yet leave his feet perfectly naked; the whole concern occupying about as much space as two American buggies, and I suppose much heavier than two ordinary buggies. Such is a rough draft of a Cuban volante. To describe the ludicrous appearance of these things is altogether out of my power. I can only wonder how one poor little horse can carry such a load of wood and iron, two passengers, and a rider into the bargain. Yet they do it, and carry them all from daylight to midnight, in a brisk trot always, and sometimes in a gallop. I am sure an American horse could never stand the usage which these poor brutes endure. And yet they are universally small. I have not seen in Havana—and at this present writing I have been all over the city repeatedly—a single native horse above the size of an American pony, or full grown mule. Now and then I notice a fine looking charger in an American buggy (I have seen three or four such), and a good looking horse in an English carriage; but there is as much foreign air about the horses as their drivers, and I am told the Cubans resist all attempts to improve the breed from the American stock. Possibly it would be no improvement; not in the days of the volante at least.

Next to the volante, one is compelled to laugh at the drays and ox-carts. I think it likely that the pattern of these has come down from the days of Cortez and Pizarro. The wheels of the dray are as much too small as those of the volante are too large, and the mules which draw them small specimens of muledom, carry on their backs an unaccountable quantity of canvas rolled up into a sort of pack, surmounted by a saddle, the whole making a bundle nearly half as large as the mule towering above the creature's back. The common ox-cart, the reader has seen in the American carry-log, used for conveying heavy timber. The oxen are fastened to this by a yoke or band passed around the head, not the neck, a rope being passed through the nostrils of the ox to secure his docility, I suppose. These oxen are the only fine animals I have seen in Havana, and truly they are noble beasts. Two of them will draw one of these ponderous carts, a load in itself, and three hogsheads of sugar, with apparent ease. Upon the whole, excepting the oxen,—and I have seen nothing equal to them in the United States—so far as locomotion is concerned, we have nothing to learn from Cuba; no improvements at least.

The first building that strikes the eye, on entering the city from the lower bay, is the palace of the Captain General. "Palacio de Gobierno," in the rear of the "Plaza de Armas." This is a large building, very much resembling some of our American hotels, by no means so imposing a structure as I expected to see, however.—The main entrance is guarded by two Spanish soldiers in full dress uniform, and just as I was passing to an American hotel, the first afternoon of my arrival, I got a view of His Excellency himself, "Don Francisco Serrano y Domingo z. Conde de San Antonio." He is an elderly man of not very prepossessing appearance, but my view was a very hasty one, as he passed in his carriage through the palace gate, between a line of soldiers, who presented arms, and gave him a blast of bugles as he entered. The plaza in front of the palace is a beautiful square, adorned with evergreen trees, paved with stones, and has several royal palm trees in the centre. Here, every evening, the people have a grand promenade, marching around the square, whilst the brass band discourses something they call music, and the volantes rattle an accompaniment on the pavements.—My first evening in the city was spent in sight-seeing, of course. I had been "confined, cabined, and confined," for nine days on a vessel, and the liberty of walking about was too precious to be unimproved; so I determined to take a half-hour's walk before tea, which in the end proved to be a much longer stroll than I had bargained for. Having no way-marks whatever, and trusting to my memory in turning corners, I walked on; but I soon found that I should be fully employed in keeping out of the way of the abominable volantes, for they rushed by in continuous procession, and the throng of comers and goers was so great, that I felt some apprehension for my limbs. The side-walks, so-called in courtesy, are, on an average, about two feet wide, never designed for ladies to walk on, even in ante-crinoline days; and the streets not more than twelve, and these thundering volantes come scraping along the pavements, with their wheels in frightful proximity to the heads of wayfaring men. So, with the crowd, twisting and squirming, the volante drivers yelling, and the general confusion of the streets, I began to realize the unpleasant truth that I was lost. I had forgotten the name of the street on which the hotel was, and only remembered that it was not very far from the Cathedral. I was rather distrustful of my Spanish, and for two hours tried to solve the problem myself by keeping on the move. At last, however, seeing nothing that looked like America, and fearing that matters might grow worse, I entered a store, and ventured to inquire my way. A gentlemanly clerk put me on the track, and in a few minutes I was at home, where I heard my own English tongue again, and where I was quite willing to rest myself. When I speak of being at home, let not the reader imagine that I mean to say that I was in as good a place as the meanest of American hotels—I only intend to say that any port will do in a storm; any sort of home is better than none in a foreign city. The practice here is to give you the least possible accommodation, and charge you the highest possible prices. Three dollars a day with good fare, might be endured, but to get but little to eat, and to sleep on a cot; to have servants that serve you not, and dishes that resist all attempts at an intimate acquaintance—these are great evils. Nevertheless, tired and sleepy, I retired to a pen in the third story, found a copy of Harper's Magazine, read a little in the "Drawer," took a look through my window at Castle Moro, and laid down to rest, thankful to the Giver of all good for my safe passage across the waters. Notwithstanding the zealous labors of a bugle-blower in a neighboring house, who was practising for a forthcoming serenade, and to whose credit I will record that he made about as much noise as I suppose possible for one pair of lungs, I was soon asleep, and dreaming of castles, and fountains, and statues, and volantes, all moving in solemn procession to the sound of the bugle.

On Saturday morning I awoke, much refreshed, and my friend of the bugle blowed me a salute, a grand peroration, as I prepared for breakfast, which was served at nine o'clock. A good cup of coffee, which they know how to make here, made me think better of the house and its landlord; so paying my fare, I commenced my pedestrian exercises again. From the Plaza de Armas, I walked up Calle del Obispo, or Bishop street, one of the prominent thoroughfares of Havana. The manner of doing business, in all departments, is peculiar to this city. There is none of that bustle and hurry in the stores which we see at home. Indeed, if it were not for the enormous profits realized, we may wonder how so many merchants manage to live. If a lady wishes to buy a dress, the Senora does not walk around the corner and stand at the counter—not she. But she has the volante rigged up, and takes a drive up one street, and down another, for inasmuch as two volantes must not meet in most of the streets, for the very good reason that they cannot pass each other, there are laws prescribed, which regulate the turning points for these vehicles. Arrived at the store, Madam does not think of alighting from her volante, but the goods must be brought out for her inspection. She sits and looks, and jaws the clerk until the price is agreed on, and the great event of the day transpires—a king's purchase. Tired of walking, I took a seat in the door-way of a tobacconist, and watched one of these negotiations. The article examined was a piece of muslin, for which the merchant demanded "tres pesos fuertes," three dollars (strong) per yard.—Senora could not give so much as that—it was only worth "tres reals fuertes," 37 1-2 cents. Here was a wide difference, nearly as great as that existing between Louis Napoleon and the Pope on the Italian question, and I doubted whether the "high contracting parties" would effect a compromise. However, be of the shop consented, after a long disquisition on muslins, and that piece in particular, to abate one peso a yard, and she of the volante rose one real in her estimate of its value.—At this stage of the game, the clerk holding at two dollars, and she offering fifty cents, there was a movement in the volante indicative of a determination to look elsewhere, and the clerk stepped towards the door with his goods—but this was only a feint on both sides.—Senora wanted to buy, and Senor the clerk wanted to sell—so both parties returned to the charge, the clerk falling four reals, and she rising two, and thus they quibbled until finally the clerk surrendered at one dollar per yard, vowing that it was the cheapest bargain in Havana, and the lady protesting that she could buy it at "la Gran Senora's" for 75 cents. This is shopping in Havana, at least the specimens I have seen of it are all like this. The muslin in question would be sold in most of our cities for thirty cents.

The dwelling houses in Havana are built of a soft stone, which is hewn with an axe, and the walls are covered with a cement, which renders them hard as granite. Most of these houses are only one story high, the exceptions being the residences of the Spanish grandees.—They have no window-glass in the windows, which rise from the floor to the ceiling fifteen or twenty feet, and are made semi-circular, enclosed with iron rods running length-wise. Inside of these bars are the shutters, heavy massive concerns, like the folds of a dungeon door, and having generally smaller divisions, which allow the insiders to look out into the street without being seen themselves. The main entrance is a door eight or ten feet wide, and twelve or fifteen feet in height, barred, bolted, ribbed and crossed with a multitudes of bolts, according in appearance with the ability of the owner.—The first object inside of the door, is the indispensable volante, burnished and bright for the afternoon drive, and in three or four feet from this vehicle is the drawing-room or parlor. It looks exceedingly queer to a foreigner to see a lady drawn in her carriage through her street door to her parlor, but so it is. The horses are kept somewhere in the court-yard, under the same roof with their master. In the matter of furniture, you will see nothing very beautiful, but everything is very costly. A dozen or two of chairs, old-fashioned in style, an ottoman, a settee or lounge, a few rocking-chairs, and a centre-table, sometimes a few family portraits hung around the wall, and here and there some paintings of "the masters;" these are the principal articles I have noticed in their parlors. Notwithstanding the meagre appearance of many of their residences, there seems to be an air of quiet comfort, of lazy indifference, enjoyed by the occupants. The rage for pianos has not yet reached Cuba. One can hardly walk through an American city without hearing the thrumming of scores of fingers on these behindered instruments. I have seen but few here, and they are neither large nor sweet-toned, if I am any judge in such matters. The Spanish caballero with his guitar, and evening serenade, I think would be a nuisance in Havana. The people are not fond of music, unless they fancy the car-splitting strains of my bugle-blowing friend, for of this they have enough. In every castle, fort, and square, in the evening, these horrible bugles are shrieking, and always on the same piece—I suppose a national chant, I know not what else it can be.

But this letter is sufficiently long. Adios.

W. P. HARRISON.

METHODIST PULPIT, SOUTH.

A book of Sermons, bearing the above title, has recently been published by William T. Smithson, of Washington city, D.C. It comprises some twenty-five gospel sermons, accompanied with twenty-five beautiful likenesses of living preachers of the Gospel, embodied in a neat and elegantly-bound volume.

Having read the sermons, seriatim, we feel prepared to say, that whilst all of them are worthy of a place in this "repository of Gospel truth," there are some of them which possess surpassing beauty and excellence. The sermon by Professor Cross, D.D., upon "Labor and Rest," breathes in its tenor the spirit of the Gospel of Christ; and seems to have been composed by its author in full view of a "chariot of fire."

The sermon by C. B. Parsons, D.D., upon "The Divinity of the Church," leaves the mind of the reader most deeply impressed with the grandeur and sublimity of the subject, as well as the power and majesty of intellect which have been evinced in its development and illustration.

The sermon by Bishop Soule, upon "The perfect law of Liberty," while it exhibits some points of doctrine which are new to the writer, is alike worthy of its eminent and distinguished author, and of the interesting subject upon which it was delivered. Having read this soul-cheering exposition of "the perfect law of liberty," we turn with reverence and delight to look upon the majestic form and features, and heaven-illuminated countenance of this "aged disciple of the Lord." Remarkable and illustrious man of God! Heaven has graciously lengthened out your days till a second, a third, and a fourth generation have risen up to reverence and bless you, and to adore Him who, in his goodness, hath blessed his people in their dark pilgrimage on earth with your life, and your labors, and the Gospel ministry with the light of your example. Having now reached that period of life when "ripe years yield their full perfection," may you yet live many days to see your "work of faith and labor of love" prosper, and enjoy, in some measure, on earth, the rich fruits of a well-spent life, and at last "receive the crown of righteousness which the Lord, the righteous Judge, will give unto you at that day, and not unto you only, but unto all them also who love his appearing."

We have read, and re-read, with increased delight and admiration, the sermon of L. Pierce, D.D., upon "Paul's Commission to Preach." This, in our imperfect judgment, is, in some of its features, not only the superior sermon of the compilation, but superior in some respects to any we remember to have read. In that part (the introductory part) of the sermon in which St. Paul's commission simply is considered, there is a process of analysis and of cogent reasoning worthy of a Calhoun, and not surpassed by anything of a forensic, judicial, or theological character with which we have any acquaintance; and to the mind of every one not mentally disabled to judge, by an incautious surrender of principle to creed, conviction, irresistible conviction must follow every proposition and every conclusion of this "master in Israel." In that part of the sermon in which St. Paul's preaching is discussed, there is, at once, a beauty and perspicuity of division and arrangement of the subject which flashes the conviction upon the mind of the reader, that the work which is about to be performed has been laid out and arranged by the hand of a "master workman," and that the entire subject, in all its parts, viz.: "the matter, the manner, and the extent of Paul's preaching," is to be duly and properly considered. And this conviction is fully and triumphantly sustained by the result. As a sermon, finished, perfect in all its parts, linked and joined together by the most consummate logic, in which "a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, has rightly divided the Word of Truth," and that too, upon a subject on which the prevalence of sound and enlightened views is of vital importance to the repose of society and the "peace of Zion," the sermon of Dr. Pierce must be regarded as a model sermon.

The discourse by H. N. McTyeire, D.D., on "the Intermediate State," embodies, in a most pleasing and delightful form, the teachings of Revelation upon a subject of great interest to all who are accustomed to extend their thoughts beyond the grave, viz., "the state of the soul between death and the final judgment." The erroneous views prevalent upon this subject, viz., "that it is an unconscious state, and that it is an eternal state," have been noticed by the author, and refuted; and the true and correct view stated and fully sustained, viz., "that the state of the soul between death and the final judgment, is a conscious interval which all must pass through, except those found on the earth at the second coming of Christ." Death, then, is but a change in the mode and place of our being, and its triumphs over the joys of earth but short. Though myriads of ages should intervene between death and the final judgment, but a brief period is to intervene between the separation and the re-union of those who have lived and loved together on earth. A re-union is speedily to take place, where life in its fulness shall still go on—where the blessedness of our being shall no more be disturbed by the vicissitudes of earth, and

> "Flesh and sin no more control
> The sacred pleasures of the soul."

Dear departed kindred and friends; dear objects of our fondest affections, of our hopes and joys, and our sorrows, we shall soon embrace you again. We are coming, we are coming! We look forward but a little, when the noise, the business and the tumult of this world shall have ended with us, as they have already ended with you for ever, when we shall close our eyes upon earth and upon the abodes of men, and waking up in a moment, with full consciousness of life and immortality, shall look upon you with unobstructed vision, safely housed in the abodes of the blessed above, and upon the wings of undying love come to you and there embrace you once more and for ever; "and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain, for the former things are passed away." Thanks be to God!

We close this communication with a brief notice of the sermon or essay of President Thwentt, upon "the Holy Scriptures." This essay is not only worthy of its place in this volume of divine truth, but also in every theological study, and in every library wherever the Bible has a place. The division and arrangement of the subject will satisfy the reader of the broad, enlightened and comprehensive views of the author. The subject has been discussed, illustrated and enriched by the learned author, with much biblical and classical learning, under the following divisions and arrangement:—The term Scriptures; a brief history of the Scriptures; the character of the Scriptures; contents of the Scriptures; inspiration of the Scriptures; arguments for their truth; guilt of neglecting them; man's condition without them; their final triumph; the reading, study, practice, &c., recommended and urged.

With all our heart, and our best judgment, we earnestly commend this "Pulpit South" to the favorable consideration of the reading public, both North and South.

J. H. M.

St. Charles Hotel, March, 1860.

DIES IRÆ.

The "Dies Irae" is perhaps better known than anything else within the whole range of mediæval literature. Its author was probably Thomas of Celano, a small town near the lake Fucino. The grand and terrible effect with which in Goethe's Faust certain stanzas of this poem are made to fall like thunder on the ear of poor guilty Margaret, who has come, alone and friendless, among worshippers purer than herself, is familiar to almost every one.

The translation now offered was written under the impression that all existing English versions deviated more or less from the metre of the original. This impression was not quite correct. There is a version by Dr. Noris, with which, however, the present translator is unacquainted, which is metrically faithful. It is with no desire to compete with this, but from a conviction that where the end to be attained is so high, every conscientious effort has its value, that the following attempt is published.

Day of anger, day of wonder,
When the world shall roll asunder,
Quenched in fire and smoke and thunder!

O vast terror, wild heart-rending
Of that hour when earth is ending,
And her jealous Judge descending;

When the trumpet's voice astounded,
Through earth's sepulchres resounded,
Summons universal soundeth!

Death astonished, Nature shaken,—
Sees all creatures, as they waken,
To that dire tribunal taken.

Lo! the Book, where all is hoarded,
Not a word unrecorded:
Every doom is thence awarded.

So the Judge, when he arraigneth,
Every hidden thing explaineth:
Nothing unavenged remaineth.

In that fiery revelation
Where shall I make supplication,
When the just hath scarce salvation?

Fount of Love, dread King supernal,
Freely giving life eternal,
Save me from the paths infernal!

This forget not, sweet Life-giver,
Me thou earnest to deliver:
Cast me not away for ever!

Seeking me thy soul life lasted,
On the cross death's pains were tasted;
Let not toil like this be wasted!

God of righteous retribution,
Grant my sins full absolution,
Ere thy wrath's last execution!

Lo, I stand with face suffused,
Blushing, in my guilt self-veil'd:
Spare my soul, with sorrow bruised!

By the Magdalene forgiven,
By the dying robber shriven,
I too cherish hope of heaven.

Though my prayers are full of failing,
Save me, of Thy grace availing,
From the pit of endless wailing!

On thy right a place provide me,
With thy chosen sheep beside me:
From the goats, good Lord, divide me!

When to penal fire are driven
Those who would not be forgiven,
Call me with thy saints to heaven.

Kneeling, crushed in heart-before thee,
Sad and suppliant I adore thee:
Hear me, save me, I implore thee!

P. S. WORSLEY.

—Blackwood's Magazine.

ABOLISHING CASTE.

One of the most important services accomplished by the late Bishop Wilson of Calcutta was the abolition of caste in the churches of his diocese. The manner in which this was effected is a striking illustration of what may be done by decision, energy, and Christian kindness, in overcoming social prejudices and great practical difficulties. We have already remarked in noticing his memoir, that Bishop Wilson sufficiently magnified his office, and was sometimes arbitrary in the administration of his diocese; but he had so much practical good sense and genuine Christian feeling, that his very self-will was often an instrument of good.

When Bishop Wilson entered upon his office, the question of caste was already perplexing and dividing the churches. No vigorous attempt to abolish caste had yet been made within the diocese. The year before his consecration one hundred and sixty-eight native converts had apostatized through the influence of caste dragging them back into heathenism. Some of the missionaries were greatly troubled as to their duty with regard to this evil, but few had the courage or the skill requisite to grapple with it in the churches. In 1833, Bishop Wilson addressed a letter to the clergy of his diocese, in which after setting forth the evils of tolerating Caste in the Church of Christ, he uttered the Episcopal mandate in these emphatic words:

"The distinction of castes, then, must be abandoned, decidedly, immediately, finally; and those who profess to belong to Christ must give this proof of their having really put off, concerning the former conversation, the old man, and having put on the new man in Christ Jesus. The Gospel recognizes no distinctions such as those of castes, imposed by a heathen usage, bearing, in some respects, a supposed religious obligation; condemning those in the lower ranks to perpetual debasement; placing an immovable barrier against all general advance and improvement in society; cutting asunder the bonds of human fellowship on the one hand, and preventing those of Christian love on the other. Such distinctions, I say, the Gospel does not recognize. On the contrary, it teaches us that God 'hath made of one blood all the nations of men;' it teaches us that whilst the 'princes of the Gentiles exercise dominion over them, and they that are great exercise authority upon them,' it must not be so amongst the followers of Christ; but that 'whosoever will be great amongst them, is to be their minister; and whosoever will be chief among them, is to be their servant, even as the Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many.'

"The decision of the apostles is, accordingly, most express: 'There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female; for ye are all one in Christ Jesus.' For if the strong separation between the holy nation and the Gentiles, which was imposed by God himself, and had subsisted from the first legation of Moses, was abolished, and the wall of division dug down, and all the world placed on one common footing under the Gospel, how much more are heathen subdivisions, arising from the darkness of an unconverted and idolatrous state, and connected in so many ways with the memorials of polytheism, to be abolished."

Many pleas were urged to induce the Bishop to modify his position, but the was inflexible. Two years later the Bishop himself resolved upon a course of practical efforts to abolish the distinction of caste in his own churches. The movement began at Trichinopoly in 1835. The Bishop was then upon his first visitation.—He had observed that in the congregation the Sudras, of the higher caste, kept themselves aloof from the Parialis, of a lower caste, and he knew also that Sudras had refused to commune with Parialis. He did not expect at once to conquer prejudices so deep and strong, but he resolved to break down the distinction practically, by his own example. Says his biographer:

"Thus a nucleus might be formed, round which others might gather from time to time, and to which all new converts might be added. If this nucleus could be formed in each station, and arranged upon the basis of the Bishop's directions, then time, patience, and watchfulness, by God's grace, would do the rest. This therefore was the Bishop's purpose; and to accomplish it, notice was given of divine service and the administration of the Lord's Supper, for the very morning of his departure. All seemed impressed with the importance of the occasion, and the church was thronged. When the Bishop, in his robes, left the vestry in order to proceed to his seat at the communion-table and commence the service, he saw many scattered groups of natives standing apart from the main body of the congregation, who were seated on the floor. Fully aware of the cause, he joined one group, and, taking two native Christians by the hand, he gently led them forward to a vacant place in front, and seated them. His chaplain, following in the surplice, by his directions, did the same. Others who were present were bid to assist. It was all done quietly and kindly, and no sort of resistance was made. The Soudra sat by the Pariah, and the Pariah by the Soudra, and both were intentionally intermingled with many of the authorities and influential Europeans of the station. When all was quiet the service commenced, and in the course of it forty natives came up, without distinction, and were confirmed. Then followed the sermon, from the words, 'Preaching peace by Jesus Christ.' When the Holy Sacrament was about to be celebrated, the Bishop quietly gave directions as to the mode of administration. A Soodra catechist received it first, then two Pariah catechists, then a European gentleman, then a Soodra, then some East Indians. The gentry of the station, having been much interested in the matter, had placed themselves at the Bishop's disposal; and, at the special request of a lady of the highest rank, a Pariah knelt and communicated between her and her husband. This facilitated the arrangement; and silently, but most effectually, the barrier which had existed for so long a time was broken down, and I47 partook of the Lord's Supper, without distinction. A precedent was thus set. This was the nucleus of the native church of the future."

AGES OF LIVING AUTHORS.

The Boston Transcript corrects from Once a Week a list of the ages of English authors, and adds a similar list of the ages of American authors. The following is the complete list as prepared by the Transcript:

ENGLISH.

James Hannay, 33; Julia Kavannugh, 36; Matthew Arnold, 37; Florence Nightingale, 37; Rev. C. Kingsley, 46; Captain Mayne Read, 42; G. H. Lewes, 43; Tom Taylor, 43; Shirley Brooks, 44; Albert Smith, 44; William Howard Russell, 44; Prof. Aytoun, 47; R. Browning, 48; C. Mackay, 48; C. Dickens, 48; W. M. Thackeray, 49; A. Tennyson, 50; Fanny Kemble, 49; Mark Lemon, 51; Edward Mimll, 51; R. M. Milnes, 51; W. E. Gladstone, 51; Hon. Mrs. Norton, 52; Charles Lever, 54; Professor Maurice, 55; Sir E. Bulwer Lytton, 55; Benjamin Disraeli, 55; Harrison Ainsworth, 55; Mary Howitt, 56; Harriet Martineau, 58; Mrs. Gore, 60; S. C. Hall, 60; Mrs. Marsh, 61; Barry Cornwall, 61; Samuel Lover, 62; Albany Fonblanque, 63; Rev. G. Gleig, 64; T. Carlyle, 65; W. Howitt, 65; Sir John Bowring, 68; Sir Archibald Alison, 68; Rev. H. H. Milman, 69; J. P. Collier, 71; Frances Trollope, 73; W. J. Fox, 74; Sir W. Napier, 75; Rev. Dr. Croly, 80; Lord Brougham, 82; Walter Savage Landor, 85; Gerald Massey, 32; Miss Mulock, 34; William Wilkie Collins, 36; Sidney Dobell, 36; James Grant, 38; Wm. Hepworth Dixon, 39; Eliza Cook, 42; Francis Brown, 44; Philip J. Bailey, 44; Adrian Domett, 45; George Gulliam, 47; John Forster, 48; Elizabeth B. Browning, 50; Mary Cowden Clarke, 51; Richard C. Trench, 53; Charles Swain, 57; Dr. Mac Bond, 58; Robert Chambers, 59; G. P. R. James, 60; Henry G. Bohn, 60; John Kemble, 60; Joan Maynne, 61; Charles Lyell, 63; Alexander Dyce, 63; T. C. Grattan, 64; George Grote, 66; Michael Faraday, 66; John Clare, 67; Frances B. Head, 67; Lord Mahon, 78; David Brewster, 76.

AMERICAN.

Paul H. Hayne and William Croswell Doane, 28; Mary A. Denison, 33; Frank B. Goodrich, 34, Richard H. Stoddard, William Allen Butler, Bayard Taylor, F. S. King, Charles G. Leland, and Winthrop Sargent, 35; William W. Caldwell, Francis Parkman, Thomas William Curtis, 36; Alice Carey, William R. Alger, Donald G. Mitchell, and A. J. H. Duganne, 37; Samuel Eliot, Edward Everett Hale, and T. B. Read, 38; Charles H. Brigham, Julia Ward Howe, Thomas W. Pearsall, C. A. Bristed, and Herman Melville, 40; William E. Channing, jr., Henry Giles, Mrs. E. D. E. N. Southworth, Elizabeth F. Ellet, Frederic D. Huntington, Frederic S. Cozzens, William W. Story, James Russell Lowell, and E. P. Whipple, 41; A. Cleveland Coxe and J. T. Fields, 42; E. A. Duyckinck and Parke Goodwin, 43; John G. Saxe and Epes Sargent, 44; George E. Ellis and R. H. Dana, jr., 45; J. T. Headley, C. A. Bartol, W. H. C. Hosmer, Henry T. Tuckerman, Henry N. Hudson, Henry Ward Beecher, Henry W. Bellows, and E. H. Chapin, 46; Charles T. Brooks, Caroline M. Sawyer, Christopher R. Crauch, and John S. Dwight, 47; Ralph Hoyt, Harriet Beecher Stowe, Richard Frothingham, jr., Theodore Parker, Jones Very, William H. Burleigh, Samuel Osgood, 48; George W. Greene, Charles Sumner, Horace Greeley, Andrew P. Peabody, Elihu Burritt, Henry Barnard, and Alfred H. Street, 49; James Freeman Clarke, Isaac M'Lellan, Asa Grey, and Oliver Wendell Holmes, 50; George S. Hillard, Park Benjamin, T. S. Arthur, Albert Pike, Robert C. Winthrop, and B. K. Curtis, 51; Theodore S. Fay, Nathaniel P. Willis, John G. Whittier, Louis Agassiz, C. G. Felton, and H. W. Longfellow, 52; A. D. Bache, Richard Hildreth, and George B. Cheever, 53; Wm. G. Simms, George Lunt, M. F. Maury, and Frederick H. Hedge, 54; George W. Bethune, Nathaniel Hawthorne, John L. Stevens, J. S. C. Abbott, Charles T. Jackson, and J. R. Bartlett, 55; Horace Bushnell, and George D. Prentice, 56; George H. Calvert, Jacob Abbott, O. A. Brownson, Wm. H. Furness, and Ralph Waldo Emerson, 57; George Folsom, George P. Morris, Chas. D. Cleveland, Louisa J. Hall, Mark Hopkins, Louisa C. Tuthill, Albert G. Greene, E. S. Gannett, Lydia Maria Child, and Leonard Bacon, 58; Wm. H. Seward, Francis Bowen, Catherine E. Beecher, and Geo. P. Marsh, 59; Stephen H. Tyng, Francis Lieber, Geo. Bancroft, and Caleb Cushing, 60; Albert Barnes, L. P. Hickock, S. G. Drake, and Francis L. Hawks, 62; Charles Anthon, George B. Emerson, 63; S. G. Goodrich, Sarah J. Hale, and John G Palfrey, 64; John P. Kennedy, Fitz Green Halleck, Wm. B. Sprague, Wm. Cullin Bryant, Orville Dewey, Edward Everett, and James Walker, 65; John Neal, Caroline Gilman, Edward Robinson, and Jared Sparks, 66; Henry C. Carey, Henry R. Schoolcraft, Edward Hitchcock, and N. L. Frothingham, 67; John Henry Hopkins, George Tickner, and Charles Sprague, 68; Chauncey A. Goodrich, and Mrs. Sigourney, 69; Joel Hawes, Joseph B. Felt, and John W. Francis, 71; Jacob Bigelow, L. M. Sargent, and R. H. Dana, 73; John Pierpont, 75; Gulian C. Verplanck, and Lewis Cass, 77; Joseph T. Buckingham, 80; Lyman Beecher, 84; Eliphalet Nott, 87; Josiah Quincy, 88.

The Transcript also gives the ages of several French and other writers of continental Europe, whose works are translated into English and enjoy a popularity on this side of the Atlantic:

Louis Blanc, 47; Kossuth, 54; George Sand, 55; Alexander Dumas, 57; Victor Hugo, 58; Emile De Girardin, 58; M. A. Thiers, 63; A. de Lamartine, 68; Victor Cousin, 69; Francois P. G. Guizot, 73.

HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW.

Professor Henry Wadsworth Longfellow was born at Portland, Maine, on the twenty-seventh of February, 1807. He is the son of the Hon. Stephen Longfellow of that city. In his fifteenth year he entered Bowdoin College, Brunswick, at which College he graduated with high honors in 1825. While at college he contributed various pieces of verse to the United States Literary Gazette. He was intended for the study of the law, and spent some time in his father's office for that purpose; but a professorship of modern languages having been founded in Bowdoin College and offered to him, he accepted the office as more congenial to his tastes. In order to qualify himself for the office, being then quite a youth, he came over to Europe, where he spent three years and a half in traveling through France, Italy, Spain, Germany, Holland, and England, and in acquiring a knowledge of the languages and literature of those countries. His residence in Germany, in particular, had a powerful influence upon him—an influence visible throughout his subsequent writings. It began in him a kind of eclectic theory of literature, and a love for European and especially mediæval and German themes and sentiments, as distinct from that intense American patriotism which some of his countrymen advocated.—"All that is best," he has said, "in the great poets of all countries is not what is national in them, but what is universal. Their roots are in their native soil, but their branches wave in the unpatriotic air." This was a state of feeling very proper in one who was to fill the office of Professor of Modern Languages in an American College; which office he returned to occupy in the year 1829, while yet only in his twenty-third year. While discharging the duties of the post, he wrote various articles of literary biography and criticism for the North-American Review; in 1833 he published a translation of a Spanish poem, with an Essay on Spanish Poetry; and in 1835 appeared the first of his regular prose-works—Outre-Mer, or a Pilgrimage beyond the Sea, containing sketches of his travels in France, Spain and Italy. In this same year, Mr. George Ticknor having resigned the Professorship of Modern Languages and Literature at Harvard University, Mr. Longfellow, then twenty-eight years of age, was called upon to succeed him. Before entering on the office, he spent another year in European travel, visiting Germany again, and also Switzerland, Denmark, and Sweden, and thus adding a knowledge of the Scandinavian tongues and literature to his previous acquirements. From the year 1836 to the present time, Mr. Longfellow has held, with high distinction, the chair in Harvard University; and it is during this period that he has published the series of works by which he is best known. In 1839 he published his prose-romance of Hyperion; in 1840 his Voices of the Night, a collection of poems; in 1841 his Ballads and other Poems, including translations from the German and Swedish; in 1842 (in which year he again visited Europe) a drama called The Spanish Student; in 1845 his Belfry of Bruges, and also an extensive work entitled The Poets and Poetry of Europe, consisting of translations from various languages, with introductions and biographical notices; in 1847 his poem of Evangeline, a story of early American colonial life, written in English Hexameters; in 1848 his Kavanagh, a kind of poetico-philosophical tale; in 1849 a political series entitled The Sea-Side and the Fire-side; in 1851 the Golden Legend, a mystical and dramatic version of a mediæval German story; and lastly, in 1855, his Song of Hiawatha, a kind of American Indian mythical epic, written in a very peculiar meter.

From the nature of some of the subjects in this long series, it will be seen that Mr. Longfellow, while true in the main to the cosmopolitan theory of poetry and literature with which he set out in his career, has yet exhibited his genius again and again in national American topics. No poem indeed is so thoroughly American in its scope and associations as the Song of Hiawatha. Of all American poets Mr. Longfellow is the most popular on this side of the Atlantic. Almost all his works have been reprinted separately, some of them in various forms by various publishers; and there are at present (1856) several editions of his collective works in the market, one or two of which are illustrated.—Though the influence of Goethe, Jean Paul, and other Germans is to be traced both in the matter and in the method of some of his writings, there can be no doubt that he is a man of fine original faculty, a highly-cultivated scholar, and a genuine literary artist.—Extract from a London Cyclopædia.

EARLY HISTORY OF PADDLE WHEELS.

Paddle wheels are mentioned by Vitruvius, who states that even in his time all record of the name of their inventor had been lost. Professor Pancirolle, of Padua, saw (about 1287) on Roman coins representations of war ships, each furnished with three paddle-wheels on either side, to be set in motion by bullocks; such war vessels the Romans are said to have used during their first war against Carthage. Between 1687 and 1693 Prince Rupert possessed a paddle-wheel boat in London, which was moved by horses: and about the same period the French engineer, Dugnet, was trying experiments at Havre and Marseilles with vessels of a similar description. Steam is said to

New Orleans Christian Advocate.

Terms—$2 00 per annum, in advance.

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

NEW ORLEANS:

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 18, 1860.

LORD MACAULAY'S OPINION OF THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A letter from Lord Macaulay, written to the Hon. H. S. Randall of New York, in 1857, has recently been published in the Southern Literary Messenger. The high position occupied by Lord Macaulay, the rare combination of talents and genius which he possessed, his twofold fame as a great statesman and the most eminent literary man of his day, his known liberality of sentiment, together with his popularity on this side of the Atlantic, would lead us, under any circumstances, to give much more than usual attention to his carefully expressed views of any subject. But in the present instance, we have an additional interest to prompt our attention to his Lordship's views. The letter in question treats of the American Government, its character and prospective duration. The following is the substance of it:

I have long been convinced that institutions purely democratic must, sooner or later, destroy liberty, or civilization, or both.

In Europe, where the population is dense, the effect of such institutions would be almost instantaneous. What happened lately in France is an example. In 1848 a pure democracy was established there. During a short time there was reason to expect a general spoliation, a national bankruptcy, a new partition of the soil, a maximum of prices, a ruinous load of taxation laid on the rich for the purpose of supporting the poor in idleness. Such a system would, in twenty years, have made France as poor and barbarous as the France of the Carlovingians. Happily the danger was averted; and now there is a despotism, a silent tribune, an enslaved press. Liberty is gone; but civilization has been saved. I have not the smallest doubt, if we had a purely democratic government here, the effect would be the same. Either the poor would plunder the rich, and civilization would perish; or order and property would be saved by a strong military government, and liberty would perish.

You may think that your country enjoys an exemption from these evils. I will frankly say to you that I am of a very different opinion. Your fate I believe to be certain, though it is deferred by a physical cause. As long as you have a boundless extent of fertile and unoccupied land, your laboring population will be far more at ease than the laboring population of the old world; and while this is the case the Jeffersonian polity may continue to exist without causing any fatal calamity. But the time will come when New England will be as thickly populated as Old England. Wages will be as low, and will fluctuate as much with you as with us. You will have your Manchesters and Birminghams; and in those Manchesters and Birminghams, hundreds of thousands of artisans will assuredly be sometimes out of work. Then your institutions will be fairly brought to the test. Distress everywhere makes the laborer mutinous and discontented, and inclines him to listen with eagerness to agitators who tell him that it is a monstrous iniquity that one man should have a million while another cannot get a full meal. In bad years there is plenty of grumbling here, and sometimes a little rioting. But it matters little. For here the sufferers are not the rulers. The supreme power is in the hands of a class, numerous indeed, but select, of an educated class, of a class which is, and knows itself to be, deeply interested in the security of property and the maintenance of order. Accordingly, the malcontents are firmly, yet gently, restrained. The bad time is got over without robbing the wealthy to relieve the indigent. The springs of national prosperity soon begin to flow again; work is plentiful; wages rise; and all is tranquillity and cheerfulness. I have seen England pass three or four times through such critical seasons as I have described. Through such seasons the United States will have to pass, in the course of the next century, if not of this. How will you pass through them? I heartily wish you a good deliverance. But my reason and my wishes are at war; and I cannot help foreboding the worst. It is quite plain that your Government will never be able to restrain a distressed and discontented majority. For with you the majority is the Government, and has the rich, who are always a minority, absolutely at its mercy. The day will come when, in the State of New York, a multitude of people, none of whom has had more than half a breakfast, or expects to have more than half a dinner, will choose a Legislature. Is it possible to doubt what sort of Legislature will be chosen? On one side is a statesman preaching patience, respect for vested rights, strict observance for public faith. On the other is a demagogue ranting about the tyranny of capitalists and usurers, and asking why anybody should be permitted to drink champagne and ride in a carriage, while thousands of honest folks are in want of necessaries. Which of the two candidates is likely to be preferred by a working man, who hears his children cry for more bread? I seriously apprehend that you will, in some such season as I have described, do things which will prevent prosperity from returning; that you will act like people who should, in a year of scarcity, devour all the seed corn, and thus make the next year a year not of scarcity, but of absolute famine. There will be, I fear, spoliation, the spoliation will increase the distress; the distress will produce fresh spoliation. There is nothing to stop you. Your Constitution is all sail and no anchor. As I said before, when a society has entered on this downward progress, either civilization or liberty must perish. Either some Cæsar or Napoleon will seize the reins of government, with a strong hand, or your Republic will be as fearfully plundered and laid waste by barbarians in the twentieth century, as the Roman Empire was in the Fifth—with this difference, that the Huns and Vandals, who ravaged the Roman Empire, came from without, and that your Huns and Vandals will have been engendered within your own country, by your own institutions.

The general idea of the letter is, "that institutions purely democratic, must sooner or later destroy liberty or civilization, or both." In application of the supposed principle to our government, Lord Macaulay feels assured, that when the population of this country becomes dense, there will be a large class of poor and depressed persons; these artisans will have their seasons of suffering and distress from want of work; and hating the rich, jealous of property, and open to the arts of demagogues, will rise against the order and peace of our society, and overthrow it. Then he adds, "your constitution is all sail and no anchor." It is evident, therefore, that in Lord M.'s opinion, we are destined to perish as a government by means of agrarianism. A conflict between rich and poor is inevitable here, and whenever it occurs, the rabble are certain in the overthrow of American liberty or American civilization.

So much for the statement of the case. The premise is, that there will be a fierce collision between labor and capital; the inference is, that said collision will issue in the triumph of the fanatical party. Neither premise nor conclusion has, in our judgment, any sagacity, any philosophy, any statesmanship in it. If the predicted strife were to occur, we should have no such results as Lord M. forebodes. Labor and capital might become arrayed in hostile attitude, but they would fight their battle without affecting the stability of the government, simply for the reason that our government is not a party to bread and meat matters. It has no connection with the prosperity of the wealthy class and the poverty of the opposite class. Poor men in our country do not lay, as in Europe, the evils of their condition on the government. They are not fools enough to be guilty of such egregious nonsense. And moreover, the laboring class of this country are just as much attached to our institutions as the rich, loving them wisely and well for what they enjoy under their protection, prizing them justly and generously because of the personal rights which they secure and maintain to them, and honoring liberty as a sentiment, a practical good, an individual and household joy, which is their own precisely in the same sense and in equal measure with their more favored brethren. Poverty, then, in the United States, is no grievance against government. It is a private circumstance, not a legislative ordination; and hence, one of the bitterest elements of poverty—an element more than any other that tends to debase and brutalize the artisan population of Europe—has no existence among us. Poverty as the offspring of natural laws, is one thing; poverty as the offspring of bad government and aristocratic oppression, is quite another thing. If the ills of poverty are vastly enhanced, as in England and Europe, by false legislation, by wasteful extravagance for the benefit of courts and nobles, by partial discriminations in favor of the rich and against the indigent, then nothing is more natural than that poor men should make an issue with the government. But poverty, as poverty, could never rise in this country to such a pitch of blind, crazy, beastly fanaticism.

And now for the basis of the argument. Is there any likelihood that such a collision as predicated can occur between our rich and poor citizens? None whatever. The whole supposition is gratuitous. For among us, neither class is a stationary class. Rich and poor are forever changing positions. The mechanics of to-day are the millionaries of the next generation, and the wealthy are constantly falling back into the ranks of their homespun brethren. So it must be whenever property is a mere question of skill and energy, as it is here. The saving clause, by which American society is guarded against the dangers named by Lord Macaulay, is in the fact, that every man feels the path of prosperity is open before him—that luxury is not an organic monopoly, that the prosperous classes are continually purified by an ascent of good blood from the hard-working men—and hence, that wealth in a free country can never seriously antagonize labor, nor labor antagonize wealth.

The argument by Lord Macaulay is weak and inconclusive, because it confounds the distinction between natural and artificial circumstances. If the poor are shut up in their mud-holes; if they are half-clothed and half starved because of their government; then, so far as this state of things exists, the poor have a right to quarrel with their governments. But where they are poor, simply because circumstances over and above outside interposition create such a condition, then the mere fact of poverty has no tendency to breed agrarianism. So far from being a disturbing element in society, it is a peaceful element, a conservative element, a salutary element, in the working machinery of the world.

Poverty will never be so general in this country as in England. There are no laws of primogeniture, nor other monopolistic kinds of legislation, by which it is rendered next to impossible for the masses to improve their condition. And, further, the people of this country, as a whole, will soon be an educated people, the facilities of education are becoming abundant and cheap. Moreover, the wealth of this country, changing from family to family every generation or two, the means of even the highest culture is in nearly all families sooner or later. And when a family once becomes educated, as a rule, it always remains educated. Thus, ignorance, more dangerous than poverty, is rapidly passing away, and poverty separated from ignorance, its most dangerous ally, will not, itself, be found in connection with any considerably large class of people, for a series of sedition-breeding generations.

And last, whatever application Lord Macaulay's views may have to the Northern States, they have none whatever to the Southern States. In the language of the Delta: "Macaulay, overlooked entirely the element of negro slavery in the United States, in his parallel between American and European society.—Where that conservative element does not enter into our society—where that society is but a crude development of European society, his parallel is just, and his gloomy views of the future are scarcely exaggerated. But Southern Society, peculiar and original as it is, does not come within the parallel."

WILL THE SOUTHERN METHODIST CHURCH BUILD A HOUSE OF WORSHIP AT WASHINGTON CITY?

This question is now prominently before the whole Church. It will be decided, affirmatively or negatively, before very long. We have a small membership there, nearly a hundred, and an ordinary house of worship on an obscure street. But we need a "representative" church, there, above all other places. Indeed, as Washington is the centre of the nation, and the very picture of the Union in the eyes of the world, it will be absolutely discreditable to the Church not to have such a house of worship. It will be a sin, for we can, through such "a city set on a hill,"—such "a candle on" such "a candle-stick,"—let our light shine more widely than through any other individual church. The most intelligent people of all parts of this country, and of every other country, assemble there from year to year.—Every thing about Washington City, of a public character, is magnificent and monumental. The house of worship should be of the same character. It is plain, then, that we ought to have such a church. Nearly every other denomination has so thought, and acted accordingly.

Mr. William T. Smithson has been for some years trying to build such a church. His plans for raising the money have not succeeded as he had hoped. The Church at large must help, and help liberally, if the house is built at all. Why does it not help? Why is it that the richest Church in the land is behind all others in this matter? We can see no good reason. We urgently call on our people, everywhere, to contribute to this worthy cause.

To those concerned in the building of the Church we wish to say: Your mistake has been that you have not sent into the field an agent, or agents, suited to the work, to raise the money. Had you done so, you would have had it long since. It is the only way to succeed.

CHAPELS FOR THE NEGROES.

A few weeks since Bishop Andrew, than whom no man is better acquainted with the subject, or sounder in judgment in reference to it, published in these columns an earnest article in advocacy of the provision of suitable chapels, wherever needed, for the accommodation of the blacks in their Sunday services. Last week a Louisiana correspondent responded in another very earnest article, showing that much of the responsibility for the deficiency in this matter rested upon the church and ministry. We are glad to have the subject agitated. We are improving in this matter, but there is an immense amount of this kind of work to be done, and the apathy in regard to it, comparatively, is lamentable. Many planters are also negligent in this matter. They are responsible to God, to the world, and to their servants, for the manner in which they provide for the religious instruction and pastoral care of those thus committed to their charge. Slavery is scriptural and benevolent, but these abuses of it cannot be defended, and ought not to be. We are glad to see that the Methodists of Mobile, in addition to one excellent church for colored people, intend to build another. It is to be sixty feet wide by eighty-seven feet long, with a basement twelve feet, and the church proper twenty-eight feet high. This edifice is for a colored congregation, in charge of the St. Francis street officials. Its location is on Church street, one square above the Old Graveyard. It will be simple in its details, but convenient and substantial, offering accommodations for a congregation of two thousand, with such advantages as the religious training of servants require. The public will be grateful for these generous movements, by which intelligence and good morals are to be encouraged.

INAUGURATION OF THE CLAY STATUE.

On last Thursday, the 12th of April, Mr. Clay's birth day, statues were erected in honor of his memory both in Richmond, Va., and in this city. A grander affair than the latter inauguration we never have seen, nor expect to see, in this life. A hundred thousand people were in the streets. Business was almost universally suspended, and mercantile doors closed—a circumstance probably unprecedented in New Orleans. Every department of American society was represented in the procession. The clergy of all religious denominations joined—Episcopal, Presbyterian, Baptist, and Methodist ministers—Catholic priests, and Jewish rabbies. When the colossal statue, in the centre of that grand avenue, Canal street, was unveiled, amid a storm of thunderous music, booming of cannon, and the shouting of ten thousand human voices, and the figure and face of the great statesman was disclosed, in the attitude in which he delivered his last great speech in the Senate, men became little children, and wept as at the funeral of a father. All political distinctions were forgotten in the general sympathy. During the oration, the old Clay Whigs were easily distinguishable in the vast multitude by their flowing tears.

It was touching exceedingly to witness the tears of childhood flowing beneath the hoary locks of age. It was a far grander triumph of Mr. Clay's genius, patriotism, and fame, than would have been his election to the Presidency.

CONVENTION OF THE YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

The Convention of the Confederation of the Young Men's Christian Associations of North America commenced its session last Wednesday, and continued until the Monday evening following. Delegates were in attendance from all the leading sections of the country, representing the leading denominations of Christians. The number was about two hundred. Owing to unexpected detention of boats, about half of the delegates arrived after the Convention was about half over. The session seemed to be harmonious and pleasant. The "Christian Journal," the organ of the Association, was discontinued for want of support. The place chosen for the next annual meeting of the Association is St. Louis. The President of the Convention, Mr. Monford, of Richmond, Va., is one of the best presiding officers we have ever seen. The Association was hospitably entertained by the citizens of New Orleans, and the delegates seemed delighted with the place. By invitation, they joined, in a body, the procession on the day of the inauguration of the statue of Henry Clay. The Convention numbered among its members several ministers, and a respectable number of able men.

ONLY $1 25 FROM 1st MAY.

From the first of May till the end of the year, the price of the Advocate will be only $1 25. We suggest to our Agents and friends to make a unanimous and vigorous effort to send us a thousand subscribers to commence with that issue. Make a special push for it, brethren, if you please.

REV. J. B. JONES' SKETCHES.

This interesting series will be resumed next week.—Press of matter has crowded them out for the last two issues. Nothing more interesting has appeared in our columns.

Visitors.—We have been favored of late by the presence in our midst of Rev. Dr. Thompson and Prof. Merrick, of Ohio, Rev. Mr. Hersey, of Baltimore, Rev. Mr. Proctor, of our Washington City Church, and Rev. Mr. Bayley of the Virginia Conference.

"Lutha Fontelle" is a new contributor, and will prove her "quality."

NOTES WHILE ON A FURLOUGH.—NO. VIII.

Carthagena, March 10, 1860.

Many things, both in the products and usages of all these countries, remind us of oriental lands and scenes, as set forth in the Bible and by modern travellers. Here mountains, vallies, and rocks—prominent features wherever you go—remind us of similar characteristics of the country inhabited by God's chosen people. Here, too, as there, at one season of the year the land is consumed by drought and seared as by fire; at another, "dressed in living green," and "as the garden of the Lord." The palm and cocoanut, as also the cactus, answer to the same productions of the East. The mango, like the almond tree, bears buds, blossoms, and half grown and ripe fruit at the same time. The narrow streets of the cities, the style of paving—with the gutters in the middle—and narrow side-walks, take us to the cities of the East and show us Jerusalem as it is, whatever it may have been. The water jars which the women carry to and from the springs, have come down to us unchanged in material or shape from the days of Rebecca and Rachel; while the "ox-goad," a pole an inch to an inch and a half in diameter, with an iron pike at the end, reminds us of the instrument with which he of old "slew six hundred men." The girdle for the waist is universal in all these countries; so of various other particulars.

The fences in Costa Rica are a curiosity. They are made by setting a row of green stakes, of almost any kind of wood, into the ground; they immediately take root and grow. Thus in a few years there is a fine hedge 20 to 30 feet high, not only furnishing a fine shade most of the day, but presenting a very picturesque appearance. But if allowed to grow unmolested, the hedges would shade too much ground and injure the crops, so they are topped and trimmed off, and these trimmings furnish most of the fuel used by the inhabitants of the valley of San Jose and other portions of the Republic. In this climate they need fire only for culinary and washing purposes. There is not a fire-place in a distance of a thousand miles. By the way, Mr. Editor, have you ever analyzed the philosophy of the fire place? There is a pleasure about it little appreciated by us, but which is sadly missed in those countries from which the climate excludes it. It is an "institution" the influence of which does more to make our domestic circles scenes of improvement and sources of happiness, than all the discoveries and theories of our social reformers. It is a point of common rendezvous for the household; here the family are sure to spend a portion of each day for much of the year—a portion generally free from ordinary engagements and care—when the heads of the family can afford to listen to the wants and inquiries of the youngest of the circle. It is the time, often, for the importation and circulation of intelligence; for the interchange of courtesies, and the cultivation of sympathies and domestic affections. Our American homes owe more of their refinement and happiness to these reunions than to our "republican institutions." In lands from which they are absent, nothing takes their place; there is no point of union but the table, and that by no means furnishes the desideratum, as the condition of the family and society manifestly show. The "family circle" seems to imply—desiderate—the fire place.

But the reader will say, perhaps, that it is time to leave Costa Rica's rich coast; to this I am agreed; but before doing so, I must embrace the opportunity to record my indebtedness to the family of our Minister to Costa Rica and Nicaragua, Hon. Alex. Dimitry, for the kindness experienced at their hands. While in the capital I had a severe attack of intermittent fever—the first in my life. The prospect for proper attention at a public house where they did not speak English, while I did not speak Spanish, was not encouraging, so I accepted the kind and pressing invitation of Mrs. Dimitry (Mr. D. was absent from home) to make my home in her family until I should recover.—While there, all that the most pains-taking care and kindness could devise, was done for my comfort and recovery. Those who have been sick in a distant land among strangers, will know how to appreciate kindness like this. I shall not soon forget it, and I feel that it is due alike to myself and the Church to make this public acknowledgment of my obligations.

And now, mounted upon the indispensable pony, with "cargu" mule for my baggage, and a peon to take charge of it and take back the animals, I start for Punta Arenas. There has been no rain in three months. The carmen are in the midst of their labors transporting the coffee crop to the port, and the dust, from the nature of the soil, is of the "finest quality," and from three to four inches deep; but we must make the best of it. The first day we reach Atenas—Athens. The accommodations are not equal to those of the St. Charles, but we must put up with them for it is the best we can do. The floor is of the same kind that Adam used before he went to housekeeping; the cooking—well, let it pass. I laid down upon the sacking, for I have not seen a bed in the republic. Ox-hides and sacking stretched upon cot bedsteads, with nothing upon them but a straw mat, such as we put upon our floors, are the general substitutes. A colony of bloodthirsty parasites, for which the houses of all the natives of these countries are famous, immediately commenced operations. I endured them until 3, A. M., when I called the "landlord," —the whole family and several guests occupied the same room—ordered my horse, and started. The coffee haulers, to make it easier for their oxen, travel in the night. I must have passed fifty carts before sunrise. I crossed the Aguacate mountains before day, at an elevation of 6000 feet, and so missed one of the finest views afforded by any country. Various trees in the forest are in full bloom, bearing large flowers of the most beautiful hues—bright yellow, pale delicate pink, and brilliant red. This was something new; with us, beautiful flowers are confined to shrubbery, but here large forest trees bear them.—It was a sight to be enjoyed. I thought of a certain friend of mine, who edits a periodical for ladies, and is very fond of flowers.

While waiting at the port for the steamer, I made the acquaintance of a Capt. Andrews, master of an English ship, and a Wesleyan local preacher. I spent the Sabbath on board his ship, preached to the crew of two ships and several persons from the town. How precious is christian communion under such circumstances. I found but a small company of passengers on the steam-ship, and, I believe, all foreigners. The only one I felt any particular interest in was a Monk, from Oregon, who, on my being introduced to him while walking on the beach, said, after a moment's thought, "Ah, this is Mr. Jefferson Hamilton!" This took me by surprise, as I had neither written nor spoken my full name since I had been in the Republic, nor was there but one family in the country that knew it; and I turned away wondering how he had come in possession of it. We had a good deal of conversation during the trip; he made numerous inquiries in relation to the constitution and polity of the different Protestant churches, and expressed very liberal sentiments, declaring that he was willing that Protestants should send missionaries into Catholic countries, and make proselytes if they could. How much of this he felt I will not presume to say; I hope all. Our voyage was varied by no incident, except the "blowing" of some monster of the deep very near us. Crossing the Isthmus to Aspinwall, I found letters from home, the first I had received, and as the reader will suppose, they were very welcome, especially as they brought tidings that all were well.

And here again I wish to acknowledge my obligations to various gentlemen. Upon a simple introduction to the agents of the Panama Railroad, and the Pacific Steamship Company, by our gentlemanly Consuls at Aspinwall and Panama, and also to Captain Dow, of the Guatamala; these gentlemen not only franked me over the railroad twice, at a saving of some $60, but deducted $37 50 from the regular fare on the "Guatamala," and tendered me a free passage to California. Such courtesies to a stranger deserves public acknowledgment. The managers of these companies have a reputation for marked generosity in such things.

Finding the English steamer "Thames" about to sail for Carthagena, I took passage for that place. The management on board of English steamers, and the attention to passengers, I am compelled to say, is superior to that on most of our own; but the fare is high.

J. H.

NOTES WHILE ON A FURLOUGH.—NO. VIII.

Carthagena, March 10, 1860.

Many things, both in the products and usages of all these countries, remind us of oriental lands and scenes, as set forth in the Bible and by modern travellers. Here mountains, vallies, and rocks—prominent features wherever you go—remind us of similar characteristics of the country inhabited by God's chosen people. Here, too, as there, at one season of the year the land is consumed by drought and seared as by fire; at another, "dressed in living green," and "as the garden of the Lord." The palm and cocoanut, as also the cactus, answer to the same productions of the East. The mango, like the almond tree, bears buds, blossoms, and half grown and ripe fruit at the same time. The narrow streets of the cities, the style of paving—with the gutters in the middle—and narrow side-walks, take us to the cities of the East and show us Jerusalem as it is, whatever it may have been. The water jars which the women carry to and from the springs, have come down to us unchanged in material or shape from the days of Rebecca and Rachel; while the "ox-goad," a pole an inch to an inch and a half in diameter, with an iron pike at the end, reminds us of the instrument with which he of old "slew six hundred men." The girdle for the waist is universal in all these countries; so of various other particulars.

The fences in Costa Rica are a curiosity. They are made by setting a row of green stakes, of almost any kind of wood, into the ground; they immediately take root and grow. Thus in a few years there is a fine hedge 20 to 30 feet high, not only furnishing a fine shade most of the day, but presenting a very picturesque appearance. But if allowed to grow unmolested, the hedges would shade too much ground and injure the crops, so they are topped and trimmed off, and these trimmings furnish most of the fuel used by the inhabitants of the valley of San Jose and other portions of the Republic. In this climate they need fire only for culinary and washing purposes. There is not a fire-place in a distance of a thousand miles. By the way, Mr. Editor, have you ever analyzed the philosophy of the fire place? There is a pleasure about it little appreciated by us, but which is sadly missed in those countries from which the climate excludes it. It is an "institution" the influence of which does more to make our domestic circles scenes of improvement and sources of happiness, than all the discoveries and theories of our social reformers. It is a point of common rendezvous for the household; here the family are sure to spend a portion of each day for much of the year—a portion generally free from ordinary engagements and care—when the heads of the family can afford to listen to the wants and inquiries of the youngest of the circle. It is the time, often, for the importation and circulation of intelligence; for the interchange of courtesies, and the cultivation of sympathies and domestic affections. Our American homes owe more of their refinement and happiness to these reunions than to our "republican institutions." In lands from which they are absent, nothing takes their place; there is no point of union but the table, and that by no means furnishes the desideratum, as the condition of the family and society manifestly show. The "family circle" seems to imply—desiderate—the fire place.

But the reader will say, perhaps, that it is time to leave Costa Rica's rich coast; to this I am agreed; but before doing so, I must embrace the opportunity to record my indebtedness to the family of our Minister to Costa Rica and Nicaragua, Hon. Alex. Dimitry, for the kindness experienced at their hands. While in the capital I had a severe attack of intermittent fever—the first in my life. The prospect for proper attention at a public house where they did not speak English, while I did not speak Spanish, was not encouraging, so I accepted the kind and pressing invitation of Mrs. Dimitry (Mr. D. was absent from home) to make my home in her family until I should recover.—While there, all that the most pains-taking care and kindness could devise, was done for my comfort and recovery. Those who have been sick in a distant land among strangers, will know how to appreciate kindness like this. I shall not soon forget it, and I feel that it is due alike to myself and the Church to make this public acknowledgment of my obligations.

And now, mounted upon the indispensable pony, with "cargu" mule for my baggage, and a peon to take charge of it and take back the animals, I start for Punta Arenas. There has been no rain in three months. The carmen are in the midst of their labors transporting the coffee crop to the port, and the dust, from the nature of the soil, is of the "finest quality," and from three to four inches deep; but we must make the best of it. The first day we reach Atenas—Athens. The accommodations are not equal to those of the St. Charles, but we must put up with them for it is the best we can do. The floor is of the same kind that Adam used before he went to housekeeping; the cooking—well, let it pass. I laid down upon the sacking, for I have not seen a bed in the republic. Ox-hides and sacking stretched upon cot bedsteads, with nothing upon them but a straw mat, such as we put upon our floors, are the general substitutes. A colony of bloodthirsty parasites, for which the houses of all the natives of these countries are famous, immediately commenced operations. I endured them until 3, A. M., when I called the "landlord," —the whole family and several guests occupied the same room—ordered my horse, and started. The coffee haulers, to make it easier for their oxen, travel in the night. I must have passed fifty carts before sunrise. I crossed the Aguacate mountains before day, at an elevation of 6000 feet, and so missed one of the finest views afforded by any country. Various trees in the forest are in full bloom, bearing large flowers of the most beautiful hues—bright yellow, pale delicate pink, and brilliant red. This was something new; with us, beautiful flowers are confined to shrubbery, but here large forest trees bear them.—It was a sight to be enjoyed. I thought of a certain friend of mine, who edits a periodical for ladies, and is very fond of flowers.

While waiting at the port for the steamer, I made the acquaintance of a Capt. Andrews, master of an English ship, and a Wesleyan local preacher. I spent the Sabbath on board his ship, preached to the crew of two ships and several persons from the town. How precious is christian communion under such circumstances. I found but a small company of passengers on the steam-ship, and, I believe, all foreigners. The only one I felt any particular interest in was a Monk, from Oregon, who, on my being introduced to him while walking on the beach, said, after a moment's thought, "Ah, this is Mr. Jefferson Hamilton!" This took me by surprise, as I had neither written nor spoken my full name since I had been in the Republic, nor was there but one family in the country that knew it; and I turned away wondering how he had come in possession of it. We had a good deal of conversation during the trip; he made numerous inquiries in relation to the constitution and polity of the different Protestant churches, and expressed very liberal sentiments, declaring that he was willing that Protestants should send missionaries into Catholic countries, and make proselytes if they could. How much of this he felt I will not presume to say; I hope all. Our voyage was varied by no incident, except the "blowing" of some monster of the deep very near us. Crossing the Isthmus to Aspinwall, I found letters from home, the first I had received, and as the reader will suppose, they were very welcome, especially as they brought tidings that all were well.

And here again I wish to acknowledge my obligations to various gentlemen. Upon a simple introduction to the agents of the Panama Railroad, and the Pacific Steamship Company, by our gentlemanly Consuls at Aspinwall and Panama, and also to Captain Dow, of the Guatamala; these gentlemen not only franked me over the railroad twice, at a saving of some $60, but deducted $37 50 from the regular fare on the "Guatamala," and tendered me a free passage to California. Such courtesies to a stranger deserves public acknowledgment. The managers of these companies have a reputation for marked generosity in such things.

Finding the English steamer "Thames" about to sail for Carthagena, I took passage for that place. The management on board of English steamers, and the attention to passengers, I am compelled to say, is superior to that on most of our own; but the fare is high.

J. H.

"HOMES FOR THE EVANGELISTS"—"MISSISIPPI."

Mr. Editor: In the Advocate of 11th inst., Mississippi proposes to give the "history" of a certain "donation of land" for "Church, burying-ground, and homes for the P. E. and preacher of the Circuit." "Homes were built," and other good things done while "the good man" who gave the land lived. But Mississippi says: "The good man died, and other trustees were appointed, and other purposes were to be served. The 'homes' were sold in 1856, and the lands, all except a fraction, went into other uses."

We should like to know what "other purposes were to be served" than such as were for the interests of the Church? The lands were deeded to the Church for its use and benefit, and could be used for any purpose which the authorities of the Church might deem best. If the deed had said the lands could be used only for "parsonage purposes," then they could not have been sold nor used for any other purpose.

"Mississippi's" insinuations are unjust. The land was not sold because "other trustees were appointed" who did not know Joseph. Why then? If you will read R. P.'s article in same paper, on "Local Itinerants," you will see the answer in part. Old "Brother Stingy" was the cause of it.

The houses for P. E. and P. C. were built of logs—some of them black-jack—about 1836. Timber will get old and rot in this country. Boards rotted, and roof had to be repaired or put on anew. Logs rotted also. Fences decayed, had to be repaired or rebuilt. But who was to do the work? and who pay for it? There was the rub. A few brethren became responsible for it once. One brother, I think, at another time. One P. E. spent $80 at another time, and one could hardly see that he had made a beginning of what was necessary to be done. The District Stewards refused to help; the community refused to do anything; the P. E. abandoned the house and the improvements, and left the job unfinished, minus $80. The other "home" had less done for it, and had not been occupied by a preacher's family since 1848. As it was all "Church property," several thought it was a "fine thing," and pitched into the rails, boards, pickets, and timber that grew on a part of the land, until not a rail could be found; hardly a loose board or picket.

The houses would not keep any one dry in a rain; hardly fit for the hogs to sleep in; and surely Mississippi would not want an "Evangelist" to put his beloved wife and little ones into such houses. He lives in too fine a house himself for that.

To prevent the utter destruction of the houses, timber, etc., the Quarterly Conference directed the trustees, if they thought it to the interests of the Church in the village, to sell a portion of the land. The trustees resolved to sell, provided a certain price could be obtained. Since the sale the land has been protected. The proceeds of the sale are to go into a new Church edifice.

Madison.

ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

Eufaula District.—Rev. J. W. Laney writes: I have just completed my round on the district, so far as the two days' meetings to the missions are concerned. The blacks seemed to rejoice greatly that they received this extra attention, and the patrons of the missions were gratified at the result of these meetings to their slaves. We had good attendance on Saturdays, and good attention to the word. In some places I had the pleasure of listening to the missionary catechize the children, and the questions were answered promptly and without embarrassment on the part of the children. I am more than ever impressed with the greatness of this mission work among the colored people, and I am happy to believe that the owners of the slaves are being convinced that it is their duty to do more in this direction than ever before. Arrangements are being made to build more mission-houses in the district. And the missionaries are going to be better supported than ever before. We have some men engaged on the missions that have no equal in this business. God bless these brethren in this great and glorious work? The whole district, I might say, is in a good condition. It is true there is no religious excitement as yet; but I have no doubt the word preached by God's ministers will, ere long, prove the power of God unto the salvation of souls. Churches are being built, and those that were half completed are being finished. Almost an entire square in the beautiful city of Eufaula, Ala., has been consumed by fire. Many of our worthy, industrious citizens have lost nearly all their hard earnings. Much will be made up to them; new buildings will go up in the place of these burnt down.

Pleasant Hill Colored Mission.—Rev. J. Williamson writes, on sending his second quarterly report: This mission is situate in Dallas county, embracing a few of the many plantations lying on the east side of the Alabama river, and some in the interior, between Benton and Cahawba. When I came to this mission I found it almost totally disorganized; out of seven appointments served last year, but one or two were willing to be served this year. I visited some of them and several have employed me to serve their people. I have now six appointments, embracing eight plantations, and I think I have a fair prospect for two more appointments. It would be difficult to attempt to give a detailed account of its present condition, for it is yet in a state of formation. Yet I am greatly encouraged; the manner of teaching seems to give pleasure and great delight to the colored people, and, at the same time, meets the general approval of the owners and Superintendent.

"OUR KATE;" OR, "SISTER."

BY LUTHA FONTELLE.

Near one of the prondest cities of the South, in a loved home, shaded by the customary grove of ohias and live-oak trees, lived a fair maiden, gay as fair. I shall not stop to tell you more of her external appearance. If you have not already seen every type of blonde or brunette beauty you have become familiar with them in the cheerful pages of the Lady's Book, in the quaint stories of Harper, or in the lively Ledger. And yet Kate was like none of these. Indeed, if you could catch the features in repose, you would have been startled, as I was, at a face I had never before thought plain. I will tell you something of her mind and heart, and your tutored imagination may sketch the outline, and fill it up with the soul's impress—yours, or Kate's, as best suits your fancy.

With the buoyant spirits of health (alas for the romance for my heroine is not a delicate, languishing lady, whom the blandest south wind may not touch too freely), with a never failing fund of brilliant humor, and a keen relish for every passing good, she was a favorite with all the ladies of the neighborhood, with the old no less than the young. Her mother died the year she left school, when she was just entering her seventeenth year, and she had gratefully availed herself of proffered kindness, and sought the sympathy and counsel of the staidest matrons of the vicinity.

She forgot the arrows pointed with polished wit, with which she discomfited many a bold suitor, when she visited the shadowed home of the widow mourning over the blight which had fallen on her last flower, the bright child of her hopes and joys; and her quick perceptions, her cultivated intellect, and exquisite tact, never served her will so earnestly in a brilliant assemblage, or presiding in her father's house, she entertained authors and divines, world-wide travellers and ministers of State, and charmed them by her lively sallies, her extensive information and her noble thoughts, as while she roused the drooping energies of the dying boy, or cheered his mother.

You see Kate, then, the light of her father's widowed heart, the sharer of his thoughts and cares, the loved sister of sweet girls and fun-loving boys, a joy to her friends and a bright attraction in every gay scene.

But amid her fashionable pursuits, came thoughts unbidden, all foreign to her surroundings. While moving in the dance, amid troops of friends, she saw the faces of her young sisters and remembered that they were motherless. Would their sainted mother, so gentle, so true to their best interests, so beloved, would she desire to see all her daughters in the flower-strewn path she was so eagerly pursuing? Oh, no! that mother would have chosen a more quiet way. And so, thinking of her sisters and her sweet mother, she lost all her relish for the ball room and gay throng.

The clear outlines of Duty, beautiful in its symmetrical proportions, became ever more manifest. The firm lips of this chaste figure, and the deep, earnest eyes that were often raised heavenward and turned again to earth with a new, searching light, became to her heart like the face of a friend. But she trembled as she saw herself standing alone, at the entrance to this new path to which Duty's immovable finger pointed.

Her father had been, many years previously, a consistent Church member, but in pursuit of wealth and honors he had turned his back on the self-denying injunctions of the Bible, and the world deemed him one of themselves. He was.

And this sweet girl, standing in her mother's place, resolved to follow that mother's example, and make Jesus her friend. She made her decision, not so much for her own sake, as for the loving young sisters and wild brothers that looked to her loving guidance. A heart of any warmth and truth must ever be made purer and nobler when loving trust reaches up its arms for guidance. This maiden felt its power, and one night when she had returned from a brilliant scene of gayety, herself the belle of the evening, she went to Jesus, resolved to leave all and follow Him.

I saw her three months afterwards, not alone, then, going to the altar of God with three of the sweet sisters she loved so well, one noble brother, and the sire whose wanderings from his Savior his daughter's example had so suddenly checked. How his eyes followed her with blessings, while her face was radiant with the deep tide of joy that flooded her soul. And the world looked on and wondered, scarce believing the change. At first it tried to lure her back, and was half startled from its own light by the repeated failure. Then it spoke slightingly, in words of bitter scorn, of her delusion and of the coward heart that trembled at false terrors. But still unmoved, she quietly pressed on in duty's path.

Home had new charms for her, and in her watchful care her household flourished. Now she found leisure to create a thousand joys and glad surprises to bind their hearts together, and guard her brothers from the alluring temptations of the city.

And one sweet sister—Lilly—she knew, at last, was saved. Fair as the flower whose name she bore, she was as fragile. Of a peculiarly delicate organization, fashionable excitement would have killed her. But in their pleasant home, and in the quiet circle of choice friends, her glowing genius and warm heart unfolded healthfully.

And Kate's rare conversational talent was by no means lost or undervalued in this more quiet life. The blended dignity and grace of her manner seemed only the true expression of her soul. And those who formerly merely admired, now eagerly sought the honor of her acquaintance. Her father regarded her with tender reverence, and looking into her eyes' calm depths saw there the spirit of her mother.

And still the world looked on, and half admitting, now the wisdom of her course, since full success had crowned it, prefixed its meed of praise. She did not need this, but every year her pure influence was more widely felt. One brother entered college with high hopes, and two fair sisters left school with well earned honors. Then Kate gave her hand to one she long had loved, of whom it is sufficient to say that he was worthy of her.

A roguish niece of mine came dancing into my room half an hour ago, and seeing me occupied, stood quietly by my chair till I finished writing. Then she assured me that she had not been idly waiting, but had vengefully destroyed every unsuspicious that had attacked me; and if there was any excellence in the story it was due chiefly to her efforts. I acknowledged this, for I had been sadly tormented, and yielded the papers. After she had read them, she asked demurely, why I had made Kate the favorite of all the ladies of the neighborhood. "Belles," she said, "did not usually aspire to such distinction. They were content if favorites of the other sex." Reader, perhaps you can tell her. Then she insisted, this niece of mine, on having the sequel to Lilly; and she went away altogether satisfied, when I put into her hands a favorite volume of Sketches, by this same Lilly, and a book of Songs which, I told her, I had heard Lilly sing to the music of her harp.

MARRIAGE FEES.

Mr. Editor—Some time since I saw an article in a Presbyterian paper, headed "Marriage Fees." I came to the conclusion that Methodist

JAPANESE WAR STEAMER AT SAN FRANCISCO.

From the Alta California of the 17th, we extract the following interesting report:

His Imperial Japanese Majesty's war steamer Candinarruh, commanded by Kat-sin-tarroh, a Captain in the Japanese Navy, arrived in our harbor yesterday, and anchored off Vallejo street wharf, at three o'clock P. M., after thirty-seven days passage from Uragawo, and hauling on board the Chief Admiral of the Imperial Japanese Navy, Co-ser-ke-ma-sa-no-ci-nia. The object of the visit of the Candinarruh is as a tender or preceding vessel to the United States steamship Powhattan, which left Yeddo on the 10th of February, bound to this port, having on board the Japanese Ambassadors, (and suite of seventy) sent by the Emperor to Washington, as already detailed in our last Japanese correspondence. The following are the names of the officers of the ship: Admiral, Co-ser-ke-ma-sa-no-ci-nat; Captain, Kat-sin-tarroh; Captain attending, Manager; Lieutenants, So-korah-te-to-sah, Okeamo, Ya-ha, Ike-e-ro, To-mo-a-go-ro, En-ah-ket-ohe; Chief Engineer, Ha-ma-ge-ro; Second Engineer, Kin-ge-ro; four midshipmen, three doctors, and seventy before the mast.

The steamer mounts ten guns, viz: four eighteen, and six thirty-two pounders. She also mounts four swivels and one howitzer. She brought, as passengers, Captain John M. Brooke, United States Navy, Mr. E. M. Kern, United States Navy, and nine of the crew of the late United States schooner J. Fenimore Cooper, which was wrecked at Yokahama on the 23d of August, 1859, as already detailed in our columns.

THE PASSAGE OVER.

The Candinarruh has been thirty-seven days sailing to this port from Japan. Her engines were not used but during three days in getting off the Japanese coast. She sails pretty well, having made about two hundred miles in one day. She was built in Holland, for the Japanese Emperor, and was sent out in her present condition about three years ago. She cost $70,000.

We visited the ship yesterday, on her arrival, and were there introduced to Captain Brook and Mr. Kern, from whom we obtained many interesting details of the passage. This is one of several steamers composing the Japanese Navy. She is the first one that has left the country for a foreign port, and perhaps would not have been allowed to come except that the two above mentioned officers happened to be in Yokohama to attend them. The express object is to await the arrival here of the Powhatan, when she will at once return to report the safe arrival of the Ambassadors and suite. The Japanese sailors are an fait in all the usual work pertaining to the duties of seafaring life. The boatswain is as thoroughly up in his work as any man could be in any service. There is no kind of sailor-work that he does not thoroughly understand, and can also manage his men in a ship-shape manner.

The crew run aloft, and make and take in sail with the utmost alacrity. There were no punishments of any kind inflicted on the crew—everything going pleasantly and easily from the first. The government on board is mild and humane. The science of navigation is thoroughly understood among the officers, who learned it from the Dutch at the school at Nagasaki. The instruments are of Dutch and English manufacture. They had two chronometers of English make. The ship is worked in all respects like those of the Dutch. The food on board is principally rice, dried fish and pickled vegetables.—The flesh is irlet in rape seed oil, making a very palatable mess, and one which no hungry man would refuse. Each of the crew is allowed a gallon of rice per day, of which the greater portion is retained in Japan for their families.—Vegetables, tea, sugar, etc., if used, they pay for themselves.

At first, on the passage, the hours were not marked off into watches, as in other sea-going ships, but soon the necessity of this was made apparent, and the system was adopted. Tables are used to eat from fore and aft—chop-sticks being used, as with the Chinese. No religious ceremonies were observed on board during the passage, nor were there any evidences of idolatory. They were heard, however, to pray to their deities occasionally in their own rooms. They looked forward with pleasure, during the passage, to their arrival here—exhibiting the greatest curiosity to know about America, its people and institutions. The Government was particularly a subject of inquiry. They were cleanly in their habits, and bathed frequently.

The Admiral had four servants, who were constantly in waiting; but the Admiral being a very sensible man, exacted no unnecessary servitude or formalities. In a gale of wind, the orders were given entirely in Dutch, and were executed with celerity and cheerfulness. The whole nautical education of the people, in fact, is based upon the Dutch language—thus illustrating the policy of that nation to preserve its exclusive hold in Japan, and to hand every useful art which they introduce upon their language.

SCENES ON BOARD THE KAT-SIN-TARROH.

A number of attaches of the Alta proceeded, yesterday, on board the steamer soon after she anchored. We were received at the gangway by a marine wearing the uniform of the Japanese navy, viz: dark worsted material, consisting of frock and trowsers, with soft wooden sandals (not clumsy wooden shoes, like those of the Chinese). Stepping upon the spar deck, we were at once struck with the neatness and order which everywhere reigned. Groups of sleazy clad and really seamen-like looking men were standing about lost, or wonder-stricken, at our appearance, as we were with theirs. The marines have a large square patch between their shoulders, upon which their peculiar rank is written in Japanese characters. The countenances of these people wear a far more intelligent look than any Chinese that we have seen.

We were received courteously and conducted about the ship. The rigging, engines and other matters do not differ from those of any Dutch propeller of the size, which is about three hundred tons. She has not a deep draught of water, but great beam. The guns are rather clumsy, and unwieldly; and the muskets, which are kept with the most scrupulous brightness, are of the same old-fashioned, angaluly appearance. Descending into the cabin, we found the same neatness and order. The floor was scrupulously scrubbed—the mahogany polished. This (after) cabin has been appropriated during the passage to the American officers, who have received every attention—a profusion of servants to wait on them, and the best that the ship afforded.

In an adjoining cabin we were introduced to Admiral Co-ser-ke-ma-sa-no-ci-um. He is a benign, benevolent-looking man, about forty years of age, and evidently in high favor at the Imperial Court to be intrusted with so important a charge as this. When we entered, he was having his hair most artistically dressed with oils and pomatum by one of his servants—the Admiral being seated on the floor and evidently enjoying the luxury of the shampoo. Soon after, he appeared on deck, dressed in an unassuming but gentlemanly costume—his feet encased in snowy white sandals and stockings; a dark brown or olive frock confrasting finely with a deep blue vest, which was laced in front with a heavy silver cord. At his side hung two swords, resembling yataghans.

The officers on board a Japanese ship, from lieutenant up, are called "two sword officers," and entitled by rank to wear two swords. These weapons are keenly sharp-pointed and beautifully polished. The Admiral's head is partially shaved, and the hair handsomely bound up behind. In an adjoining cabin, the Chief Engineer, Hama-ge-ro, was having his hair oiled and dressed by a servant.

We noticed in the Admiral's cabin a picture of President Buchanan hanging in a conspicuous place. The Japanese national flag is displayed on board the ship at the main and in the bows. This is a white groundwork with a ball in the center. At the main floats the Admiral's private signal—a diamond shaped figure, within a red circle, on a white ground. We were offered for refreshments a very delicate, but strongly flavored liquer, something like maraschino. While we were taking notes about the ships decks, the Japanese showed the most intense curiosity to see our style of writing, and were much gratified at being allowed to examine the book. This curiosity was manifested as to articles of clothing, watches, pencils, knives, etc., and it may be safely presumed that the crew cast long and wistful eyes ashore at the city, whose strange sights they were doubtless eager to explore.

The Captain, Kat-sin-taroh, has been sick nearly the whole passage, and under the care of the Doctor, who is a very intelligent man. When a servant entered the Captain's cabin, he made a low obeilleance to that dignitary, and the same on leaving. We noticed that while the sailing master was conversing with the Admiral, or receiving from him some lengthy instructions, the former bent very low, and kept his eyes fixed humbly upon the deck, while the Admiral preserved a peculiarly upright position, with his head well up, as though he felt the dignity of his office. The name of one of the Midshipmen is Kun-u-rah-tse-no kame. "I thank you," in Japanese, is A-rung-a-tu.

The ship, we presume, will be open to inspection for all who desire to visit her. She is a curiosity, which none should neglect; and probably another chance of the kind will not occur again for many years. A salute will be exchanged between her and the fort to-morrow.

Last evening, Captains Man-ge-ron, Yo-se-ro, O-ke-yre o, and U-hera came on shore in one of the steamer's boats, with Captain Brooke and Mr. Charles Wolcott Brooks, and proceeded through several of our principal streets, to the International Hotel, where they took lodgings. There dinner was served, containing many of the usual varieties afforded by the market, which they discussed with a good relish, expressing gratification at the new dishes which were now set before them for the first time. Supervisors Brooks and Young were received by them, on behalf of the City Government, and the civilities of the city were tendered to them in an informal manner, until such time as the Board could meet. Later in the evening they visited Job's Hotel, by invitation of Mr. Brooks, and then, for the first time, indulged in the luxury of ice creams and other delicious confectionary.

VISIT OF THE PRINCE OF WALES TO CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES.

One of the most inveterate traditions of our fathers was the immobility of royalty. That the king should remain habitually within a certain radius of his capital, and never go beyond it, except for the purpose of making a solemn and formal visit to some loyal province, was, with the later sovereigns of the House of Hanover, almost an article of faith. The first two Georges were, of course, constantly running over to Germany; but when the prince who, born and educated in the country, "gloried the name of Briton," came to the throne, the Tycoon of Japan was almost as immovable. This may have been partly the result of natural sluggishness of mind, but it was, perhaps, more an imitation of French and Spanish royalty, which had then reached the extreme of absurd punctilliousness. Whatever the cause, George III was content to oscillate all his life between London and Windsor, and an excursion to Weymouth was the most formidable journey which he ever attempted. His son and successor never visited either Scotland or Ireland until he had ascended to the throne, at the age of nearly sixty years. King William, though he had seen the world in his youth, was almost as stationary after he ceased to be a midshipman. It cannot be doubted that much of the narrowness of these sovereigns, and despotic tendencies of the first two, arose from their having seen so little of the world, and even of the country they were to govern. In the age before railways, the greatest lords were content to pass much of their time in residences almost suburban, being deterred by the enormous expense from transferring their households frequently from Northumberland or Derbyshire and back. The sovereign encouraged this dislike of locomotion by his example, and, in spite of grand tours in his youth, the English nobility could not be said to be a really travelled man.

Now, however, Englishmen go every where in Europe and in the East, and royalty is about to lead them to a field which, if not untrodden, is less known than it should be. The Prince of Wales, is likely to make American travel popular by his intended visit to Canada. For the first time since the discovery of America, an heir apparent to the British Crown is to cross the Atlantic, and in his character as the future ruler of this Empire receive the respects of one of its most flourishing provinces. Other princes have visited the Western world in military or naval capacities. The father of her present Majesty held high command there. But the unity of the Empire and the status of the British North America as a great allied province, and not a mere dependent "plantation," will for the first time be recognized when Albert, Prince of Wales, sets foot on its shores. The Governor General, in opening the Canadian Parliament, announced the approaching visit, and the satisfaction of all classes has since been loudly expressed. The people of the North American colonies are prepared to receive the Prince of Wales with every demonstration of regard. Not only as a tribute to his station as the future head of the greatest commonwealth in the world, but as the representative of a rule which has conferred immense benefits on the provinces, the Canadian people will give him welcome Far twenty years the progress of the North American colonies has been such as to surpass even the rapid growth of the neighboring States. Her present Majesty's accession to the throne found the Canadians deeply discontented, and, as is now admitted, not without cause. Insurrection followed, blood was shed, and our evil-wishers all over the world raised their raven croak, as usual, on the inevitable dismemberment of the British empire. But the folly of seventy years before was not to be repeated; justice was preferred as a remedy to the employment of Hessians, and the policy of conciliation produced not only quiet but loyalty. Since those menacing days the prosperity of the provinces has been almost uninterrupted. The reign of Victoria has seen what may be called a nation grow up on the banks of the St. Lawrence and Lake Ontario. The population of the provinces has more than doubled, and their wealth has increased on a far greater proportion. Wise negotiations have broken down the commercial barriers between them and the United States, and allowed the creation of a most thriving trade. British capital, instead of seeking investment among decaying Spaniards or faithless Orientals, has been able to develop the resources of a people which is one with our own. The country is now traversed by railways; the most astonishing—engineering work of the age has been constructed within its territory by the genius of Stephenson; steamers of great speed and capacity are built for the direct service of the colonies, and everything promises that the prosperity which is to come will be as permanent as great. Nor are the Canadians united to appreciate their political advantages. Under the protection of the United Kingdom they have become a nation without any of the burdens and perils of nationality. Like men standing on the shore while ships are battling with the waves, they are able to look on the struggles which convulse the neighboring Union. That Canada is anxious of admission into the sisterhood of American republics is an assertion that the most reckless orator would hardly now make. The people of the provinces are independent enough in their way, and would, no doubt, fiercely resent any assumption of undue power by England. But as long as the mother country rules with kindness and moderation the Canadians are not likely to mix themselves up with the feuds of slavery, or throw in their lot with a people who confess that their own future destiny is dark and troubled.

It would, however, be a matter of regret if the Prince of Wales, satisfied with the homage of the Canadians, should neglect to visit the Republic which now plays so conspicuous a part in the world. We do not, of course, anticipate in any case that the Prince would return to England without having set foot on the United States territory; but there are different ways of visiting a country, and, as none repays attentive observation more than the American Republic, so none is likely to be so ill understood by a mere flying tourist. America is not a country of museums and palaces, to be "done" in so many days with a Murray's hand-book. Its interest consists in its people, in the phases of the civilization through which they are passing, in the political and commercial activity which they display, in their energy and restlessness, their greatness and their weaknesses. Although we can not expect that a youth in his nineteenth year should be able to appreciate the American Commonwealth; yet we feel sure that a journey through the United States and some association with the people would not be lost labor. Of a kind and courteous reception the son of Queen Victoria may be very sure.

The interests of Americans in the descendants of the former ruler of their country is second only to that of Englishmen themselves, and, whatever may have been formerly the case, the feeling is now one of good will and sympathy. The Prince of Wales might find both instruction and recreation in a visit to the Atlantic cities, whether it be New York in all its ambitions and span new splendor, or its more quiet rivals. There is much to be learned from a few weeks of such travel—more than a royal personage may ever afterward have an opportunity of learning. One who is called to such high destinies, and who will have such opportunities of directing the tastes of his countrymen, may advantageously study the progress in the arts of life by a people thrown, as it were, but yesterday on the shores of a new continent, a progress not less wonderful than their commercial prosperity. If the Prince of Wales should further visit the President of the United States, at Washington, the courtesy will, we feel sure, be appreciated, and tend to courtesy will, we feel sure, be appreciated, and tend to London Times.

SANGUINARY DRAMA AT ROME.

Full Particulars by an Eye Witness.

The correspondent of the London Times, writing from Rome, March 20th, gives the following particulars of the late collision, by which so many lives were sacrificed, and which seems only the precursor of more sanguinary events:

Yesterday Rome was the theatre of a sanguinary drama. I was a spectator of the whole scene, and have put myself, not without great personal risk, in a position to be able to give you minute and correct particulars.

On the 15th, the leaders of the Patriotic party sent forth a proclamation, which I here submit:

ROMANS! Gen. Garibaldi promotes a subscription for the purchase of 1,000,000 muskets (for which subscriptions were made in the United States) wherewith to accomplish the work of national redemption. Let us lay our own offerings on the altar of the country, and remember that for the present we can only give profits of self-denial and sacrifice. Bent upon our great purpose of reconstituting an independent and free Italy, we must persevere in that noble and dignified calmness which won us the gratitude of our sister cities and the sympathy of civilized nations. We trust to the justice of our cause, and the patriot zeal of those who are hastening its triumph, and we await in union and security the forthcoming day which will join us to the rest of the Italian family.

The Government provoked by the appearance of this proclamation, which was stuck up at every corner of the streets, in print, proceeded to arrests and perquisitions.—Through they were made aware of a great demonstration which was to take place as soon as the result of the plebiscite of Central Italy became known in this place. On Monday, in fact, it was arranged that a solumn but orderly promenade should take place along the Corso, between five and seven in the evening, to celebrate the annexation. Instructions had been given that the demonstration should take place with the usual calmness, and with exemplary moderation, avoiding even the slightest chance of a disturbance." In the morning the students, who, as usual, were assembled in their church to hear mass, immediately upon the termination of the "dinalless sacrifice," as it is called, set up the chant of the Te Deum, singing praises to heaven for the annexation. The director or rector of the church, mad with rage, jumps upon the benches, then leaps from one chair to another, crying out:

"Away, away with you, ye profaners of the temple. This is the house of God, the house of prayer! Ye are blaspheming!" Yet what the young men were singing was no profane ditty, but the holy Ambrosian hymn, "We praise thee, O Lord!" The director, however, was not to be appeased; he rushed out of the church, calling loudly for the police, and was followed by the students, who, once out in the open air, hooted and hissed him with all their might.

Five o'clock in the afternoon came. The Government, aware, as I said, of the intended demonstration, had spread a rumor that the promenade was to be not on the Corso, but out of the Porta Pia, where the grand Carnival demonstration had previously taken place. Their object was to weaken the assemblage of the multitude, and have it more helplessly at their discretion.

Five o'clock came, as I was telling you, and the Corso was already alive with the usual large number of private carriages and hackney coaches, in two rows, proceeding in contrary directions at a slow pace, agreeably to the custom. The footpaths were crowded with people of the of the middle classes, with their families; the women, I should say, rather outnumbering the men. Not one Roman gendarme, policeman or sbirro was to be seen. The usual patrols of French soldiers headed by gendarmes of the same nation, by their presence reassured the order-loving people. Six o'clock had not yet struck, when from every street, at every turning, bands of Pontifical gendarmes broke out, rudely pushing and elbowing their way to the right and left through the dense population, endeavoring by all manner of provocation to pick quarrels with them. The crowd, however, gave way before them with great forbearance, avoiding all collisions.

Meanwhile, in the adjoining Piazza Colonna, where I was, and in the Corso, from Piazza San Lorenzo in Lucina, and Via in Lucina, fresh bands of Papal gendarmes came down with an irrestible charge upon the people. After them, and in the wake opened through the crowd by their broad swords, there came the sbirri, in plain clothes, but armed with stilettoes and sword-canes. I am not able to tell you how many are the wounded. I saw the blows; I saw the blood. I should say hundreds must have been hit; my own blood runs cold only to recall to mind what I witnessed. Three of the French officers I saw myself bleeding. I saw women and children bleeding on the ground. The French officers again and again dashed through the crowd in the thickest of the fray, rescuing the defenceless people from the hands of their ruthless destroyers. Owing to their exertions order was to some extent restored. They showed the greatest sympathy with the people; they promised them redress and justice; they bore witness to their prudence and forbearance; they are willing, even to-day, to give evidence that the whole outrage was the result of the wanton provocation of the gendarmes. New arrests and perquisitions were made in the night.

ANNEXATION OF CENTRAL ITALY.

The King of Sardinia has taken the step for which he has long been preparing. He has laid his hand upon the patrimony of St. Peter. Modena and Parma had already been allowed to gravitate to the forming mass of Italian power, and the mere appearance of the decree which annexed them to Sardinia, would have caused but slight sensation. But this formal State paper is accompanied by a declaration which startles many who have accustomed themselves to believe that there was a real power latent under the threatenings and lamentations that came to us from Rome. This King of a half-formed kingdom, ostentatiously deserted by his great protectors, denounced as a sacrilegious robber, by all the adherents of the old Papacy throughout Christendom, and bitterly hated by every nation which, like Austria and Spain, makes religious bigotry the spring of its civil system, advances as calmly to seize a province of the States of the Church, as an English soldier would walk up to take a jewel out of the head of an Indian idol. When Farini lays before Victor Emmanuel, the result of the suffrages, his master declares his acceptance "not only of the States of Modena and Parma, but also of the Romagna, which has already separated itself from the Papal Government." Imitating the promptitude of his great confederate, the King of Sardinia has probably already put his troops in motion to take possession of the new province. There is always great virtue in possession, but at this crisis an accomplished fact is especially strong in its inertness. Who shall now move a Sardinian garrison out of Bologna? What police will be strong enough to call to arms the jaded and exhausted States, whose zeal for the priesthood has already well nigh eaten them up? Rumors are passing from month to month, how the zealots and the bigots and the perverts, and how others who are only curious in rare ceremonials, are packing up for a journey to Rome in the hope of seeing the unwonted forms of an excommunication of a Sovereign. Prince Victor Emmanuel must have calculated the effect of such a fulmination before he fulminated it, and must have convinced himself that among his own Italian subjects it would be but a by-word and a jest. The faithful Saroyards, who might have had scruples of conscience in obeying an excommunicated Sovereign, are transferred to an Emperor who is happily in the bosom of the Church; but as to the people of Lombardy, Modena, Parma, and the Romagna, any public act which may mark the hostility between their new Sovereign and their ancient tyrant, or the ally of their ancient tyrant, will be to them a claim to their confidence and affection. Moreover, these imprecations would have an unexpected acknowledgement, if the same curses which should expel Victor Emanuel from the pale of the Church, should also scare the French army from the city of Rome. It is clear that Victor Emanuel has ascertained either that these thunder-bolts will not fall or else that he can afford to despise them.

However, Massaroni himself could not pocket a booty with more politeness than does Victor Emanuel accept the Romagna. The expression of Sardinia's "deep devotion" must be very gratifying to the Holy Father when looking round upon his new Austrian lories, he comes to the conclusion that they are not numerous enough to chase his affectionate but rather predatory son. When the Kind declares that he is ready to defend the independence of the Supreme Minister of religion, he must inspire great confidence in the College of Cardinals; and when he promises to pay homage to the Sovereignty of the Pope he is probably as welcome as a gang of housebreakers who should ransack your cellars and drink your health in the contents of your best bins.—London Times.

TERRORS OF THE PAPAL ARMORY.

Our European advices make frequent reference to the threat of excommunication denounced against Victor Emanuel. It has been stated that the sentence would be executed as soon as the King should announce his acceptance of the Italian provinces. That acceptance has been signified, but it does not appear that the sentence has yet been formally pronounced, although mention is made of a "monitory," in which the King is informed that he is in fact excommunicated. In the minds of most persons in our day, the idea of excommunication excites but little of the emotion with which it used once to be associated.

The excommunication and interdict, we need not say to many of our readers, are different modes of punishment by which the Head of the Church visits its displeasure, and, according to the Catholic creed, the displeasure of Heaven, on such as it adjudges to be the sinners deserving of these penalties. The minor excommunication delars the offender from participation in the Lord's Supper. The major excommunication denies him a union in any Christian rite and all Christian solace. It is not only to be debarred from the Sacraments but refused admission to the house of God.

No priest can celebrate his marriage. His bones, if he die, cannot repose in consecrated earth, nor can the Christian burial service be read over them. If he is a monarch who is thus doomed, the subjects are absolved from their allegiance to him. No Christian can speak to him; nor the meanest Christian serve him, even in extremity, though he were perishing from cold and hunger. He is a legal and social outlaw and accurst; he is anathema maranatha. The interdict is a form of excommunication applied to a whole kingdom. In a kingdom lying under an interdict, the whole religious action of society is brought to a dead stand. The churches are closed; the bells are silenced in their towers, and the priest's voice at the altar. With the cessation of religious worship there is a cessation from all the other offices of the church. There is no longer marriages, burial or baptism. The dead are carried without ceremony by night to ground not blessed by a priest. The faithful put on the emblems of mourning at the death of their friends; "the mourners go about the streets." The effect of an interdict was in some instances terrible. King John of England withered before it. The execution of the severer Papal sentences has perfectly prostrated mighty sovereigns. Emperor have gone to Rome as suppliants to propitiate the anger of the Pope, and have only been pardoned on condition of the most abject humiliation.

Undoubtedly, even when the Church was at the height of its power, the cause in which it seized its spiritual arms, and the objects against which it levelled them, had much to do with the effect they produced. The Pope could prostrate King John of England, when he dared not attempt the same denunciation against other princes on the English throne. Thus Edward III., being threatened with excommunication, called on Parliament, and that body passed the famous Praemunire act, which punished any attempt to introduce a foreign power derogatory of the King's right, and was aimed at the assumption of setting the Pope's mandate over an act of Parliament or the King's proclamation. A person guilty of a premunire was punished by imprisonment and confiscation. The Bishops throughout England were forewarned that the King would scathe them if they broke this statute.

If Victor Emanuel is to be excommunicated, we are told the sentence will be pronounced at St. Peter's, either by the Pope or a Cardinal. The interior of the Church will be draped in black, the crucifix will be veiled, and torches lighted and extinguished one after another. Other solemn ceremonies of a funeral cast will figure in this grand act of denunciation. The Philadelphia Gazette, referring to the decree, says that the form of excommunication is one of the arcana, secrets only known to the highest authorities of the Church. These denunciations are sometimes framed pro hac vice, though in accordance with the practices of the Colleges. The published digest of the church omits many forms besides that of excommunication, such, for instance, as that used on the coronation and on the reception of penitent women in the Bosom of the Church, and the like. These may be found at the Jesuits' College at Vienna, which is, we believe, the depository of the arcana; also in the library of the Vatican; but they are sealed books to the multitude, and to all but those to whom the rulers of the church open the seal.

Whether or not there will be a formal excommunication can not be determined by the accounts we have. The probability is that if it is ventured on it will not seriously damage the King of Sardinia or the cause of Italian unity.—St Louis Republican

DEATH OF MRS. JAMESON, THE WRITER.

We record with much regret the death, after a few days' illness, of Mrs. JAMESON, the authoress, whose literary works were of a high class in art and social science, and who has left friends, not only in her own country, but in almost every capital in Europe, to lament her loss. Mrs. Jameson was the eldest daughter of Mr. Murphy, painter in ordinary to the Princess Charlotte, a well-known artist in the early part of the present century. She married Mr. Robert Jamson, the late Vice-Chancellor of Canada, whom she survived six years. Her literary labors commenced with the "Diary of an Ennuyee," in 1826, followed by numerous volumes on various subjects of biography and art. Her principal and most popular publications were her "Characteristics of Women," chiefly studies from Shakspeare; "Visits and Sketches at Home and Abroad," "Winter Studies and Summer Rambles in Canada." The latter work she regarded as peculiarly a record of her own social views and convictions. In 1842 she published the "Hand-Book to the Public Galleries of Art in and near London," which was the first of a series of artistic works of subsequent production, viz.; on "Sacred and Legendary Art, Legends of the Monastic Orders," "Legends of the Madonna," &c. One of her last publications was a revised and enlarged edition of "Memoirs of the Early Italian Painters," published by Mr. Murray. For two years past she had been engaged on a laborious and elaborately illustrated work announced by Messrs. Longman, and nearly completed, the "History of our Lord and of his Precursor, St. John the Baptist, with the Personages and Typical Subjects of the Old Testament, as represented in Christian Art." In the completion of this labor she had re-visited Italy and passed several months in Rome and other continental cities.—London Times.

TUSCANY.

The expelled Grand Duke of Tuscany is about to issue a protest, addressed to the crowned heads of Europe, against the violation of treaties and the violence done to the rights of legitimacy in the annexation of Tuscany to Sardinia.

He is low down on the list of dynasties which exist, and are tolerated in the face of the dogma, that families rule by divine right. England, France, Spain, Portugal, and Belgium, have each changed their dynasties in disregard of family rights and treaties. The Count de Chambord, so-disant Henry V, of France, and the Count de Paris as the successor of Louis Philippe, whom all Europe treated with as King, have been vainly seeking for recognition of a title to the throne from which the treaties of Europe prescribed the family of the Bonapattes. The Count de Montemolin shows a hereditary claim under Spanish law to the throne of Isabella II. Leopold of Belgium is King by a successful revolution which overthrew the settlement of the treaty of Vienna, and the same great powers put a Italian Prince on the throne of revolutionized Greece. The ex-Duke of Tuscany will hardly persuade the monarchs of Europe, at this day, to revive in his favor, the despotic dogmas which the spirit of the age has outgrown, and which they have one and all, at some time heretofore, set aside, as impossible to be safely applied to Europe in its present state. Ferdinand may protest loud and long, but he may be content if he succeeds in exchanging his claims for a comfortable pension to enable him to live somewhere in obscurity at his ease. He has never shown any qualities which make it likely that he can do any thing to take care of himself.

The expelled Grand Dukes are Austrian by descent, but of a stock partly French in its origin. The Grand Duchy of Tuscany grew, by various successive accretions, out of the ancient republic of Florence, of which the reigning family was de Medici. Florence, originally a dependency of the German Empire, purchased its independence of the Emperor Rudolph, at the close of the thirteenth century. In the growth of the republic by conquest and purchase into the Grand Duchy of Tuscany, the Medici became rulers, and had the title of Grand Duke conferred to them early in the sixteenth century. The house of Medici flourished till its extinction in the year 1737. Tuscany then fell to the house of Lorraine, not by any hereditary right, but by virtue of the treaty of peace between Austria, Russia and France, which terminated the war of Polish succession. These powers agreed that after the death of John Gaston de Medici, Grand Duke of Tuscany, the last of his race, that Francis, Duke of Lorraine, should have Tuscany, and Stanislaus, the exhaunt to the Polish throne, should have Lorraine. When John Gaston died this arrangement took effect. Francis became Grand Duke of Tuscany, and by marrying the celebrated Empress Maria Theresa, carried Tuscany into the Imperial family of Austria. Stanislaus took Lorraine, and dying, left it to his daughter, who had married Louis XV, and thus Lorraine came into the possession of France. The expelled Grand Duke, Ferdinand IV., is fourth in descent from this Lorraine Francis, through the succession of Leopold I., Ferdinand III., Leopold II., Ferdinand IV., with whom ends the line of Hapsburg-Lorraine, and causes the extinction of Tuscany as a separate State. Austrian and French influences have been resisted and expunged, and two millions of intelligent Tuscans unite themselves with ten other millions animated with a zealous and enlightened aspiration to build up one strong Italian State, founded on popular rights and devoted to popular progress.—Piray-mus.

DOMESTIC.

Arrival of the Japanese Embassy.

The U. S. steamer Powhatan, Flag Officer J. Tattnall, with the Japanese embassy, composed of two chief Ambassadors, eighteen other officials, and a number of servants, which sailed from Jeddo the 4th of February, arrived at San Francisco on the 27th ult.

They were warmly greeted by the citizens of San Francisco, who extended them courtesies calculated to make them feel at home and impress them with a favorable idea of their hospitality and refinement.

The embassy, after a short stay in San Francisco, will proceed to Panama, thence by a train across the Isthmus, and thence by a U. S. vessel to Washington, where the new treaty will be ratified.

Rush to the Washoe Mines.

Advices received from Carson City states that emigrants are pouring in from all parts of California. Every day large pack trains of mules leave for the Washoe diggings, and the excitement in that quarter continues unabated.

The stages from different quarters arrive daily, crowded with strangers, all eager to get to the land of promise.

The most absurd stories are believed, and a stranger is looked upon coldly and suspiciously if he presumes to doubt the most extravagant rumors.

Steam Communication between San Francisco and Japan.

A company is being organized in the city of San Francisco, for the purpose of taking into consideration the propriety of running screw steamers to Japan.

FOREIGN.

The Savoy Question.

The Paris Patrie says that the Sardinian troops have commenced the evacuation of Savoy, and that the first detachment of French troops returned from Lombardy, will arrive at Savoy on 25th March.

M. Thouvenel's last dispatch to Count de Persigny, containing explanations for the British Government relative to the annexation of Savoy, was published in the Moniteur on the 22d. It contains little but what has been previously stated. It points out the necessity for the revision of the French frontiers; reiterates the Emperor's respect for existing treaties; claims that this is purely an exceptional case; shows that the cession will be made without violence, and free from all constraint, and concludes by expressing confidence that England will see that the situation of France has required the consummation of this project.

The London Times, in an editorial, admits that the annexation must be quietly allowed, but at the same time denounces the act as one of spoliation and wrong, and le principle as bad as a march upon the Rhine or a sudden attempt on Antwerp.—It adds, it must leave on all minds that there is no safety, except in continual watchfulness and preparation against the aggressions of a Sovereign who thus seizes upon the possessions of a friendly power.

The Paris correspondent of the London Times says that all the powers had replied to France relative to Savoy, and gives the following as the substance of their notes:

Russia says that so long as the right of the people to select rulers is not put forward by France, and that as the present change does not affect the balance of power of Europe, what Sardinia may do with Savoy is no business of hers.

Prussia says that as the Emperor of France formally disavows the doctrine of natural frontiers, the transfer of Savoy is no business of hers.

Austria declares that she certainly does not approve of any annexation of the kind, but as Europe stood by when other annexations were effected, she does not see what she has to do with the annexation of Savoy.

Six French regiments are said to have taken possession of Chablais and Faucigny.

A French frigate had arrived off Nice, and several steamships were expected there on the 26th. The population of Nice had signed a petition against the representative of the municipality.

France.

Gen. Dufour, who is on a special mission from Switzerland, had an interview with the Emperor, and expressed himself satisfied with his assurances to respect Swiss interests.

The fleet now lying at Toulon has received orders to be ready for sea.

It is asserted that the French Government, while still retaining Chablais and Faucigny, is indispesed to give most solemn guarantees to Switzerland and Europe that Swiss interests shall be protected.

The Grand Duke Michael had arrived at Toulon incognito, where he is inspecting the newly constructed portable gun-boats with a view to the application of the new system on the Amoor river.

Orders had been issued for the formation of two camps additional to that of Chalons, one consisting of infantry near Stenar, and the other of cavalry at Luneville, near the Prussian frontier.

Le Nord says the reply of the British Government had reached Paris, and it was understood that it had not renounced all hope of preventing annexation, or, at least, of reducing it to proportions which would make it a constant source of embarrassment to France.

The Emperor Napoleon, in receiving the deputation from Savoy, stated that the re-union of Savoy and Nice to France had been resolved on in principle. The assent of Piedmont, and of the population, had been obtained, and the negotiations with the Powers who signed the treaty of 1815 permitted the hope of a favorable examination of the question by the greater part of them.

Italy.

The French army in Lombardy commenced its return on the 21st.

The Sardinian Council of State had decided that the concordat concluded by Austria with the Pope is not binding in Lombardy.

The Ex-Duke of Tuscany is preparing to protest against his fate.

Baron Ricasoli reached Turin on the 22d, and presented to the King of Sardinia the vote of Tuscany on the annexation question. The king in response to a congratulatory speech by Ricasoli, said: "I accept the vote of Tuscany, which, after having been expressed by the National Assembly, is now confirmed by an unanimity of popular suffrage. Tuscany, in associating her destinies with those of Piedmont, far from renouncing, continues her glorious traditions and augments their importance, by uniting them to those of the other parties of the State. The Parliament in which the Representatives of Tuscany will take seats beside those of Piedmont, Lombardy and the Armelia will bring the laws of the country into conformity with the truthful principle of liberty. Thus Tuscany will enjoy the blessing of administrative autonomy without weakening the union of power and the national will upon which the prosperity and independence of the country are principally dependant."

The King then signed a decree annexing Tuscany to Sardinia.

It is ordered that on the promulgation of the decree annexing Tuscany to Piedmont the French delegation at Florence would be dissolved and return to Leghorn.

The Paris Constitutionnel, in an article by its principal editor, says the withdrawal of the French troops from Italy must not be considered a sign of coolness between France and Sardinia. France leaves Lombardy because its independence is irrevocably assured. Austria only intends to act in defence of the frontier of Venetia. The loyalty of the French policy could not occasion any embarrassment on that subject. The withdrawal of the French army from Italy is therefore a sign of the approaching solution of the question of Italy, and not a sign of complication, which the wisdom as well as the interest of Piedmont will know how to prevent.

It was reported that Cavour would be Minister of Marine in the Sardinian Council.

Prince Carignan was expected to proceed to Florence on the 26th, not as Regent, but as the King's Governor at Tuscany.

The Ex-Grand Duke of Tuscany was preparing a protest, addressed to the European powers, and a manifesto to the Tuscans, against the flagrant violation of treaties that has taken place.

The Duchess Regent of Parma has appealed to the Great Powers to support her protest.

A demonstration had taken place at Rome in honor of the birth-day of Garibaldi. The soldiers dispersed the crowds, and a number of persons were wounded.

Austria.

The agitation in Hungary continued, and numerous arrests had been made in Pesth.

The Swiss Charge d'Affaires at Vienna had presented to Count Rechberg a circular note in which the Federal Council protests to the Powers who guaranteed the treaties of Vienna against any measure having for its object the incorporation of Chablais and Faucigny with the French Empire. Count Rechberg replied that Austria reserves her definitive reply until she has ascertained the disposition of Europe; but he remluded the Minister that last year, when the French troops were conveyed by railroad from Culoz to Chemberg, the Austrian cabinet in vain presented to Switzerland, as well as to the Great Powers, that the neutrality of that part of Savoy should be respected, but by the passage of the French troops that neutrality was openly violated, contrary to the treaty of 1815.

Letters from Pesth report that many arrests in that city had been made, and revolutionary proclamations ere said to have been discovered by the police.

Many rifled cannon had been recently made in Austria, and were supposed to have been sent to Venetia.

The Austrian government was raising at home a new loan of 200,000,000 florins, interest at five per cent., payable in fifty-seven years by means of lottery drawings.

Savoy and Nice to be Released from Allegiance.

The complication of the state of affairs in Italy seems to be much increased.

The Pope excommunicated King Victor Emanuel on the 26th ult., as a plunderer of the Church.

An act of excommunication against those who are aiding and consenting a rebellion for an invasion in Romagna, made its appearance under publication in the city of Rome on the 26th ult.

General Garibaldi has been elected a deputy from the Territory of Nice.

The King of Sardinia has published a proclamation, by which he releases the inhabitants of Savoy and Nice from further allegiance.

The late massacre at Rome appears to have been much more serious than was at first presumed. The number of persons killed and wounded is reckoned at 183. A number of ladies were more or less injured. The American Consul was stabbed in the side. The wound inflicted is but a slight one.

Dispatches received from Vienna says that the Austrian Cabinet has addressed a note to the Cabinet of Turin, in which it sternly protests against the annexation of Tuscany, Parma and Modena to Piedmont.

The Ambassadors of the Western Powers at Naples have urged reforms on the King.

The Ministry has sent in its resignation, but it has not yet been accepted by the King.

The latest advices received from Rome, state that in case the city should be evacuated by the French troops, the Pontifical troops and the army of Naples will enter the Marches.

Three thousand of the Papal troops are conc

Poetry.

A COURT LADY.

The following beautiful poem, from from the pen of one of the most gifted women of the age, will be welcomed and appreciated by our readers, not only as giving a touching picture of Italy after the war, but as delicately conveying the author's political views in reference to that proposed arrangement in the Italian States, which is now the chief question of European politics. It is proper to mention that Mrs. Browning is a Napoleonist, and looks with enthusiasm for the freedom of Italy through the aid of France:

Her hair was tawny with gold, her eyes with purple were dark;
Her cheeks' pale opal burnt with a red and restless spark.

Never was lady of Milan nobler in name and in race;
Never was lady of Italy fairer to see in the face.

Never was lady on earth more true as woman and wife,
Larger in judgment and instinct, prouder in manners and life.

She stood in the early morning, and said to her maidens, "Bring
That silken robe made ready to wear at the court of the king.

"Bring me the cheque of diamond, lucid, clear of the mote;
Clasp me the large at the waist, and clasp me the small at the throat.

"Diamonds to fasten the hair, and diamonds to fasten the sleeves, Loose to drop from their rays, like a powder of snow from the moon."

Gorgeous she entered the sunlight which gathered her up in a flame,
While, straight in her open carriage, she to the Hospital came.

In the west at the door, and gazing from end to end,
Many and low are the pallets, but each is the place of a friend."

Up she passed through the wards, and stood at a young man's bed;
Bloody the head on his brow, and livid the droop of his head.

"Art thou a Lombard, my brother? Happy art thou!" she cried,
And smiled like Italy on him; he dreamed in her face, and died.

Pale with his passing soul, she went on still to a second:
He was a grave, hard man, whose years by dangerous wars were reckoned.

Wounds in his body were sore wounds in his life were sorer.
"Art thou a Bourgeois?" Her eyes drove lightnings before her.

"Austrian and priest had joined to double and tighten the cord
Able to bind these, O strong one!—free by the strokes of a sword.

"Now be grave for the rest of us, using the life overcast
To ripen our wine of the present (too new), in glooms of the past."

Down she stepped to a pallet where lay a face like a girl's,
Young, and pathetic with dying—a deep black hole in the curls.

"Art thou from Tuscany, brother? and sweet thou, dreaming in pain, Thy mother stand in the piazza, searching the list of the slain?"

Died as a mother herself she touched his cheek with her hands:
"Blessed is she who has borne thee, although she should weep as she stands."

On she passed to a Frenchman, his arm carried off by a ball;
Kneeling, "O more than my brother, how shall I thank thee for all?

"Think of the heroes around us has fought for his land and line,
But thou hast fought for a stranger, in hate of a wrong not thine.

"Happy are all free peoples, too strong to be dispossessed;
But kneel are those among nations who dare to be strong for the rest!"

Over she passed on her way, and came to a couch where pined
One with a face from Venitia, white with a hope out of mind.

Only a tear for Venice?—she turned as in presence of a distressed
And stooped to his forehead and—[illegible] the majority
Who are always [illegible] passion and loss,
The day will come [illegible] it, as if she were kissing
Peace—a breakfast.
Pallet with [illegible] of pure sister, will chief strain of heart she moved on then to another, sort—[illegible] strong in his death. "And dost thou suffer, my brother?"

Holding his hands in hers: "Out of the Pledgeot lion Cometh the sweetness of freedom! sweetest to live or to die on."

Holding his cold rough hands—"Well, oh, well have ye done
In noble, noble Piedmont, who would not be noble alone."

Back he fell while she spoke. She rose to her feet with a spring.
"That was a Piedmontese! and this is the Court of the King!"

Children's Column.

AN HONEST ARAB.

We had been on a fishing tour in the Highlands of Scotland, and, en route to town, were idling a day or two in "the gray metropolis of the north." "Scotchman, Xpress, Merkery, Fawcess, penny a hunder—this day's Scotchman, Sir!" shouted a shrill-piped, ragged little imp at the fag end of a cold, wet, bitter day in October, as we stood blowing a cloud at the door of the New Royal in Princes Street.

"No, we don't want any."

"Fawcess, penny a hunder, Sir!; this day's paper, Sir—half price, Sir—only a bawbee;" persisted the young countryman of Adam Smith, as the market showed symptoms of decline, and threatened to close decidedly flat.

"Get along, Bird's-eye, don't want any," growled Phillips.

"They're gude fawcess, Sir, penny a hunder."

"Don't smoke." Phillips, loquitur. whif, whif, whif.

"They're gude fawcess, Sir, hundur and twenty for a penny, Sir," coming round on my flank.

"No, don't want 'em, my boy."

The keen blue face, red bare feet ingrained with dirt, and bundle of scanty rags, looked piteously up at me, moved off a little, but still hovered near us. Now, when I put down my first subscription to the One Tun Ragged School in Westminster, I took a mental pledge from myself to encourage vagrant children in the streets no more. Somehow in this instance that pledge wouldn't stand by me, but gave way.

"Give us a penn'orth, young un."

"Yes, Sir—they dinna smell."

"If the lasifers don't, the son of Lucifer does," threw in Phillips.

"Ah, I haven't got a copper, little 'un, nothing less than a shilling; so, never mind, my boy, I'll buy from you to-morrow."

"Buy them the night, if you please. I'm very hungrey, Sir."

"He'll give you his check for the balance, Geff."

His little cold face, which had lightened up, now fell, for, from his bundle of papers, I saw his sales had been few that day.

"I'll gang for change, Sir."

"Well, little 'un, I'll try you—now be a good boy, and bring me the change to-morrow morning to the hotel—ask for Mr. Turner."

"Give my friend your word of honor, as a gentleman, as security for the bob."

"As sure's death, Sir, I'll bring the change the morn," was the promise of young Lucifer before he vanished with the shilling.

"Well, Turner," as we strolled along Princes Street, "if you don't expect to see your brimstone friend again, do you?"

"I do."

"Your friend will dishonor his I.O.U. as sure as—"

"Well, I won't grieve about the money; but I think I can trust the boy."

"Can? Why, you have trusted him; and your deliberation savors remarkably of the wisdom of the historical stable-keeper, who began to think about shutting the door when—but the illustration don't seem to strike you as a novelty."

"Well, we'll see."

"Yes, wonders, but not young Brimstone and your money."

Next morning was spent in "doing" the lions.

On our return to the inn, I inquired:

"Waiter, did a little boy call for me to-day?"

"Boy, Sir?—call Sir? No, sir."

"Of course, Geff, he didn't. Did you really expect to see your young Arab again?"

"Indeed I did, Charley. I wish he had proved honest."

"Then, oh Lucifer, son of the morning, how thou art fallen!"

Later in the evening a small boy was introduced, who wished to speak with me. He was a duod-cimo edition of the small octave of the previous day, got up with less outlay of capital—a shoeless, shirtless, shrunk, ragged, wretched, keen witted Arab of the streets and closes of the city. He was so very small and cold and childlike—though with the same shivering feet and frame, thin, blue cold face, down which tears had worn their weary channels—that I saw at once the child was not my friend of the previous night.

"Enter Antonio to redeem his bond!" said Phillips.

He stood a few minutes diving and rummaging into the recesses of his rags; at last little Tom Thumb said:

"Are you the gentleman that boucht fewzees frae Sandy yesterday?"

"Yes, my little man."

"Weel, here's a sevenpence (counting out divers copper coins), Sandy canna come; he's no weel; a cart ran ow'r him the day, and broken his legs, and lost his bannet, and his fewzees, and your fourpence-piece, and his knife, and he's no weel. He's no weel ava, and the doc—tor says—says he's dee—in, and—and that's a' he can gin you noo." And the poor child, commencing with sobs, ended in a sore fit of crying.

I gave him food, for, though his cup of sorrow was full enough, his stomach was empty, as he looked wistfully at the display on the tea-table.

"Are you Sandy's brother?"

Ay, Sir;" and the flood-gates of his heart again opened.

"Where do you live? Are your father and mother alive?"

"We bide in Blackfriars Wynd in the Coogate. My mither's dead, and father's awa, and we bide whiles wi' our gudemither," sobbing bitterly.

"Where did this accident happen?"

"Near the college, Sir."

Calling a cab, we were speedily set down at Blackfriars Wynd. I had never before penetrated the wretchedness of these ancient closes by day, and here I entered one by night, and almost alone. Preceded by my little guide, I entered a dark, wide, winding stair, until climbing many flights of stairs, in total darkness, he opened a door, whence a light maintained a feeble unequal struggle with the thick, close-smelling, heavy gloom. My courage nearly gave way as the spectacle of that room burst upon me.—In an apartment, certainly spacious in extent but scarcely made visible by one guttering candle stuck in a bottle, were an overcrowded mass of wretched beings sleeping on miserable beds spread out upon the floor, or squatted or reclining upon the cold unfurnished boards.

Stepping over a prostrate quarrelling drunkard, I found little Sandy on a bed of carpenter's shavings on the floor. He was still in his rags, and a torn and scanty coverlet had been thrown over him. Poor lad! he was so changed. His sharp pallid face was clammy and cold—beads of the sweat of agony standing on his brow—his bruised and mangled body lay motionless and still, except when sobs and moaning heaved his fluttering breast. A bloated woman, in maudlin drunkenness, (the dead or banished father's second wife, and not his mother), now and then bathed his lips with whiskey and water, whilst she applied to her own a bottle of spirits to drown the grief she incouped and assumed. A doctor from the Royal Infirmary had called and left some medicine to soothe the poor lad's agony (for his case was hopeless, even though he had been taken at first, as he ought to have been, to the Infirmary in the neighborhood), but his tip-y nurse had forgotten to administer it. I applied it, and had him placed on a less miserable bed of straw, and feeling a woman, an occupant of the room, to attend him during the night, I gave what directions I could, and left the degraded, squalid home.

Next morning I was again in Blackfriars Wynd. Its close, pestilential air, and towering, antique, dilapidated mansions (the abode of the peerage in the far-off times) now struck my senses. Above a door-way way was carved upon the stone—"Except ye Lord do build ye house, ye builders build in vain."

I said the room was spacious; it was almost noble in its proportions. The walls of paneled oak sadly marred, a massive marble mantle-piece of cunning carving, ruthlessly broken and disfigured, enameled tiles around the fire-place, once representing some Bible-story, now sore despoiled and cracked, and the ceiling festooned with antique fruit and flowers, spared in the general Vandal wreck. With the exception of a broken chair, furniture there was none in that stifling den. Its occupants, said the surgeon whom I found at the sufferer's bed, were chiefly of one nation, pants, and the poor lad's step-mother—who had taken him from the ragged school that she might drink of his pitiful earnings—was as sunk in infamy as any there.

For the patient medical skill was naught, for he was sinking fast. The soul looking from his light-blue eyes was slowly ebbing out, his pallid cheeks were sunk and thin, but consciousness returned, and his lamp was flickering up before it sunk forever. As I took his feeble hand, a flicker of recognition seemed to gleam across his face.

"I got tha change, and wan comin'—"

My poor boy, you were very honest. Have you any wish—any thing, poor child, I can do for you? I promise to—"

"Renby, I'm sure I'm deein', wha will take care o' you noo?"

Little Reuben was instantly in a fit of crying, and threw himself prostrate on the bed. "Oh, Sandy! Sandy! Sandy!" sobbed his little heart.

"I will see to your little brother."

"Thank you, Sir. I Diuna—didna leave me, Reu—Reu—by. I'm com—comin', comin'—"

"Whist! whist!" cried little Raub, looking up, and turning round to implore some silence in the room. That moment the calm faded smile, that [illegible] alighted as a momentary visitant [illegible] seemed to have passed away, the eyes became [illegible] upon his face, slowly little life imperceptibly [illegible] all became blank and glazed, and his hop—[illegible] publy rippled out.

[illegible] boy lies in the Canongate churchyard, not of from the grave stone put up by Burns to the memory of Fergusson, his brother poet, and I have little Reuben at Dr. Guthrie's ragged school, and receive excellent accounts of him, and from him.

"What of your young Arab, Turcer?" said Phillips, the following afternoon. "Was he honest, and is he really ill?"

"Yes Phillips, he was an honest Arab; but now he is where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest."

EXTRAORDINARY HOAX.

The Manchester (England) Guardian, of February 28, has the following account of an extraordinary hoax at Warrington, Lancashire:

On Saturday, a hoax of a most extraordinary and impudent kind was played off at Warrington. It appears that some waggish individual, at present unknown, last week addressed letters to various gentlemen and traders in the town, dating from the Rectory, and purporting to be signed by the Rector, the Rev. W. Quekett, giving invitations and orders to an almost incredible amount. On Saturday morning, about 11 o'clock, that end of Church-street that fronts the Rectory presented a curious aspect. Crowds of people had gathered, and were watching the fun, as butchers and sweeps and bakers made their appearance at the house of the Rector. Mr. Quekett, as may well be imagined, was nigh frantic at seeing the numerous articles that were being deposited at his door; and it really was no joke to be presented by seven carters, each of whom had brought a load of coals, and was determined not to be gammooed into taking them back. Nor was it at all a laughing matter to be troubled with sweeps, and butchers, and doctors, all seeking an entree. While a squabble was going on between the coal-carters and domestics, up drove two empty carts, the drivers having orders, as they said, to take the Rector's luggage down to the railway station; and confusion was worse confounded by the arrival of a joiner, armed with full instructions to measure Mr. Quekett for a coffin. The bewildered servants astonished "ohips" by telling him he had better ask the master himself," and feeling himself "done," he walked off amid the derisive cheers from the people outside. The joiner had barely left the door when four sweeps made their appearance, eyeing each other askance, as they thought it quare thur on us should be caw'd to sweep one chimney." They were undecided at last, but not without some difficulty, and the disputation had scarcely closed between them and the Rector's servants when the Mayor's carriage was announced, and out stepped the chief magistrate, expecting to take luncheon with his reverend friend. A few words sufficed to show His Worship how matters stood, and he was preparing to leave, when two celebrated members of the medical fraternity made their appearance. Perhaps they were sent for to prepare the Rector for the services of the joiner.—Eight butcher boys, with prime joints, next besieged the Rector's door, supplemented by a lad with a handcart full of currant bread, which had been prepared for some party that was to take place. Explanations ensued, but a barber who had come to shave the Rector would not believe the news, and he had to be told to depart. After the coals came the liquors. Men with porter and wine arrived from various merchants in the town, each morally certain, as he knocked at the door, that his were the only things ordered. All were, however, doomed to disappointment, and they had to return as heavily laden as they came; and so had the fishmonger's boy with a barrel of oysters. A cab next drove up, but drove away as it came, empty, the drivers looking as pleasant as was possible under the circumstances. A couple of cartloads of bricks were next driven up to the door, followed by a boy with a truck laden with buckets and tubs, and another with a barrowful of spades, all the parties being evidently in a state of deep mystification at the crowd, the coals, the sweeps, and the butchers, their intellect being out at all cleared by the lusty cheers with which they were greeted. The matter has been placed in the hands of the police, and every effort is being made to discover the author of this outrageous trick.

AN ARMY REVIEWED BY A LION.

The author of a recent work on Algeria relates the following incident, which occured while marching with a body of French troops on their way to attack the Kabyles:

We had ridden carelessly forward, admiring the view, or speculating on the game to be found in those mountain passes, when the sudden halt and the unalinging of carbines startled us. Pushing past the rear files, we galloped to the front just in time to prevent the sergeant who led the advance firing at a noble lion, who, advancing towards the same path which we are pursuing, had halted abruptly at our view. He had evidently come from a different direction to the one we were pursuing, and was making to the very pile of the mountains whose sombre colors had excited our curiosity. Five minutes later, and we should not have seen him; but, as it happened, there he stood, evidently very much astonished at this plumping so suddenly on so large a party. Were we in fire, we should doubtless either kill or mortally wound the animal. In the first case, all would be well, and we should be the richer by a hon's skin; in the second place, we should be sure to lose one or more men, and it was a responsibility the young officer in command would not assume. Hastily giving the order to unsling the carbines, he closed up the men with some difficulty, for the horses were very restive. In case the lion showed a disposition to attack, all were to face toward him, and it was to be hoped a general discharge would prove mortal. If disposed to let us do so, were to pass him quietly.

I have often heard that the lion by day in no way resembles the same animal by night. During the darkness, seeking his prey where he can find it, he will attack anything with the greatest ferocity; but, during the daytime, it being its proper period of sleep, and being besides, generally gorged with food, he seldom attacks man. In the present instance, I had little confidence in the effect of our fire, for our horses, as their riders approached their dreaded enemy, became more and more alarmed and restive. The lion was, doubtless, the one I had heard roar in the distance the previous night, and he had been to the other side, seeking his food among the donors of the native tribes near Tenient, from which he was now returning to his den.

Our files were closed up—we neared the lion who showed no symptoms of fear; gazed at us, not savagely, but apparently with great enrlosity. Then he moved his tail to and fro, like a large cat; and, as we neared him, he deliberately sat down on his hind quarters, looking then, for all the world, like a queer colored, large Newfoundland dog. Just as we ranged up with him, passing by in single file, the horses' heads and tails were together, he opened his large mouth with a mighty yawn, uttering, as he did so, a sound between a heavy sigh and a groan. This he did without rising, and in a most sleepy manner, as though he were supremely indifferent to our presence.

All this time our horses were terribly excited, and my own, a jet black Syrian barb, which had carried me many a mile over the plains of Wuldschina and Rommello, and who, from his intense love of mischief and fighting, I had long since christened "Beshi-Bazourk," was now completely cowed, and though walking at a very slow pace from the lion, and I could not resist the fancy that seized me to rein in and look at him. Trembling in every limb, my horse obeyed me, and as the rear files of our escort moved passed, I contemplated the noble brute. He was a splendid male, of the color called by the natives the "black lion," and which, they say, is the most fierce and terrible of all. He seemed sleepy and quiet enough, just then, and did not even look at me. The jangling of the men's arms appeared to catch his attention; and it was, indeed, but a moment's space that allowed me for contemplation, for a slight move on his part caused my horse to bound aside so as almost to unhorse me; and when I recovered my seat and my power over my frightened steed, the sleepy fellow had deliberately laid down, and resting his noble head on two mighty paws, he followed us with his eyes as we moved slowly away.

CONVERSION OF CHILDREN.

The following interesting account of a revival among the children in Cinstable, England, is taken from the London Watchman:

Two or three weeks ago four boys of our Sunday-school, about ten or eleven years of age, became convinced of sin, and began to hold prayer-meetings in the fields. They all found mercy. They then prayed for their brothers and companions. Their numbers increased, all the new comers finding mercy, until twenty were found, all converted.—They held meetings for every day from one to two o'clock and from half-past five to seven. Their number still increased, until last week they had forty in Mr. W——'n loft, all of whom are either rejoicing in Christ or earnestly seeking salvation. Last Sunday was a good day at school; after the evening service nine boys, some of whom were the most unpromising in school, stayed at the prayer meeting, and all found peace. I went to the prayer-meeting on Monday night, and was surprised to see thirty boys, all under thirteen years of age, in the gallery. Others came to until there were fifty, including some of the elder scholars. They were very quiet during the meeting. At a few minutes to eight Mr. Barnley said, "two more will pray," when one of the boys began, then another, until in about two minutes ten had prayed, with great earnestness and simplicity. They prayed for the school, their teachers, superintendents, ministers, parents, sisters, brothers, school-fellows, backsliders, the heathen, and the world.—About half-past eight we concluded. At nine the united prayer-meeting at the market commenced; a dozen of the elder boys were present, and were evidently under a gracious influence. One poor ignorant boy, who found peace only the night before, prayed with great propriety. Another boy at the meeting of adults to-day prayed and pleaded until the whole meeting were in tears. No one has had any hand in organizing this work of God; it is the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes. It is creating quite a sensation in the town. We are expecting greater things than these. To-morrow week united service will be continued. A FURLONG.

HOW VICTORIA TRAINS HER CHILDREN.

A primary regard is paid to moral and religious duties. They rise early, breakfast at eight, and dine at two. Their various occupations are allotted out, with almost military precision. One hour finds them engaged in the study of the ancient, another of the modern authors, their acquaintance with the languages being first found on a thorough knowledge of their grammatical construction, and afterwards familiarized and perfected by conversation.—Next they are trained in those military exercises which give dignity and bearing. Another hour is agreeably filled up with the light accomplishments of music and dancing. Again the happy party assemble in the riding-school, where they may be seen deeply interested in the various evolutions of the menage. Thence—while drawing and the further exercise of music, and the lighter accomplishments, call off the attention of their sisters—the young princes proceed to busily engage themselves in a carpenter's shop, fitted up expressly for them, at the wish of the royal consort, with a turning lathe and other tools essential to a thorough knowledge of the craft. They thus become not only theoretically but practically acquainted with the useful arts of life. A small laboratory is occasionally brought into requisition, at the instance also of their royal father, and the minds of the children are thus led from a contemplation of the curiosities of chemical science and the wonders of nature to an inquiry into their causes. This done, the young carpenters and students throw down their saws and axes, unbuckle their philosophy, and shoulder their miniature percussion-guns—which they handle with the dexterity of practised sportsmen—for a shooting stroll through the Royal Gardens.—The evening meal, the preparation for the morning lessons, and brief religious instruction, close the day.

REV. THOS. H. STOCKTON.

This eminent clergyman, now chaplain to the House of Congress, was recently compelled to suspend the publication of a small religious journal, in Philadelphia, for the want of support. In announcing the suspension, he feelingly remarked: "It seems hard, to the midst of daily struggles with sickness and death, without any private means, without regular pastoral position or support. In a condition far poorer than that of simple poverty, toiling, though unable to toil, and steadily sinking, notwithstanding all toils; we repeat it, it is hard to be driven to one's wits end, hemmed in, crushed out from the very center of a great Christian public, a vast, mighty, wealthy, and exultant brotherhood, yet callous as statues and careless as etques."

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

MRS. CLARISA YOUNG, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Wuritzell, was born in Capenay County, State of New Jersey, November 14th, 1794. She embraced religion and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in early life; was married to Mr. T. Young in 1812, and moved to this place in 1833; brought her certificate of membership with her; in 1842 she was one of five that composed the first Methodist Society in this place—the year that the Rev. Q. Y. M'Nab had charge here. She remained a member of the same Society until God called her to himself. She died in great peace on Sabbath morning, Feb. 5, 1860. She left an aged companion, two sons and one daughter. She sleeps in the grave, where three of her class-mates that joined the church with her had gone before, leaving only one of the original number, who is our class-leader; but he is not alone—God has raised up others to fill the vacant seats in our church, and we now number about seventy members; and we still look for better times. To God be all the glory.

MATTHEW D. THOMASON.

Biloxi, April 3, 1860.

MRS. MARY MINOR died of cancer, 18th November, 1859, at the residence of John H. Sharp, Cass Co., Texas, aged 75 years. For forty years she was a consistent member of the M. E. Church. She endured her affliction with Christian fortitude. Complaint was never heard: she often expressed her faith that "God did all things well." When suffering each excruciating pain as to cause those who waited around her bed to shed tears of sympathy, she would say, "weep not, my dear children, for every pang I suffer brings me nearer to my blessed home." She cheerfully bore testimony that there was a sufficiency in God's grace to make the soul rise superior to all pain, toil, and care. A Christian in health, she was happy in affliction; "tranquil amidst death's alarms."

C. L. HAMMILL.

MATTHEW G. PALMER died 16th March, at his residence in Claiborne Parish, La., after a long and protracted illness, in the forty third year of his age. He was a consistent member of the Methodist Church, and had been for a number of years. He was possessed of all those christian virtues and graces that adorn the lives of men. He was not, however, permitted to express any wish, or to testify to the grace of God in his last moments, death came depriving him of that consciousness desirable in the dying hour. But his past life was sufficient to justify us in believing he died the death of the righteous. He was a kind husband, an affectionate father, and an indulgent master. He leaves a companion and three children, as well as a large circle of friends and acquaintances, to mourn his death. But their loss has been his eternal gain.

J. D. H.

RACHAEL H. PEARCE, wife of Rev. W. P. Pearce, and daughter of Henry and Susannah Hennington, born in Jones county, Miss., died March 1, 1860. She was a child of much affliction, but learned to be patient in her sufferings and to resign her all into the hands of Jesus. She said that she was confident that as soon as she died she would go straight to heaven, and then continued to shout and praise God, saying, "Peace on earth and good-will among men." All was peace in her soul.—She professed religion in the days of her youth; joined the Methodist Church, and has been an acceptable member ever since. She had many virtues and many friends.

WESLEY.

RICHMOND A. M'LEOD died of consumption 30th January, 1860, after two years suffering. He made a profession of religion a few days before his death. He had been raised by religious parents, and knew well how to approach the mercy-seat. A few hours before his death his father asked him if he was ready to meet his God. "Father," said he, "I earnestly repent of all my sins." His father again inquired, some time after that, of his unwillingness to die. He seemed perfectly resigned to the will of God, and said he felt that God, for the Redeemer's sake, had pardoned all his sins. He leaves many friends to mourn his loss.

P. M. FEATHERSTON.

JOHN PERCY, infant son of Simeon T. and Maggie M. Goodwyn, aged 11 months and 20 days. Johnnie was our household pet; he was a flower of rare sweetness and purity—a bud of such hopeful promise! Yet, like all the perishable things of earth, this fair and lovely bud, ere it had scarce unfolded its petals, withered and died, to bud and blossom again in the celestial world. His sweet, smiling face, and laughing blue eyes, greet us no more. We mourn his loss, yet not as those without hope.

JULIA.

EDUCATIONAL.

DOLBEAR'S COMMERCIAL COLLEGE, OF THE City of New Orleans, founded in 1832—Chartered by the Legislature of Louisiana, with Agricultural and Mechanical Departments—Capital Stock $2,000—in the new and spacious edifice known as STORY BUILDING south-east corner of Camp and Common streets, entrance on both streets, open day and evening. Faculty:—

RUFUS DOLBEAR, PRESIDENT
MATHEMATICAL DEPARTMENT.
GEO. E. BRACKETT, Professor.
BOOK-KEEPING DEPARTMENT.
RUFUS DOLBEAR, Lecturer.
J. W. BLACKBURN, Professor.
ENGLISH DEPARTMENT.
HON. J. N. CARAHOAN, A.M., late Sup't Education; La; Professor and Lecturer on Commercial Law, etc
and M. B. M'CARTHY, Professor.
FRENCH DEPARTMENT.
MARC. ROUX, Professor.
DEPARTMENT FOR PENMANSHIP.
RUFUS DOLBEAR, Lecturer.
J. B. GRIFFITH Professor.
SPANISH DEPARTMENT.
MANUEL MARINO, Professor.
GERMAN DEPARTMENT.
GEO. GRENNAN, Professor.
LATIN AND GREEK DEPARTMENT.
M. MARINO and G. GRENNAN Professors
ITALIAN DEPARTMENT.
RHETORIC, LOGIC, AND ELOCUTION.

This is the only chartered Commercial College in the South-West, and the oldest in the United States, and has stood for MORE THAN A QUARTER OF A CENTURY on its own merits alone.

Persons from 12 to 60 years of age, can attend to any branch they may wish.

Board can be had with the Professor, or other good families speaking English, French, Spanish or German, from $5 to $6 per week.

Catalogues with terms, opinions of the press and leading men of the nation, etc., sent to all who desire them.

N.B.—To prevent mistakes or imposition, Students intended for this College should bring this advertisement as special directions, as there are every winter temporary rooms open for a few months, all of course making wonderful pretenses and promises, and posting flaming placards to enlighten the people of New Orleans and of the South! When three or more form Clubs and enter at the same time, ten per cent will be deducted from tuition.

☞ Citizens and strangers are invited to visit.

feb1 1y RUFUS DOLBEAR, President.

SOULE'S COMMERCIAL COLLEGE, CORNER OF Camp and Common streets, entrance No. 80 Common street,—established in 1856,—open day and evening the entire year.

A full course of instruction in this institution embraces Double Entry Book-keeping, Commercial Calculation and Commercial Law, and Penmanship. Gentlemen can enter for the full course, or any branch they desire, and at any time, as there is no class system, no copying from books, and no memorizing of arbitrary rules.

Merchants, Book keepers, and young gentlemen wishing instruction, are respectfully requested to call and examine our practical forms and peculiar manner of teaching.

For catalogues containing full information, and Balance-sheet Circulars, the most magnificent work of the kind ever executed in the United States, address, GEO. SOULE, New Orleans.

FELICIANA FEMALE INSTITUTE, JACKSON, LA. The exercises of the second term of the scholastic year will commence on the first of March. Pupils entered at any time, and charged from the time of entrance.

Extensive grounds and house have been added to the premises.

A good library, a new and complete apparatus, a full and competent corps of teachers, comfortable and newly-furnished apartments, afford the best facilities for a thorough education.

BOARD OF TRUSTEES:

WM. H. WATKINS, G. G., President.
J. N. EVANS, Secretary.
Prof. W. H. N. MAGRUDER, WM. LIPSCOMB,
JOHN W. GURRUS, Esq., Col. B. M. BUYIAN,
F. V. D. HAGAMAN, Esq. Rev. A. G. MILLER
Rev. JOHN G. MILLER, JOHN MCKOWEN, Esq
Hon. JOHN MCVEA.

6m THOS. W. GROWN, Principal.

KENNER ACADEMY—A BOARDING AND DAY School for Boys and Young Men—VICTOR SOULELLIA, Principal. The institution is located in the town of Kenner, Jefferson Parish, La., about ten miles from New Orleans by railroad, and sixteen miles by river. The location is extremely delightful and pleasant. The health of the place is unsurpassed during the whole year.

The course of study is thorough, embracing the English, French, Spanish, German, Latin, and Greek languages. Students can be prepared for any class in college, or for business pursuits.

The academy Year is divided into Two Sessions of Five Months each, commencing on the First of October and March respectively. Scholars will be received at any time during the year; none for less time than one session.

For further particulars see circulars, or address Principal

MISCELLANEOUS.

NEW CARPETING.—J. D. DAMERON & CO., 124 Canal street have received a large and choice assortment of English Velvet and Tapestry CARPETING, of the celebrated manufacture of Crossley and sons and others.

Big-low Brussels and Wilton's—New Patterns.
Three-Ply and Ingrains of the best makers.
Rugs, Baizes, Door Mats, etc.

CURTAIN MATERIAL.—We would call attention to our extensive stock of all descriptions of Brocatelle Satin de Laine and Worsted Curtain Material, Lace and Muslin Curtains, Table and Piano Covers, Cords, Trimmings etc

WINDOW SHADES AND CORNICES.—In this branch of our business, great pains is taken to get up the Newest Styles, and our stock has no superior.

OIL CLOTHS.—3 feet to 24 feet wide, of choice quality and new patterns.

WEST TROY BELL FOUNDERY.—ESTABLISHED in 1826. The subscribers manufacture and have constantly for BELLS, sale at their old established Foundery, their superior Bells for BELLS, churches Academies, Factories, Steamboats, Locomotives, BELLS, Plantations &c., mounted in the most approved and suitable manner with their new Patented Yoke and other BELLS, improved Mountings, and warranted in every particular.

BELLS. For information in regard to Keys, Dimensions Mountings, BELLS, Warrantee, &c; send for a circular

Address, A. MENEELY'S SONS, Agents, West Troy, N. Y.

☞ SLARK, STAUFFER & CO, Agents, New Orleans, La., where a Stock of Bells can be found. my16-1y

CUDDY, BROWN & CO.—HAVING CLOSED THE business of MILES OWEN & CO., the last 7 or January, 1860, my business connections in future in this city will be with Messrs Cuddy, Brown & Co., 38 Camp street. MILES OWEN.

FASHIONABLE CLOTHING.—T. H. JACKSON & CO. No 82 Common street, keeps supplied by frequent arrivals from New York, a well assorted stock of CLOTHING and Gents' FURNISHING GOODS of every description, which we will sell low for cash.—Also a good assortment of TRUNKS, CARPET BAGS, VALICES, SILK and GINGHAM UMBRELLAS, &c., &c.

All on reasonable terms. T. H. JACKSON & Co.,
Jan.31 No. 82 Common street, 2 doors from Camp street

D. J. WASSON, CARPENTER AND BUILDER.—Also, Sash, Blinds, Doors, Cisterns, Lumber, &c., in lots to suit purchasers. Orders promptly attended to.

Box 355 Mechanics' Exchange, 19 St. Charles st. Shop, 355 and 357 Rampart st., First District, New Orleans. mar20-1y

ROB'T B. ARAD. F. SEAUMONT, JR.

ROBT. H. READ & CO., DEALERS IN DRUGS, MEdicines and Chemicals, Oils, Perfumery, Instruments, Patent Medicines, Toilet Articles, Letter-paper, Ink, Pens, etc., No. 108 CANAL STREET, near Royal, New Orleans.

☞ Especial attention given to Commission Merchants' and Planters' Orders. All Articles Warranted to be of the BEST QUALITY, and carefully put up an3

L. SAWYER, DEALER IN WOODEN-WARE, PAper, Brooms, Matches, Cordage, Twines, Scales; and BRARIN'S CELEBRATED BALANCES for Weighing Cotton, Sugar and Tobacco, No. 66 MAGAZINE STREET, New Orleans. ap20

GEORGE H. VINTEN, PRINTERS' WAREHOUSE, 105 Poydras street, New Orleans. Presses, Types, Inks, Paper, Cards, and Furnishing of every description. Agent for the sale of Robt Hoe & Co's Presses, and James Connor & Sons' Types. Old Type taken in exchange for new at 9 cents per pound.

Constantly on hand and for sale Printing Paper of the following sizes.

21 inches by 28	23½ inches by 31	24 inches by 38
22 inches by 32	24 inches by 36	26 inches by 37
32 inches by 44		36 inches by 48

AND OTHER SIZES TO ASSIST.

Also, Double Medium Book Paper, Manilla Wrappers, Note, Letter, and Cap Papers of every description; Cards, Card Boards, &c.

mar 20-1y GEORGE H. VINTEN.

P. H. WILLARD, COAL MERCHANT, IS EXCHANGE-street, opposite the Postoffice. Those desirous of purchasing our Wood, can be supplied at short notice at the City Coal Office where he constantly kept on hand Pittsburgh, Anghin, and Cannel, Anthracite and Lower Ohio Coal. Families, Hotels, Cotton Presses Steamers, &c., &c. supplied at the lowest market prices. n22-1y

TO MERCHANTS AND PLANTERS.—MANUFACturers' commission Broker. Large stock of BOOTS, SHOES and HATS. Call and examine the stock, at No. 38 Magazine street opposite the Arcade, New Orleans.

nov 1a R. W. RAYNE.

J. H. KELLER, SOAP MANUFACTORY, CORNER of Howard and 1st Avenue, New Orleans.

☞ A good supply constantly on hand, and all orders promptly filled.

R. A. STEWART'S NEW PROCESS FOR DEFECating and purifying Cane Juice, Syrup Molasses, and other sugar in the matter.

Planters wishing to use this Process can obtain the right to do so by calling on or addressing STUART & JAMES, No. 42 Union st New Orleans, where samples of the Sugar may be seen (au31) R. A. STEWART

PH. P. WERLEIN, PUBLISHER AND DEALER in SHEET MUSIC and MUSIC BOOKS. Dealers will be supplied at the regular Board of Trade prices. The PIANO FORTES are of the best manufacture, and sold at Eastern prices. MELODEONS are the celebrated George A. Prince & Co.'s "the best in the world," (Home Journal,) at wholesale and retail. PIANOS, VIOLINS, GUITARS, and all other instruments tuned and repaired.

Call at the Music Store, No 5 Camp street. PH. P. WERLEIN

BLOOMFIELD'S PRINTING AND BOOK-BINDING Establishment, No 46 Camp street, corner of Gravier.

All kinds of BOOK AND PAMPHLET PRINTING AND RINGING executed neatly and correctly, at moderate prices.

dec 26 1y WM. BLOOMFIELD, Jr.

ISAAC T. HINTON, BOOK AND JOB PRINTER, 27 Commercial Place, New Orleans, executes with neatness, Pamphlets, Cards, Billheads, Circulars, Labels, Bills Lading, Checks, and every description of Plain and Fancy Printing.

PRINTERS' ROLLERS.—T. BRAULLIEU IS READY to cast Printers' Rollers of the best quality, upon reception of orders either from city or country, at short notice. It is just as foolish for each pressman to cast his own rollers as it is for each man to make his own shirt. Work warranted to be of the best kind.

Address, T. BRAULLIEU,
Office of the Christian Advocate,
oct19 112 Camp st., New Orleans.

R. H. READ'S COUGH MIXTURE.—A MOST RELIable Remedy for Coughs and Colds, and all affections of the throat. This preparation possesses all the valuable properties of the WILD CHERRY, and is as safe and quite pleasant Medicine. The constant and increasing demand for it has induced the subscriber to bring it forward for public favor, and asks but a trial of its virtues by those who are afflicted with Cough or Pulmonary affections.

For sale at ROBERT H. READ & CO'S
Plantation Drug Store, 113 Canal-street

NO. 3 CAMP STREET. EUREKA!!

SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINES FOR PLANTAtion, family, and Manufacturers' use.—Prices, $65, $80, $100, $115, $125

These Machines have no equal; they possess all the latest improvements, the last being November 19th, 1859. Their mechanism is so simple and durable that a child can easily understand and operate them. They work with two threads, using Howe's patent shuttle, making the lock stitch, and presenting the same stitch on both and of the fabric sewn.—They will run, stitch, hem, fell bind and gather.

SMALL MACHINES WARRANTED.

Every variety of Thread, Silk, Needles, and other findings for sale.

Principal Southern Salesroom, No. 3 Camp st.

E. L. NIMMO, Agent.

PHILIP RAHM, EAGLE MACHINE WORKS—Richmond Va., manufactures Stationary and Portable steam engines of any required power and superior design and workmanship, combining several improvements with simplicity and durability, best adapting them for plantation use.

Circular Saw Mills, Grist Mills, Blasting for Gin Houses, Drainage Pumps, and Machinery generally. My Machinery will be fully guaranteed to perform as represented, and an experience and care used to correct it when desired. An illustrated Catalogue, with prices, sent by

NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY A COMMITTEE OF MINISTERS FOR THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH---C. C. GILLESPIE, EDITOR.

VOLUME X.—NUMBER 17. WHOLE NUMBER 480.

NEW ORLEANS, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 25, 1860.

$2 00 A YEAR, IN ADVANCE. OFFICE—115 CAMP ST.

LETTERS FROM CUBA.—NO. III.

Havana, March 17th, 1860.

I know not but that I may be wearying your readers with tiresome details of matters insignificant in themselves. If this be the case, you know the remedy. A city so full of peculiarities—so unlike everything American, must be seen in detail to be understood.—At every corner in Havana you meet with objects of interest—not because they are beautiful, nor grand, but because, for the most part, they are singularly grotesque. The volante is a type of the citizen—the dwelling house is an emblem of the government. If the volante is a huge, awkward, ill-contrived affair, behind the age, so is the citizen a relic of the past. He thinks—if perchance he thinks at all—just as his forefathers thought. The Creole hates the Spaniard, the Spaniard despises the Creole. Mutual distrust among the Creoles themselves, causes them to be as watchful and as suspicious as if every man were a rogue. Indeed, roguery is not unknown in Havana. It is a system, an organized system, reduced to rules, having its nicks and bounds, its definite methods of prosecution. If you are thoughtful, you get your American money changed into Spanish before you leave America. A Spanish ounce is worth $16 50 in the United States—here its value is seventeen dollars. Of course you have no banker, or ought not to have any. Well, this ounce of gold is changed for you into four quarter-ounce-pieces, whose mythical value is $4 25, that you can get but $4 00 for it, unless it is a rare chance. Being an American, you will of course take American gold and silver. But this American silver is taken back from you at a discount of twenty per cent. Now if you dream of a speculation—buying up this money at this discount, you will not be able to get it, for the simple reason that it must go back into the hands of strangers from "the States," at par. This sharp needs no explanation, and if it did, you would not get it. It is one of the "institutions" of Havana. The why and the wherefore of things are matters too profound to engage the attention of this people. They have been accustomed to yellow uniforms—to Captain Generals—forts—policemen, etc., but you can hardly find a man who can or will give you a word of information about them. Whether this is a politic reserve, dictated by Spanish tyranny, or real ignorance, the effect upon seekers of information is the same.

On Saturday afternoon, whilst strolling towards the city wall, I saw some soldiers in full uniform, filing down the street. Following the crowd beyond the gates, I arrived at the "Paseo del Isabel 2d," just opposite the Tacon Theatre, in time to see a review of the regular and volunteer troops, by the Captain General. It was a grand parade, in honor of the recent Spanish victories over the Moors. The soldiers, infantry, artillery, and dragoons, passed before the Governor and his staff, in quickstep time, and occupied more than an hour and a half. I endeavored in vain to obtain some clue to the number, but these clever "know-nothings" could only answer, "To no se," i do not know. From a rough estimate of my own, I think there must have been at least 12,000 men under arms. About five thousand spectators, men, women and children, were grouped together for the space of half a mile, and the roof of Tacon Theatre was covered with ladies and gentlemen. Nearly every style of uniform, some of them gaudy, others by no means beautiful, passed along the Paseo, and occasionally a faint huzza was heard in the neighborhood of the Captain General, but for whom it was designed, or from whom it came, I could not discover. A large number of the troops were volunteers, and two regiments were bona fide negroes. I had never seen Africa in arms before, and I thought it a little incongruous to force them to celebrate the defeat of their African friends the Moors. By the way, I hear it said, that these same negro regiments were the cause of the unpopularity of General Concha, towards the close of his administration in the Island. After the last filibuster expedition, Concha organized these regiments of negro soldiers, and so great was the opposition to the movement that he diminished them. The whites very properly regarded it as an effort to equalize the negroes and whites, and they demurred. It is plain enough to me that these negro volunteers are merely designed to intimidate the Cubans. The whispered threat, terrible if true, and there seems to be no reason to doubt it, of arming the negroes for the massacre of the whites in the event of a native revolution, seems to crop out in this colored corps. Here is a demonstration to all doubters that negroes can handle fire-arms, and make good soldiers—so these Spanish masters would have their subjects to believe, and really I could see no difference in military skill between the black and white men. General Serrano has revived this feature of the soldiery, I am told, under the name of a Fire Department, but the absurdity of this pretension is too plain. They are designed to be soldiers—and to take no animportant part in any future movement towards political regeneration.—Perhaps it may amuse your readers to give them a translation of an address issued by the Captain General on the day of this parade. I have seen no English translation of it, and must therefore depend upon my own rendering—it is taken from the Gaceta de la Habana of March 11th.

"Alocucion dirigida por el Excmo Sr. Capitan General a los cuerpos de todas armas de esta Isla, con motivo de la toma de Tetuan."

"Address issued by His Excellency Sr. Captain General to the troops of the whole army of this Island, on the occasion of the capture of Tetuan.

"Soldiers and Volunteers—The glorious deeds of the Spanish army, which already garrisons the walls of Tetuan, and which we this day celebrate, have aroused your enthusiasm, and your enthusiasm belongs to the country. As the organ of these noble sentiments, I have the satisfaction of sending up to the foot of the throne of our Queen an expression of your loyalty. Her Majesty, appreciating your generous ardor, will, without doubt, reward you with the most valuable recompense in her power to bestow upon you, that of being considered worthy to defend, in this important territory of the monarchy, the honor of the national flag.

"Hear the declaration which, at the request of the Government, I shall place in the hands of Her Majesty the Queen.

"'Senora—The news of the war of the army of Africa, and the echo of its victories, mingled with the name of your Majesty, have traveled without delay the one thousand six hundred leagues which separate as from the metrópolis. The Spanish army of America, and the volunteers of the Island, are proud of their brethren of the Spanish army of Africa. We who have not had on this occasion the glory of spilling our blood, fighting beneath the banners of your Majesty, venture to place at your royal feet the homage of our respect and enthusiasm.

"The title with which your majesty has exalted the already illustrious General O'Donnell, is the reward the most appropriate and patriotic which your Majesty could bestow in his services. The Duke of Tetuan is not the sole proprietor of his own glory, which belongs to the country, and your Majesty has thus perpetuated, in the commander of the army, the memory of many glorious events, giving in history the distinguished surname to him by whom it has been so justly merited. All honors of this kind are preserved in the reward. And it could not be otherwise, for if this victory had not been achieved, invoking the august name of your Majesty, the triumphal car Majesty have always been esteemed as the honor and gratification of all Spaniards.

"Moreover, Senora, we are now able to bear, without a blush, the satire which points out in the Pyrennees the limits of Africa. Wherever Africa may commence, no one will deny us the glory of having carried the banner of Spain, and leaving the impression of her civilization upon that continent. Condescend, your Majesty, to accept the respectful congratulation which, for success so signal and prosperous, the army of Cuba sends up to the throne, as an evidence of the loyalty of their sentiments.'

"Soldiers and Volunteers: Viva la Reina! Viva el Ejercito de Africa!

FRANCISCO SERRANO."

Havana, 10th March, 1860.

I have endeavored, as far as possible, to preserve the exact language of this document, in order that your readers, who may not be familiar with Spanish glorifications, may have an idea of the style of their proclamations. One would imagine from the tone of this document, that a vast amount of "enthusiasm" would be visible among the soldiery. If there was anything of the sort, however, I did not see it. It is true, that the war with the Moors seems to have given new life to this degenerate government, and a certain personal interest is felt here with reference to the war, owing to the fact that General O'Donnell was at one time Captain General of Cuba. His name may be seen in large letters on the lighthouse which stands on the point of Moro Castle, the building having been erected during his administration here in 1844. But so great is the distance between "His Excellency" and "the people," that the remembrance of his former connection with them seems to produce no great amount of "gratification" at his success.

A little incident which occurred during the procession of the troops amused me very much. On the eastern side of the Paseo, a "Col." Wood from New York had a little menagerie, consisting of a pair of lions, two hyenas, a leopard, two elephants, and a few reindeer; these were being "stirred up" to the delight of the spectators, and a hand-organ was in full exercise, playing "Yankee Doodle" with great vigor in honing of the Captain General himself. The association of ideas was somewhat suggestive. These legions of yellow coats are drilled and fed for Yankee Doodle's especial benefit, but the native Yankee inside cared as little for the display of her Majesty's troops as he did for the Bey of Algiers, and gave them a quickstep time to march by, with which they may some day have their ears saluted by the band in Castle Moro.

Whilst on the subject, I may mention that this African war has been celebrated by innumerable feasts in all parts of the "siempre fiel Isla de Cuba," (ever faithful Island of Cuba). From what I have seen, however, the demonstrations are gotten up by partizans of the Government, and are by no means popular rejoicings. You can see in a dozen places placards posted at the doors of exhibition rooms, where "grand panoramas" of the battles which have been fought may be seen on canvass for "dos reals sencillos," twenty cents. These picture-makers are the only "sensation" mongers I have met on the Island, and as the idea of seizing upon the public interest in this way smacks strongly of the States, I suspect that the Yankees have a hand in it. How it pays, I am not able to say, but should suppose that, whatever methods the "faithful" may have of showing their "enthusiasm," this is not one of them, as the spectators seem to have been few when I passed the doors.

Havana contains about 225,000 inhabitants, and yet it is comparatively a small town, so far as space is concerned. From the directory of Havana, a publication issued last year (for the first time), I gather some facts in this connection. The city within the walls (intramuros) is much smaller than the portion without (estramuros). The city wall is 2700 English yards long, reaching from the bay opposite the Moro to the water on the Southern side of the bay. From Castillo de la Punta to the Paseo de Roncali is 2650 yards; from the Governor's Palace to the extreme limit, outside the walls, 3400 yards; from Castillo de la Punta, nearly opposite the Moro, to Puente de Chavez, the most Southern portion outside the walls, is 3400 yards; so that the city is nearly two miles square, a territory of which many American towns can boast without an eighth of the population. The Paseo del Isabel 2d is a wide promenade running North and South, about one mile in length. At its Southern terminus is the Campo de Marte, or Field of Mars, the parade ground of the troops. At the Campo de Marte the Calzada de S. Luis Gonzaga begins, a wide street which terminates at the suburbs in the Paseo de Tacon. These streets are great thoroughfares in the cool of the afternoon, and at night, being constantly thronged with seekers of pure air, who have escaped from the confinement of the city. Adjoining the Campo de Marte is the "Almacenes y Depositos del Ferro Carril," in other words the Railroad Depot, not a very ambitious affair, but quite as much as we can expect here. The road extends to Cardenas, and on the opposite side of the bay another railroad is in course of construction direct to Matanzas.

Notwithstanding the horror which American filibusterism excites in Cuba, the Yankees are the originators and managers of nearly all their public works. The little steamboat in which the Captain of the Port pays his official visits was built in Philadelphia, and cost $6000. The staves and hoops which make the casks and hogsheads for their sugar and molasses, are imported ready to put up from the United States. Although they have an abundant supply of wood, they have no coal. Indeed what little energy and industry you can see in exercise in Havana proceeds from American energy. A company of New Yorkers are just now putting up the largest sugar house in the world. The building-frame is of cast iron, brought out from New York. The house stands on the Regla, a point of land running into the bay. When finished, it will cover nearly seven acres of ground. The main room, now nearly completed, is 950 feet in length, having 335 iron pillars as supports for the second story, and this single room covers three acres and a half. The house will cost $2,500,000 when completed.

It makes one nervous to see these people work. They do not allow vessels to discharge freight at their wharves after eleven o'clock in the day, as it must all be removed before night. Negro stevedores and hands work with segars in their mouths, and I have seen them stop lifting a bale of goods to the dray, until some one of the party got his segar to burning. When necessity prompts, they work for high wages, and then lounge away their time until the money is spent. The negroes are impudent, and do not hesitate to return word for word to the Creoles, and it offended, walk away, and leave the employer helpless. Of course these are the free negroes, and these are principally seen in the city. You need not expect one of these fellows to give you the inside of the walk, and if your American blood rises at a push or a rub from one of these negroes, it must not cool itself by giving him a tap with your cane, unless you are familiar with the mysteries of a calador's office, for he will certainly make complaint, and you must foot the bill. From the Spaniards and Creoles, as a general thing, a stranger receives every courtesy in the streets. But more anon.

W. P. HARRISON.

INTRODUCTION OF PROTESTANTISM INTO MISSISSIPPI.—NO. XI.

PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

MR. EDITOR: When I wrote a series of ten numbers under the above running title about a year ago, I nearly exhausted the materials I then had on hand, and expecting but little time for writing during the year upon which I had then entered, I thought to conclude the series; but being urged by a number of valuable friends to continue the subject, especially as to the origin of the Protestant Episcopal and Presbyterian Churches in Mississippi, I determined, at a suitable time, to make the attempt. I am aware that my materials are meager, but they are reliable as far as they go, having been derived from the family records and lineal descendants of the principal actors in the scenes narrated. I will do what I can, and if others, who can aid, will interest themselves in the matter, we need not despair of rescuing from oblivion names and facts that deserve to be prominent in connection with the ecclesiastical history of our country.

In the conclusion of my ninth number, I briefly alluded to Rev. Adam Cloud as the first Protestant Episcopal minister that came to Mississippi. I have since obtained from his son, Samuel G. Cloud, M. D., of Oakley, Franklin Parish, La., some very interesting and characteristic facts connected with his father's first settlement in the Natchez country, which I will introduce in their proper place.

Rev. Adam Cloud was born in New Castle county, Delaware, Dec. 30th, 1759. Of his early history I have no account. In 1781 he was admitted on trial as a traveling preacher in the Methodist connection, and placed on Roanoke circuit in Virginia, as the junior of Enoch Matson. He received an appointment as a traveling Methodist preacher for seven successive years, until in 1788—in the language of the printed minutes—he "desisted from traveling in connection with, and under the direction of, our Conference."

He was married to Mary Grandine, near Morristown, in the State of New Jersey, Jan. 31st, 1788, and his marriage may have been the cause of his "desisting from traveling in connection with the Conference," as the support of married preachers was exceedingly parsimonious in these early times. He subsequently entered the ministry in the Protestant Episcopal Church, and in that character emigrated to the far famed Natchez country in 1792, and settled on St. Catherine's Creek, about two miles from Natchez, just below where the road to Washington crosses. He probably brought several slaves with him from New Jersey, as it is known that he soon after had them in his possession. He acquired a title to 1700 acres of land in the district, and soon gave evidence of thrift in the way of a good stock of hogs, cattle, and horses. His settlement in the country was hailed with acclamations of joy by the Protestant families, especially such as adhered to the Episcopal Church; for since the death of Samuel Swayze in 1784, they had been quite destitute of Protestant worship in that portion of the district. Though all public Protestant worship was still under the interdict of the Spanish government, Mr. Cloud was successfully importuned to preach an occasional sermon, baptize the children, marry the young folks, and bury the dead. It was thought at first that the American feeling and influence was strong enough to protect him in these holy Christian ministrations, so far at least as to secure the connivance of the Spaniards. But in this they were mistaken. The emissaries of the lynx-eyed priesthood carefully noticed, and reported at head-quarters, all the movements of Mr. Cloud, and it was soon determined to end his labors of love among the people. At about the end of three years from his first settlement in the country, a file of armed soldiers from Natchez entered his house in the middle of the night, and forcibly secaring his person, hastened off with their prey. He was confined as a prisoner in Natchez several days, when it was determined to send him bound to Carondalet, the Spanish Commandment at New Orleans. The objects contemplated by this movement seem to have been to get him as far as possible from the sympathy and protection of his friends, and to deprive him of any palliating testimony he might be able to avail himself of in the vicinity of Natchez. Two soldiers were charged with conducting him to New Orleans, who placed him in fetters on board a common pirogue, and in that way descended the Mississippi river to the place of destination, a distance then of three hundred miles. The allegations against Mr. Cloud were "for preaching, baptizing, and marrying people contrary to the laws of the existing government."—On his arrival at New Orleans he was duly committed for trial. After long delay, under pretence of a careful investigation of his case, Governer Carondalet submitted two alternatives to him, one of which he was compelled to accept. Either he must go to Cuba or Spain and be tried before an ecclesiastical court upon the specified allegations, or he must leave forever the Spanish dominions. If Mr. Cloud had crouched at the feet of his oppressors, asked their forbearance for the past, with promises of abstaining from preaching in future, no doubt they would have set him at liberty, and permitted him quietly to return to his home and family. But he was firmly fixed in the doctrines of the Protestant faith, and this he would not, aye, felt that he could not do. He maintained a firm and dignified bearing throughout this trying ordeal, and would have preferred a martyr's fate to a renunciation of his faith and ministerial obligations.

When the final alternatives were submitted to him for his choice, he was ready for a prompt decision. He was too well acquainted with the history of the devil-invented Spanish Inquisition to risk himself before one of their ecclesiastical courts under a charge of heretical preaching. Moreover, being yet in the prime of life, he knew if he could regain his liberty without a sacrifice of principle, he might yet be worth something to his family and the world. The latter alternative was chosen, and in view of a command to carry it out speedily, he sent to Natchez for his family to join him as soon as possible. Except the sum of three hundred dollars, and one bed and bedding, his property was all left behind and was lost to his family. I have no evidence that even the few servants were permitted to accompany their mistress. Mrs. Cloud, with her four children, the two eldest daughters, the youngest an infant, with only three hundred dollars to defray expenses, took passage in a small row boat at Natchez, and after a tedious voyage joined her husband in New Orleans. They were sent off on the first vessel sailing for the United States, which was a small schooner bound for Charleston, S. C. How Mr. Cloud passed the next twenty years of his life I am not informed.—In 1816 he returned to Mississippi in good standing as a minister of the Episcopal Church, and settled near Greenville, in Jefferson county. If any Protestant Episcopal Church was organized in the Territory previous to that date, he had no agency in it. About the year 1820 an Episcopal Church was organized in the south-western portion of Jefferson county, of which he was Rector for several years. After his term of service ended here, he never again took the pastoral oversight of a church in Mississippi. Being now about sixty-five years old, he was hardly capable of performing pastoral duty, and, moreover, he was not very acceptable to the High-Churchmen who now took the lead in his branch of the Church. Perhaps his early Methodistic training had led him to adopt as an article of his creed the opinion of Hooker, Stillingfleet, and White, on the subject of ordination, for he seemed too well satisfied with the validity of the ordination received from Bishop Asbury to suit the High-church notions of some of his brethren. But the venerable man, as his strength permitted and occasion offered, continued to "preach, marry the young folks, and baptize the babies," for doing which, thirty years before, he had suffered the loss of his property and been cruelly expelled from the country.

After his return to Mississippi, by patient industry and economy, he acquired a handsome little estate, sufficient to rear and educate his children and make him comfortable in the evening of life. Not long before his death he removed to Texas, and settled at Brazoria, where in May, 1831, he finished his eventful pilgrimage on earth, at the advanced age of seventy-five. His remains were deposited in the common grave-yard of that place, to await the resurrection of the just. Whether his grave is suitably marked or not I cannot tell, nor is it of the least importance to him; but posterity ought to know where reposes the dust of such a man. I knew him well in my youth. Peace to his memory!

J. G. JONES.

NOTES WHILE ON A FURLOUGH—No. IX.

New Grenada, March 15, 1860.

CARTHAGENA.

This is a walled city, built upon an island, the whole of which is enclosed and fortified, at an expense, tradition says, of fifty-five millions; and upon a survey of the walls and defences, I am disposed to credit tradition; the labor and outlay were vast indeed. This was the work of Spain in the days of her glory; and tradition reports further, that when the Minister showed the King (Philip II., perhaps,) the amount of the expenditure, he took his spy-glass, and ascending a tower, took a long and steady look in the direction, saying, that walls and defences that had cost that much ought to be seen. This is a finished city, too, as Holton has remarked; it was finished when New York and Boston were insignificant villages, and when our grand Confederacy comprised not more than four or five feeble colonies. It would seem strange, indeed, to an American to live in a city where a new building did not go up in fifty years. I do not think one has arisen in this city in that time. For the last thirty or forty years the hand of decay has been at work upon public and private buildings, and ruins, some of them stupendous, meet you in every direction. Separation from the mother country placed the seal of death upon the city. The present population, including the suburb Jimanie, which is also an island, and fortified, cannot be over 8000, and three-fifths of them are Africans in whole or part. They are idle, improvident, and degraded, in the main. Central, and most part of South America, is the very paradise for the African race; the climate, and almost spontaneous productions of the earth, enable them to live with very little exertion, and they will not work more than they are obliged to. Formerly the population must have been much larger. Its character in the city and border regions was affected greatly for the worse by the Revolution. When the province rebelled against the old country, the natives of Spain and their immediate descendants, living in this region, in consequence of more frequent intercourse and more intimate relations with Europe, adhered to the royal cause; and consequently, when the revolution was established, they were obliged to leave the country. Thus the better elements of society were withdrawn, and the sediment left. In addition to this, when emancipation took place in Jamaica, many of the negroes of that island becoming restless, and wishing to better their condition, emigrated to this region, and helped to swell the idleness. And to complete the list of misfortunes, slavery, which formerly existed in this republic, ceased five years since; and the same result followed here as elsewhere, where the African has been placed in a position for which he was not prepared. Northern men residing here are earnest in their wishes that the Black Republicans and Abolitionists could come and reside here a while, and witness the movements of the negro without a master. Among the population I notice an unusual number of very old persons, which speaks well for the salubrity of the climate. Indeed, with the fresh and constant sea-breeze enjoyed here, I do not see how the place can be otherwise than healthy, especially as there are no swamps adjacent.

Like all other Catholic cities I have seen, Carthagena was well supplied with churches; some of them were most costly, magnificent structures, with large conventual establishments annexed. One half of them are now mere ruins, or closed up, and most of the others seem to have a mere lingering existence. In the Cathedral is a pulpit, the gift of one of the Popes. It is of variegated and various marbles, and of exquisite workmanship, far better than the gospel preached in it, I doubt not. The priests here, as in all these countries, are taken mainly from the "lowest of the people;" the presence of African blood proves no bar to its honors. Indeed, such is the condition of the Church, that no one with any worldly prospects would enter its ministry. This remark goes upon the assumption that there is no Divine call to the work. It might be expected that men without the advantages of good raising, and thus void of proper self respect, and a proper sense of the value of an elevated character, and unrestrained by the grace and fear of God, would not be very strict in morals; and accordingly, they are generally flagrantly derelict; several of them living openly with their families! But, alas! what may not a people shut out from the Bible and Protestantism be made to believe! Holton, in his work on New Grenada, mentions the case of a Catholic lady who, speaking of just such priests as these, remarked, that she would prefer such to a married man, "for his sacraments would be efficacious still, wicked as he is; whereas, if married, those who trusted to them would be lost." What a work to convert such a people to the knowledge of the truth!

Carthagena is not the natural outlet for the commerce of the Republic, being seventy-five miles from the mouth of the Magdalena, the river that drains the larger portion of the country, and on which most of its productions are brought to the coast; but it has a good harbor, and Sabanilla, at the mouth, has not. An attempt has been made to force the trade of the interior to this point, by means of a canal connecting it with Calamar, 90 miles distant, and near 100 from the mouth of the river; but this is in a poor condition, and imperfectly answers the end proposed. The Spanish government had no idea, when it spent so many millions in fortifying this place, of the arrival of a period in the history of commerce, when the products of a country and its imports could not be most profitably carried on donkies. It was a donkey age, and many governments were donkey-ish in views and policy; and donkeyism has not been bleached out of the Spanish race by a great deal. The place has a small export trade, but nothing to what it might have if the government were more enlightened and energetic, and the people more industrious. It has a fine back country, but it is lying waste, except little patches here and there cultivated to raise plantains, yams, &c.

Like all cities on the Spanish main, when the Anglo-Saxon race have not infused life into them, this is a dull place. Its streets have a deserted appearance, and the people are destitute of animation. According to my philosophy, this is the result partly of climate, partly of their religion, and partly of race. Its market is a curiosity in its way: those who sell in it understand short division; everything is divided out into the smallest portions, and if you wish to purchase more than the value of a medio, several of the piles are united. Prices never change, but quantities do often. Animals killed for the stall are "used up" more completely than in any market I ever visited. I should not like to attempt to specify the part of the animal not used for food. Among other curiosities offered for sale, are lizards, some three feet long. These are opened alive, their eggs taken out, and then they are allowed to go, and I am assured that they heal up and do well afterwards. Sometimes, however, they are not let off so easily as that, but are eaten.

This was originally a well built city, according to Spanish tools, a century and a half or two centuries ago. Its streets would be considered very narrow by us. The floors in the different stories of the houses, and some of the roofs, are of brick. There is not a glass window in the city, I think. When light is needed, the doors, of which there is a good supply, are thrown open. The streets are partially paved, but are not lighted, except as individuals hang out lamps. There is but one road from the city to the country, and that passes out to the south-east. Just outside the gate you pass the huge rock, San Lazaro, hewn into a fort, entirely deserted. A little farther on, you pass the high hill, La Popa, crowned with a church and convent, both deserted also. Once a year, on the saint's day to whom they are dedicated, priests and people assemble there in honor of its patron; after religious services they feast, and close with a dance, of course. The effeminate, useless, fallen people of all these countries, can all do that and smoke. Men smoke, and women smoke, the old smoke and the young smoke, the whites smoke and the blacks smoke; they smoke at the table and in the parlor, at home and in the street; they will smoke at all times, and in all places, but in heaven; the reason they will not do it there I need not mention. Here, as well as in Costa Rica, I find cotton growing wild, and some little under cultivation. In both places it is perennial, and not an annual, as with us. It will flourish and bear from year to year indefinitely. It is excellent in staple and quality, and might be cultivated to great profit, but for want of labor. So of coffee; the finest coffee plantation in the Republic, the product of which took the premium at the World's Fair, has to be given up from the same cause. Emancipation does not promote industry, except in genuflexions.

J. H.

THE UNEQUAL STAKES.

BY LUTHA FONTELLE.

Two gentlemen sat together in a spacious library, one fifty, the other thirty-five years of age. The rare collection of works by authors of every age, the fine statues, and costly paintings, which had so frequently attracted them thither, were, that night, unnoticed. They were awaiting the sad return, from a brilliant career at college, of the eldest son. The lifeless form of his father, half idolized by the warm-hearted youth, had lain, since 8 o'clock in the morning, in an adjoining room. It was then 11 at night. The family, exhausted by grief, had been persuaded to retire. After the return of the field hands from a distant part of the plantation, their load wail for their beloved master floated across the bayou, and deepened the gloom that had settled on the household. But it brought relief to the widow. The narestrained outgushing of their sorrow broke up the depths of her still grief, and her tears flowed freely. When, at last, she slept, Richard Firmly silenced their cries. And, now, the sadly sweet tones of an occasional dirge alone reached the mansion.

As they sat in the quiet library, now retrospective, now glancing into the future, Firmly broke the silence, as if half unconsciously,

"And what is life?" he asked.

"Life," said Dr. Gladsun, and his round face, so expressive of his genial humor and his keen appreciation of all pleasure, lost the pensive shade that seemed a stranger to it, "life is an enjoyment of the senses. We live only when they thrill our souls with the beauty and harmony of nature and the joys of a happy existence. The lost friend before us is an example in point. For fifty years he revelled in all the brightness of sunlight, in all the wealth of a rarely endowed nature. Fortune was ever pouring a flood of gold into his coffers, and though he was untroubled by care and lavish in expenditure, they were never empty. Blessed with a beautiful wife, who was created for him, as certainly as Eve was for Adam, though I do not think she ever tempted him to evil; brave sons and lovely daughters grew in gladness around him. His sisters, each of whom he educated, and dowered liberally on her marriage, settled near him and never poisoned his domestic bliss. Save one," and here his voice trembled a little, "all were friends who knew him. His chosen friends lived and prospered. Sometimes, it is true, a financial pressure, and especially the last crisis, troubled them for a moment, but they remembered the king of open hearts, and were relieved. I do not think he was ever called to mourn over the death of a valued friend or near relative. No one could long carry a sad heart in his presence. His large eyes were always brilliant with some happy thought, his face radiant with some glad emotion; when he spoke, one forgot care or sorrow, Fatton's happiness was so diffusive. His voice was like the full sound of a summer's stream, flowing through sunlight, cool shadows, and flowers; and the joyous ring of his laughter was full of the music of kindness and unalloyed bliss. What a rich, genial nature! What a life filled but not crowded with blessings! And then his death, though startling to us, was a fitting end to such an existence. Cut down, like the ripe cane, while the breath of Autumn was still soft as the south wind, and fragrant with its wealth of fruit ungathered."

A long silence followed these words. Dr. Gladsun laid his head back in the tall library chair, and, though he thought himself satisfied with the completeness of his friend's life, the former pensiveness stole over his face. His companion had retained his grave thoughtfulness, deepened by a sadness, now stern, now tender.—Once or twice he seemed about to speak, but his warm friendship for the deceased, and his habitual delicacy of feeling, closed his lips. At last he rose and went out on the gallery.

There he found Ruth, his young wife, whom he had brought over with him in the morning. Ruth, though almost a stranger to the family, could render, he know, every possible solace, as gentle was she in her love and care, so firm in the hour of trial. The stricken daughters wept in her arms, as they turned from the statue-like grief of their mother, and all had been soothed to sleep under her loving administration. Then she sought the gallery to gather fresh strength for her calm soul. Leaning against a pillar she looked out on the fair gardens that lay beneath her, most lovely in the moonlight. The rays fell on the orange groves, changing their bright leaves into silver, and revealing the golden fruit. Above and around her the live-oaks swayed their long arms in the gentle breeze, and silently waved their grey drapery.—Lights still gleamed from the "quarter," but all was still, save an occasional grief-laden note that came faintly over the bayou.

Sometimes, Ruth moved quietly across the gallery, absorbed in thought. When Firmly asked in his deep, musical voice, "What is life?" the question chimed with her musings. Dr. Gladsun's theory, by no means peculiar to himself, was familiar to her, but the illustration startled and shocked her. Involuntarily, as she passed the library window, open to the floor, she looked in, searching the face of Firmly. Its expression and his silence satisfied her, though Dr. Gladsun mistook the latter for conviction. When he ceased, Ruth shivered with the agony of the contrast.

Again, she saw the lifeless form borne through the stately hall, and heard the one heart-rending groan of the widow, and the shrieks of the children and house servants. Frank Fulton had fallen in a duel with his one enemy. In the midst of happiness he had perilled all, and Ruth asked herself, "for what?" "The reputation of a man of honor," the world said, and while it pitied the resulting grief, still praised the deed. "A man of honor," she repeated aloud, unconsciously, "he was that before."

"He was," said Firmly, and Ruth looked up to meet the tender, earnest eyes of her husband. He drew her into the library, and they sat down together. "There never lived a more honorable gentleman. And then to fall by the hand of the depraved Villecoeur; Fulton, with the large, true heart and noble mind, and with the happiness of so many hearts bound up in his! And Villecoeur, with his dissipated life, unredeemed by one good act; without a single tie of friendship, and with no near relative!"

"Why this alone," said Ruth, "should have prevented the duel. The stakes were too unequal. But what was the origin of Villecoeur's enmity?"

"They were both rivals for the hand of sweet Mary Glenn. Very naturally she favored Fulton, and shrank from the attentions of Villecoeur, then a dark, splendid-looking man, with the intuitive perception of a pure, womanly spirit. The latter swore to be revenged, and after Mary's betrothal attempted to poison her mind with subtle tales of Fulton's unfaithfulness. But Frank was to her, the one, chosen from earth's noblest sons, and he could not disturb her trusting heart with one doubt."

"And his revenge has slept till now?" asked Ruth.

"A few weeks before their marriage, when he was attempting to bring about a duel between Fulton and one of his dearest friends, he was obliged to fly in consequence of some intrigue, and went to Europe. There, engaged in other pursuits, he appears to have forgotten Fulton. Two months ago he returned, and has been continually seeking an occasion for a quarrel. At last, he insulted Fulton so publicly that he felt obliged to challenge him."

"Was there not a better way?" asked Ruth, a little anxiously.

"Villecoeur richly merited chastisement, but that would only have developed the assassin. Yes, Ruth, I think there was a severe and more certain punishment than the whip or the challenge. What would you have desired me to do?"

"What I feel assured you would have done—taken no notice neither of the person, nor the insult, but proceeded quietly with the business in hand. All who knew you would have understood that you considered it beneath your dignity, as a gentleman, to resent a deliberate and unprovoked affront, with a transparent deadly intent, from one, equal only in wealth and in the social position of his family."

"But were it one who stood high in the world's esteem, by virtue, also, of his own talents and virtues, and God had blessed him with another Ruth; should I not then abide by this received code of honor?"

"Not even then," said Ruth, calmly, for she was looking into his eyes, and read his thoughts, "not even then, for you would obey the higher code of Christian honor."

"Even so, my Ruth."

"Even so," echoed Dr. Gladsun, and he grasped warmly the hands of Richard Firmly and his sweet wife.

Just then they heard the sound of carriage wheels in the avenue. The gentlemen went out to meet the bereaved son and secure his quiet entrance, and Ruth hastened to calm the house-servants, and then repaired to the bedside of the widow and daughter.

Pale and haggard, young Frank almost fainted as he passed over the threshold, and he shed his first tears, after the terrible message reached him, in the arms of his father's most valued friends.

Let us leave them thus, and let the readers of the Advocate take the sad lesson to their hearts.

UNDER CHLOROFROM.

Until the last three or four hundred years amputation of a limb was very rarely performed except when, from injury or disease, its extremity had begun to mortify; and then few surgeons ventured to make incisions in the sound portion, but limited themselves to an operation through the tissues which had already lost their vitality. This timidity was due to the fact that they were unacquainted with any effectual means of stopping the bleeding from the larger arteries divided by the knife. Certain and easy as is the control of such bleeding now, by the simple process of tying a piece of thread or silk round the extremity of the bleeding vessel (as we shall hereafter see), it was unknown, at all events as applicable to amputation, to any surgical writer from Hippocrates, 400 B. C., or from Celsus, who flourished in the first Christian century, to the fifteenth. Consequently the numerous instances of injury and disease in which life is now saved by a timely resort to amputation were then always fatal. Hence, also, arose the various expedients which the more adventurous operators of the time restored to in order to stop fatal bleeding, with the effect only of increasing the patient's torture, and with the attainment of no good result. Thus the incisions were performed with a red-hot knife, that the divided vessels, seared and charred by the horrible contact, might contract or become plugged, and so be prevented from bleeding (Albucasis, eleventh century). Effective for the instant, the force of the circulation quickly overpowered the sleader obstruction, and fatal hemorrhage sooner or later took place. Yet this plan continued more or less in vogue down to the discovery of the ligature in the sixteenth century, and was practiced even later in Germany by the celebrated Hildanus (1641), although he subsequently adopted the new method. According to another fashion, the surgeon, after making a tedious division of the flesh down to the bone, with studied endeavor not to divide the arteries until the last moment, relied on applications of red-hot irons, or of some styptic fluid, usually a powerful acid or astringent, to arrest the bleeding. If these were not successful, a vessel of bleeding pitch was at hand, ready prepared, into which the bleeding stump was plunged. Between Scylly and Charybdis, the patient rarely escaped with life; either the duel from loss of blood in a few hours or less, or, if the dreadful remedies succeeded, he survived a day or two to die of fever or exhaustation. After an earlier method, that of Guido di Caulico (1363), a bandage of plaster was made to encircle the member so tightly that mortification attacked all the parts below, which then, after the lapse of months, dropped off, a horribly loathsome and offensive mass. Another surgeon, Butalli (1560), invented a machine to sever the limb to an instant by a single stroke; and it was not uncommon at this period to effect the same purpose by the hatchet or by a powerful mallet and chisel.

It is to Ambrose Pare, the great French surgeon, who flourished in the sixteenth century, that we owe the application of the ligature (used long before in ordinary wounds) to the bleeding arteries in amputation. He discarded the use of the red-hot cautery, and of all the frightful adjuncts already described; and accomplished his purpose by carrying the thread round the vessel by means of a needle passed through the soft parts adjacent—a method of adjustment which, although still in use, is now employed only in exceptional instances.—Richard Wiseman, sometimes styled the father of English surgery, who practiced about the middle of the seventeenth century, is believed to have been the first to employ the ligature in England, and to relinquish the application of heated irons. At this era also, the circulation of the blood was discovered by the renowned Harvey, and the distinction between arteries and veins being thenceforth clearly understood, the value of the ligature was rendered more than ever obvious.

But enough of this: let us soothe our ruffled nerves by seeing how the thing is done to-day. We will take a quiet post of observation in the area of the operating theatre at one of our metropolitan hospitals in this year of our Lord 1860. Notice is posted that amputation of the thigh will be performed a two o'clock P. M., and we occupy our seat ten minutes before the hour.

The area itself is small, of a horse-shoe form, and surrounded by seats rising on a steep incline, one above another, to the number of eight or nine tiers. From one hundred to one hundred and fifty students occupy these, and pack pretty closely, especially on the lower rows, whence the best view is obtained. For no assemblage of youths between eighteen and twenty-five years, who have nothing to do but to wait, they are tolerably well-behaved and quiet. Three or four practical jokes, however, it is evident, are disturbed among them, and so the time passes all the quicker for the rest. The clock has not long struck two when the folding doors open, and lo walk two or three of the leading surgeons of the hospital, followed by a staff of dressers and a few professional lookers-on—the latter being confined to seats reserved for them on the lowest and innermost tier. A small table, covered with instruments, occupies a place on one side of the area; water, sponges, towels, and lint are placed on the opposite. The surgeon who is about to operate rapidly glances over the table, and sees that his instruments are all there and in readiness. He requests a colleague to take charge of the tourniquet, and with a word deputes one assistant to "take the flaps," another to hold the limb, a third to hand the instruments, and the last to take charge of the sponges. This done, and while the patient is inhaling chloroform in an adjoining apartment, under the care of a gentleman who makes that his special duty, the operator gives to the now hushed and listening auditory a brief history of the circumstances which led to an incurable disease of the left knee-joint, and the reasons why he decides on the operation about to be performed. He has scarcely closed when the unconscious patient is brought in by a couple of sturdy porters and laid upon the operating-table, a small, but strong and steady erection, four feet long by two feet wide, which stands in the centre of the area.—The left being the doomed leg, the right is fastened by a bandage to one of the supports of the table, so, as to be out of harm's way; while the dresser who has special char

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

New Orleans Christian Advocate.

Terms—$2 00 per annum, in advance.

NEW ORLEANS:

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 25, 1860.

ONLY $1 25 FROM 1st MAY.

From the first of May till the end of the year, the price of the Advocate will be only $1 25. We suggest to our Agents and friends to make a unanimous and vigorous effort to send us a thousand subscribers to commence with that issue. Make a special push for it, brethren, if you please.

MISSIONARY CONFERENCE AT LIVERPOOL.

We have received, from some unknown friend, the Liverpool Courier, of March 24, in which appears a full account of a grand Missionary Conference, the leaders in which were about one hundred gentlemen, chiefly missionaries and mission secretaries, old soldiers and civilians, from all parts of the world, and all sections of the Church of Christ. There were representatives of the following societies: Church Missionary, London Missionary, Baptist, Wesleyan, Moravian, Church of Scotland, Free Church, United Presbyterian, Welsh, Calvinistic, Irish and American Presbyterian, Turkish, Vernacular Education, &c., representing almost every evangelical church, both Established and Nonconformist, in the Kingdom. The object was to discuss the whole subject of missionary work at home and abroad in a practical, business-like manner, so as to elicit useful suggestions as to the best modes of operation from those best acquainted with the subject.

The proceedings were inaugurated with a prayer meeting, presided over by the Rev. Dr. Dixon, Wesleyan minister, after which General Alexander took the chair. A discussion was then commenced on European missionaries abroad, which involved the following subjects:—The necessity for a missionary mixing intimately with the natives and obtaining a thorough mastery of their language—vernacular preaching—itinerating—house visitation—local pastoral work—medical missionaries—translation of Bible and Christian works—causes of missionary success; of failure—should missionary effort be concentrated in limited localities, or diffused over a large surface—reflex influence of a greater degree of vital religion among the European soldiery and countrymen abroad.

Major Gen. Alexander presided. They were in session four days, and had fine dinners, and very delightful tea takings, all together, each day—a good feature, and one which should be adopted in this country. At one of their meetings the subject brought under discussion was, "How best to stir up, direct and work the missionary feeling at home," which involved the following topics: A missionary intelligencer, periodicals, correspondence of missionaries with university prayer unions and missionary associations, in their native towns, deputations, juvenile associations and missionary effort on the part of the young, conferences, a professorship of missionary history at the universities. The Rev. Dr. Lockhart, formerly a medical missionary in China, referred to that country as an illustration of what might be accomplished by medical missions in gaining the confidence of the people and opening their hearts to receive the Word; for after being relieved of pain and distress, the seed was sown and many were brought to know Christ. In every respect the medical mission in China had been satisfactory, and he had no doubt that in India they would be equally successful. He referred to the immoral conduct of English sailors in China and other foreign lands as one of the great obstacles to missionary efforts.

The Rev. W. Shaw, missionary from Africa, submitted statistical details of missionary labors in that country. He said there were now from 15,000 to 18,000 natives of various tribes and nations regularly accredited members of Christian churches, and admitted to the communion of the Lord Jesus. There were 20,000 in attendance at missionary schools, and taking the number altogether attending the gospel ministrations, there were at least 100,000 persons who had been brought to form the habit of attending the ministrations of the gospel through the labors of the missionaries connected with the various societies. The subject of "native agency" in connection with missionary efforts was brought under discussion.—Other topics intimately connected with the leading question were introduced, namely: The advantages of native agency; how should native agency be obtained; how far should the English language be employed in missionary education; difficulties in the way of ordaining natives as evangelists and pastors; how far should the clerical principle be introduced into native churches; how far should each individual Christian be encouraged to strengthen and propagate the Gospel amongst those still in darkness; and on what principle should the stipends of native agents be regulated. "How best to obtain and qualify candidates of the right stamp for the mission work" was one of the questions discussed. The Rev. Joseph Tucker, of the Turkish Aid Society, called attention to missionary efforts in Turkey, where the society had operated with considerable success. Numerous books had been published in the Greek, Turkish, Armenian, Syrian, and Arabic languages, besides schools established, at which there were now about 450,000 children in attendance.—The society had given a great impulse to the cause of education, and the subject was now being taken up by the Government, who had originated schools similar to those in our own country. In Constantinople alone there were 296 free schools, attended by 22,700 children, and many girls' schools had been established by Greek ladies. The churches organized by the society in various parts of Turkey were going on successfully, and considerable progress had been made in disseminating the principles of the Christian religion. The proceedings were brought to a close by a great public meeting in the Philharmonic Hall, admission to which was by tickets only, which were so much in demand that they were all distributed long before the day of meeting, and when the hall was opened it was speedily filled by a brilliant assembly of ladies and gentlemen. The Earl of Shaftesbury presided. Speeches were made by Rev. Dr. Raffles, Gen. Alexander, Lord Shaftesbury, Major Davidson (an old Indian officer), Col. Herbert Edwards, Rev. Hugh Stowell, Rev. Mr. Cullen, the Mayor, and others. Maj. Davidson related the following anecdote:

> He was confident that the Bible was to this people (of India) the most interesting of all English books, because they found in its history many illustrations of their everyday life; therefore, in many respects they could understand the Bible better than we could ourselves. As a proof of this, he would name an incident which occurred to a British officer with whom he was acquainted in India. His friend one day took a long ride in the country, and halted during the heat of the day at a village, where he rested in the usual receptacle for strangers, the village temple. The news soon spread around, that a white gentleman was in the temple, who could speak Mahrattee like a native—and the villagers crowded to see and converse with the stranger. He talked to them of their husbandry and other domestic matters, showing to the astonished people that he was familiar with the law and code of their habits and customs. In the course of conversation, one of the natives asked the English officer if he could tell them anything about "Usef," (which term they used to designate "Joseph,") and proceeding with his conversation, the officer found out that the villagers were familiar with the history of that patriarch. He inquired how they gathered their information about Joseph, when he was told that one of their number had visited a distant European station, where some one gave him a little tract, containing the history of Joseph in the Mahrattee language. This little tract was so highly prized, that the village accountant had been regularly engaged to read it publicly; and every evening the people assembled round the village well to hear the interesting account of Joseph and his brethren. These poor natives could know and feel what famine was, for they had been long accustomed to it; they had seen the corn reserved for years of scarcity, and they had been accustomed to have these stores doled out to them in scanty portion, to save them from actual starvation and to sow the seed in their fields. These simple villagers had been so deeply interested in the little tract, that they informed the British officer of their conviction, that the God of Joseph was the only true God.

Rev. Joseph Mullens, in the course of his address, said:—

> During this Conference not less than thirty-five missionaries from various parts of the world were present. There was one from among the North American Red Indians. Another had come from the islands of the Southern Seas. They had a representative from the West Indies; and another from the West Coast of Africa. They had one from the Cape settlement. Two of their honored brethren who had been out as medical missionaries, laboring on the coasts of China, were present as the representatives of seventy or eighty Protestant missionaries on the shores of that great empire; and more than twenty were there to plead the cause of India. Many persons there were aware that in India, especially in Bombay, Madras and Calcutta, the missionaries met month by month for discussions of the very kind they had been engaged in during the week, though on a smaller scale. Not only did the missionaries meet in union, but they co-operated on system. It was the rule with them to work together. They felt that in the face of the world they must make it known they were the disciples of Christ. While they respected the conscientious scruples of all, they would show the world they had one Lord, one faith, one baptism, and one God and father of all; and that they had one aim and one purpose, in the love of perishing souls. What a glorious position did they now stand in compared with what their fathers held when they commenced this work sixty years ago. He doubted whether modern missionaries had made a single convert before the year 1800. Dr. Carey went to India, and died to Serampore, as the century opened. A few others went to the South Seas.—Others went to Africa, and others to the West Indies, and now we saw 1,000 missionaries laboring in the Savior's cause wherever the Lord had opened the way.—Now they had more than 2,000 communicants, and more than a million who had forsaken heathenism and who rejoiced in Sabbath services, and who heard the Gospel of Christ. This work began amidst the apathy of friends. Beau Brummel and his crew ruled the world then, and the spirit of French infidelity prevailed; but just when the enemy came in as a flood, the spirit of the Lord raised up a standard against them, and now, thanks be to God, the different branches of the church of Christ went forth under the captain of their salvation, conquering and to conquer in his name. Now they looked upon the missionary following in the steps of Capt. Cook, when idolatry had passed away, when the children grew up like our own, and were now ignorant of idolatry. More than 100,000 Christians were now gathered in these islands, and it was intended by the natives to provide native ministers. The American Missionary Society would soon be able to leave the inhabitants of the Sandwich Islands to their own resources, looking on the missionary cause only as its counsellors and friends in those islands. If they looked at Africa, when, in the beginning of the present century, the Hottentot, the Finjoe, and the Kaffir, were shot down without mercy, they found men civilized and christianized. In China, seventeen years ago, the ports of China were opened for the first time, and now there were eighty Protestant missionaries working for Christ. In China they had gathered into churches 1,400 communicants, and about 3,000 Chinese christians. If they went to Burmah they found 100,000 Kaffirs, every one of whom, but thirty years ago, was entirely ignorant of the Gospel, who now observed the Sabbath, who were active and self-denying in zeal, and who did all in their power to send some of their own people into the work of Christ. And in many portions of India they saw churches planted by christian missionaries, who had labored in this good work for many years. In the island of Madagascar, where they had been literally persecuted and treated with unrelenting severity, and where it was thought that at the commencement of the persecution, twenty years ago, that the Christians were rooted out of the land, and where, perhaps, there were not fifty christians, there were now 3,000 who had been raised up by the blessing of the divine spirit upon the teaching of native agents who stood up for God's holy law.—Then they might refer to the island of Tahiti; and there they saw, that whilst French Popery had endeavored to exert all its influences, and present all its blandishments, they had adhered faithfully to their Protestant religion.

The Conference presented, says the Courier, a singularly interesting mixture of the civil, military and ecclesiastical elements. An old Indian General occupied the chair, surrounded by several soldiers, who, like himself, had, doubtless, often trodden the gory field of battle. A striking incident was mentioned, when one officer stated of another present that he had not met him since, as a young ensign, he was placed under his command many years ago in India. Strange that now, after a life of battle and conflict, they should meet once again, and for the first time for so many years, at the board of a missionary conference in England. It does seem as if there were signs of the swords becoming "ploughshares," and the spears "pruning hooks," when generals and colonels are uniting with such real earnestness with ministers and missionaries in promoting that glorious work which is "peace on earth, and good will towards men."

RE-UNION OF AMERICAN METHODISTS.

We see in quite a number of our secular exchanges notices of a movement for the reunion of the Southern and Northern Methodist Churches, which, since 1844, have been separated in consequence of the anti-slavery tests set up by the latter. We know of no such movement, and cannot divine the origin of such publications. However much to be regretted the ecclesiastical intermeddling with this subject, without biblical authority, and without consulting the purposes of providence; and however much to be regretted the consequent division of the Church; we know of nothing upon which to base a hope of the reunion of the Northern and Southern branches of American Methodism. The Southern Church is established upon a scriptural, non-political platform—precisely that of the Apostolic Church. She does her duty to both master and servant without interfering with the established civil relations of either. Had the whole Church, from the beginning, occupied this ground, American Methodism would have been, to this day, one undivided whole, and her strength and usefulness would have been the glory of the Christian world. But the Southern Church, rejoicing in "the liberty wherewith Christ hath made her free" from all these entangling, unscriptural, political alliances, and abundantly prosperous, will never make any concessions, in this matter, for union with any body on earth.

If the sentiments of the speech of Rev. Mr. Kettell, at the recent session of the New York Conference, which we publish below, were the sentiments of the Northern Church, generally, there might be hope of reunion; but such is far from being the case. The most conservative party of the Northern Church occupy an avowed anti-slavery platform, which they distinguish from an abolition platform. The Discipline of the Northern Church allows no minister to own a slave, and no member, where the laws admit of emancipation; though this law is evaded in their slave-holding territory. The present contest among them is whether or not freedom from slave-holding shall be made an absolute test of Church-membership.

We are surprised to find that the Picayune of this city, in publishing the speech of Mr. Kettell, heads the article as follows: "A FEW WHOLESOME IDEAS FOR THE METHODISTS," Is the Picayune ignorant of the existence of the Southern Methodist Church; or does it regard such "ideas" as necessary for the health of that Church? We trust our neighbors will see that it is due to themselves to be set right before the public on this subject. Our neighbor of the Crescent publishes the case fairly, setting forth the difference in position of the Northern and Southern Methodist Churches. Mr. Kettell, in his speech, among other things said:

> Was slavery a sin to such an extent that a man should be excommunicated for holding slaves! Now, if it was a sin to hold slaves, there was no alternative; they must cut it off, root and branch. Yet brethren who said it was a sin objected to the instant abolition of slavery. Now, the whole question was, "Is slavery a sin or not?" There was a great deal of pious rhetoric and sentimentalism spent on this theme. Slavery was called sinful, because evils grew out of it. He doubted it was necessarily a sin. There were many evils growing out of the marriage relation in the present imperfect state of society, but marriage was not sinful per se.
>
> The Sabbath, also, was made the occasion of riot and debauchery, but who would dare to say the Sabbath was a sinful institution? The old adage, that the world owed every man a living, was non-sense; every man owed the world his labor, and if a race would not work, men were right to exact labor by force. This principle was understood and carried out at the North, in our vagrant and workhouse systems. The question with us was not whether we would adopt such a system, but whether its adoption was a sin worthy of excommunication. All the rhetoric expended about people owning the bodies and souls of slaves was nonsense. The Southerners only owned the right to make their slaves work, and to convey them from one place to another to make them do so. At Athens and Rome, the bodies and souls were owned, but in our day slaves were treated with kindness, and cruelty to them was punished severely. Slavery, as it existed, was not a sin. The question was, whether they should let loose 4,000,000, of paupers upon the world. He depicted the natural degradation of the negro race, and insisted that they were best off as at present. The Negro in the West Indies was incapable of taking care of himself. Emancipation had blighted one half of the finest of the Antilles. This was proved incontestably. Toussaint l'Ouverture discerned the evils of freedom to the blacks, and established the famous "Rural Code," with the intent to finally enslave all his race. Go where you would in our own North, and the negroes were so idle set. If slavery had degraded the negro, why didn't freedom elevate him? He affirmed most emphatically that, under God's providence, slavery in America had been the only thing which had elevated the negro race, and he was a bold man who would dare deny it! In morals, health and civilization, the slaves were far above the free negroes. Many statistics were given to show this. Mr. Wesley was often quoted as having said that "American slavery was the vilest system under the sun." Mr. W. must have been blinded by prejudice, or he would never have made such a remark. Folks said we were "cottonized." It was a blessed thing for us that we were. The wealth flowing to us from the Southern cotton crop alone kept alive our institutions and so-called elevation. The speaker here went on to contrast the products of the South and of the North, finding an enormous ratio in favor of the latter, and ending with the conclusion that we were the ones who were actually deriving the most benefit from the institution of slavery. Didn't his brethren love coffee and sugar, and, he was sorry to say, tobacco? Did they ever think of abolishing slavery by the giving up slave products? It was something very curious to see a brother get up and make an anti-slavery speech, with a cotton shirt on his back and tobacco in his mouth. If slavery was a relic of barbarism, 'twas because the negroes were barbarians; all this talk about their being equal with us, he didn't believe a word of. 'Twas all nonsense and sophistry. Attempts to alter Southern institutions by such talk made him think of the European rival villages, "Great Barre" and "Little Barre." Two people in the latter place built a lofty steeple with a wonderful clock in it, looking toward the rival village, from which the semblance of a human countenance loomed forth and made faces at Great Barre, whenever the clock struck the hour of the day. This was what we were engaged in doing—making faces at the South, and he didn't think it was very dignified, or that it would result in much in the end.

THE JAPANESE EMBASSY AT SAN FRANCISCO.

By the last news from California we learn that the Japanese Embassy to the United States, consisting of seventy persons—four Embassadors, eighteen attaches of the Embassy, and fifty servants and attendants—had arrived at San Francisco on the 2nd of April, on their way to Washington. They came in the United States steamer Powhatun, which bears the flag of Com. Tatnall. The San Francisco papers give many interesting particulars of the arrival and appearance of these "strangers in a strange land." The Japanese occupied a large space on board—two rows of houses having been constructed on either side of the quarterdeck for them. Their habits are represented to have been cleanly, and their conduct on the passage that of guests. The officers of the ship state that they could not have had less trouble with the same number of any other nation. They have been carefully observant of everything on board, from the day of their starting. Their draughtsmen have taken copies of the machinery, and notes have been made of everything that has transpired on board, by a censor, or secretary, who has also had a copy made, which, with the notes of what transpires up to their departure hence, will be forwarded to the Emperor by the next vessel leaving for Japan. A journal was also left at Honolulu for the same destination. A number of them have made considerable progress in English. There are two or three interpreters with the Embassy, but it is said that none of them can compare with Capt. Mangern, of the Kandinmarro, whose arrival was previously announced in the Advocate, who may perhaps accompany the Embassadors to Washington. They stood the passage very well, few of them having suffered much with sea-sickness. Lieutenant Trenchard represents the weather as having been unusually rough, and affording not only an opportunity of testing the Japanese, but of the ship herself.—The three principal dignitaries on board are hereditary Princes, or rulers of Provinces in their native land, and are about equal in rank. The proper title of each in England would be "His Royal Highness," and in the United States "His Excellency," being the highest title under the sovereign ruler. The fourth dignitary (Morita Okarata) is sent out to act as treasurer, on account of his sound judgment and prudence; it is his province to advise and counsel. He is the Lord Palmerston of the Embassy, and nothing can be done without his approval. He appears to be clothed by the Emperor with very high powers.

The Powhatan arrived at Honolulu March 5th, and remained there till the 18th. The Ambassadors were there received with all formal honors. Private hospitalities were extended on every hand, and the King and Queen held court at the palace for the reception of the distinguished foreigners, and welcomed them in appropriate terms. They were also entertained at a grand ball given by the officers of the Powhatan, expressing great delight at the gay and novel scene. They bring $100,000 to defray their personal expenses, although the Embassy is invited at the sole expense of the United States. The chief dignitaries are magnificently dressed in embroidered silk robes, each wearing a sword of beautiful workmanship. They have conducted themselves with great dignity and propriety. The Japanese Ambassadors visited San Francisco on the 31st ult., and remained the honored guests of the city. Twenty thousand dollars were appropriated from the city treasury to provide for them suitable entertainment. All the Corporation officers, the members of the Legislature, the Governor and citizens generally, paid their respects in person; and a grand public reception was given to the strangers at the largest hall in the city, where the United States officers, both civil and military, with the foreign consuls and State authorities, participated in the ceremonies. The Japanese carry an immense amount of baggage, including many boxes of presents to the United States Government.

NEW YORK LITERARY CORRESPONDENCE.

New York, April 11, 1860.

Mr. Collier's Shakespeare Forgeries—The North British Review on Methodism—On Erasmus—The North American on Darwin's Origin of Species—On the Woman's Rights Question—Methodist Quarterly on Lay Representation—Milburn's new Book—Dr. Hayes' "Arctic Boat Journey," and new Expedition—Harper's Summer List.

The Literary world of England is just now greatly excited at the discovery that the curious old Folio of Shakspeare, which Mr. Collier first unearthed, some sixteen years ago, and whose marginal corrections were generally (though not universally) believed to have been made by some person who lived either in Shakspeare's own time, or at least but a generation subsequent—that these corrections are, in fact, mere forgeries—and enormously clumsy forgeries at that. Mr. Hamilton, of the British Museum, first made known that under the written corrections in ink, and in an old hand, were in very many places pencil marks in a modern hand. Other people say bluntly that these pencil marks, which must have been made before the ink marks, are undoubtedly in Mr. Colliers' hand-writing. An ingenious and patient literary detective announces that some corrections in short-hand, which puzzled him for a time, he discovers, after six months patient research, to be in a kind of short-hand which was invented in 1740, and could not consequently have been made before then, though they may have been since. Other documents, it is proved, have been either altogether forged, or incorrectly transcribed by Mr. Collier. And thus there stands revealed a most astounding series of subtle forgeries, which have the effect of unsettling many things about Shakspeare's works and self, which the world was rather glad to take for granted on the word of an "old corrector."

Mr. Collier, against whom such very serious charges are brought, and who thus falls under the suspicion of having for many years duped not only the world, but his most intimate friends, is a man now between 70 and 80 years old. He defends himself in the wildest and worst possible manner, by accusing his accusers of all manner of impossible meannesses and crimes, and by pleading his good character and grey hairs in bar. It is a pity he did not die before he was discovered. For that he has himself manufactured some—many—though by no means all, the emendations of his "Old Corrector;" and has persistently passed forged documents upon the world as genuine. I think no one who has read the clearly proven charges, and his defence, can doubt. Pity the sorrows of this poor old man, who seems to have had a kind of mania for "discovering" Shakspeare's documents.

The current number of the North British Review has a very fine and appreciative paper, on "Wesleyan Methodism." It is a review of "the Life of Jabez Bunting, D.D.," by his son, Thomas P. Bunting; published in this country by Messrs. Harper and Brothers. The Reviewer says:—"Whatever difference of opinion may have existed, or may still exist, regarding Dr. Bunting's policy, his biographer may well be permitted to point to the fact, that when he became a preacher, the members of the Wesleyan community, exclusive of those in the United States, numbered 120,000, and that when he retired into private life, the number had swelled to upwards of 400,000; and this in spite of considerable secessions, and notwithstanding the revived zeal of the Church of England, which Methodism had done so much to quicken and evoke, and which now provided for and absorbed multitudes who would otherwise have found their way into the Wesleyan ranks. And he may also point to the kindred fact, that the annual contributions from the Connexion for the support of missions to the heathen, which, when Bunting originated the Missionary Society in 1813, amounted only to some £5000, and when he assumed the management on Watson's death, in 1833, had advanced to £47,000, reached, when he retired in 1851, the noble sum of upwards of £100,000, with more than a hundred thousand converts enrolled as members of society. And in addition to all that Dr. Bunting did for his own church, the biographer may point to his eminent services to the general cause of Christianity, and his readiness to aid what he believed to be the cause of truth and righteousness in communions far removed from his own, of which his ardent support of the Free Church movement in Scotland may serve as a specimen." Of the book itself he has this high, but not too high praise: "The author is rendering an important service to the universal Church—to which, indeed, Dr. Bunting belonged; for, as Angell James said of him to some Wesleyan ministers, "He is ours as well as yours," and it is nothing more than the barest justice to the subject of the memoir that such a record should be drawn up. Jabez Bunting has left little in the world of letters to keep his name alive. And never do we look upon him with greater respect and reverence than when, with all his lofty aspirations, his refined literary taste, and his consciousness of the possession of powers which would have raised him to a lofty niche in the temple of Fame, we find him addressing a friend in these simple yet sublime words: 'The die is cast. If I give to our missions the attention they require, I shall not have any time hereafter for literature.' His monument was to be of another kind. Of the manner in which the biographer has performed his part we can scarcely speak in too high terms. He has told the story of his father's life—so far as it has yet gone—with admirable tact, ability and skill. This memoir is a singularly fresh and interesting work, containing much important information, and many valuable and suggestive remarks, and pervaded throughout by a genial, manly, Christian spirit, which it does one good to meet with. If we complain of anything, it is, that with exuberant good feeling the author has devoted too much space to sketches of his father's early friends. With all respect for these worthies, we must confess that we rather grudge them their room; and we shall be surprised if the biographer himself do not come, ere his next volume sees the light, to be of our opinion. However, we condone the venial fault, partly because of the kindly feeling which led to it, and partly because these sketches are really very interesting in themselves, and are remarkably well executed. Altogether, we can express no better wish for Mr. Bunting as an author, than that he may be as successful with his second volume as he has been with the first."

The North British has besides, articles on "Erasmus as a Satirist," a laudatory sketch of the life of him who was with Luther in spirit, but whose love of ease and fear of the fagot kept him "on the fence" when the great Reformer was doing battle with all Europe for freedom of conscience. Also an article on the "Silence of Scripture," not so interesting or suggestive as the subject would seem to warrant. And a number of others of minor or mere local interest, which I have not time to notice.

The North American Review for April is a very able and interesting number. The article on "Darwin's Origin of Species" is the most clear and thorough critique that has yet appeared of that book. The reviewer makes evident, that while "we may say of Darwin what Pascal said of Descartes—'it was his ambition, in his system of philosophy, to be able to do without God altogether; but he was obliged to suppose the Deity gave the world a fillip in order to set it in motion;' after which there was nothing more for him to do—he yet proves, in point of fact, the very point which he most constantly denies. "While seeking with so much zeal to disprove the necessity of any fresh exertion of creative power to explain the origin of a new species, he traces back that origin to countless "variations," departures from law, divergences from type, every one of which, on his own principles, is just as much an act of creation as the primary calling forth of light out of darkness. Variations of this sort, not mechanical, but contingent,—not resulting necessarily from the old order of things, but arbitrarily engrafted upon it, not pointing backward in an endless cycle, but forward to a continued progress and improvement,—have been taking place ever since the first appearance of life upon the earth, and are even now constantly occurring around us. Thus, indeed, to adopt the doctrine propounded in another of the mottoes affixed to this book, though not, we fear, in the sense in which either its author or Mr. Darwin understood it—thus, indeed "we can perceive that events are brought about, not by insulated interpositions of Divine power," but by exertions of it so frequent and beneficent, that we come to regard them as the ordinary action of Him who laid the foundations of the earth, and without whom not a sparrow falleth to the ground. We will take, for instance, one of his own examples,—the commencement of vision, or the rudimentary formation of an eye. If such a rudiment could see at all, and it must see well enough to give its possessor a decided advantage in the struggle for life,—then its formation was a step of transcendent magnitude; for there is all the difference in the world between seeing, however imperfectly, and not seeing at all. And as the theory will not allow any variations to be transmitted and preserved but those which are immediately and directly useful in the competition for the ground, the way could not have been prepared, through millions of years, for the formation of an eye which could see, by accumulating variations on an eye which could not see. From a creature, then, which had not even an infinitesimal rudiment of an optic nerve, there must have been a sudden jump to another having an entirely new sense, and that, call it what you will, would be neither more nor less than a new creation."

There is also in the North American a very desirable, and only too brief article, on the vexed question of "Woman's Rights." Here seems to me a fair statement of the "rights" of the labor question, as between the two sexes: "what is specially wanted in every community is the natural, untrammelled energy of every adult hand, irrespective of sex. That is the best governed country which best protects each and all in the free use of their hands and their gains, so far as they do no wrong to others. Beyond this, kings and rulers can do but little to mend, though they may do much to mar Nature's plan. If left to the natural laws of demand and supply, women, as well as men, soon fall into their true sphere of duty, doing those things that they can do best, and leaving to others those things that others can do best. Just at this point is the great fallacy of most of the arguments adduced in support of this and that reform in society. The question is not what this or that person can or cannot do. The true inquiry is, who can do it best? When it is said, that among the savages women were left to till the soil, the only profitable inquiry is, how did they till it? Did they cause the earth to blossom as the rose under their cultivation, or how otherwise? Who have been the most successful in beautifying the earth, the husbandmen of England and America, or the women of those countries where the stubborn soil has been committed either wholly or partially to them? The question is, not whether women have sat on the throne, or borne sway in one place or another, but, whenever and wherever they have been called to do a certain duty, whether they have or have not generally excelled in doing it." That is to say, the labor market recognizes no sex, but only ability. And on that ground the "labor" part of the question must be decided. To plead "sex" is to beg the question.

The Methodist Quarterly for April has, in view of the approaching meeting of our general Conference, I suppose, a forcible article on "Lay Representation," one of the prominent questions at present agitated amongst us. The writer maintains that "it is not true that the laity have no voice, no power in the government of the Church. No one can become a member of it, or be licensed to exhort, or to preach, or be admitted to the itineracy, without their formal consent expressed at different times. They act a very important part in the judiciary of the Church. No layman can be excluded from the Church unless tried and adjudged guilty by a committee of laymen, nor can he be denied the right of an appeal to a higher tribunal of laymen. In addition to all this, the laity hold in their hands the support of the minister, determining how much he shall receive. And if they fail to meet their own proposition they cannot be held liable as in a case of legal indebtedness. The ministry has no means of enforcing payment. The laity has the money power in its hands. In completion of the statement of the power of the laity, I would add that all the Church property, excepting the Book Concern, is held and controlled by laymen as trustees."

Without committing myself against or for the position of this writer, I may add that the power which is indirectly exercised is often much greater, more overwhelming and determining than any more direct exercise of power against it is likely to be. That we, the laity, have a strong, controlling voice in the counsels of the Church, seems to me to be beyond doubt. It, is another question whether the power, while thus exercised, is the most wholesome or efficient in certain directions; and it may be urged with some show of reason that a lay representation would, for instance, relieve our ministry of the burden of conducting the financial affairs of the Church, and place business matters in the hands of business men. Our ministry are a most able set of men, but it is hardly fair to ask of men who have passed their days in preaching, and their nights in study, to be also, on demand, first class business men. Few of our merchants would like to undertake to be at once thoroughly educated ministers, and thoroughly trained business men.

That our Book concerns have gone on as well as they have would seem to disprove this point, and to show that our ministry are more versatile than is above supposed. It proves on the contrary, I think, that—while the General Conference elects from the ministry those who shall be "to it responsible," the real labor of conducting the vast business affairs of these concerns rests in fact upon the shoulders of persons who are never known to the public, who have grown up in the business, have a thorough life-long knowledge of it, and for a moderate salary, and with no hope of promotion (being laymen) perform the duties of those who are chosen and paid as "book agents," and often even have to instruct newly appointed agents in the mere business routine, which enables those gentlemen to make a creditable show of working for their salaries. Now here is plainly a case where a worthy servant of the church, in one of its most important concerns, goes without his fairly earned reward, merely because he is not a preacher.

The article on "Wesley as a man of Literature," presents our great founder as a commentator, a political writer, and a controversialist. It is an interesting paper.

Derby and Jackson have published Mr. Milburn's new book. I like Mr. Milburn's good, homely, trenchant and pithy English. He smacks of the soil, and is as refreshing as a land-breeze to a sea-worn sailor.

A most interesting book, just out, is Dr. Hayes' "Arctic Boat Journey." The Dr. was a trusted companion of the lamented Kane, and his book rivals in interest that of his captain. Dr. Hayes is just trying to raise the means for a final expedition to the Arctic regions, to explore the open Polar sea, which some of Kane's men saw, which Lieut. Maury proves to exist, on scientific grounds, and which I don't believe is there at all. I hope the money will be raised, and the question settled. And, judging from his spirited volume, Dr. Hayes is the right man to head an expedition, which, if it achieves anything at all, will have to penetrate farther north than ever white man reached before.

The publishing business is growing dull: that is to say, publishers are preparing for the stagnation which must occur, pending the excitement of the Presidential Election.

Messrs. Harper and Brothers have, however, a good list in prospect. They will publish almost immediately Trollope's "West Indies and the Spanish Main," a book whose gossip is as entertaining, as its political economy is interesting. It is really one of the best written volumes of travel I have ever read, and will please equally thinking men and readers for amusement. "Old Leaves," (also by Harper and Brothers) is a collection of articles from the now extinct "Household Words." These papers discuss interesting and often important subjects in a style which is the best, because the most interesting and amusing magazine style of the day. A day in "the London Post Office," another in the Bank of England; some accounts of forgeries on the Bank of England—such are the subjects—always treated in that way which makes the most abstruse points popular.

"Queens of Society," is an account of famous women, who have led "Society" at various times and by various charms. Mr. W. C. Prince, who wrote the articles on "Coins," in recent numbers of Harper's Magazine, which excited such general interest throughout the country, has prepared a fine and thorough "Book of Coins and Coinage," which will be welcomed by all who are interested, and their number just now is great. Mr. Prince is himself one of the oldest and best "collectors" in the United States, and has a collection of coins which can hardly be matched in the country.

Smiths' smaller "History of Greece," will be welcomed by young students, for whom it is intended. And lastly, to end the list of Messrs. Harper and Brothers, come, two new and stirring novels, "The Mill on the Floss," by the author of "Adam Bede," and "A Mother's Trials," a book of a kind of painful interest, but written with great vigor and pathos.

Messrs. Appleton have just out another volume of Rawlinson's splendid edition of "Herodotus," a book of which I will make farther mention in my next.

Enough for this time.

THE NEW KINGDOM OF SARDINIA.

By the annexation of Lombardy, Parma, Modena, the Romagna, and Tuscany, Victor Emmanuel becomes the head of a kingdom containing a population of 11,246,613. Before the war, Sardinia, (including Savoy and Nice) contained a population of 5,167,542; the addition of Lombardy, after the peace of Villa-Franca, raised this number up to 7,977,547. The newly annexed Grand Duchy of Tuscany has a population of 1,807,000; Parma, 567,000; Modena, 606,000; the Roman Legations, 1,014,105. The acquisitions from Central Italy, therefore, number 3,934,105. There is a deduction from this aggregate of about 660,000 for Savoy and Nice, ceded to France; but with this correction, the aggregate population of Sardinia is put at 11,246,613, or more than double the population of the kingdom at the beginning of the war. It is geographically a powerful and compact kingdom, extending from the Mediterranean to the Adriatic, and commanding the whole of Northern Italy, with the exception of Venitia, which Austria still claims and holds.

With Venitia, for which Victor Emanuel has a great longing, and towards which he is accused of having covetous designs, and which belongs to the Kingdom of Northern Italy quite as naturally by geographical fitness and identity of language and ideas as Savoy did to France, Sardinia would be one of the most homogenious and well bounded and powerful States in Southern Europe.

This new power also threatens to be the downfall of the inhuman despotism of Naples. Whether, in the event of the overthrow of the present dynasty, the country would fall into the arms of Sardinia, or be erected into a new government by itself, cannot now be determined.

BENJAMIN OF MOLDAVIA AND THE LOST TRIBES OF ISRAEL.

The Corner Stone, a journal devoted to the cause of Judaism, published in this city, in its issue of the 19th inst., speaks at some length of the travels and discoveries of Mr. Benjamin, a Jewish traveller now in this city.—We had heard, through the reports of modern travellers, of Hebrew communities, of very ancient origin, somewhere in the interior of the far East, who had preserved their distinctive nationality, and to some extent their ancient religious books and customs: but we had not before heard them spoken of as the descendants of the "ten lost tribes."—Indeed, we know not that the people mentioned by Mr. Benjamin are identical with those above alluded to. The narrative is a curious and interesting one at any rate, and we quote it from the Corner Stone, as our readers will doubtless be pleased to see it:

> This highly distinguished tourist, who has penetrated the depths of Asia and Africa, in search of the lost tribes, is now in our midst.
>
> Benjamin the II as he is called by the greatest men of the world, he being like his namesake Benjamin of Toledo, who flourished in the twelfth century, a Jew, who has undertaken the great and perilous task of exploring the East in quest of the lost tribes, has actually spent eight years in Asia, where he underwent the most trying hardships and perils, and succeeded in discovering their existence,
>
> In Kurdistan he made the discovery of several communities, isolated from the whole world, having their own Synagogues and Rabbis.
>
> The mountains of Kurdistan are synonymous with "the dark mountains" of fabulous notoriety. There is a legend among us that when the ten tribes were led into captivity, they were brought to the places situate beside the "River Chosach." This turns out to be more than a legend, it is a historical and physical fact, and supported by philological research. The word "kurd" is easily reconcilable with the Chaldaic word for darkness, and the fact that some of these mountains are so steep and so high, that the rays of the sun seldom penetrate the valleys, render the legend in question a truth, which the researches and explorations of the intrepid traveller Benjamin of Moldavia, have now proved to a certainty, establishing beyond the possibility of a doubt, that the captive tribes of Israel at the expulsion, were led into Asia, some of whom were brought into Kurdistan, or the mountains of darkness.
>
> Mr. Benjamin is a great talmudist, he has also made himself familiar with all our midrashim, and other sources of information, which had considerably aided him in arriving at proper and judicious conclusions on the subject of his explorations. The work of such a man is, therefore, what we cannot ordinarily get. His is not a made book but a book which will make men familiar with facts and things that can not otherwise be attained. One word more before we speak of Mr. Benjamin's great object in visiting us. Mr. Benjamin, like his work, is, as far we can judge from conversation with him, free from superstition. He is a literary man in the fullest sense of the word. He does not come to us with tales about rivers which flow the whole week and subside on the Sabbath, whether true or not, but he comes to us a credible eye witness of what he really saw or heard upon the great subject of Israel's destiny. He describes to you the actual condition of our brethren suffering the most galling oppression in Asia and some parts of Africa.
>
> He gives a true account of their situation, so that his work is as great an acquisition to the philanthropist as is to the man of research.
>
> We will now only add a few words to reference to Mr. Benjamin's visit among us. Mr. B. having spent eight years in Central Asia, where he made the discovery of the ten tribes, returned to Europe and published his work. The great service which he has thus rendered science, procured him the highest commendations from the most celebrated men of the world—such as Von Humbolt, Prof. Ritter, the two Petermans, as also autograph letters from the reigning monarchs of Europe. But what Mr. B. has thus far done, though greatly benefitting the cause of learning and knowledge, he regarded as a mere entrance into the sacred chamber of knowledge. He stood at the portal and gazed at the hidden arcana. He is, however, desirous of penetrating the hidden chambers thereof, and all he requires is the means to enable him to do so. As follow the example of our brothers in Cincinnati, who our coreligionists have held meetings and pledged themselves to sustain his views. Mr. B. wishes to return to Asia, remain there in quest of his great object three years at the expiration of which time he is sanguine he will have a complete and succinct account of all the dispersed or lost ten tribes.
>
> Let us merely add, that it is highly gratifying to know that Mr. Benjamin has already succeeded here to a certain extent in enlisting public aid for his scheme, inasmuch as the Hebrew Mission Society has voted the sum of three hundred dollars yearly for the space of three years.

A FEW MORE STONES.

We mean that a few more stones for the Washington City Church have been gathered. Rev. John Boyle recently received two hundred dollars from Summerfield, Ala., and more recently, near six hundred have been collected in this city, during the visit of the Rev. Messrs. Proctor and Bayley. The work, we trust, is beginning to progress more hopefully. The enterprise ought to be pushed forward, at once, to a triumphant conclusion. The difficulty is, in the absence of a suitable agent, that "what is every body's business is nobody

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

APRIL 25, 1860.

THE LATE REV. T. C. THORNION, D. D.

Ms. Editor: Rev. H. H. Montgomery communicated to you the fact, that our venerable brother, Rev. T. C. Thornton, D. D., President of Madison College, had departed this life; but no notice of his death having appeared in the Advocate, I suppose his communication has not reached you. I therefore send you some incidents connected with his last moments, without at present attempting anything like an extended obituary or biographical sketch, such as his long and useful life, his eminent attainments and his zealous and ardent attachment to the cause of God, demand at our hands. He has many warm friends and admirers, who would, while lamenting his death, desire to learn something in reference to the last moments of this devoted servant of God.

He fell asleep in Jesus, on the 22d day of March, and closed forever, on earth, his useful labors. He had been in feeble health for some months, but most of the time was able to be up, though not in sufficient health to engage in college or pulpit duties. He attended the last session of the Mississippi Conference, and was permitted to participate in the deliberations of that body. A few weeks before his death he visited the College and lectured the students; and also at the close of the services on the following Sabbath, addressed the congregation, though in much feebleness of body. The appeal he sent you in behalf of the China mission, was, I suppose, the last thing he ever penned. He did not see it in the Advocate, as it reached his office the morning after his death. He felt a deep interest in that mission, and talked much about it during his illness. Even during his sickness, as he had done in his life, he lost sight of self in the interest he felt for the cause of education, the cause of missions, and the great interests of the Church.

His mind was clear and strong to the very last hour of his life. He repeated many passages from the Scriptures, and portions of hymns. I caught some of his expressions during the last day of his earthly existence, and will pen them for the gratification of his many friends. A day or two before he died he said, "Glory be to God, I have not followed a cunningly devised fable; live or die, it is all right." On the day he left us, in reply to the question, President, do you feel Jesus precious to you now? he said, "Yes, I the chief of sinners am, but Jesus died for me. I have felt him precious during most of my sickness, and last night, in the watches of the night, I felt I had the victory, and expect to have it to the end; and if I die to-night, I shall have victory over hell, death, and the grave. 'O death, where is thy sting! O grave, where is thy victory!' Thanks be to God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ, I feel as calm as summer evenings be."

He then asked for his hymn book, and selected a hymn by turning down the leaf; and said, "I thank God I trust to Jesus and his Almighty arm for eternal peace. If it be the will of the Lord that my days be prolonged for the benefit of those around me, especially the College, China mission, and my family, I shall be glad; but if it is not, the will of the Lord, the will of the Lord be done, and to his name be all the glory for ever and ever, amen." About 3 o'clock he had his family and the servants called into the room, and with great calmness and distinctness talked to them as to what he wished done; thanked his family physician, Dr. P. O'Leary, very tenderly for his unremitting kindness, and also thanked the servants for their attentions to him, exhorting all to live for God.—Closing his talk, he repeated the 23d Psalm, pronounced the benediction and the Gloria Patri.

To his wife he said, "Cheer up, my dear, cheer up! the storm is heavy, but Jesus is at the helm. I am not afraid to die. I am not afraid to lie in the grave by my dear Maria," and repeated the hymn commencing, "There is a land of pure delight." He said, "I wish no epitaph, I wish no pomp. A sinner saved by grace, a sinner saved by grace; let a gust of praise go to the ends of the earth for a sinner saved by grace. I die in peace with God and all mankind. I forgive every one, and wish every one to forgive me." About 4 o'clock he felt his pulse to see how the purple tide of life was ebbing, and died about 8 o'clock, P. M., having passed away as calmly as the setting sun. He felt no pain, and literally fell asleep in Jesus. A great and good man has fallen. A faithful minister of the New Testament, an able divine, and a father in Israel has left us to join the redeemed above. His death presented the composure of peace, combined with the sublime emotions of a Christian hero and a Christian philosopher. He talked familiarly of death, and viewed it as but the gate to a brighter world. He died realizing those sublime truths of the gospel which he had for half a century with such faithfulness preached to others. In sublime tranquillity he passed away to dwell with God forever. "He rests from his labors, and his works follow him."

J. M. Pugh.

Madison College, Sharon, Miss., April 13, 1860.

LITERARY NOTICES.

Post-Oak Circuit. By a Member of the Red River Conference. Edited by Thos. O. Summers, D. D. Thirteenth Thousand. Nashville, Tenn.: Published for the Author. Southern Methodist Publishing House. 1860. For sale at all our Depositories.

This is an enlarged edition of "Post Oak Circuit." Five new chapters have been added. Including the humbuggery attaching, as an excrescence, to some parts of the body ministerial, as well as the parsimony formerly diffused through the body laic, as it now does, it may be considered a "full-orbed" ecclesiastical satire, with its "whole round of rays (stlug-rays) complete." Those who have read the original, (and who has not?) will be very apt to read the enlarged work. Ridicule and satire have worked for the devil long enough. If we can make them "means of grace," so be it. Any way to drive parsimony and humbuggery out of the Church.

The Biblical Reason Why: A Family Guide to Scripture Readings, and a Hand-Book for Biblical Students. By the author of "The Reason Why—General Science," "The Reason Why—Natural History," "That's It, or Plain Teaching," etc. Illustrated with numerous Engravings. New York: Dick & Fitzgerald, Publishers, No. 18 Ann-street. For sale in New Orleans by J. C. Morgan & Co.

The design of this book is tolerably apparent from its title-page. It is intended to give "reasons," founded upon the Bible, and assigned by the most eminent divines and christian philosophers, for the great and all-absorbing events recorded in the history of the Bible, the life of our Savior, and the Acts of the Apostles. It is intended to be a sort of popular commentary. From the examination we have given it, we judge that it is from an Episcopalian inspiration. We have seen little or nothing to dissent from in its interpretations of Scripture. They are pervaded by evangelical views and a spiritual tone.

Cassell's Illustrated Family Bible. New York: Published by Cassell, Petter & Galpin, 37 Park-row. For sale by all booksellers.

We have received Parts I, II, and III of this work. Its price is fifteen cents a number or part. The numbers appear on the first and fifteenth of each month. Twelve numbers form a volume, and the whole work will comprise four volumes. The publication commenced on the first of March last. It is a periodical illustrated commentary. The scriptural text is in large, clear type; the notes are full; and the pictorial illustrations, drawn from ancient customs, scenery and history, are beautiful and valuable. It is well calculated to interest both old and young, in an unusual manner, in the study of the Bible.

Cassell's Popular Natural History. New York: Cassell, Petter & Galpin, 37 Park-row. For sale by all booksellers.

The first number of this periodical is on our table. It is from the same house, at the same price, and will appear at the same times, as the work above mentioned. The one is intended to illustrate revelation, and the other nature. And, as the Illustrated Bible begins with creation and man, the Popular Natural History begins with creation and the ape. It is on good paper, in clear type, and profusely illustrated with many fine pictures. It is exceedingly appropriate that these two periodicals go together; and we do not know of any publications of the kind that will be more charming to the young, or more beneficial in a family.

Mitchell's New Intermediate Geography. Third Book of the Series. A System of Modern Geography, designed for the use of schools and academies. Illustrated by twenty-three copper-plate maps, drawn and engraved expressly for this work, from the latest authorities; and embellished with numerous engravings. By S. Augustus Mitchell. Philadelphia: Published by E. H. Butler & Co. and for sale by all booksellers. For sale in New Orleans by E. H. Stevens & Co., 55, 57 and 59 Common-street.

We have already, a month or two since, noticed this valuable work in full, and need not repeat at length our commendation.

Wooing and Warning in the Wilderness. A Story of Canetucky. By Chas. D. Kirk (Se De Kay) New York: Derby and Jackson, Publishers. For sale in New Orleans by H. D. M'Goun, 36 Camp-street.

This is a series of sketches or life-pictures, of the early times of Kentucky. It describes, in pleasant style, early politics and politicians, early Indian wars and frontier warriors, and early marriages and lovers, in "Old Canetuck." The chivalry and romance connected with those early times, when the "hunters of Kentucky" gained a fame which has enshalmed their memories in history and song and fiction, pervade this book.

Our Church. A Manual for Members and Probationers of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. By the Rev. Josephus Anderson, author of "The Bible Christian."—Edited by Thomas. O. Summers, D. D. Nashville, Tenn.: Southern Methodist Publishing House. 1860. For sale at all our Depositories.

We hail every book of this kind. We have long needed a small, comprehensive, and thoroughly accurate work to answer the question of inquirers, "What is Methodism?" We have not examined this book sufficiently to say that it is the work desired. We like it, however. It discusses the Christian Church—the Methodist Church—her doctrines and government, her probationers, members, and their duties; and concludes with a form for reception into full connection.

THE RECENT TROUBLE IN ROME.

The New York Tribune has a letter from its correspondent in Rome, who was an eye-witness to the attack on the populace by the Pope's carbineers. It gives a detailed account, agreeing in every particular with a letter from the London Times, which was copied in last week's Advocate. The writer gives his own experience thus:

We had just time to ensconce ourselves in a doorway, when about a dozen carabinieri, or Roman gendarmes, some on horseback and some on foot, galloping and running, forming a line which stretched across a street not much wider than Nassau street, every one cutting to right and left, every one with a drawn sabre, flashing in sight. My companion, Mr. W. W. Hall, of Providence, a young Unitarian clergyman, had put one foot on the sidewalk, with a view of seeking some better shelter, when the swordsmen came abreast of us. The nearest one, without a word, struck my companion on the shoulder with the flat of his sabre, a violent blow, and muttering, in reply to his remark that we were Americans, "non importa," "no matter," brought the blade down upon his head with his utmost force, inflicting a gash upon the brow, between the left eye and the temple. Luckily, the wound, although so near a vital part, is a slight one, and will scarcely leave an honorable scare. Another gendarme aimed a blow at me, but I repeated that we were Americans, and he rushed off with his companions, who were hurrying on. It is possible that Mr. Hall's slouched hat heightened the violence of the attack upon him, for it had been given out that the Liberals were to wear slouched hats, which are always suspected by despotic governments.

But the case which comes nearest home is that of Mr. Glentworth, the American Consul, who was getting into his carriage in front of his own door, in company with a French officer in full uniform when the dragoons galloped off. One of them aimed a blow at Mr. Glentworth's head but the officer at his side pushed him back with one hand and half drew his sword with the other. At this point the gendarme would seem to have opened his eyes to the uniform, the presence of which in the city made his own excuse possible, and rushed on with his companions.—Whether the gendarme understood that Mr. Hall and myself were Americans, or that Mr. Glentworth was the American Consul, it is of course impossible to say. But we stated our nationality distinctly between the first and second blow, and Mr. Glentworth's house, before which his carriage was standing, occupies a conspicuous position opposite the Via Condotti, the great shop street and the roughfare from the Piazza di Spagna and the principal hotels to St. Peter's. Every gendarme in the city ought to know the character of the house, even if it were not plainly indicated by the American eagle on the front.—This, which appears to me a vital point, will doubtless receive a thorough examination in the course of the official correspondence which is likely to grow out of the affair. Our Minister here, Mr. Stockton, transmits to Washington, with commendable promptness, by the mail which carries this, a full narrative of the affair of Monday, together with the statements of the Americans injured. A translation of the matter has been furnished to Cardinal Antonelli. No other Minister, as far as I can learn, has moved in the matter.

Antonelli intimated to Mr. Stockton, who called upon him on Tuesday, I understood, that he had as yet no official knowledge of the matter, other than a report that innocent persons had suffered; that therefore he could make no official declaration; but that if the facts were as represented, his government was prepared to disavow the act of its agents performed without orders, and to discharge them if pointed out. At the same time the Giornale di Roma, the official organ, has declared that nothing in the nature of an attack took place, and that no one was wounded. And while some friends of the government cry with Giornale di Roma, that it is all a story got up for effect, others assert that the gendarmes put down a conspiracy, the existence of which had been luckily disclosed to the authorities. The liberals, on the other hand, assert that it was a deliberate massacre, planned by the Cardinals and executed by the carabinieri, under a pretext which might form an excuse for banishment and arrests. Some color is given to the hypothesis by the fact that the squad who charged up the Corso acted as one man, and although they met with no resistance from any quarter, cut down every one within reach.

It may be that at first they struck with the flat of their swords only, but they soon used the blade. I hear tonight moreover that they were joined at the Piazzo del Popolo by another squad, who had galloped up the Ripalsa, a street nearly parallel with the Corso, and debouching into Popolo; and that letters from Ancona speak of a similar raid there. It is certain that on Tuesday five prominent men, who had been members of the Committee of Liberals, and long suspected by the Government, were banished. Their names are Santangeli, Sterbetrelli, Mastrieola, Tissoni, and Ferri. One of them is a merchant retired from business; the others are mercanti di campagne, large landholders, all among the wealthiest men; hardly second to the foremost princes. These men have gone, some to Paris and some to Turin. They took the opportunity to carry presents from the Roman people to Victor Emanuel and Napoleon, in the shape of two swords, each of which cost 10,000f. and were paid for by the Romans at a franc a head. The subscription commenced during the late Italian war. I also learn that many arrests were made last night, some very distinguished men being among the victims.

THE ENGLISH CHURCH-RATE QUESTION.

This question is now one of leading importance in England, as also in this country. It will be seen from the Times' editorial, which we publish below, that it favors the abolition of Church-rates.

Church-rates!—The very words have already excited some gesture of impatience in half our readers. The topic is an established bore. It would be vain to count how much public time and how much private temper it has already unprofitably wasted. It is always costing good money and making bad law; it is always turning quiet rectors into scheming politicians, and sturdy chapel-goers into pinch-beck Hampdens. How anybody, be he noble or right reverend, or simply an honorable member, can wish to perpetuate the annual procession of this unquiet topic we cannot guess. How a House can ever now be got to do honor to it, is to be explained only by those who are deep in the arcana of electioneering. There cannot be a more dreary portion of the duty of a member of either House of Legislature than to take part, as many will today, in this dull annual farce of discussing what in all modern times the House of Commons has always decided in the same way, and always has decided to no purpose.

The House of Lords has offered a compromise. Soon after the opening of the present Session they appointed a Select Committee "to inquire into the present operation of the law and practice respecting the assessment and the levy of Church-rates." This Committee comprised, among others, the names of the Earl of Derby, Earl Granville, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Bishops of London and Oxford—all representative men. There is no doubt, therefore, that its members have sufficient authority to bind their House, and that what they resolve upon the House of Peers will ratify. They seem to have gone to work very heartily with this Church-rate difficulty, and for the space of fourteen days took a great deal of evidence, which we should conceive to have been rather matter of courtesy that necessity upon so well-worn a subject. Having thus decently discussed the topic, the Committee have published their report, and they have propounded the conditions upon which, so far as the Lords are concerned, this long-enduring strife may be made to cease.—The first suggestion is to abolish the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Court, and to assimilate the remedy of the recovery of a Church-rate to the remedy for the recovery of a Poor-rate. This part of the scheme only rivets the collar round the neck of the ratepayer, which was previously so loose that he could easily escape from it; and, so far, it would be acceptable neither to the Churchman nor to the Dissenter. To the Churchman, however, it is proposed that the items for which a rate may be made shall be definitely declared by law, and that the rate-payers in any new parish or district shall be rateable for the purposes of their own church, and for no other. This gets rid at once of the principal cause of complaint which the Church-goer now has, and of the principal difficulty in the legality of the rate. Its lawful objects are ascertained beyond further dispute, and its application is for the immediate advantage of the person paying. To the Dissenters it is proposed that they may exempt themselves altogether from the liability of a Church rate by giving a yearly notice to the Churchwarden of their desire to be so exempted. Any person, indeed, may, under the scheme, surrender all his rights as a parishioner upon his parish church, and renounce all obligations in contributing towards its sustentation. He loses his seat and his right to vote for the making or application, of Church-rates. He goes scot-free, and leaves the parish church to be supported by those who may desire to worship within its walls. Such is the scheme which the leaders of both parties in the House of Peers, and which the most eminent in rank and ability of the prelates of the Church, have agreed to as a compromise on this disagreeable question. A good deal may be said, at first sight, in favor of this plan. It seems to be moderate and reasonable. It appears to acknowledge in their full extent the principles at once of religious toleration, but also of religious equality. It takes from the Church of England the odious reproach of sustaining her own modest ceremonial worship by funds extorted from those who dissent from her communion. It meets every objection of principle which has ever been urged effectively against the system, which, under the opposition of the Dissenters and under the ingenuity of the lawyers, has in practice so completely broken down. It is fairly put by the Lords, that this desire of exemption from Church-rates is by no means common to all the members of the great body of Dissenters. The most rigid independent cannot reasonably ask that he should have rights in a parish church which he refuses to repair, nor can he without intolerance insist that his brother Dissenter of the Wesleyan sect should be forced into forfeiture of his claim upon parochial ministrations simply out of regard to the convenience of the Independent.

These are the considerations which appear to favor the scheme thus authoritatively put forward. It is conceived in a spirit of accommodation, and deserves to be treated with a respectful attention. But, on the other hand, objections will be brought against it which are by no means without their weight. Unless we are much mistaken, many of the warmest friends of the Establishment will be most strenuously opposed to this proposition. It offers a premium to the indifferent of all classes to declare themselves to be of a party distinct from the church. How many tens of thousands are there who are now content to remain nominal Churchmen, and who, although they take no interest themselves in religion of any kind, look upon their parish church as their natural place of worship, whether they would repair if they went anywhere, and whether they would send their children or servants? Is it wise to force or to tempt this great class into a position which is of a quasi-hostile character? To claim this exemption will be to take a party; and when a man has once taken a party he is likely to continue in it, and any accession of religious feelings will in all probability carry him in a direction antagonistic to the Church. This is not an unimportant consideration for Churchmen, and we are sure it will influence the judgment of many of them when considering this matter. On the other hand, the Dissenters will certainly be dissatisfied with the compromise proposed. The annual declaration of their desire to be exempt, and the exclusion from vestry meetings, at which Church matters are debated, will make the division between religious bodies obtrusively public, whereas in all public and secular transactions the true policy of the civil magistrate is to make it as faint and unseen as possible. To the Dissenters this annual claim will appear at once invidious and troublesome. In towns it would almost certainly create a perpetual small religious war.—The annual claim would be a party banner, and would come to be used as a defiance on one side and a reproach on the other.

Upon the whole, we think that the time is past when such a compromise as this could be profitably adopted.—The parties are now too thoroughly committed. The utter extinction of Church-rates has become the popular creed. All the Churchmen of the liberal school of politics have joined the Dissenters upon this point. The House of Commons has once and again condemned the whole system. We see no escape from the position in which we now are but to abolish Church-rates altogether. As to a substitute, there is a natural substitute which occurs to every one, which is in full action all around us, and which is perfectly successful. Let the church be repaired by those who have special accommodation in it. The rector maintains his chancel; let the pew-owners maintain the body of the fabric. It cannot for a moment be contended that a farmer has a right to the exclusive occupation of a pew and to make others repair the roof which defends it from the rain. In many instances it now happens that they who are liable for the bulk of the Church-rates have no pews, or the very worst pews, appurtenant to their dwelling-houses. Free seats, of course; there must be, but the case must be very rare, or the parish must be very much neglected, or the clergymen must be very unpopular, where a moderate system of pew-rents would not suffice for the necessary repairs of the church, and for the simple ceremonial of an English church. We should be glad to see the compromise now proposed carried out, or any other means adopted which would give no triumph to either of the contending parties; but we fear it is too late. Church-rates must go altogether, and pew-rents, or some other kind of contribution, must take their place. It can only come to this, and the sooner the better.—London Times.

SAVOY AND THE SWISS FRONTIER.

The annexation of Savoy has not been effected with absolute quiet. The great royal and imperial courts have indeed acquiesced in it, as something they do not approve of, but care not to contest, and it is, therefore, to be treated as an accomplished fact. But all the Savoyards are not contented to be transferred to a new allegiance. A party of them on Lake Geneva have seized a steamer and raised the standard of resistance. The Federal Council of the Swiss cantons have pronounced against the annexation to France of the districts of Savoy which are neutralized under existing treaties, and call for some security that the guarantee of treaties for the protection of the Swiss frontier shall be maintained. There is nothing in this which is going to trouble the French Emperor. The little emeute on the Lake amounts to nothing, and he has already made promises to soothe the Swiss sensibilities and undertaken that they shall have no reason to complain of the transfer. His speech on accepting the treaty for annexation contained assurances that the Swiss frontier should have all the benefits of the old guarantee, and in taking possession of Savoy care has been taken not to garrison the frontier posts in the districts which are objects of suspicion to the Swiss.

These districts are Chablais and Faucigny, which are adjacent to the Swiss town and canton of Geneva, on the southern shore of the lake, and effectively surround that small canton. Troops stationed there are at the gate which opens into the heart of Switzerland, and the cautions relying upon the ancient treaties, which guaranteed them from sudden invasion by the neutrality of these districts, when included in the Savoy portion of Sardinia, demand that they shall be placed in no worse position by the transfer of their territories to a more powerful and dangerous neighbor.

The demand is a reasonable one, and the Emperor Napoleon will find no difficulty in appeasing the Swiss without European intervention, and of his own free will. He has no present object to serve by keeping up a threatening demonstration towards Switzerland, and he can therefore comply with their desires and conciliate them without discomposing any plan of his own. If it were otherwise, we doubt whether Europe would interpose and make war on France for the sake of the Swiss. They are rather disposed to let him alone as long as possible, and less to quarrel with him for what he has done than to be doubtful and apprehensive of what he may want to do hereafter.—Picayune.

DOMESTIC.

Progress of the Bulkhead Bill.

The bulkhead bill, which has been so long before both Houses of the California Legislature, has passed the Senate.

The supporters of the bill say it will most undoubtedly pass the Assembly also. There are many, however, who are opposed to the project, and public opinion was being brought to bear powerfully on the rest.

An indignation meeting had been held in San Francisco on the subject, the largest that has ever been seen in that city.

It is generally believed that the Governor will veto the bill in any case.

Wagon Roads to Nevada Territory.

The bill providing for an appropriation of a quarter of a million of dollars for the purpose of opening nine wagon roads over the Sierra Nevada has passed both houses of the Legislature, and will undoubtedly become a law.

Great Rush to the New Mines.

Large numbers of persons, from all parts of California, are hourly arriving at the Carson Valley mines and the excitement continues unabated. Provisions are, in consequence, extremely scarce and selling at fabulous prices. Flour has been sold as high as fifty dollars the hundred pounds.

The Nicaragua Treaty.

Washington, April 20.—The Black Republican members of the Senate held a caucus to-day, and have agreed to support the Nicaragua treaty as amended, to guard the landing of troops by Congressional legislation.

Another Exciting Affair.

New York, April 20.—The Washington Correspondent of the New York Tribune says that Ex-Governor Walker of Kansas Territory has challenged Attorney General Black to fight a duel, for denouncing as a forgery a letter received by Governor Walker while Governor of Kansas, from President Buchanan, approving of Popular Sovereignty, non-intervention, etc. Attorney General Black has refused to accept the challenge.

The wife of Rev. J. D. Adams died at Waterproof, on the 20th. inst., as I am informed by brother McFarland.

R. J. Harp.

NATIONAL DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION.

Charleston, April 24.—The National Democratic Convention assembled in this city to-day, at 12 o'clock, pursuant to adjournment. The attendance was full from every State in the Union, the double delegations, for the present, all being admitted.

The committee on organization, appointed yesterday, reported Caleb Cushing, of Massachusetts, for President, and a list of thirty three Vice Presidents, one from each State in the Union; also, thirty three Secretaries, likewise taken from the thirty three States.

The report of the committee was unanimously approved and the Convention so permanently organized, much to the satisfaction of all the members.

The permanent organization effected, it was moved and seconded that the rules of the Cincinnati Convention be adopted as the rules of this Convention, with the amendment that each individual delegate have the privilege of voting as seemeth to him best. The reason of the amendment was that several delegations had been instructed to abide by the decision of the majority, and thus cast the vote of the State as a unit.

A long and somewhat exciting discussion ensued on the amendment, but it was finally adopted by a large majority, as also the rules of the last convention thus amended.

It was then moved and seconded that the Convention adopt a platform of principles, before proceeding to make a nomination for the Presidency. This motion also gave rise to considerable discussion, but it was finally adopted by a large majority, and in accordance with the same, the President appointed a committee of thirty-three, one from each State, to draw up a platform of principles for the Convention.

The Convention, on motion, then unanimously ordered all resolutions on political principles, to be sent to the Committee on Platform, and in accordance with the same, the resolutions of the Alabama State Convention, introduced by Judge Meek, were then referred.

The Committee on Credentials is appointed yesterday, have not yet reported. Meantime the double delegations all have seats in the Convention.

There is an unusual number of people in the city and attendant upon the Convention as lobby-men; nevertheless the proceedings are very quiet and orderly.

Outside the Convention.

It is generally believed here in the best informed circles that the Committee on Credentials will report in favor of the Soft Shell delegation from New York, headed by Dean Richmond and Peter Cagger, and against the Hard Shell delegation, headed by Fernando Wood.

It is, moreover, stated that a very large majority of the Soft Shell delegation stand ready to vote for Douglas.

It is also stated that the Committee will report in favor of the Douglas delegation from Illinois.

As to the double delegation from Georgia, though it embarrasses the Convention, it causes less trouble, inasmuch as there is more harmony of opinion in respect to the principles on which the nomination is to be made.

The Alabama delegation will stand firmly by their instructions, and demand a platform that guarantees, without any equivocation whatever, the protection of slavery.

The Kentucky delegation are unanimous in favor of Guthrie, though they will present the name of Breckinridge, should he seem to be the choice of the Convention.

The Tennessee delegation say they will stand by Johnson to the last, according to their instructions, though it is believed they will quickly go for any other man who seems to be the general choice.

The first choice of the South Carolina delegation was Jefferson Davis, of Mississippi, but to-night it is said they have agreed to go for Hunter, of Va.

The friends of Hunter now say that he has ninety votes sure on the first ballot.

It is rumored this evening that, notwithstanding the formal resolution of the Convention, an effort will be made to-morrow to bring on a ballot for President, before the Committee on Platform shall have reported.

It is also said to-night that the Convention will probably take a recess to-morrow morning, in order to give the Committees on Credentials and Platforms time to report.

Reports of the Convention at New York.

New York, April 24.—The correspondent of the Tribune telegraphs to-day from Charleston that everything is against Douglas, and that he can hardly be nominated in any case.—The writer adds that a rumor is in circulation and generally credited, that the New York delegation, whichever is admitted, will go for Hunter of Virginia.

Second Dispatch from New York.

New York, April 24.—In a second dispatch from Charleston, the correspondent of the Tribune says that nothing will satisfy the South except the nomination of Hunter of Virginia.

The dispatches of greatest interest are those received either from Douglas himself, or his intimate friends. Those received last night generally represented him to be very despondent. Those received from Charleston to-day, represent him to be more confident, though it does not appear that any certain opinion has been, or as yet can be formed as to the result of the Convention's deliberations.

Second Dispatch from Washington.

Washington, April 24.—Private advices received here indicate that the Massachusetts and New York Soft Shell Democrats will act to unison, if the latter are admitted, and go for Douglas, if they can secure his nomination.

The delegates from the cotton States are advised by Southern Senators here to insist on a slave code and Congressional sovereignty in the Territories, or secede from the Convention.

Douglas will not accept the nomination on such a platform He is still confident of his success.

The advices are, however, favorable to Hunter's nomination on the Cincinnati platform. It is said that Hunter and Douglas will accord a hearty support to whoever may be nominated.

Dispatches received by the Administration say that Douglas stock is depressed, and that the South will unite on a Southern man.

Movements of the Southern Delegations.

Charleston, April 24.—The Alabama, Mississippi, Florida, Arkansas, Texas and Louisiana delegates gave out to-night, emphatically, that they will go out of the Convention unless their platform is adopted.

A meeting was held last night by the Pennsylvania delegates, who, after a stormy session, resolved to abandon Breckenridge for Guthrie.

A meeting was also held at the same time by the Southern delegates. After an exciting discussion on several questions, they adjourned at one o'clock this morning without coming to any formal decision. To-night, however, the individual members appear very decided.

Mr. Dickinson, of New York, is to-night industriously pressed by a few ardent personal friends and supporters His only chance, however, is as a compromise candidate. In case of a rupture, he has ten votes from the New York delegation.

Caleb Cushing's Speech.—Particulars of the Organization.

Charleston, April 24.—On taking the chair this morning as permanent President of the Convention Mr. Cushing made an eloquent and patriotic speech, in which he counseled moderation and concession of personal preferences, provided it did not involve a compromise of principle.

The speech was received with great applause by all parties.

During the half hour which was then taken up, in the arrangements of the Vice Presidents and Secretaries, the members of the convention exchanged congratulations on the happy organization.

The amendment to the rules of the Cincinnati Convention, absolving delegates from instructions as a body, passed by a vote of 198 yeas to 109 nays. Many of the Southern delegates strenously opposed the amendment.

The committee on the credentials gave notice that they would report at 10 o'clock to-morrow morning, to which hour the Conventioned adjourned.

FROM CALIFORNIA.

The following telegraphic summary of news by the Overland Pony Express, we take from the Chicago Times of the 15th. It will be seen that the dates are from San Francisco to April 3d, being only twelve days:

St. Joseph, Mo., April 13th.—The first messenger on the Central Overland Pony Express arrived here at 4 P. M. yesterday, with California dates to April 3d, and Carson Valley to the 7th. It came through in ten days to a minute, leaving San Francisco at 4 P. M. April 3d.

San Francisco, March 31.—The Legislature is occupied considering the San Francisco bulk-head bill. The contest is exciting, proportionate to the vast interest involved. The result is doubtful.

The State capital seems permanently located at Sacramento. $100,000 have been appropriated for the commencement of a capital building, which is to cost, when completed, $500,000.

The Japanese steam corvette Condimarrah has been in dry dock at Mare Island navy yard, and put in complete order, free of charge.

The United States steamer Powhatan, Capt. Pearson, bearing the flag officer of Tattnall, arrived on the 27th from Japan, via Honolulu. She brings the Japanese embassy, consisting of two principal embassadors, princes of high rank among the nobility of the empire, and two associates, who are nobles of nearly equal rank.

By the Powhatan, advices from Japan are received to the 15th of February.

The Government of Japan had commenced stamping Mexican dollars, making them legal currency in that country. This obviates one of the principal difficulties in prosecuting trade with foreigners.

The news from the Washoe mines is about as before reported. Emigration thither is increasing.

San Juan Island was in joint occupancy by the American and British troops.

It was estimated that 3000 white men and 2000 Chinamen were engaged in mining at Frazer river.

Mining accounts are encouraging, and new diggings have been discovered in various places.

Carson City, April 4, 7 P. M.—The excitement in regard to the gold and silver mines in this region is unabated. Hundreds are pouring in from all parts of California. Scarcely a company who are prospecting have failed in striking rich ore where they anticipated to find it. The mineral region extends from a hundred miles in every direction and rich discoveries have been made over one hundred miles up the Humboldt.—The Spanish claims, situated where the mines were first opened, were yielding $2000 per day. Ground is changing hands at from $20 to $200 per foot. The Mono lake and Walker river country is rich in minerals, and hundreds are prospecting that region, generally with good success.

Flour is now being shipped to San Francisco for smelting from five different companies; other companies are making arrangements to ship their ore as soon as animals can be procured.—The ore sent yields from $2000 to $5000 per ton. Discoveries of gold bearing quartz are being made every day. Machinery of every description is on its way here for the purpose of crushing, smelting, etc. etc. Town property in different locations ranges high. Many fine proof buildings are under construction. The population is increasing very fast, and it is thought that in two months the population will be 50,000. Society is very bad, no laws for the collection of debts or the punishment of criminals; murders and fights are of daily occurrence.

The Pony Express is greeted with great enthusiasm by the people of the Valley, and as we have had but a semi-monthly mail during the past winter, the prospect of a quick communication with friends in the East is very encouraging.

The telegraph line is now completed to Miller's Station, and an office will be opened at that point during the present week. Miller's is thirty miles east of this city, in route to Salt Lake, and in two weeks the line will be in operation thirty miles still east, when the time will be reduced to eight days from St. Joseph to San Francisco for telegraphic dispatches.

The past winter has been very severe, unprecedented since the country has been known. The road over the Sierra Nevada has been open for travel the entire winter.

We are waiting very anxiously to hear if Congress is going to give us a Territorial Government this session.

San Francisco, April 4, 0 P. M.—The Central Overland Pony Express left here yesterday at 3,45, amid the cheers of over three thousand people.

In the first case to-day Walsh was found guilty, and will be sentenced Saturday.

An extra session of the United States Circuit Court will be held in May.

The amount of gold bullion deposited in the Mint last week was 29,991 ounces, and silver bullion to the amount of 7000 ounces. The amount of money coined was $236,000 mostly in double eagles.

Placerville, April 4, 7:15 P. M.—The Pony Express passed this place at 6:30 A. M.

The State telegraph branch line was completed to this city last night, having been built from Sacramento to Placerville, forty-five miles, in ten and a half working days.

The rush to the Carson Valley mines was still increasing.—The hotels are crowded, and crowds are leaving every day.—Many are detained for want of means to get over the mountains. Horses are engaged ahead. Freight from thirty to forty cents per pound to Virginia city. Several families passed through here to-day, with their household furniture, cows, calves, etc. Sixty-three passengers arrived here this morning, bound for Washoe.

St. Joseph, Mo., April 14.—A spirited demonstration was made here last night in honor of the prompt arrival of the first Pony Express from San Francisco. The city was illuminated, the military and citizens paraded the streets with bands of music, fireworks were set off, speeches appropriate to the occasion were made, and the best of feeling was manifested by every body.

The last hundred miles of the route were made in eight hours, and the carrier states that even better time than this was made in other portions of the road.

We are now advised where the express which left here on the 3d instant met the one coming this way. The next express will leave here Friday next, April 20th, at 4 A. M.

Harper's Magazine for May. On this page, sixth column, will be found the advertisement of this valuable and interesting monthly. The present number completes the tenth year, and twentieth volume of the magazine.—Its establishment inaugurated a new era in American magazine literature, and the completion of its tenth year is the assurance of the success of the ideas embodied in its establishment.

Benthuysen, Lewis, & Co., 116 Canal Street, Plantation, Housekeeping, and Fancy Dry Goods Establish. ment. Their advertisement will be found on this page, sixth column, Read it, and call and judge for yourselves.

MARRIAGES.

"It is not good for man to be alone."

On the 18th inst., at the residence of the bride's father, by Rev. Robert J. Harp, Capt. Geo. H. Swasey, to Miss Ophelia E., daughter of A. O. Jackson Esq., of this city.

By Rev. Wm. Green, on the evening of the 17th of April, 1860, at the residence of L. L. Babers Esq., Wilkinson county, Miss., Mr. John S. Row to Miss Julia A. Collings, both of Louisiana.

At the residence of Mr. Wm. Bagley, Covington La., by Rev. J. English, Mr. Geo W. Wright of Pensacola Fla., to Miss M. E. Bagley, Covington, La.

On the 17th inst., by the Rev. Dr. Hawley, Mr. Philip Hallaran to Miss Isabella S. Dewees, youngest daughter of D. S. Dewees Esq.

By Rev. J. E. Ferguson, at his residence in Richmond, Texas, the Rev. S. W. Martin of the Wisconsin Annual Conference, to Mrs. Arrohia Hans Jacobs, of Houston, on 9th day of March.

RECEIPTS, BY THE POST-OFFICE,

From April 17th to April 24th, 1860.

A—B F Alexander, $5; L Adamson, 4.
B—J G Bethune, $10; N W Brown, $1 50; H D Berry, $5.
C—H Copeland, $5; W A Cunningham, $5; N B Cooper, $11.
D—L F Dowdell, $1 50; C L Dobbs, 12.
E—J English, $5.
G—W H Gill, $5; R Graves, $2; J T M Gregory, $10; A E Goodwyn, $10.
H—A S Hamilton, $2; B Holmes, 1 50; W C Hearn, $5.
J—W. M. Jayne, $5; H Irby, $1 30.
K—S Lynch, $5; H P Lewis, 1.
M—D S McDonald, $3; J J. Millsaps, $15; F P McKinney, $2; C C McKinley, $14 50; T H McLeodon, $15 30.
N—W H Neal, $5.
P—J C Pitts, $5; J M Pugh, $2.
R—U Irby, 20.
S—J F Scurlock, $5; N H Self, $1 50.
T—R J Travers, $2.
V—H C Verdi, $2.
Y—J C Younger, $1.

COMMERCIAL.

Monday Evening, April 23d, 1860.

We condense the following statement from the New Orleans Price Current of the 22d instant:—

The market generally has exhibited only a moderate degree of animation during the past week, and with the intervention of a close holiday, adverse accounts from Europe, and some stringency in the money market, the operations in Cotton have been of a rather limited character. Sugar and Molasses have arrived slowly, but about sufficiently to meet the demand. In Tobacco, however, a more active movement has taken place, while Western produce of nearly all descriptions has been inactive, with a tendency in prices in favor of buyers.

COTTON.—With respect to prices, we have to remark that they have been very well maintained for nearly all qualities of clean cotton, and particularly for even running lots of the medium and better grades, which have been in request at rates ¼ to ⅛c. per pound above our figures, while for mixed and average lots the market has been still more in favor of buyers, and the differences to prices between dusty and entirely clean Cotton of the same staple ranges at a ½ to ⅝c. per lb.

The receipts at this port since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas,) are 2,034,958 bales, against 1,582,447 bales to same date last year, and the increase of the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 772,474 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same dates last year, there is an increase of 706,999 bales to Great Britain; and of 155,557 to France, while to other foreign ports there is a decrease of 82,793 bales.

New Orleans Classification:

Inferior	5 @ 0	Good Middling	11¾@12
Ordinary	8¾@ 7¾	Middling Fair	12⅛@12⅝
Good Ordinary	7¾@ 8⅞	Fair	—@—
Low Middling	9⅜@10	Good Fair	—@—
Middling	10⅜@11	Good and Fine	—@—

APRIL 25, 1860.

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

Poetry.

LINES INSCRIBED TO MRS E. M. M'CLANAHAN, On the Death of her Infant Boy.

BY CHAS. J. HARRIS.

He is gone—the baby-boy,
Gone to seek for purer joy;
Gone to dwell with Christ in glory,
Gone, oh! like a pleasant story.

Like a sunbeam on the wave
The sweet Lord his spirit gave;
And it gladdened life's dark stream
With a momentary gleam.

Then was caught up like a star,
To shed its radiance from afar;
And to the galaxy of Heaven
Now another light is given.

Murmur not at the bereaved:
Trust the Lord, who knoweth best;
Trust him, yes, and thank him kindly,
Human wisdom sees but blindly.

Take, sweet Christ, the tender blossom,
Fold it softly in thy bosom!
O, it will adorn thy mansion!
Fairer still, in its expansion.

Like a pale sweet lily broken,
Like a beauty that's unspoken,
Like a shadow angels leave,
Is the clay for which we grieve.

Back to Jesus Christ who sent him,
Back to God, who kindly lent him,
Now return the precious token,
With its purity unbroken.

LINES.

I walked by the side of a tranquil stream,
Where the sun was reflecting his parting beam;
The water was bright, and so crystal clear,
That every spray had its image there.

And every leaf that n'er it bowed,
And the silver streak and the crimson cloud,
And all that was bright and all that was fair,
And all that was gay, had its image there.

I said it was like the tranquil breast
That religion had soothed to a holy rest,
When sorrow had tamed the impassioned eye,
And the soul reflects its expected sky.

But I took a stone that lay by side,
And cast it far on the glassy tide,
And gone was the charm of the pictured scean,
Its sky so bright, and its landscape green.

Thus I bade them mark how an idle word,
Too harshly spoke and too deeply heard,
Or a rash reproof, or a look unkind,
May spoil the peace of an heavenly mind.

You cannot impede the celestial ray
That lights the dawn of eternal day;
But so may you trouble the bosom it cheers,
Twill scarcely be true to the image it bears.

Children's Column.

A DEATH-BED TESTIMONY.

Returning one Sabbath evening from one of my appointments, I discovered, to the left of my pathway, which led through a dense pine forest, a log cabin. I should, perhaps, have passed it without paying much attention to it, had I not recollected to have heard that a poor man in that neighborhood was sick. Believing, from the locality and general appearance of things, that this was the house, I determined to turn in and see him. I rode up, and could not help feeling sad that one of my fellow-beings should be afflicted, and yet no better cared for than the premises seemed to indicate. Still, as I neared the house, I could not help contemplating a brighter scene. Perhaps, thought I, he is a christian; and if so, it makes but little difference; many good men have died in worth places, and gone to their homes all glorious and bright. This reflection dissipated my gloom.

Alighting at the little yard fence, I walked in. Quite a number of poor people were in attendance. The outside view of things had been a true index to that within. Oh, thought I, surely this poor man has treasure in heaven, for he has none on earth. I went to his bed-side.—The face was pale as death, the eye had lost its brilliancy, the voice was very weak. I took his hand in mine: his pale, thin fingers, and his almost inaudible voice, as he said "very sick, sir," made me feel almost as if I were shaking hands with the dead.

"How long have you been sick?"

"Thirty days."

"Do you not think you are better?"

A shake of the head was the reply. "Alas!" added the sick man, "my friends have tired, and gone off, and left me to my fate."

After some other conversation, in which I had endeavored to encourage him, I ventured to inquire:

"What is the condition of your soul?"

He looked me straight in the eye, and said—

"I am not prepared to die—I have put it off too long."

His look was full of despair. I exhorted him to put his trust in Jesus; told him He was the savior of sinners.

"Oh," said he, "I have tried; but when the body is racked with pain, it is hard to exercise faith. Time was when I might; but now I am afraid it is too late. I am a probationer in your church. I joined, and thought I was doing all I could; but I find I was mistaken. Oh, I wish I had sought a change of heart when I was well and enjoyed church privileges; but I did not, and now I am in such pain I cannot!"

When he stopped speaking, I looked round upon those who were present; they looked solemn as death, and well they might, for the pitiful tone of his voice was enough to have touched the sympathies of the hardest heart. I sang and prayed with him, and left him in the hands of his God, promising to remember him in my prayers at a throne of grace.

As I rode away I could not help thinking how many probationers in our church are in the same situation; and if death should call for them, would make the same sad acknowledgment. A few days passed, and the sad news came, "he is dead!"

R.

A WILD RIDE.

"I'd give my ears this moment, Bill Hart," said I, "only to ride and manage a wild colt of a mustang, like that!"

"Well, Doc., I reckon you might do it just as easy, if you'd only taken your first lessons from the same schoolmasters that I did," was the reply, as the man addressed threw himself gracefully from the back of those untamed steeds of Texas plains, which he had just lassoed, and ridden for the first time. The still but half subdued animal feeling himself relieved of the weight of his rider, sprang tremblingly to the length of his hair lariat; but the wary Texan, planting one heel firmly in the sod, let the frightened and beautiful creature leap in circles about him, and while scarcely noticing his mad efforts to escape, he turned towards me and continued.—

"Yes, Doc., if you could have the good fortune to cut your eye-teeth in mustang-riding as I did, there's little doubt you'd come in time to be as good a horseman as the best of us; ha! ha! ha! I tell you, my boy, it only takes a stiff upper lip, a strong bridle bit and the saddle-girth, with a little knowledge of the ways of the brutes, to master the wildest and most vicious among them."

Saying this, the old mustanger, forcing the long, iron, tether pin of his lariat deeply and securely into the ground, and stripping off his rigging, walked away from the rearing animal, and seated himself among us under the shade of the little live oak grove, where we had established our encampment.

It was a party of "mustangers," or catchers of wild horses, that I had recently joined, not far from the western bank of the Nueces. I had often heard of this rare and exciting sport, and had travelled up from Corpus Christi to the little Irish colony of San Patrico, expressly to join this man Hart in one of his wild-horse hunting expeditions. We had been here in the vicinity of one of his corrals for several days, and having already collected a large herd within its palisades, were now engaged in the exciting and not unfrequently dangerous employment of breaking in to the bit and saddle the most desirable of them, previous to starting them towards the coast, where already had been established a good market for them.

"And how was it you cut your eye-teeth, Uncle Bill?" I asked of the old man, as helping himself to a long ribbon of, half-dried buffalo meat, suspended from the limbs overhead, he drew out his knife and commenced a relishing lunch after his heading ride.

"How was it, say you? Well, I'll tell you, my boy. Years ago, for you see that I'm an old man now, when the Mexicans claimed this broad land from beyond the Sabine as their own, I came among them. Corpus Christi was then hardly a rancho, having scarcely a dozen hide-covered jacals in the place. I came to it, a cabin boy from New Orleans, on board a little vessel engaged in the dry hide trade in a small way. Having a misunderstanding with the skipper, I left him, and concluded to live with the Mexicans. I reckon I was the first white person that had ever come among them, and they were right glad to receive me.

"In a little while I learned their language, and, like all youngsters, delighted in being on horseback, especially on those wild mustangs that the hunters brought in from the prairies. But I had never yet had the pleasure of mounting a caballo bravo, as those animals were called, that had never felt the pressure of a lasso, and the jaw-breaking bridle bit of the Mexicans; and I was ambitious of doing so, and becoming a mustanger.

"One day old Pedro Solano, the head man of the rancho, permitted me, to accompany the party of hunters out upon this very range where, if the animals were not more numerous than at this time, they were, by far, much wilder and finer.

"In them days they were rarely hunted. It was only when horse hair was wanted for lariats, or fresh horses for the saddle, that they were sought. Their hides were not marketable then, and the vast herds of cattle that roved about the coast furnished all that the people required in the way of trade, and for domestic use.

"Now it happened that there was, out here, a noble black stallion, that had long been lording it over the herds of the prairies. He had gathered the choicest and fleetest mares about him, and moved about with them with all the pride and haughtiness of a king. This noble animal the Mexicans had christened El Retinto, from his glassy color; and though numerous efforts had been made to capture him, he had thus far escaped the treacherous noose of the lasso.

"Fortunately, the first herd we sighted, after reaching the range, was that led by the famous El Retinto. The night before, a fine shower had fallen, and the animals were so much occupied in feeding upon the new, green and tender grass, that they had not noticed our approach. The old stallion was nowhere to be seen; and Pedro, suspecting that he was in search of water, in yonder barranca, (ravine,) directed his two best vaqueros, with their lassos, to dismount, and to move cautiously under cover of that little olump of timber, and with the wind in their favor, to reconnoitre this place.

"The men reached the timber, and then drawing themselves noiselessly along the ground, reached the edge of the barranca, without being discovered by the mares. Finding a saltable place, one of them crossed the gully, and gained the top of the other bank, and the two passed cautiously along, one on each side. From where we had halted, I could see all the motions of the men. I was watching with excited interest, when I observed the one on the opposite side of the barranca, rise suddenly to his feet, and swinging his long leathern thong over his head, gave it a wide cast out over the gully. At the same instant the other man also threw his lasso, and we could see by the tugging at the ropes, that some animal had been ensnared. A glad shout, now told of their success; and sinking the vowels into the sides of our animals, we were soon up on the edge of the ravine.

"Below there, by the edge of a water hole, the vaqueros had discovered El Retinto himself. The noble creature was struggling in the coils of the two lassos, both of which had been skillfully thrown over his beautiful, arching neck, and the captured horse possessed in vain to escape their fatal embraces. With wild cries of terror and rage the old patriarch and leader of his herd, gave the alarm; and the excited mares with ears erected, and manes and flowing tails upon the breeze, gathered from every direction, and rushing together, like a body of mounted cavalry, approached the edge of the barranca, at a little distance, and gazing a moment upon the fierce struggle of their leader, uttered wild cries of alarm, and then in one compact troop bounded away over the plain.

"After a severe struggle with the desperate and vicious animal, whose strength was not a match to the skill of his captors, we succeeded in getting him out of the barranca upon the level ground. But when once there, and he caught sight of his beautiful harem, as it continued to sweep in a wide circle about the spot, all his efforts to escape were redoubled; and the fierce cries of the baffled creature were painful to hear. For a time it required all the cunning of the Mexicans to prevent his escape; but when, at length, they managed to throw him upon the ground, and slipped a close bandage over his eyes, it was out the work of a moment to bind the secure wooden saddle to his back, and force the terrible, jaw breaking bridle into his mouth.

"This was done,—and Pedro turning to me, bid me tighten my sash, and prepare to mount the panting and furious stallion.

"Come, my boy," said he. 'You have been long anxious to break a wild mustang; and now is your chance. You shall have it to boast that you have ridden for the first time the noblest animal that ever led a herd of mares on the Neuces Range! Ready, my men!'

"So saying the old Mexican made a sign to the vaqueros to slip the lassos quietly from the still prostrate horse. As he felt his neck and limbs relieved from the pressure of the ropes, El Retinto sprang trembling to his feet. But no sooner had he risen from the ground than I was firmly and securely seated in the saddle, with the bridle reins firmly grasped in my hands. Still the astonished animal did not attempt to move from his tracks; but lifting his proud head, blew the foam impatiently from his nostrils, and scented the breeze, as if to ascertain the direction taken by his herd.

"'All ready, my boy?' inquired old Pedro.

"'Let him go!' I replied.

"At that moment one of the men approached the head of the horse, and with a skillful motion relieved him of the bandage, which had been covering his eyes.

"I tell you, my friend, that was the proudest and most exciting moment of my whole life; I am certain I must have trembled like a very coward, though it was not from fear; for I would not then have exchanged my seat upon the back of that wild charger for all the wealth of kings, with their crowns thrown in to boot. A few moments after, however, had I possessed that wealth, how gladly would I have given it, to have been placed once more on the firm sod of the prairie.

"No sooner had the bridle been removed, than I felt the gallant mustang swell beneath me, as he inspired a breastful of the free air; and then, with an exultant neigh, which was heard by the still circling herd, and fiercely answered back to him, gathered his feet together beneath him, and threw himself with a sudden bound at least ten feet in the air, and striking upon the same spot with his hind feet, leaped furiously upwards again. These motions the wild horse repeated again and again, each time springing with more force and celerity; till, at length, convinced that I was not to be thrown from my secure seat, the frantic animal, with another ringing neigh, threw his head aloft, and switching his long, beautiful, glossy tail from side to side, darted like an arrow, over the plain in the direction of his mates.

"Bracing myself firmly in my stirrups, and closing my teeth, while I grasped the bridle, I gave him free rein. As I felt myself borne swiftly through the yielding air, at a rate I had never before experienced, my pulse leaped within me with a wild joy. The muscles beneath me were strong and supple to a degree I had never observed in any animal I had ever mounted; and as the magnificent creature flew over the smooth and elastic sward of the prairie, my sensations were those of exquisite delight.

"Without swerving an inch from his course, the flying horse bore directly towards the rising ground, where the mares had halted; forming themselves into an extended line, were gazing with elevated heads and straining eyes upon their approaching lord. As he drew nearer he seemed to increase his speed; and filling the air with neighs of glad recognition, had already reached the foot of the slight ascent, when for the first time the herd discovered the strange object upon his back. But an instant only did they stand their ground after making this discovery, for now they wheeled suddenly about, and with high heads, and distended eyeballs, fled away again towards the horizon.

"Still the noble animal pressed after them, scarcely touching the ground as he flew, and we were again gaining upon the herd. So much excited was I by this headlong rush, and so exquisitely did I luxuriate in the rapid motion, that I was not aware of the distance that lay between me and my companions, till, an ascending another eminence of the gently rolling prairie, I cast my eyes over the plain we had passed, and was surprised to find that I had left them out of sight.

"I now determined to retrace my steps, and rejoin them; for this purpose I began to bear upon the powerful lever of my mustang bit, an instrument so constructed that the ordinary force of a child's arm is sufficient to break the jaw of the strongest animal. It was necessary to check my horse's speed before I attempted to turn his head in the opposite direction.

"But no sooner did I exert a little pressure upon my bridle reins for this purpose, than, to my horror, I saw the knot that confined the headstall at the top of the head, slip from its fastening, and, dragged apart by the weight of the heavy iron bit, fall over each cheek of the flying horse.

"I now became excessively alarmed, but, untwilling-standing, still retained my presence of mind, and endeavored, by a continued strain upon the reins, to keep the bit in his mouth. But as if aware of what occurred, the animal regathering all his energies, threw himself into the air, and tossing his head till it came in contact with my own, with an almost stunning blow, freed his mouth entirely of the bit, which fell uselessly upon his muscular breast.

"I was now entirely at the mercy of the frantic brute; and it is impossible to imagine a situation more terrible than mine was then—upon the back of a wild horse, rushing headlong with almost lightning speed into the crowded ranks of a herd of terrified animals—for, now under no control, the horse was gaining rapidly upon the frightened mares, who were straining their utmost to fly from him. With the, to them, strange object upon his back Unless some providential interference should come to my relief, I was certain a fearful death awaited me. Onward rushed the horse with redoubled speed—a speed that made it almost impossible to catch my breath; and with such force did the air impinge upon my face that it seemed as if the blood was starting from the skin. A few more flying leaps, and we were in among the kicking and snorting herd! Now, if possible, my danger was greater than before, for thick and fast the blows fell upon the breast and flanks of my panting steed; each instant I expected to receive my quietus from the blows of the fierce animals

"Away we flew over the plain! The panting horse, now white with foam, refusing to quit the herd, or to permit the frightened mares to leave him.

"I now saw no possible hope of escape from my terrible position; for to throw myself to the ground would be certain death, beneath the feet of the animals; and the only chance in my favor, was the possibility that at length the strength of my mustang must yield to the fierce efforts he was making. As yet, however, there appeared no flagging of the noble brute: and the probability was, that my own failing strength would yield sooner than his.

"Away we sped over the undulating prairie, surrounded by the kicking herd. My friends must have been miles away, for I could see no signs of their approach, if, indeed, they had mounted and given chase after me. This, however, I could not doubt; and this thought encouraged me to cling to my firmly-girted saddle.

"At length an idea occurred to me. It was this: I might kill the noble brute beneath me. I might let out his hot blood upon the plain; and as his glorious strength should desert him by degrees, safely free myself from him. Inspired by this new-born hope, I felt for my knife;—but I uttered a cry of disappointment, as my hand came in contact with the empty sheath,—I had lost the blade. But, as if directed by some good angel, my silken sash now becoming loose, and its ends streaming behind me, attracted my eyes.

"'Thank God!' I exclaimed, as I caught at the scarlet pennon, and hastily unwound it from my waist;—for another plan of escape had suddenly suggested itself to my mind.

"Not a moment did I lose, but hurling my long, Mexican rowels into the lathery flanks of the stallion, which caused him to throw his head suddenly upwards, I threw a coil of the sash about his neck, and hastily knotting it tightly, grasped the circlet with one hand, and with the assistance of my metallic sheath, twisted it with a vice-like gripe about his throat.

"The effect was instantaneous;—for as the animal felt the painful pressure upon his windpipe, he suddenly checked his speed, and in another moment broke into a staggering and undecided trot; and as I took another turn in the ligature, came to a dead halt; and by desperate efforts at coughing and snorting, endeavored to free his throat of the choking circlet.

"His blood-shot eyeballs protruded from their sockets; and as I took still another turn in my silken garrote, I felt his limbs tremble convulsively beneath me, and he fell first upon his knees, and then, with a gurgling, choking groan, tumbled over upon his sweat-reeking side.

"Without an effort, I sprang to my feet—still, however, retaining my hold upon the twisted sash.

"The noble creature was now completely conquered; and relaxing a little the strong gripe I had upon his throat, lest he might die of suffocation, I restored the bridle to his mouth, and knotting the headstall securely to its place, snatched the sash entirely from his neck.

"In another instant he was upon his feet, and I was once more securely seated upon his back. The frightened mares were still scudding away as I turned my already half-broken mustang upon the back track, and gave him the sharp points of my spurs. Again we went flying over the prairie; but not at the rate we had come; and by the time I met the Mexicans, who were in search of me, and had retraced with them to our encampment, the beautiful Retinto might have been safely mounted by a child.

"'Thus was the first ride I ever had on a caballo bravo' concluded the old mustanger, 'and thus it was, Doc., I cut my eye-teeth. To-morrow your turn shall come, if you desire it; but take my advice—never mount a wild horse, without first seeing that your rigging is all right and tight.'"

LIFTING THE VEIL.

George, of Cappadocia, born at Ephiphania, Cecilia, was a low parasite, who got lucrative contracts to supply the army with bacon. A rogue and informer, he got rich and ran from justice. He envied his money, embraced Arianism, collected a library, and got promoted, by faction, to the Episcopal throne of Alexandria. When Julian came, A.D. 361, George was thrown into prison; the prison was burst open by the mob, and George was lynched, as he deserved. And this precious knave became in good time St. George of England, patron of chivalry, and the pride of the best blood of the modern world. Strange that the solid, truth-speaking Britns should derive his lineage from an impostor. Strange the New World should have no better luck—that the broad America must wear the name of a thief. Amerigo Vispaci, the pickle dealer of Seville, who went out, in 1599, a subaltern, with Injeda, and whose highest naval rank was boatswain's mate, an expedition that never sailed, managed to supplant Columbus, and baptize half the world with his dishonest name. Thus nobody can throw stones. We are equally bad off in our founders; and the false pickle dealer is an offset to the false bacon-seller.—Ralph Waldo Emerson.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

A Tribute of Respect.

Whereas, we, the members of the Quarterly Conference for Lebanon circuit, have, through a mysterious providence, been called to lament the sudden death of our much beloved brother in Christ—REV. JOSEPH W. HIGHTOWER, who, after one round on his circuit, was called to his great reward. He died in great peace February 11th. We feel it but due his bereaved companion and friends to publicly express our heartfelt sorrow. Therefore,

Resolved 1st. That while our hearts are bowed in grief at a calamity so sudden and painful, we express to the surrowing relatives our high and lasting appreciation of his worthy character as a man and Christian minister, and that we would fain alleviate their affliction and share with them the bitter cup of sorrow.

Resolved 2d. That we will ever cherish a grateful recollection of his worthy character, while we will submit patiently to the painful dispensations of divine providence.

EBENEZER HEARN, P. E.

FRANCES M. ROBERTS, Sec.

MARY M. EDWARDS, only daughter of Gen. Daniel and Mary Edwards, was born in the parish of St. Tammany, May 10th, 1820; married W. D. J. Warner, Esq., of East Feliciana, December 22nd, 1840; and died in the latter parish, April 3d, 1860.

Since the latter part of the year 1844, she has been a member of the Methodist Church; and, better still, a consistent, zealous Christian. Her quiet and beautiful path way was illumined by the steady light of the Christian's faith, and made glad by the consciousness of the favor of her Heavenly Father. Meeting every duty, leaving none of the calls of to-day for to-morrow, she, in a few years, attained a ripeness of christian character and experience rarely equalled. Thus, when the summons came, she was ready. Who, then, will say, that though called away in the prime of life, and from many tenderly loved ones, she has been taken from us too soon?

Though a great sufferer in her last illness, which continued more than a month, she bore her sufferings with the patience and fortitude which were marked traits of her character. From the first she anticipated the result, and calmly—joyfully awaited it. Her last thoughts were given to her husband and children, whom she exhorted to meet her in heaven; and to her aged father, to whom she sent a message expressive of the confident hope of a speedy re-union in the "better land." "And I heard a voice from heaven saying unto me: Write; blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth; yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors; and their works do follow them."

O.

☞ Clinton (La.) papers please copy.

JAS. R. STROTHER died, at his residence in Vicksburg March 5th, 1860. He was born in Virginia March 11th, 1823. When quite young, his father removed to Tennessee, where he grew to manhood. He was first married in Opehasas, La., to Miss Emma Lewie, daughter of the Hon. Thomas H. Lewis, who, dying, left him one child—a lovely boy. His second marriage was in St. Louis, Mo., to Miss Ann E. Cox, in the year 1848. He came to this city from Greenville, Miss., about four years ago, and, with his wife, joined the M. E. Church, of which he continued an acceptable member until his death. He was a good man, beloved and honored by all who knew him. As a lawyer he was honest; as a citizen he was faithful; as a friend he was constant; as a husband and father, he was devoted and affectionate; and as a christian he was consistent. His end was peaceful. When he realized that he must die, he was peaceful and resigned. To his honored father, who has long preached Christ, his loving wife and orphan children, and his friends and relations, we offer Christian sympathy, believing that their loss is his eternal gain.

HIS PASTOR.

EFFIE L. and MARY LIZZIE, two little daughters of E. J. and Martha I. Harvey, have joined their angel sisters in the choir above. Not quite a year and a half had Effie L. dwelt on earth to gladden her parents' hearts, when scarlet fever unlocked the beautiful little casket, and on the 3d March her soul flew back to the God who gave it. Four days later, Mary Lizzie was summoned by the same messenger, ere she had numbered her fourth birth-day, and left the fond parents whom she loved so well, to dwell in His presence who said, "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven." Twice in the last five years have the lifeless forms of two little girls been laid among the flowers of the garden; and the patter of little feet, and music of young voices, been hushed in the home of these parents. Four lovely buds of promise have been taken from their hearts and home, in a world of sorrow, to bloom in that brighter, better land, where they stretch their little angel-hands to welcome those they lived to love. May God guide the steps of these afflicted parents safely to their loved ones.

M.

Deer Creek, Issaquena County, Miss.

☞ Vicksburg papers please copy.

MRS. MARY LUNDY died, suddenly, of apoplexy, at her residence, near Uniontown, Perry county, Ala. Such is the melancholy record we must make of one who so recently moved among us, respected and beloved by all, and scattering the precious light of a genuine religious life wherever she went.—Mrs. Lundy was born in Hancock county, Ga., 12th Feb., 1816, and was brought up under the immediate influence of the M. E. Church, her father, Dr. Andrew, being a minister of said denomination. Our sister did not, however, make an open profession of faith in the Redeemer until some eight or nine years since, during a revival of religion in the Methodist Church at Uniontown, Ala. During her connection with the church (which continued to the period of her sudden death), her department was singularly consistent. During the last two or three years, she frequently stood upon the mount of spiritual joy, and could exclaim with the sweet singer of Israel, "My cup runneth over." Though in her last moments the deceased was not permitted to speak of the bright world to which she was hastening, yet the testimony of her life is, that her spirit is among the happy throng that surround the throne of God on high.

J. B.

Southern C. Advocate please copy.

LITTLE BERIMON, infant son of C. H. and Elizabeth Sewart, of Marion county, Miss., was born February 24th, 1860, and died March 2t, 1860.

N. B. Y.

EDUCATIONAL.

DOLBEAR'S COMMERCIAL COLLEGE, OF THE City of New Orleans, founded in 1832—Chartered by the Legislature of Louisiana, with Agricultural and Mechanical Departments—Capital Stock, $2 0,000—in the new and spacious edifice known as STORY BUILDING south-east corner of Camp and Common streets, entrance on both streets, open day and evening. Faculty—

RUFUS DOLBEAR, PRESIDENT.
MATHEMATICAL DEPARTMENT.
GEO. E. BRACKETT, Professor.
BOOK-KEEPING DEPARTMENT.
RUFUS DOLBEAR, Lecturer.
J. W. BLACKMAN, Professor.
ENGLISH DEPARTMENT.
HON. J. N. CARRIGAN, A.M., late Sup't Education, La.; Professor and Lecturer on Commercial Law, etc
and M. B. M'CARTHEY, Professor.
FRENCH DEPARTMENT.
MARC. RUIZ, Professor.
DEPARTMENT FOR PENMANSHIP.
RUFUS DOLBEAR, Lecturer.
J. B. OSMITH, Professor.
SPANISH DEPARTMENT.
MANUEL MARINO, Professor.
GERMAN DEPARTMENT.
GEO. OHSNER, Professor.
LATIN AND GREEK DEPARTMENT.
M. MARINO and G. GESSNER, Professors.
ITALIAN DEPARTMENT.
RHETORIC, LOGIC, AND ELOCUTION.

This is the only chartered Commercial College in the South-West, and the oldest in the United States, and has stood for
FOR MORE THAN A QUARTER OF A CENTURY
On its own merits alone.

Persons from 12 to 60 years of age, can attend to any branch they may wish.

Board can be had with the Professor, or other good families speaking English, French, Spanish or German, from $5 in $6 per week.

Catalogues with terms, opinions of the press and leading men of the nation, etc., sent to all who desire them.

N.B.—To prevent mistakes or imposition, Students intended for this College should bring this advertisement as special direction, as there are every winter temporary rooms open for a few months, all of course making wonderful pretenses and promises, and posting flaming placards to enlighten the people of New Orleans and of the South! When three or more form Clubs and enter at the same time, ten per cent will be deducted from tuition.

☞ Citizens and strangers are invited to visit.

feb1 1y RUFUS DOLBEAR, President.

SOULE'S COMMERCIAL COLLEGE, CORNER OF Camp and Common streets, entrance No. 80 Common street,—established in 1856,—open day and evening the entire year.

A full course of instruction in this institution embraces Double Entry Book-keeping, Commercial Calculation and Commercial Law, and Penmanship. Gentlemen can enter for the full course, or any branch they desire, and at any time, as there is no class system, no copying from books, and no memorizing of arbitrary rules.

Merchants, Book keepers, and young gentlemen wishing instruction, are respectfully requested to call and examine our practical forms and peculiar manner of teaching.

For catalogues containing full information, and Balance-sheet Circulars, the most magnificent work of the kind ever executed in the United States, address, GEO. SOULE, New Orleans.

FELICIANA FEMALE INSTITUTE, JACKSON, LA. The exercises of the second term of this school will commence on the first of March next. Pupils entered at any time, and charged from the time of entrance.

Extensive grounds and houses have been added to the premises.

A good library, a new and complete apparatus, a full and competent corps of teachers, comfortable and newly-furnished apartments, afford the best facilities for a thorough education.

BOARD OF TRUSTEES:

WM. H. WATKINS, D.D., President.
J. N. EVANS, Secretary.
Prof. W. H. N. MAGRUDER, Wm LIPSCOMB,
JOHN W. BURRUSS, Esq., Col. S. M. QUINLAN,
F. Y. D. HAGAMAN, Esq. Rev. A. G. MILLER,
Rev. JOHN C. MILLER, JOHN MCKOWEN, Esq
Hon. JOHN MCVEA.
THOS. W. BROWN, Principal.

fm

PORT GIBSON COLLEGIATE ACADEMY, FOR Young Ladies, resumed its Exercises on the first Monday in Oct. last. A well chosen Faculty will spare no pains or care to make this Institution a pleasant and profitable place for young Lady students.

The buildings are large, well-ventilated, and well furnished. The grounds ample and beautiful.

For Information and Circulars, apply to,
Rev. B. JONES, Port Gibson, Miss.

PROFESSIONAL.

JAMES J. HUTCHINSON, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, Livingston, Alabama., will Practice in Sumter and the adjoining counties. [au24]

DR. E. D. BEACH, HAVING RESUMED THE practice of Medicine, offers his professional services to the citizens of New Orleans.

N. B.—Special attention paid to diseases of the RECTUM, PILES, FISTULA IN ANO, ETC.—Fistula in ano permanently cured without the use of the knife, cautery, pain, or confinement whatever. Office No. 6, Baronne street near Canal. ap21

J. E. ELAM, ATTORNEY - AT - LAW, BATON Rouge.

REFERENCES—Henderson & Oakes and Chinn & Bolton, New Orleans; W. S. Pike and A. Matta, Baton Rouge

B. D. & A. W. ROBERTS, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, Floyd, Carroll Parish, Louisiana. jy15

FUQUA & KILBOURNE, ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW, Clinton, Louisiana, practice in the Parishes of East and West Feliciana, and East Baton Rouge.

References—Payne & Harrison, Byrne, Vance & Co., W. and C. Letchford and Co., Broadwell & Haynes, and Pritchard & Pinkus, New Orleans. mar 7-1y

W. P. WINANS. J. T. HEATH.

WINANS & HEATH, ATTORNEYS AND COUNsellors at Law, Shreveport, La. Office—Market street. Will practice in the courts of Caddo, De Soto, Bossier, Claiborne, and Bienville.

G. SPENCER MAYO, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, Harrisonburg, La., will practice in the Courts of Catahoula, Concordia, Caldwell and Franklin Parishes.

COMMISSION MERCHANTS.

W. A. BROADWELL. A. P. HAYNES.

BROADWELL & HAYNES, COMMISSION MERchants (formerly Broadwell & Payne), No 40 Union street N O Having retired from business, I take great pleasure in soliciting for my former Partners, BROADWELL & HAYNES, the patronage and confidence of my friends, believing their experience, capacity and means, will merit its continuance, and enable them to give general satisfaction. [jo1] M. U. PAYNE.

W. R. STUART, DR D. A. JAMES,
New Orleans. Madison Parish, La.

STUART & JAMES, NO. 43 UNION STREET, New Orleans, have associated themselves together for the purpose of conducting a COTTON FACTORAGE & GENERAL COMMISSION BUSINESS; are prepared to make the usual Advances to planters, in the way of supplies, etc., and respectfully solicit patronage

B. M. LOWE & CO., COTTON FACTORS AND General Commission Merchants, No. 97 GRAVIER STREET, New Orleans. ap0

A. H. MAY & CO., COTTON FACTORS AND General Commission Merchants, No 94 Gravier street, New Orleans. no21y

J. D. PAYNE J. P. HARRISON.
G. W. HUNNINGTON. WM. H. HARRISON

PAYNE & HARRISON, COMMISSION MERCHANTS No. 41 Union street, New Orleans. dec7-1y

A. L. WALKER, ROBT. O. HUTCHINSON
New Orleans. Caddo Parish, La.

WALKER & HUTCHINSON, COTTON FACTORS and Commission Merchants, No. 87 Carondolet street, New Orleans. je28

J. BOYD & CO., COTTON FACTORS, RECEIVING and Forwarding Merchants, No. 4 Union street, New Orleans.

LEONARD FASH. F. A. LABRANS.

LEONARD FASH & CO COMMISSION MERchants, and Dealers in Western Produce, 61 Magazine street, New Orleans. Oct 26.

LANE, SALTER & CO., SUCCESSORS TO LANE, MAYFIELD & Co., Cotton and Sugar Factors and General Commission Merchants, No. 78 Charles street, New Orleans. jy5-1y

JOHN F. WYCHE & CO., COTTON FACTORS and Commission Merchants, No 18 Common street, New Orleans

STONE'S INFIRMARY—Corner of Canal and Claiborne streets, New Orleans. This well-known Institution is fully provided with everything necessary for the comfort and convenience of patients.

Separate Buildings have been erected for the accommodation of Negroes.

TERMS, including Medical attention, Nursing, Medicines, &c., $3 to $5 per day for Whites; $1 to $2 per day for Negroes.

Extra charges for surgical cases and operations

T. O. RICHARDSON, M.D.,
Attending Physician and Surgeon,
WARREN STONE, M.D.,
Consulting Physician and Surgeon.

P.S.—Special accommodations for females afflicted with Uterine Vaginal Fistula, Prolapsus and other diseases peculiar to the sex. Assistant with diseases of the eye.

SPALDING'S PREPARED GLUE.—SAVE THE Pieces! Economy! Dispatch!

☞ "A STITCH IN TIME SAVES NINE."☜

As accidents will happen, even in well-regulated families, it is very desirable to have some cheap and convenient way for repairing Furniture, Toys, Crockery, &c.

SPALDING'S PREPARED GLUE

meets all such emergencies, and no household can afford to be without it. It is always ready and up to the sticking point. There is no longer a necessity for limping chairs, splintered vessels, headless dolls, and broken oradles. It is just the article for cane, shell, and other ornamental work, so popular with ladies of refinement and taste.

This admirable preparation is used cold, being chemically held in solution, and possessing all the valuable qualities of the best cabinet-makers' glue. It may be used in the place of ordinary mucilage, being vastly more adhesive.

"USEFUL IN EVERY HOUSE."

N.B.—A Brush accompanies each Bottle. Price 25 cents.

Wholesale Depot, 48 Cedar-street, New York.

Address HENRY C SPALDING & Co
Box No. 3,606, New York.

Put up for Dealers in Cases containing four, eight, and twelve dozen—a beautiful Lithographic Show-Card accompanying each package.

☞ A single bottle of SPALDING'S PREPARED GLUE will sometimes save cost annually to every household.☜

Sold by all prominent Stationers, Druggists, Hardware and Furniture Dealers, Grocers, and Fancy Stores

Country merchants should make a note of SPALDING'S PREPARED GLUE, when making up their list. It will stand any climate

jan 25 1y

WEST TROY BELL FOUNDRY.—ESTABLISHED in 1826 The subscribers manufacture and have constantly for SALE at their old established Foundery, their superior Bells for CHURCHES Academies, Factories, Steamboats, Locomotives, BELLS. Plantations, &c., mounted in the most approved and substantial manner with their new Patented Yoke and other BELLS improved Mountings, and warranted in every particular. BELLS. For information in regard to Keys, Dimensions Mountings, BELLS. Warrantee, &c., send for a circular

Address, A. MENEELY'S SONS, Agents, West Troy, N. Y.
☞ CLARK, STAUFFER & CO, Agents, New Orleans, La., where a Stock of Bells can be found. my16-1y

MISCELLANEOUS.

CARPETING.—As the Season is advancing, we are now offering our large Stock of Velvet, Brussels and other Carpeting, at greatly reduced prices.

FLOOR OIL CLOTH.—We deal largely in this article, and endeavor to keep in the fine qualities, only the manufacture of the best makers. The widths vary from three feet to 21 feet by 96 feet. We cut to suit any Room or Hall.

CANTON MATTING.—In Store 500 Pieces of choice and ordinary quality—four fourths, five fourths, and six-fourths, White and Checked, of late importation from China, and much superior to old Matting.

CURTAIN MATERIAL.—A large assortment of Brocatelle, Silk and Wool Damask, Worsted Damask; Lace and Muslin Curtains, Cords, Tassells, Gimps, Brass Cornices, Bands and Pins, etc. We have a large Stock of Table and Piano Covers in One Cloth.

WINDOW SHADES.—Great pains is taken in this branch of our business, our assortment is unsurpassed; sizes from six feet to twelve feet long, and the designs very beautiful.

J. D. DAMERON and Co.,
124 Canal street,
Tenro Buildings.

a.1m

MOORE'S DOUBLE LOCK STITCH FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. Until of recent date all low priced Sewing Machines were considered worthless; but the Moore Machine is a practicable demonstration that a reliable Machine for all kinds of Family and Plantation Sewing can be retailed at the low price of "Thirty-five Dollars." It sews from two spools just as they are brought from the store, without re-winding. It works equally well on Gunabury, Cassimeres, Linen, and Muslin. It gathers, fills, tucks, hems and stitches equal to any Machine now sold. It makes a strong, elastic and durable stitch, that will not rip though you cut every fourth stitch. It is easy to operate, runs rapidly and quietly, and is as little liable to get out of order as any Machine now extent. It is a neat piece of furniture, as well as a useful implement.

The undersigned being the exclusive owners of the right to make, vend and use said Machines in the State of Louisiana, are now having the machine manufactured for sale, and want Agents in every Parish in the State, and will allow remunerative commissions

One of us will travel through the state this Spring; those wishing an interest in the business will address us at Griffin Georgia, until 1st May, after that time at New Orleans, until 1st June.

Clubs of Six desiring to purchase at the Factory can have them for $175.

JOHNSON & CO.

F. W. BAGNERLY.
C. H. JOHNSON.

CUDDY, BROWN & CO.—HAVING CLOSED THE office of MILES OWEN & CO., on the first day of January, 1857, my business connections in future in this city will be with Messrs. Cuddy, Brown & Co., 88 Camp street. MILES OWEN.

FASHIONABLE CLOTHING.—T. H. JACKSON & CO. No 82 Common street, keeps supplied by frequent arrivals from New York, a well assorted stock of CLOTHING and Gents' FURNISHING GOODS of every description, which we will sell low for cash.—Also a good assortment of TRUNKS, C

NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY A COMMITTEE OF MINISTERS FOR THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH---C. C. GILLESPIE, EDITOR.

VOLUME X.—NUMBER 18. WHOLE NUMBER 481.

NEW ORLEANS, WEDNESDAY, MAY 2, 1860.

$2 00 A YEAR, IN ADVANCE OFFICE—113 CAMP ST.

LETTERS FROM CUBA.—NO. IV.

Havana, March 22d, 1860.

One of the plagues of Havana is the "Real Loteria de la Isla de Cuba," the Royal Lottery. The traffic in lottery tickets almost exceeds belief. Hundreds of thousands of dollars pass into the hends of the government from this source every month. To-day one of these lotteries was drawn, and—I am sure, so far as "enthusiasm" is concerned, it far exceeded the war with the Moors. A file of soldiers was stationed with fixed bayonets to keep off the crowd whilst the drawing was in progress. It is managed in this way: 30,000 billets or bonos, marked from 1 to 30,000, are placed in an immense wheel, which is turned by three or four men—out of this wheel a number is drawn; then from a smaller wheel containing the "premiums," rising from $100 to $100,000, a prize is drawn, and set opposite the number. There were about three hundred prizes drawn to-day, amounting in all to $350,000. To raise this amount, the government sells 30,000 tickets at $1 6 each, amounting to $180,000, so that, in case all the tickets are sold, and all the prizes drawn, the Queen has made $130,000 by the operation. The buyer of a ticket has a chance in one hundred of drawing a prize, and yet the patrons of the lottery are to be found in every class, and frequently large sums are invested. I hear of some sea-faring men who have bought hundreds of dollars worth of tickets. Go where you will in Havana, you find the peddler of tickets. He buys them from the government at $16 per whole ticket, and sells them at $17. I had not been on shore ten minutes before I was besieged by an old man who wanted to sell me a fortune for four dollars and a quarter. In vain I told him that I did not want them. "Compra, Senor, compra," "buy, sir, buy," and he followed me up the street to the corner, where I was taken in charge by another, and soon they closed in upon me, old men and young men, some with one eye, or one arm, appealing to charity, and others striving to make me believe it was a certain road to wealth. I escaped from them, however, and they gave me up as a "hard customer." Several evenings afterward, I was taking a cup of coffee in the Cafe beneath the Tacon Theatre when I was again assailed. Two women, very slovenly in appearance, each having a child in her arms, borrowed, perhaps, for the occasion, walked up to my table and besought me to buy their tickets for the "love of God and charity." I appeared not to notice them until they commenced such a hideous din around me that I was glad to get rid of them and the tickets too, at the price of a few dimes. These lotteries are drawn every twenty days, and must prove an immense income to the Government, as the tickets, I am informed, are all generally sold before the day of drawing.

In a previous letter I promised to state some facts bearing upon the literature of the Island. Every one who is acquainted with the condition of things here, knows that the policy of the Government is to keep the Creoles to a certain extent in darkness. With what success this policy is pursued, an American has many opportunities to judge. I have seen but three newspapers, the Diario, Gaceta and Prensa, published daily at $12 per annum, and they are about as poor papers as one would wish to see. As a specimen, let me give you the contents of the Diario de la Marina of March 11th. The first column on the first poge commences with "ultima horas," or, as we would express it, "the latest news." Under this head, by an arrival at New York be it remembered, for they get nothing here direct, not even from old Spain, are "Notices of the Peninsula," scraps of news from Madrid, nearly every thing about O'Donnell and the Moors, of conrse. Next comes "General Correspondence" from Madrid, in which O'Donnell figures again in almost every paragraph. Article No. 3 is the one I gave you in my last letter, about the "Grand Parade." The editor prefaces the Captain General's address by stating that it would be impossible to describe "the most brilliant military feast of yesterday afternoon." Next we have a "Popular Subscription towards the preparation of a Testimony of Honor for His Excellency Senor General-in-Chief of the Spanish army in Africa, Duke de Tetuan"—General O'Donnell again. The highest amount allowed to be given is one dollar, the lowest twelve and a half cents. The editor closes the list of contributing Dons with the announcement that $1580 have been subscribed in his office. Official and commercial notices fill up the remainder of this page.

The first article on the second page is an editorial about the blockade of Vera Cruz, and Mexican relations with Spain. Next we have an editorial about the patriotism manifested all over the Island, in helping to increase the fund for the war against the Moors. The same old theme. An article laudatory of the Captain General is next in order, he having recently made some municipal regulation to the editor's liking. A short article on the cultivation of cane is succeeded by another about the commercial treaty between France and England. A paragraph or two of unimportant items close up this head. The news of the Island follows, and Correspondence of the Island, together with an article entitled the Love of Country. A few newspaper waifs fill up the remainder of the paper. Now, in all this, there is much more matter than in most of our daily papers—of this there can be no question; but the difficulty, to be seen fully, must be seen in the paper itself. There is a constraint in the manner of writing—a hollowness in the expressions of patriotism—a want, in a word, of liberty to think and write as he feels, which is characteristic of everything I have seen in the shape of an original article. Prohibited from discussing any of those subjects about which men are most deeply interested, it is not to be wondered at that these people are without literature. I have thoroughly searched about a dozen book-stores, all I have been able to find, and nowhere have I seen a book of any size bearing the Havana imprint. I picked up a little pamphlet of twenty-six pages, entitles "Espanoles a Marruecos," written in verse, and aspiring to be a "dramatico patriotic" in one act, "all about the Moors." For this pamphlet I paid fifty cents, about two cents a page, and this is a fair specimen of the prices of books. Barcelona and Madrid are the principal publishing points from which their libraries are recruited, and of course no political heresy can escape the watchful guardians of old Spain. Books, like almost everything else, are unreasonably high. For a plain copy of Don Quixote, in two volumes, they asked me eight dollars and fifty cents; could be bought in the States for three dollars. A small work on the Cuoclia administration in Cuba cost me three dollars; the Directory of Havana, three dollars and fifty cents, etc. I noticed some translations of the Waverly Novels, the works of Alexander Dumas in Spanish, and many other French works; Bancroft's History of the United States, etc.

At such prices as these, none but the wealthy can afford to buy books, and those who may desire to purchase foreign works have a very small catalogue from which to chose. But I doubt very much whether the Creole cares to read a great deal. Indeed, with all the evils to which they are subject, they do not seem to be very discontented. "Filibusters" are apt to have their ardor cooled by a few weeks residence in Havana. Magnificent country this undoubtedly is, and for the sake of human progress, and for the benefit of society at large, it ought to fall into other hands; but for the sake of the Creoles themselves I should think the experiment anything else than profitable. Notwithstanding so many of them have been educated in the United States, and speak tolerable English, their mental calibre, or the depression of a political status to which they are accustomed, has rendered their means of information of little value. By far the more honorable, high-minded and intelligent class are the old Spaniards, upon whose word you may depend, but a Creole is to be trusted only so far as you can supervise his actions. Of course I speak not of the whole, but of the majority with whom one comes in contact here. How it may be in the country, on the haciendas, the residences of the planters, I do not know; but let a man take his stand, at any one of the city gates, and see a citizen equipped for a ride in the interior, and he will form no favorable idea either of the law or the police. A holster of pistols is as indispensable as the saddle to which it is attached, and in addition to this a gun is attached by a strap to the saddle, and a rapier or a short sabre swings at the rider's side. Thus accoutred upon a pacing horse, the caballero ventures abroad; but in the event of meeting a highwayman, perhaps pistol, gun and sword would be of little service.—These gentlemen of the road have their rendezvous in the hills and mountains of the interior, in places inaccessible to the police and soldiery, and when they are apprized of the approach of booty, make their descent as suddenly and as dexterously as the Mexicans throw their lasso. Sometimes they pay a visit to a hacienda, and politely inform the country Don that they have taxed him so many dollars, which he will find it to his interest to pay without debate. The man may have arms in his possession, but what can he do against a dozen of these wild lawless fellows? He submits, of course, pays the fine, and says nothing about it, lest the robbers should take it into their heads to punish his indiscretion by burning his houses and destroying his machinery. Ever and anon the law lays its heavy hand on one of these desperadoes, and then wo to him, for the garrote is the speedy reward of his misdeeds.

Whilst passing to and fro through the city, and meeting at every step a policeman, a soldier, or an officer of some sort, I cannot wonder at the good order that prevails in Havana. Certainly you may go where you please, and do as you please, provided you attend to your own business as every gentleman should, and you will be as little likely to be molested as in New Orleans or New York. The soldiers themselves will treat you politely, and even with kindness, notwithstanding your white skin and unmistakeable manners point you out to everybody as an American. In this respect I have known foreigners in the United States subjected to many inconveniences which are unknown here. But what an immense sum does the tiovernment of this city cost. Look at the princely magnificence of the Captain General and his retinue—the garrisons of the Moro, the Cabano, the Castle of the Point, No. 4, Principe, etc—the hundreds of watchmen, sentiuels, day-police, etc.—and the hundreds of soldiers quartered here. No wonder that the Spanish Home Government receives but two out of the nine millions of revenue received from customs at this port. Seven millions go to support collectors, inspectors, and other officers, and to maintain the municipal and departmental organization. In addition to this income, there are taxes upon all species of industry and trade—taxes upon real estate, and upon incomes of all sorts. The gross amount of revenue from Havana and the Western Department I have not been able to learn, but it must be over $20,000,000.

Accustomed as I have always been to observe the Sabbath-day, I felt very much at a loss the first Sabbath I spent in the city. Walking through the streets, you could discover no signs of a day of rest. Indeed there is no Sabbath here—draymen, house-builders, workmen of all classes, shopkeepers of every description, drive on their business with even more animation than usual on Sunday. The cathedral and the churches are open, but not for preaching—mass, and the ceremonies of Romanism. On Monday afternoon a sermon was preached at three o'clock by D. Pedro Alburn in Santo Cristo Church, and on Sunday evening the Captain General gave a grand ball. So it goes. The people seem to care nothing for either church or priest—and of true religion, alas! they know nothing at all. The priest is welcomed at the sick bed, and in the dying moment, because then he is believed to employ the power of God in the remission of sins, and preparation for the solemn realities of eternity. As I was returning home one evening early, I obtained a view of a funeral procession in the streets. A man with a lantern in one hand and a bell in the other went before, ringing the bell, and the hearse followed with the corpse, and as soon as the priest was seen, down the spectators dropped on their knees, the men with their heads uncovered. Clerks behind the counters, measuring goods, fell on their knees, muslins and scissors in hand. I happened to be in a storewhere a lady was shopping, and as soon as she heard the bell (which I supposed to be an auctioneer's notice at first,) she left the counter, fell on her knees, and looked through her veil at the passing procession. I was some what at a loss what to do—curiosity prompted me to see what was going on, but I could not pay the price of pulling off my hat, and getting down upon my knees, and time was when Protestant non-conformity led to serious consequences. However, I stood in the door, looked at his reverence, and made no obeisance whatever, without anything resulting from it. A number of carringes followed the hearse, from which I judged that it was a person of some social position. But how different was the scene I witnessed yesterday afternoon! A plain black coffin, borne on the shoulders of six men, was followed to its resting place by about a dozen persons. No priest in his canonicals—no bells ringing before—no pulling of hats, nor bowing of knees; but the pall-bearers were quietly trudging along to the cemetery, smoking their segars as they went, and chatting away as merrily as if they were going to a wedding! The coffin was so badly joined that I could see the slippers of the dead man between the lid and the coffin. Here was one of the heirs of poverty and sorrow, going to his long home, side by side to lie with his brother dust who had preceded him with so much pomp two evenings before. In the grave distinctions are unknown; and the mass-less soul will fare as well as he for whom the mummeries of an absurd ritual are repeated in the walls of a gloomy cathedral by a poor erring mortal.

Ever recurring to the mind of an American is the old question, when will "manifest destiny" place the "Queen of the Antilles" among the stars of the North American constellation? Echo answers when! Not by the strong arm of power—not by any cohesive element among the people—not by native revolution—not by purchase from the mother country—not by these means will the end be attained. The customs of centuries are not to be overturned in a day, nor are the prejudices of an ignorant people to be overcome by the wild influences of republican neighborhood. These people, even if liberated from Spanish dominion, must have a new master, and I question if the politics of the United States knows any system of government capable of rearing an infant race from the cradle of liberty to intelligent manliness. The experiment will be hazardous, whenever attempted. Yours truly,

W. P. Harrison.

INTRODUCTION OF PROTESTANTISM INTO MISSISSIPPI.—NO. XII.

PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

Mr. Editor: Rev. Joseph Bullen (incorrectly written John Bullen in No. IX) was, in my opinion, the first Presbyterian minister that settled within the present limits of Mississippi; but as he spent several years in attempting to establish a mission among the Chickasaw Indians, he was not the first, by a few months, to visit the white settlements in the southern portion of the territory. A sketch of the life and labors of this excellent man and minister deserves a prominent place in the early history of Protestantism in our country. I am glad to say to your readers that I have received from my venerable neighbor Capt. Samuel Bullen, his youngest son, some valuable incidents and dates which will aid me very much in giving a brief outline of his connection with the early struggles of the Church in this region.

He was born in Worcester county, Massachusetts, about the year 1753, as I infer from the date of his marriage. He received his education at Yale College, and commenced his ministry before he attained the age of majority. In 1774 he was united in marriage to Miss Hannah Morse, of Sutton, Worcester county, Mass., by which they had five daughters and four sons, most of whom lived to be heads of families. Early in his ministry Mr. Bullen settled in Windham county, Vermont, where he spent about twenty years in the active duties of his vocation. About 1798 the Presbyterian Missionary Board of New York determined to establish a missionary station in the Chickasaw nation of Indians, and engaged Mr. Bullen to go on a tour of observation, and report the feasibility of the enterprise. In 1799 he made the journey, taking his son Joseph, then about sixteen years old, as his traveling companion. After spending some time in the Nation, he returned to his family late in the year. Having reported favorably to the Missionary Board, he was employed by them to take charge of the mission for three years. His first son, having died in infancy, and his three oldest daughters having grown up and married in Vermont, about the middle of March, 1800, he took his wife and five remaining children, and set out on his long and perilous journey to the Chickasaw nation, then inhabiting what is now North Mississippi. His course was by the city of Troy, in New York, and thence through Pennsylvania to Pittsburg. At the town of Bradford, in Pennsylvania, they were detained some time by the severe illness of several members of the family; an amiable, sweet spirited girl, just blooming into womanhood, died in the Lord, and there she was buried among strangers, to await the day of promise when "the dead in Christ shall rise." The people of Bradford by their unremitted kind attentions aroused in the hearts of the bereaved missionary family the liveliest and most enduring gratitude. Having arrived at Pittsburg, Mr. Bullen, in keeping with the prevalent custom, procured a flat-boat, in which himself and family descended the Ohio and Mississippi rivers to the Chickasaw Bluffs, where Memphis now stands. The bluff was then surmounted by Fort Pickering, which consisted of a stockade fort and several block houses, with a garrison of 60 or 70 United States soldiers, including officers, and was the door of ingress and egress to the Chickasaw Nation. On the arrival of the missionary family at the fort they were received by the commandant and soldiers with great cordiality, and were hospitably entertained during their brief stay. There being neither wagons nor wagon roads leading to the interior, Mr. Bullen procured a sufficient number of pack horses from the Indian traders to convey his family and chattels about one hundred miles in a south-easterly direction to the ancient Indian town of Pontotoc, near which he procured an old Indian settlement for a family residence. The Chickasawa generally received him kindly, and he immediately entered on his work. He engaged the services of an interpreter, through whom he preached the gospel to these heathen people. He also organized a rudimental school, which was successfully taught mostly by his son Joseph, and having a blacksmith and wood-workman connected with the mission family, he succeeded to some extent in learning a few the use of tools. Some good was evidently accomplished by the mission, for in addition to some improvement in agriculture and mechanism, several learned to read, and a few were admitted into the Church. Several white men and half-bloods were also duly married to Indian women with whom they had been previously living. But the influence of wicked traders and the usual effects of ardent spirits threw so many discouragements in the way, that when Mr. Bullen's term of service expired at the close of 1802, he had concluded to leave the Nation. As he had left his little farm in Vermont unsold, he had, until about this time, intended to return.—It was, perhaps, in the spring of 1802, three Presbyterian missionaries, by the name of Montgomery, Hall, and Bowman, spent a night at the mission house on their way to south-Mississippi, which seemed to settle him in the purpose of going also in that direction. Accordingly, early in 1803, he left Pontotoc, and settled about twenty miles north-east of Natchez, in what is now the southern part of Jefferson county. In addition to cultivating a small farm and occasionally teaching school, he engaged in preaching in various neighborhoods, and soon succeeded in forming the first Presbyterian Church in Mississippi. This church, which was called Bethel, was constructed of hewed logs, and was built on the south fork of Cole's Creek, on land then belonging to Alexander Calender, but now to Richard Harrison. Except the family of Felix Hughes, most of the members and patronizing families of this church were either descendants or connections of the Swayze family mentioned heretofore as settling the Mandamus Grant in 1773, south-east of Natchez, and consisted of the Colemans, Callenders, Griffings and others. Bethel was kept up as a place of worship for many years, until the formation of other Presbyterian Churches in more central localities drew off the membership. I now come to a point within my own recollection, for in early boyhood I was a hearer in this church, and Father Bullen, as we usually called him, was the preacher. He was even then venerable with age, and weighed down with accumulating infirmities. My recollection of him is, that he was a tender hearted man, and manifested great affection for his auditors, especially the young people, and was more "a son of consolation" than "a son of thunder." On the 17th of October, 1818, in the seventy-second year of her age, the wife of his youth, and the dear and faithful partner of his long and eventful pilgrimage, "died in faith," and was buried at Bethel. March 26th, 1825, he also closed his sojourn on earth and was buried beside his wife. Their graves are yet distinctly marked by plain head and foot-stones; and any one wishing to visit the site of the first Presbyterian Church in Mississippi, and the graves of the sainted dead buried there, can do so by calling on either Mr. Richard or Battaille Harrison, who will take pleasure in pointing out the locality. Father Bullen doubtless assisted in the organization of most of the early Presbyterian churches in Mississippi. How large a posterity descended from the three married daughters he left in Vermont in 1800, or his son Joseph who married a Miss Ross and settled; and perhaps yet lives, somewhere in east Tennessee, I do not know; but the Mississippi branch of his descendants is large, and the most of them, in addition to wealth and intelligence, are reliable and worthy members of the Methodist Church, South; a beautiful and impressive illustration of the blessings promised to "the seed of the righteous."

In my next I shall have something to say of the Rev. Wm. Montgomery.

J. G. Jones.

LETTER FROM BOSTON.

TREMONT TEMPLE.—DR. HUNTINGTON'S LECTURE BEFORE THE YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

"Without a star or angel for their guide,
Who worship God shall find him. Humble Love,
And not proud Reason, keeps the door of Heaven;
Love finds admission where proud science fails."

The immense crowd which gathered to hear Dr. Huntington, Prof. of Harvard University, on this occasion, was too great for the house. They were waiting around the door so thick, that when it was opened, we were fairly borne along by the multitude. Many were obliged to leave for want of room. The deep interest and excitement produced upon the public mind from his late conversion to the Trinitarian faith of the gospel, was all absorbing. His coming out so boldly in its declaration from that Unitarian school of divinity, and its classic halls of literary and scientific fame, was a circumstance of no ordinary character. The talents he possessed; the position he occupied as an accomplished scholar, orator, and a man of unblemished character, were calculated to produce a sensation of the most interesting kind.

There was a deep emotion evidently felt in the vast crowd. A stillness reigned—as if the throbbing pulsations of the heart responded to the soul-stirring thoughts which agitated the mind. We felt a peculiar sympathy with the scene; as if the Holy Spirit was brooding over the assembly with its soft and mellow light, to throw the radiance of Heaven upon the sublime subject of the cross of Christ with convincing power. Every seat, aisle, and vacant place was crowded before the speaker appeared upon the platform. As he entered, all eyes were riveted upon his interesting person, whose countenance beamed with a calm and placid light of intellectual foveliness.—His figure was graceful and commanding; and he appeared of an age when the mental faculties are well matured by deep and holy thought; youthful enough to give energy and spirit to manly eloquence.

The subject of his lecture was, true and false independence of character. His just and clear discrimination of the motives which actuate men of the world, were very beautiful. His analysis of the mind in its most subtle and intimate winding, discovered a searching investigation of the moral principles; illustrated by his eloquent and appropriate address, was calculated to improve and enlighten the young men in the formation of their characters upon the best of principles in the pursuits of life. His nice distinctions developed a philosophical research of a sound understanding, enlightened by divine wisdom. He presented man in his original capacities, God-like, created a little lower than the angels, crowned with glory and honor, yet fallen, utterly helpless as to their restoration, without a mediator. But through Christ strengthening them, they could do all things. True independence of character, he said, could be distinguished from the false, by a sacrifice of selfish interest, and a willingness to bear the scorn of the worldly-minded, when in the pursuit of wisdom and virtue. He cautioned the young against that kind of independence which seeks notoriety by a display of talent to attract admiration. In the closing period of his address, he dwelt with eloquence upon the gospel of Christ as perfecting the character of a young man in the most noble principles of conduct, and which alone gives the finishing touch to their elegant accomplishments, and qualifies them for useful and happy lives; and without which they could never reach that standard of moral beauty which constitutes their most attractive charms.

His style of orutory was chaste and classical; not of that kind which electrifies an audience, but which refreshes like a pure stream flowing through a verdant field enamelled with flowers of the sweetest fragrance, for he drinks from the well of living waters the streams of Lebanon, and communes with one "whose garments smell of myrrh, aloes, and cassia." God will have his witnesses in every place, and the invisible operations of the Holy Spirit are unlimited. Jesus finds a way to that heart which feels a void which nothing but his love can fill.—The speculative and skeptical may be left to wonder through the material and intellectual world, searching after the beautiful ideal, which they never find to exist but in the airy phantoms of their own imagination; while the simplicity of the gospel of Jesus unfolds it all. There is a harmony in its attributes with the spirit of beauty in all that surrounds us, and all that is perceived within of beautiful and good; of the most cultivated and refined intellect in its highest aspirations.

Dr. Huntington has a Bible class for the young men, where he instructs them in revealed truths to great advantage.

HENRY WARD BEECHER.

In the same temple we listened to the lecture of this famous orator, of world wide fame, on the subject of religion and politics. The same rush, the same crowded house; but with an excited expectation of something racy and piquant. We must confess, although having heard him before, we were disappointed. He seemed to have deteriorated in his style of oratory. He descended from the sublime to the ridiculous so often that it detracted from the beauty of eloquence. It appeared to us, in striking at the prejudices of the pulpit he did not give credit to the influence of the true and good, although they might be mingled with error; and, in the spirit of sarcasm, lowering their dignity, without raising a better standard of pulpit eloquence himself. Perhaps, like Lord Bacon in opposition to the peripeleptic philosophy, he aims at the "prejudices of the tribe" of schooled divines, and shows off their training by a quaint manner of burlesque. He said they went to academies to be ground up into meal, to colleges to be moulded up into dough, and into theological institutions to be baked, and come out as shew-bread (lord apphase). How far this applies to the present New England ministry we could not tell. Perhaps he knows. He is an independent speaker, with many flights of a bold imagination; with that insight of human nature, which he knows well how to touch, and make its strings vibrate with various notes which please the multitude.

THE MARINERS' CHURCH—FATHER TAYLOR THE SEAMAN'S FRIEND.

On entering his church we were struck with a beautiful fresco painting on the walls of his pulpit; the scene was in St. Paul's Bay, in the Island of Malta. A ship at strand among the rocks, in the foaming sea; and an angel, with expanded wings, in the clouds above. There was a harmony in the picture with the object of his mission, strikingly illustrative and impressive—a sermon in itself. The body of the church was filled with well dressed, respectable-looking sailors, whose bronzed faces shone with that honest expression peculiar to that class of unsophisticated men. A more orderly, attentive congregation we never saw, than those assembled at Father Taylor's church. He is eminently endowed with talents suited to their condition, and gifted with the pathetic to touch the heart, in the most graphic language. He has the eloquence of nature, refined by grace, and schooled in the gospel Jesus. His venerable form is impressive from the advance of years, but the intonations of his voice are still harmonious, and he rises to the highest note of the sublime, and electrifies his hearers by his bold and majestic figures, borrowed from the mighty ocean, with which he is familiar; either in a calm, or clothed by a storm. He has a son-in law, of like zeal, who assists him in his present labors, an interesting young man of promising talents.

THE PRAYER MEETING.

We attended the sailors' prayer-meeting, which was truly interesting to us, and heard some instructive speeches from sea-captains, with that true simplicity and beauty of the Christian character, which sent a thrill through the soul of holy inspiration. Mrs. Taylor is a lady of beauty and accomplishments, she took a part in the meeting with that good sense and refined sensibility, which told much for the success of this apostle in a work which throws its influence round the whole globe and isles of the sea. This church is a pharos of light extending from China to Japan, for while at his residence, we heard from one of his converts on the latter coast, who sent back the watch-word to Father Taylor "that all was well."

He and his lady spent a day with us at the house of our amiable friend, Rev. E. Otheman, through whose kindness we were made acquainted. We enjoyed their society two evenings at their own home, where he sits like a patriarch, surrounded by his accomplished family of children and grand-children, to cheer his passage to the tomb. Some of his children occupy elevated positions in society. He has traveled through Palestine, and has a large cabinet of specimens from the holy places, which he dwells upon with that enthusiasm peculiar to himself. He is in the decline of life, but not in zeal. He has a great wish to visit New Orleans, which he saw in his youth as a sailor boy.

MR. RICH, THE PHILANTHROPIST.

We were happy to be made acquainted, through our friends, with this distinguished individual and his family. Mr. Rich is a man of large heart, and noble views; he is free from all sectional prejudices of the political world; with that true feeling of a christian gentleman, that looks with a penetrating eye at results which promote the prosperity of our country. He is a man that has made his own fortune by personal efforts, and his possessions are great. He has a residence in the city, and one in the environs of Boston, which, with its surroundings, would well compare with those of England. Mrs. Rich resembles our Southern ladies in character. He "devises liberal things," and gives freely of his substance for educational purposes in our church. He built a house for the President of the Wilbrahum Academy, and designs now to rebuild the beautiful boarding establishment lately consumed by fire, with the aid of another wealthy man of the same benevolent purposes of doing good to the rising generation.

His love and veneration for the character of Dr. Fisk, has induced him to name one of his ships for that lovely man, and has his sculptured figure to adorn its prow, now seen floating upon the ocean's waves! The halls of Mr. Rich were hung with many portraits; we looked upon them with a deep and sad interest. They were the shades of departed loveliness, of youth and beauty, for out of a family of seven children not one remains to inherit his fortune. How true—

"Nothing can we call our own, but Death!"

S. B. Thomas.

READ THE SCRIPTURES IN CONNECTION WITH A COMMENTARY.

It is said that "man should not live unto himself," that his advantages and profiting should be made serviceable to others as well as himself. And having derived great advantage from reading the Scriptures as above, I desire to recommend the same course to others, particularly our young ministers.

Three years ago, having no special reading on hand, I decided to adopt Dr. Clark's comments on the Scriptures for my year's reading. Soon after I had commenced this work I informed one of our D.D.s of what I was doing, whereupon he remarked that "I had undertaken a laborious and comparatively useless task." But the question presented itself to me in this light: that Dr. Clarke was too learned and pious a man to write much nonsense, and that I could afford to read what he thought proper to write as necessary to a correct understanding of God's Word. So the determination was persisted in to accompony him through his forty years' labor. The result was that I came out a wiser and better man. And so great was my profiting, and so keen a relish did it create for the companionship of the learned and pious, in my reading the blessed word, that I procured Jenks' Comprehensive Commentary, and expect, if life lasts, to have him as my companion till I shall reach the close of "Revelations" again.

To read the word in connection with a Commentator is to read it in company with the learned and pious, sometimes curious, too, of both modern and primitive times. This is particularly so with Clarke's comments. He is sure to introduce you into the presence of the different Bible critics worthy of note, both modern and ancient, and also the different versions and renderings of the word—the Chaldaic, Arabic, Syraic, Septuagcot, Samaritan, the Coptic, Talmud, Vulgate, &c. Now, with these different versions of the word before him, and associated with the various and numerous learned men, with Dr. Clarke as the umpire of the whole, the Bible student has an advantage that he could not possibly have alone with his Bible. The young student may derive great advantage by consulting the experienced and faithful of his acquaintance, should he be favored with such, but even if he had such with whom to confer, he could not have their constant companionship, but his commentary he may have with him at least most of the time. We do not wish to be understood as directing the student to abide by the renderings and decisions of the commentator implicitly. Not so; neither should he be too hasty in dissenting from his decisions; he should be sure to give a better interpretation of his own, before rejecting that of his advisor. "In the multitude of counel there is safety."

Again, the study of the Scriptures after this fashion, is no surface work, but is as the miner, with pick and spade, crowbar and shovel, descending the pit, turning up the rich ore, and causing the mine to yield forth its abundant treasures to the faithful laborer. Surface work alone, has, and still will richly compensate the Bible reader, but to enjoy its richer treasures, and to walk in its clearer light, and to behold its more glorious revealments, he must descend to its greater depths, and rise to its greater revealed heights, which can be done only by much prayerful study, and the more helps we can have the better.

The Bible is the "man of the minister's council," the word that he is to preach to the people, the word of Him who has made him a minister; the word by which the people are to be saved, if saved at all; the word which, when faithfully preached—"preached in demonstration of the Spirit and with power, is the power of God unto Salvation." As such every minister should seek to be, if he is not already, well versed in its sacred teaching and divine literature, that he may be an able minister of the new and everlasting covenant. And has any man ever known too much about his Bible, and been too well qualified to dispense its truths to the people? Never did that man live. But, on the other hand, for the want of Bible knowledge, and ability to dispense its teachings to the people, we have had many bunglers in the ministry, and God's word and God's cause has been dishonored, and the Church and the world has suffered thereby.

A. McBryde.

SPRING AND REVIVALS.

I write embowered in flowers with which the kind ladies have furnished my study; the sweet-throated mocking bird is caroling its bewitching varieties in a grand old oak near by. The southern zephyr, fresh from the Mexican Gulf, and rich as an angel's breath, softly cools my heated cheek; and my heart is musical with a psalm of praise and thanksgiving to the great Creator, for having so munificently bestowed upon us the beautiful in nature. Who in the spring-time does not feel thankful for the privilege of living in this green and gracious world! Had earth been intended only as a mere brouic, and not a cheerful home, God had been more sparing in its decorations. The green, grassy carpet, the cerulean ceiling, the mountain altars, the cataract choirs, the many-tinted rainbow, the fair and fragrant flowers, the rich and rosente fruits, are all gratuitous, not necessary. But man has esthetic powors, and God has provided the beautiful and sublime to gratify his virtuous tastes. Those who look upon the broad and beauteous world as a mere workhouse, look on it wrongly. It is a grand palatial home—an Alhambra. "The Lord is good to all." The seasons are instructive. Each year they preach to us a sermon, beginning with the flowers and fragrance of spring, continuing with the fruits and flavors of summer, proceeding to the falling leaves and loves of autumn, until at length, "pale, concluding winter comes at last, and shuts the scene." How symbolic is all this of the procession of human life from the cradle to the grave! I love the spring, the season when nature puts on her holiday attire, and God "renewest the face of the earth." Amid buds and blossoms, songs and songsters, sunshine and shades, smiles and showers, one need not be a poet to be strangely pleased.

"There's perfume upon every wind—
Music in every tree,
Dews for the moisture-loving flowers—
Sweets for the seeking bee;
The sick come forth for the heating South,
The young are gathering flowers;
And life is a tale of poetry,
That is told by golden hours."

Is it not singular that we, a Christian people, should continue the heathenish custom of inaugurating the year with the rage and vigour of January? Is not the spring season the birth era, or revival time of the year? Spencer, in the "Fairy Queen," gives spring its proper position, in the march of the seasons—places it first, at any rate, in the poetical calender—

"So forth issued the seasons of the year;
First lusty Spring, all bright in leaves and flowers,
That freshly budded, and new blossoms did bear, &c.

The Hebraic year began in the month Nisan, corresponding with our March, but varying a little with the course of the moon. By Moses it is denominated "Abib." It was called "Nisan" by Ezra, after the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity. But custom, the world's common law, is tyrannical, and I suppose that we shall have to continue to celebrate New Year's Day on the first of January, despite the impropriety.

Is not the objection to revivals of religion founded on an implied spasmodia action in the graciousness of God; unreasonable and opposed to the analogies of nature? Nature has her revival era in each returning year, her "times of refreshing from the presence of the Lord." The doctrine of spiritual regeneration—the "new creation," has its striking analogy in what is now transpiring around us. Buds and blossoms, verdure and beauty adorn the vale and the mead, the oak and the shrub, while a "choir of chirping minstrels" are sweetly singing their revival hymns. Why may not the church have her spring season, her time of renewing? "My beloved spake, and said unto me—rise up, my love, my fair one, and come away; for, lo, the winter is past, the rain is over and gone; the flowers appear on the earth; the time of the singing of birds is come, and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land; the fig tree putteth forth her green figs, and the vines, with the tender grape, give a good smell. Arise, my love, my fair one, and come away."

Oh, that the church may have a glorious spring! May her prayer be, "O, my dove, that art in the clefts of the rock, in the secret places of the stairs, let me see thy countenance, let me hear thy voice, and thy countenance is comely!" And, ere the flowers are all blown, and the "last rose of summer is left blooming alone," may she be able to say, "my beloved is mine, and I am his; he feedeth among the lilies!"

H. A. M. Henderson.

A PLAN FOR QUARTERLY CONFERENCE.

First, let each Quarterly Conference henceforth publish and distribute an adequate supply of its own minutes, containing besides the usual questions and answers, &c., a well written Sabbath School report, missionary address, Presiding Elders sermon, or whatever the Quarterly Conference may direct; but in no case omitting a full and succinct Steward's report—showing the amounts apportioned to the preachers, how distributed among the different Societies, amounts collected, by whom and from whom, &c.

Secondly, let each Presiding Elder furnish a copy of the minutes of each Quarterly Conference, of every circuit and station in his district, that his administration may be reviewed by an annual Conference Committee to be appointed for that purpose, who shall report to the Conference all errors and defects of administration, and place said minutes on file with the Conference documents.

If men may be brought to feel greater interest in the transaction of business, by considering that what they do will be made known to their neighbors and fellow-citizens. If the thought "what I am doing will be placed on record for posterity to look at, alongside with what my contemporaries did," hath in it any inspiration, this plan has good elements. These measures are not a reflection upon the administrative ability of our Presiding Elders, but are the offspring of that love of law and order which would look at every man's official conduct with a brotherly glance. It will, however, bring our ablest disciplinarians into frequent communication, if not occasionally into direct contact upon questions of ecclesiastical law and usage, and that under favorable circumstances. Suppose the curiosity of a Preacher or some other person should be excited in reference to the amount of quarterage paid by a certain Steward, there is no delicate way of ascertaining the amount—the curious doubt must remain unsolved. This plan will proclaim from the housetop that which is not now spoken even privately in the ear. And the lash of public contempt shall be dreaded by the white-livered miser. The records of the Quarterly Conferences thus preserved will furnish full and reliable materials for the future historian.

The preservation of our records is a matter of great importance in its legal bearings. Other considerations crowd upon my mind, such as these: the large quantity of printing thrown in favor of our own presses; the addition which would thus be made to our literature in the form of essays, sermons, &c. A vast amount of information would thus be given in regard to our polity, &c.

S. J. Hawkins.

EXCOMMUNICATION OF VICTOR EMANUEL.

The Courier gives the following translation of what it says is the bull of excommunication of Victor Emanuel, King of Sardinia, pronounced against him by the Pope, after the meeting of the consistory of the 26th of March ultimo:

By the authority of God Almighty, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and the Holy Canons, and of the undefiled Virgin Mary, mother and patroness of our Savior, and of all the celestial virtues, angels, archangels, thrones, dominions, powers, cherubims and seraphims, and of all the holy patriarchs, prophets, and of all the apostles and evangelists, and of the holy innocents, who in sight of the Holy Lamb are found worthy to sing the new song of the holy martyrs and holy confessors, and of the holy virgins, and of all the saints together, with the holy and elect of God—we excommunicate and anathematize him; and from the thresholds of the holy church of God Almighty we sequester him, that he may be tormented, disposed and delivered over with Dathan and Abirum, and with those who say unto the Lord God, "Depart from us; we desire none of thy ways." And as fire is quenched with water, so let the light of him be put out forevermore, unless he shall repent him and make satisfaction! Amen.

May the Father, who created man, curse him! May the Son, who suffered for us, curse him! May the Holy Ghost, who was given to us in baptism, curse him!—May the holy cross which Christ, for our salvation, triumphing over his enemies, ascended, curse him!

May the holy and eternal Virgin Mary, mother of God, curse him! May St. Michael, the advocate of holy souls, curse him! May all the angels, and archangels, principalities and powers, and all the heavenly armies, curse him!

May the praiseworthy multitude of patriarchs and prophets curse him!

May St. John, the Precursor, and St. John the Baptist, and St. Peter, and St. Paul, and St. Andrew, and all other Christ's apostles, together curse him! And may the rest of his disciples and four evangelists, who by their preaching converted the universal world, and may the holy and wonderful company of martyrs and confessors, who by their holy works are found pleasing to God Almighty, curse him!

May the holy choir of the holy virgins, who for the honor of Christ have despised the things of the world, damn him! May all the saints who, from the beginning of the world to everlasting ages, are found to be beloved of God, damn him!—May the heavens and earth, and all the holy things remaining therein, damn him!

May he be damned wherever he be—whether in the house or the stable, the garden or the field, or the highway or the path, or in the wood, or in the water, or in the church! May he be cursed in living, in dying! May he be cursed in eating and drinking; in being hungry, in being thirsty, in fasting, in sleeping, slumbering, in walking, in standing, in sitting, in lying, in working, in resting, mingendo, cacando, flebotomando!

May he be cursed in all the faculties of his body!

May he be cursed inwardly and outwardly!

May he be cursed in the hair of his head! May he be cursed in his brains, and in his vertex, in his temples, in his forehead, in his ears, in his eye-brows, in his che

New Orleans Christian Advocate.

Terms—$2 50 per annum, in advance.

NEW ORLEANS:

WEDNESDAY, MAY 2, 1860.

ONLY $1 25 FROM 1st MAY.

From the first of May till the end of the year, the price of the Advocate will be only $1 25. We suggest to our Agents and friends to make a unanimous and vigorous effort to send us a thousand subscribers to commence with that issue. Make a special push for it, brethren. If you please.

DR. LIPSCOMB'S POEM.

We learned, without his knowledge, some months since, that our friend, Dr. Lipscomb, had on hand a poem on Milton. We confess we were surprised. Though a prose-poet of high order, we had not dreamed that he had ever attempted anything in the line of poetry proper. But our surprise was still greater when, yesterday, we opened the May number of Harper's Magazine and found a poem headed, "Milton," filling seven pages, and at the bottom, "A. A. L., Tuskegee, Ala." We have not had time to examine it thoroughly, and if we had, we prefer, at present, to let a most competent critic speak first, viz.: the accomplished editor of the Methodist Protestant, Baltimore:—

"The writer of this poem has not been known heretofore to the readers of Harper's Magazine as a "Poet." As an essayist, brilliant at times, always finished, and full of genuine, healthy thought, his papers have attracted the attention of some of the best cultivated minds in America and in Europe. Dr. Lipscomb, of Tuskegee, Alabama, has been regarded by those who have identified his papers in Harper's Magazine, and in the Reviews of the country, as one of America's most felicitous writers. But no one had ever heard of his writing a poem, since his boyhood, and even then, perhaps half a dozen stanzas of questionable measure would have met the complement of all his pretensions. How agreeably surprised, then, will those who know him be to find the favorite initials "A. A. L." appended to one of the best poems produced in America for the last five years at least.

"We confess to some surprize on the first reading of this poem. It is not of the flashing, dashing, rhyming, chiming, tripping, skipping school. As Waller said of Milton's "Paradise Lost," so, doubtless, some will say of this, that it is dull, prosy work. But the man whose ear is attuned to the loftier harmonies of numbers, who knows what blank verse is, who can measure lofty thought, and with an appreciating sense, feel what is serenely majestic—the man, in short, who can read John Milton, and enjoy what he reads—will find in this tribute a song not unworthy the noble theme it celebrates.

"We have intimated our surprise on reading this poem. We were surprized at its excellence. We know it to be a first flight into the region of verse. Lipscomb's high sense of what poetry should be has deterred him from poetical composition heretofore. In a moment of inspiration, however, he seems to have yielded to impulse stirring within, and pleading for an utterance of what he felt. The delay of former years has only enabled him the more confidently now to bring to his aid an enlarged culture, a nicely disciplined taste, and wealth of illustration befitting his subject. How he has studied Milton, how he has appreciated Milton, how his mind has been influenced by Milton, how his song has caught somewhat of the stately grandeur of Milton's verse, will be readily seen by those who are familiar with the Blind Old Bard and his wonderful creations.

"We do not mean to suggest a comparison between Milton's verse and that now before us. Such a comparison would be extreme, and by no means just to the poem we are considering. But we do mean to say, that Lipscomb's treatment of his theme shows clearly that his appreciation of Milton is exquisite, and that what, in the hands of one man in a thousand who writes verse, would seem to be a profanation, is in his hands an appropriate and worthy apostrophe to the greatest of English poets."

We have not room for copious extracts. Indeed, the poem must be read as a whole to be properly enjoyed. Those who have not seen it, however, will thank us for such specimens as we subjoin.

Of Milton's earlier life, we have the following:

"The classic banks of Cam heard thy first songs,
Heard them with joy. Its reeds, like organ-pipes,
Took breath from thee, and gave melodious sounds
That flowing waters caught, glad of thy strains,
As sweeter than their own, and bore afar
To blend with ocean's minstrelsy. Its walls
And domes of cloistered thought, proud of their Bard,
Sent forth thy Natal Ode. The pagan priests,
When fired from flowery lands a shining way,
And brought, in rapt entranced, the starry beam
By which their King was seen, laid at his feet
No richer gift than thy adoring chant,
In numbers full and varied. Even then
Thy 'singing-robes,' not tightly worn, were pure,
The vestments of a saintlier time than yoeth,
With passion's heat and senses yet unpurged,
Thy virtue was not stained by contact rash,
Or gross with things unlawful. Manhood's morn
No rising vapors caught from slimy pools;
And worthy were its hours thy festal rites
To grace, when at God's altar holy vows
Were sworn, and Beauty, as the Bride of thought,
To thy warm heart for life was closely bound."

Of his blindness, and its providential purpose, the Poet thus sings:

"Thy gloom
For calmer thought and rest of soul serene
Was kindly sent, that thy high privilege,
Still higher raised, might ampler scope impart,
And grander manhood. Lo! to thee it brought
A firmament lit up with dazzling spheres,
Each star a friend for friends thou hadst resigned.
Night gave thee compensation large and rich
For thy great sacrifice. For thee it wore
Splendors more gorgeous than the day had valled,
And all its orbs shone forth more luminous
By what the landscape lost. The broken group
Of Pleiades (one of their number gone),
As if in sympathy with kindred woe,
Hung o'er thy darkened way with softer beam.
Orion flashed his giant sword, and Mars,
To heroes known, in fuller flame effulged
Across the space of thy extended gloom.
Nor Jupiter with pomp of moons arrayed,
Nor Saturn, with his wide encircling blaze,
Disowned the presence of thy fellowship
When thou wast born into the solemn night,
And shut up with thy God.
Refuse this gift?
Ah! no. Welcome the sacrificial knife,
Its keenest anguish through the seeing orbs;
Welcome the whole extinguished show of earth:
All objects that a poet's heart doth nurse;
Whate'er he lives in as the complement
Of his own life, and whate'er perfects love,
And all that ministers to his great art—
As aids from mountains, fields, and rolling flood—
Still more the faces fair that catch our looks,
Or yet create them, and to their own moods
Adapt responsive feeling; let them die—
Die for the sake of England's liberty;
Die in a free, triumphant martyrdom!"

Of Milton's sorrow:

"Thou didst accept thy sorrow as from God;
And in its litany, low-voiced and calm,
Like the soft murmur of a rivulet,
That through the martin channels of a cave
Glides gently on—a sunless, waveless thing—
As if it feared the depths of its own peace,
Thy worship gave to Him who o'er thine eyes
The shadows of his cross serenely drew."

The closing strain is lofty and significant:

"Not to thy chant sublime shall rivers roll,
Nor forests wave their leafy minstrelsy;
The melancholy main shall not prolong
The measured cadence of thy requiem
O'er Eden lost; nor fragrant airs of spring,
Nor summer winds thy choral strains rehearse.
As then wast exiled from all earthly things,
And to thine own companionship ordained,
With intercourse of angels and of God,
So, too, thy name shall ever hold unshared
The grandeur of its theme, and flow alone,
A stream of sacred music through the world."

BISHOP PIERCE.—We learn from the N. C. Advocate that the Third-street Methodist Church, Lynchburg, Va. is nearly completed, and that Bishop Pierce is expected to preach the dedicatory sermon on the first Sunday in May. On the third Sabbath in May, Bishop Pierce, it is announced, will dedicate a Church in Charlestown, Virginia.

THE CHARLESTON CONVENTION.

The great Democratic Party of the United States, which has held together, heretofore, through all temptations and dangers, seems, from present appearances, to be hopelessly divided. The latest advices from Charleston, where the National Democratic Convention has been in session for more than a week, indicate that the feud heretofore existing between the Douglas and anti-Douglas wings of the party has resulted in an open rupture; the latter, or most of them, including the delegations from Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, South Carolina, Florida, Texas, Delaware, withdrawing from the Convention. It is said that the remaining Southern States, with California and Oregon, will unite with them. The issue between them is, the question of the duty of Congress to grant protection to slave property in the territories of the United States, if needed. The Southern or anti-Douglas men insist upon the insertion of a clause embodying the doctrine of protection in the platform of the party; the Douglas men, having the majority, refuse it; hence the rupture.

The Douglas men have the majority, but the Southern men represent the States which must elect the President, if elected at all. It seems to be the simple question whether or not the Southern States shall have equal rights with the other States in the common territories of the Union. The territorial question is now the only vital question connected with slavery in the politics of this country. The Black Republicans profess that they have no intention of interfering with slavery in the States, but that no more slave States shall be admitted, nor shall slavery be allowed in the territories. The Southern Democrats contend that slave property has the same right to protection with all other property. This is the issue between the Southern wing of the Democratic party and the Black Republican party. The Douglas wing of the Democratic party admit the rights of slave property in the territories, but deny that Congress has the power to protect it, if menaced by unfriendly territorial legislation. This, it is contended by Southern men, is, in effect, "a nigh cut to all the ends of Black Republicanism."

The result will probably be three candidates for the Presidency—Democratic, Douglas, and Black Republican. This will probably throw the election of President into the House of Representatives, when, it is hoped, the two wings of the Democratic party, and the Southern and Conservative Opposition, generally, may unite, and defeat the Black Republicans.

It is believed also, that, in the House, the fifteen Southern States, with California and Oregon, will be able, alone, to elect their man.

Before we go to press we shall publish the latest and perhaps final advices. In the meantime we say to our readers, trust in God, give yourselves to prayer, and keep perfectly cool. It has thundered many a time before. God has this country in his keeping.

Below will be found the substance of the despatches from Charlestou, up to eleven o'clock last night:

CHARLESTON, May 1.—The Convention assembled at the usual hour. Hon. Caleb Cushing, President of the Convention, in the chair.

Twenty-two members of the delegation from Georgia seceded without giving an explanation.

Four members seceded after having given their reasons for so doing. Ten remained in the Convention.

The delegations representing the States of Tennessee, Virginia, Kentucky and North Carolina held a caucus, for the purpose of consulting and determining the course they shall pursue in the future.

The Secede re' party met this morning, and elected Senator Bayard, of Delaware, President of their Convention.

They also elected eight Vice Presidents, four Secretaries, and a Committee on Resolutions.

The Committee on Resolutions is composed of Messrs. Stockdale, of Texas, twin, of Alabama, Jackson, of Georgia, Hunter, of Louisiana, Berksdale, of Mississippi, Barrows, of Arkansas, Magowan, of South Carolina, Whitley, of Delaware, and Dike, of Florida.

The new organization is called the Constitutional Democratic Convention, and adjourned to meet to-morrow morning.

The National Convention has determined on the two-thirds rule, which means two-thirds of the electoral votes in the Union.

The prospects of Senator Douglas, heretofore considered fair, are on the decline, and his chances for the Presidency are now considered hopeless.

The remaining delegates representing the State of Georgia in the Convention, have been disfranchised by the ruling of the Chair.

The Southern seceders are endeavoring to gather in their Constitutional Convention as many delegates, at present in the National Convention, as they can. It is the general belief that their numbers will be greatly augmented.

Some of the delegates, disgusted at the present state of affairs in Charleston, have left that city for their homes.

CHARLESTON, May 1, 10 P. M.—The Convention at a late hour, after considerable excitement, proceeded to ballot for a candidate for the Presidency,

The first ballot was taken and the following is the result: Douglas received 145½ votes, Hunter 42½, Guthrie 35½, Lane 0, Dickinson 7½, Johnson 12.

The Convention continued to ballot with slightly varying results, Douglas continuing to gain until the 7th ballot, which resulted as follows:

Douglas obtained 150½ votes, Hunter 42½, Guthrie 38½, Lane 0, Dickinson 4, Johnson 11.

It is stated that the Southern Constitutional Convention are endeavoring to bring in California and Oregon, in which case Joe Lane will probably be their candidate for the Presidency.

CHARLESTON, May 1, 11 P. M.—The Douglasites to night made a desperate effort to abrogate the two-thirds rule, but could not succeed.

There is no possible chance for Douglas's nomination. It is now conceded by all that he cannot be chosen.

It is likewise considered certain that no nomination will be made at Charleston by the National Convention.

A project has been started to adjourn the Convention, with the view of meeting again at Philadelphia in the middle of June.

If an entirely unexceptionel man be nominated, the Southern delegation will support him, otherwise they will form an independent ticket.

There are now nine States represented in the Southern Democratic Convention, and it is thought that California and Oregon will join them.

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE BISHOPS AND MISSIONARY BOARD OF METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH.

The Nashville Advocate says that the recent meeting was characterized by more than ordinary industry, and satisfactory thoroughness of discussion in regard to the different subjects and fields before it. Below is the Report of the Secretary:

The Fifteenth Annual Meeting of the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church, South, was held in the Mulberry St. Methodist Church in Nashville, Monday evening, April 16, Bishop Early in the chair.

Prayer by Rev. S. Watson, of the Memphis Conference.

The Secretary read the Annual Report to the meeting, which, on motion of W. B. Cooper was adopted.

Dr. Summers, chairman of the committee appointed to nominate the officers of the Society for the ensuing year, reported the following list, who were, on motion, elected:

President.—Bishop J. Soule.

Vice Presidents.—Bishops J. O. Andrew, R. Payne, G. F. Pierce, John Early, H. H. Kavanaugh; Revs. A. L. P. Green, T. O. Summers, H. N. McTyeire, J. B. McFerrin, L. D. Huston.

Secretary, elected by the General Conference.—Rev. E. W. Sehon.

Treasurer, elected by the General Conference.—I. Lition.

Assistant Treasurers, elected by the General Conference.—Rev. E. H. Myers, Charleston, S. C.; Rev. J. C. Keener, New Orleans, La.; Rev. D. R. McNally, St. Louis, Mo.

Managers.—Rev. J. W. Hanner, N. Hobson, W. B Cooper, Dr. R. Martin, A. W. Johnson, Rev. J. Morrow, W. R. Elliston, T. Anderson, Rev. A. P. McFerrin, H. P. Bostick, J. Paul, P. W. Maxey, Rev. S. P. Whitten, Irby Morgan, T. L. Bransford, Jos. Wheless.

Bishop Paine was then introduced to the meeting, and delivered a strong and forcible address in favor of the great missionary enterprise. The Bishop, in concluding, introduced to the meeting Rev. W. T. J. Sullivan, our appointed missionary to Japan.

He spoke feelingly and impressively of his call to the great work to which he had given himself, and of his fixed purpose of heart, trusting in Divine strength, to persevere and continue faithful in the same.

His address was listened to with the deepest interest.

Bishop Early then introduced Rev. J. H. Pritchett, of Leavenworth, Kansas Conference, who delivered a very interesting address in regard to our work in Kansas, and the duty of the Church to sustain our missions in that country.

Bishop Early, in response to a call made upon him, addressed the meeting at some length in a most interesting manner in reference to our general missionary interests.

Brief remarks were also made by Drs McFerrin and Summers.

The deepest interest prevailed throughout the whole congregation during the entire meeting, and much good was doubtless accomplished in favor of the missionary cause.

It was announced by the Secretary that the anniversary of the Society would be held in Macon, Ga., on the last Sabbath and Monday in this month.

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE BISHOPS AND MISSIONARY BOARD.

This meeting was commenced on Monday morning, April 16.

Bishops Soule, Andrew, Payne, and Early were present, with a full representation from the Missionary Board.

Bishops Pierce and Kavanaugh were detained by affliction. The meeting continued in session during the week. Many matters of great interest were brought before the Board, and a special examination had of all the different departments of missionary work under the care of the Church.

The domestic missions, upon the success of which has always depended the enlargement and extension of our work, received the marked attention of the Board.

The colored missions, which, from our position and relation to them, and the success which has hitherto attended our labors in them, we have so often pronounced the crowning glory of the Church, at this meeting were fully presented and duly regarded.

These missions have upon us, as upon all Christian Churches, a strong claim; and we are happy to say, the past and present history of the Southern Church affords proof that that claim has not been unheeded, although much more might and should be done for them.

The Indian Missions, of which this Board have so large a number, and the schools under its care, received due attention from the Board, and such measures were adopted as shall tend to their future advancement and prosperity.

Increased appropriations were made to the China Mission, fully to meet all the wants of the former missionaries and those of our two brethren, Wood and Allen, just sent out by the Board.

The appropriations for the past year have all been forwarded, and those for the present year the Board have ordered to be forwarded within the next month.

The action had heretofore in regard to the Japan mission was fully approved by the meeting, with a request, also, that an additional missionary be selected for that work, and that the mission be commenced as soon as practicable.

The Standing Committee on the Missions, through its chairman, Dr. McTyeire, reported in favor of the establishment of missions at the following points:

Panama, San Jose, in Costa Rica, unless some more eligible point shall be indicated by further examination and reports of Dr. Hamilton; and El Barlo, on the Tehuantepec Ithmus.

The report was adopted by the Board.

It will thus be seen, in order to meet the wants of the mission already existing, and those just formed, together with the increased appropriations made to our Mission Conference, that a much larger amount of funds will be needed for the present than was the past year.

The aggregate amount, as reported from the Conferences, and as published in the Minutes, raised for missions the year just closed, was $234,441. We would here, as we have often said before, state that misconception exists in regard to this subject, from the fact that in this amount thus reported is counted the funds received from the General Government, and nearly one-half the remainder is paid to the missionaries themselves in their different fields of labor.

This amount is reported, together with the cash, by the Treasurers of the Annual Conferences, and, united, from the aggregate returns which the Bishops report as received for missions, and from which the report is published from year to year in the General Minutes.

It is very desirable that the difficulty complained of should be done away. The Board, therefore, at its present meeting, adopted the following resolution.

Resolved, That the Treasurers of the several Annual Conference Missionary Societies, auxiliary to the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, be and hereby are requested, in making their returns, to report the full amount received for missions during the year in two separate columns—one showing the exact amount received in cash; the other the amount received in contributions to the missionaries on their work for their support.

We hope this request will be heeded by all our treasurers.

The Board also passed a resolution recommending the Bishops, in examination of the character of the preachers at all the Annual Conferences, in every instance, to inquire if the missionary collections had been raised as required by the Discipline.

Our great hope is to have united, prompt, and general action on this subject. If this were done, as we have so often urged and pressed, our treasury would be full.

The Board resolved to raise, the present year, for missions, $217,800, exclusive of government funds. This amount will allow for what is thought will be paid of this sum to the missionaries themselves. It was proportioned among the several Annual Conferences according to their ability and their former contributions. The appropriations for the year amount to $168,050; with the deficiency now existing, to $208 050.

As a Church we should and ought to raise $300,000. This could and would be done, if united and prompt action were had upon the part of the preachers.

The amount voted can be raised without difficulty—in many of the Conferences resolutions were adopted to raise the present year far more than has been made the pro rata allowance—in the present distribution of the sum to be raised by the Board.

RESIGNATION OF THE TREASURER.

Our worthy treasurer, I. Litton, Esq., was compelled by his engagements to resign. This was deeply regretted by the Board and he retired with the sincere thanks of the Board, for services rendered.

On nomination of the Secretary, Dr. McFerrin was unanimously elected Treasurer of the Missionary Society. We hail his election with pleasure, and shall look forward to the future with great hope, aided by his valuable services.

E. W. SEHON, Missionary Secretary.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS OF NEW ORLEANS.

Although our readers have heard of the Public School system of New-Orleans, we doubt if they have anything like a correct and appreciative understanding of its excellence and value. Nothing, outside of its commercial advantages, promises so much for the future of New Orleans as its public schools. They take the children at seven years of age, and conduct them to graduation in the High Schools, male and female. The course, as far as it goes, is excellent, the study and the discipline thorough, and when the boys and girls graduate in the High School, they are well educated for all the practical purposes of life, and fully prepared to conduct their own education to any higher standard to which they may aspire. They have gone through a thorough English course, with the addition of Latin and French.

And these advantages cost not a cent, for either tuition, books, or stationery. And constant improvements and enlargements are being made. It is believed that in time the course of study will reach a full collegiate standard. The rich and the poor meet together, and exercise a mutually beneficial influence.

Of course, we have had neither the time nor the opportunity to examine thoroughly the different systems of culture obtaining in the different Distrjcts of the city, (for they are all separate and independent, under different boards, as they should be); and we are therefore unprepared to give an opinion as to their comparative merits. Among so many able superintendents, principals, and teachers, however, we should judge that there is promise of the best systems.

We lately attended the commencement, properly speaking, of the Fourth District High Schools, held in the Felicity-street Methodist Church, in which the Boys' High School and the Girls' High School were united, the graduates from both receiving their diplomas at the same time. It was equal to anything of the kind we have ever witnessed. It was a beautiful scene. It was touching and cheering to witness the performances of boys and girls who, without the free school system, would far ever have been denied such advantages, in consequence of pecuniary inability. Our friend, J. G. Parham, Esq., is the able and popular Superintendent of the Public Schools of the Fourth District.

THE SOUTHERN FIELD AND FIRESIDE.

This popular Southern weekly, says the Southern Advocate, has nearly completed its first year; and is now canvassing actively for a renewal of subscriptions for another year. Its agricultural and horticultural articles and most of its lighter literature belong to a class of reading of which we do but little, and we cannot, therefore, pronounce an independent judgment upon them. If, however, success and popularity be good criteria for determining their excellence, they may be pronounced good. We can, however, testify cordially to the superior excellence of its weekly letter from Paris. The writer takes hold of the political questions of Europe as though he had thoroughly studied his subject, and his letters keep us well posted upon the complicated changes that are taking place on that continent. It is announced that at the close of the present volume, Mr. John R. Thompson, of Richmond, Va., will take Editorial control of the paper. He comes highly recommended as a finished scholar, and an elegant writer—a literary man in the strict and best sense of the term. A poet himself, of no ordinary merit, he possesses, in an eminent degree, the refined and chastened taste, and those powers of nice discrimination, quick, correct appreciation, and facile expression, so necessary in the conduct of a paper that ministers to the intellectual wants of a community, and which aspires to become its literary guide, and the favorite organ of its development. Mr. Thompson's literary standard is very high. He is a critic of practiced and rare ability, thoroughly imbued with reverence for Literature, and an abiding sense of the dignity of his profession as a literary man.

The Field and Fireside is published at $2 00 per annum, at Augusta, Ga.

CHINESE POETRY.

It has been a sort of received opinion that the Chinese were of such a materialized race as to be incapable of climbing the heights of Parnassus, or at least that they would not likely consider the benefits of such an exercise worth the toil and trouble. The "Narrative of Lord Elgin," recently published, contains a number of extracts from poems of Celestial origin, by no means destitute of merit, however they may have failed in promoting an extensive growth of the ideal sentiment among the people. The first of these has for its author no less a personage than Hwashana, a minister of the highest rank at the Court of Pekin, and a leading negotiator of the treaty concluded in 1858. The translation is by Wade. The title reads as follows:

Hwashana's Complaint when on his Second Mission to Mankinden the Capital of Mantchouria, he Finds Himself once more at the Inn at Chulau.

I.

"On toward the sister capital once more,
By duty called, I track my distant way;
The watch-dog notes my wheels as droops the night
O'er the thatched cot, and slowly tramp my steeds
Up the wild pass, in autumn's morning sad,
Joyless the moon. And now in chamber lone,
Beneath his single lamp the traveler dreams
Of home and home, a hundred leagues behind.
Where are his rhymes these papers bore of old?
Vain search I o'er La-he let him restless pore."

II.

"Where herds and swine once lay, a hostel now,
Chulau is won at last. My ear is staid,
As sunset, slanting, strikes its roof, and chill
The wide-spread hars admit the evening breath.
Forlorn the scene—a very 'Walk in Dew.'*
Envoy of majesty I so known to whom?
Peace whom the State hath need—no word of care;
Turn to thy muse—let verse these walls adorn."

* The "Walk in Dew" is a poem, allusion to which is made to convey to the reader the idea of shuddering or shivering horror with which the present poet gazes on the scene before him. The lines on the title-page of this volume are a rythmical version of the last half stanza.

The next is the composition of a teacher known as "Old Chang," and described as a "good scholar, an efficient spy in behalf of his own Government, a gentleman in his manners, a great humbug, and a confirmed opium smoker." He had accompanied the expedition to Tientsiu, and wrote his verses on a fan in honor of Mr. Wade. The heading would be reckoned disproportionally large here, even by a phrenologist:

Two Stanzas of Verse in Five Words each, presented by Chang-Tung-Yan to Wade, his Pupil and Literary Acquaintance of Nine Years standing, with whom he had been a Shipmate to Taku and Tientsin, on Finding Himself Several months on Board the same Vessel with Him. Composed on the Fifth Moon of the year Wu Wu. (June, 1854.)

I.

"So best in lettered toil thine aim
To aid the world—by one fair deed
To earn a thousand autumns' fame.
The days' capacious will why heed?
Fitful is down upon the air,
A fable that the waters bear,
Is all our glory's fleeting pride.
Thy pastime in the leisure hour
The nicely studied rhyme to pair;
Nor cities win thy praise, nor power—
And well for all is change. Though fair
The moon, yet dark the evening's doom
Changeful our lot, as evening's gloom
Play o'er the lone stream's tide.

II.

"Nine years since first we met are sped.
Thenceforth unfriendly union bound;
Now six long moons one deck we tread,
Our night lamp trimm'd, we shut the round
Of earth's affairs; the burning day
On weighty tshors pours its rays;
We put indting matters grave,
For me, my part fled vainly by,
And with what haste! No longer proud,
But free I stray, as floats on high,
Now flustering, now dispersed the cloud.
Home to my books—I ask no more—
With age my limbs are travel sore;
Give me my hill side cave."

PAPAL BULL OF EXCOMMUNICATION.

We have in full the Apostolic Letter of Pius the IX, by which the punishment of Major Excommunication is inflicted on the invaders and usurpers of some of the Pontifical provinces. It is dated at St. Peter, Rome, under the ring of the fishers, 26th day of March, 1860, in the 14th year of our Popedom," and signed by Pius P. P. IX. The letter is too long to publish in full.—We give the following synopsis by the Rome correspondent of the London Chronicle:

After a recital of the titles and authority of the Pontiff, the document proceeds to state the injuries to which the enemies of the Holy See and true religion, and especially Piedmont, or the "Sub-Alpine Guberalum," as the Latin phrase runs, have subjected the Papacy for long past. The anti-ecclesiastical laws of Sardinia, the encroachments on the power of the Church in that kingdom, and the protest of Count Cavour, at the Congress of Paris, are all severally alluded to. When the late war broke out between the Emperor of Austria and the allied Sovereigns of France and Sardinia, no wicked act ("nihil scelleris") was omitted by the latter to stir up hatred against the Pope, and seduce his subjects from their allegiance. Whether the word "latter" or rather its equivalent phrase includes both France and Sardinia, or Sardinia only, is left judiciously doubtful. The paper then enumerates the various warnings and remonstrances made by the Holy See, and how they have all failed in their effect, while its enemies have only continued their wicked machinations, till at last the people of the Romagna have been threatened and enjoled into an impious renunciation of the rule imposed on them by God, for St. Peter and his successors. Taking all these things into consideration, and having implored the aid of the Holy Ghost, the Pontiff has resolved to exert his full powers, and therefore, as he says, "Anathematizavimus et excommunicavimus" all those who, whether ex-principals, accomplices or sympathizers, have taken part in the rebellion of the Romagna. This excommunication consigns them to everlasting perdition, abrogates all indulgences or absolutions received by them from the present or past Popes or from any priest of the church—and can only be removed either by the free will of the Pontiff, or of his apostolical successors, and even then only on the devout penitence of the offenders.—The document then warns all persons from rendering themselves liable to the terrors of this sentence, and concludes with something of "datum," by the remark that, as it is obviously impossible to stick up this sentence of excommunication in the rebellious provinces, where it is most needed, therefore it is to be put up at the three spots I have named above, and that all persons who hear of it will be equally liable as if they had actually had it submitted to them.

The excommunication was finally agreed upon at the meeting of the Sacred College on Friday. On the Sunday, on the principle of "the better day the better deed," the document was signed, and has been placarded at St. Peter's, at the Lateran, and at the Monte-Citorio. At the Monte-Citorio, there were only about a dozen persons, chiefly priests, engaged in deciphering it; no person is actually mentioned by name. Even the "Cobernium Sub-Alpium" is, after all, only an abstraction. The truth is, at the last, even "Pius the Ninth's" courage gave way before the absurdity of excommunicating "Victor Emmanuel" in person, in this year of grace 1860.

HELP FOR THE PACIFIC.

REV. O. FISHER, in a letter to the Pacific Methodist, makes a most earnest appeal for more ministerial help for the Southern Methodist Church in Oregon. Considering the wants of that work, and, indeed, of the whole Pacific coast, and remembering that the right sort of men are abundant in the older Conferences, it is sadly touching to contemplate the arduous labors of our small but heroic band of pioneers, toiling alone in that great field. We need another Asbury, and the spirit of his day. A man who will not go where the Church needs and desires him, is not fit to be a Methodist preacher.—Old Conferences, with full memberships, many so-called supernumeraries, and easy circuits and stations, are doing more harm to the spirit of the itinerancy than all the unsound theories on the subject in the land. We pray to see a vigorous exercise of episcopal influence and prerogative in regard to these things. It is said that the venerable Bishop Soule is going to attend the next Pacific Conference. We trust that the glorious old hero will be attended by a corps of "good men and true," equipped in every respect for the war on that interesting frontier. Let the matter be agitated in time. Let strong men be chosen by the Bishop, and let them exert themselves in the interval to raise means in their respective regions to support them for a time, and report it as missionary money.

DR. RIVERS, of Florence, Ala., we are glad to learn, is in a fair way of recovery. The attempts of the medical attendants to save the broken limb promise to succeed entirely, and as speedily as could be expected.

DEATH OF COL. C. S. TARPLEY.

We were grieved to learn last a telegraphic dispatch reached his relatives in this city day before yesterday, informing them that our friend and brother, Col. C. S. Tarpley, of Jackson, Miss., died that day at one o'clock, of pneumonia. He had lost some twenty of his negroes by the same disease. He was in this city but a few weeks since, and we never saw a man in finer health or more buoyant spirits. He always called to see us when he came to the city, which he did frequently, and he was always delighted to meet the ministers and other Christian friends, and poured out the fullness of his heart in religious conversation. He seemed entirely devoted to the cause of Christ and to the promotion of the interests of the Church. He always had something to say of his class, of which he was a leader. He was a wealthy and honored citizen, a distinguished Member of the Mississippi Bar, and had filled various public positions with honor and usefulness. But he is gone, and his amiable and accomplished wife, and their children, are left to mourn. He had just completed a spacious mansion on his plantation, with every provision for home comfort and refined culture. Mississippi, and the Episcopal and Methodist Churches, have lost two noble men within a few days—G. S. Yerger and C. S. Tarpley.

THE CHURCH OF FRANCE.

We learn of the establishment in Paris of a new religious paper, l' Union Chretienne, under the editorship of one of the most learned Roman priests, Abbe Guettee, and a priest of one of the Eastern Churches, which aims at a union of all the Christian Churches. The prospectus addressed itself especially to the Episcopal Churches and, as a late number of the Union mentions, many letters of sympathy have been received from the Episcopal Churches of England, and especially from the Russian Church. Also from Roman Catholic countries, especially from Italy and Spain, several priests have sent in a declaration that they adhere to the views of the prospectus. We see that the new paper and its prospects are discussed in the leading papers of England and Germany, and the warmest hopes entertained for its success. It is not yet sufficiently known to what extent the Roman Catholic contributors to the new paper desire to carry the reformation of their Church; but the points which have already been urged—denial of the papal infallibility, rejection of the new doctrine of the Immaculate conception, demand of a free circulation of the Bible, acknowledgement of the Christian character of other denominations—are sufficient to secure for this movement a lively interest on the part of all Protestants.—It has thus again become apparent that there are many hundreds of priests who are only prevented by fear from opposing the claim of the Pope to infallibility in doctrinal decisions.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE SUNDAY-SCHOOLS.

The fourteenth anniversary of the Methodist Sunday School Union for New Orleans was celebrated in the Carondelet-street Methodist Church, on Sunday last, at four o'clock in the afternoon. Such a vast congregation of children we have never seen before. They have sixteen schools, and about eighteen hundred children. The exercises were of the usual kind, singing, speaking, dialogues, and poems. Several of the speeches and dialogues, and some of the singing, were in German, which was highly delightful to the audience. Where they will hold their next anniversary is a question, for by the next time they meet, no building in New Orleans will hold even the children, to say nothing of the audience. We suggest LaFayette square. It was a glorious sight to see so many young and happy faces, and the singing by those sweet young voices made us think of the song of the angels heard by the Shepherds of Judea. Let the next one be on a grand scale; let people and schools be invited from the country, and let a whole Sabbath be given to it.

LITERARY NOTICES.

THE LIFE AND TIMES OF HEROD THE GREAT, as connected, Historically and Prophetically, with the coming of Christ; and Incidental Portraitures of Noted Personages of the Age. By William Willett. Philadelphia: Lindsay & Blakiston. 1860. For sale in New Orleans at the Presbyterian Depository, 154 Camp St.

This work combines the sacred and profane history of the times in question in one harmonious and consecutive narrative. It also gives us an insight into the private life of the leading actors, and makes us acquainted with the various traditions concerning them. Pompey, Herod, Hyrcanus, Antipater, Cassius, Brutus, Antony, Cleopatra, The Magi, Anna and Simeon, Augustus Cesar, Agrippa, Mariamne, Zacharias and Elizabeth, and the Holy Family, all pass before us in their natural relations to their time and to each other. The style is solemnly attractive, and the book has a really dramatic interest.

SKETCH BOOK; or Miscellaneous Anecdotes, illustrating a variety of topics proper to the Pulpit and Platform. By William C. Smith, of the New York Conference. New York: Carlton & Porter. 1860.

This is a collection of interesting, pathetic, beautiful, encouraging, consoling, and pious anecdotes, sketches, illustrations, and stories. It will be pleasant and profitable reading.

HELPS FOR THE PULPIT: or Sketches and Skeletons of Sermons. By a Minister. Two volumes in one. First American and fifth London Edition. Philadelphia: Smith, English, & Co. For sale in New Orleans at the Presbyterian Depository, 154 Camp street.

From the examination we have given these "sketches," we are inclined to believe they are as good as any of the kind we have ever seen, if not better. They seem to be natural in arrangement, sound in doctrine, evangelical in spirit. Of course, no man who expects to become a good preacher will servilely follow any body's sketches, but as "helps" in the study and composition of sermons they will be valuable to young preachers.

HOME CIRCLE FOR MAY. This number has a strong array of contributors; among them Bishop Andrew, on the "Ministry of Young Ladies"—Dr. Pierce, on "Anna the Prophetess"—Col. Jack Thorrington on the Bible.—Rev. J. A. Proctor, on "Nathan Hale," (the American Andre)—Rev. D. Stevenson on "Brazil and the Brazilians." These are but few of the leading papers. The editorial department is as neat and tasteful as ever. The musical department is valuable, and will do incalculable good. Let it be continued and enriched more and more.

By the way, do our people appreciate the fact, that the front page of the cover of the Home Circle is unsurpassed for taste and beauty? If that ecclesiastical army which has been so long on drill on the fourth page, were disbanded, and the contents of the third page put in its stead, it would be well. The paper and type, presswork, etc., of the Home Circle cannot be excelled.

HARPER FOR MAY. Through Thos. L. White, 105 Canal Street, we have a number on our table. "Raleigh and his City" is a continuation of "Longings in the Foot-Prints of the Pioneers." "Ancient Monuments in the United States" by E. G. Squier, is another interesting paper, as is, also, "The Silk Worm." Harper is doing good—imparting valuable information—helping to educate the people—by the illustrated articles in every number, on some department of history, science, or actual life. Dr. Lipscomb has a poem on "Milton." The Doctor is well known as a preacher, educator, writer; but this is his first appearance as a poet. We can not speak of it critically now. Dr. L. has also an excellent paper on "Our Cemeteries." The various departments of the Magazine are admirably filled.

LADIES REPOSITORY FOR MAY. This, we believe, is a number of the excellent magazine of our Northern Methodist brethren to which Southern Methodists can make no objection. Heretofore this has not been the case. How long it will be before a "dead fly" will drop into the "pot of ointment" we cannot tell. With this exception, the magazine is the completest and most successful one of the kind in the United States.

LETTERS FROM MRS. CROSS.—NO. XIII.

Of the ten or twelve thousand inhabitants of San Antonio, about one-third are Germans. These Germans are an industrious, economical people, with an element of phlegm that does admirably well to mingle with the fire and excitability of the American temperament. They have also that patience in labor which we so much need; a quiet way of rolling up their trowsers and wading through drudgery without discomposure. Always keeping the end in view, they are never in a hurry to leap to it, but are satisfied to approach it step by step. Thus they are enabled to accomplish the greatest things, since they have usually a physique which is able to bear all the continued and accumulated work which it is called upon to perform. Of Humboldt it is said, that he spent sixteen hours out of the twenty-four in mental exertion, and at ninety years old possessed the buoyancy and cheerfulness of boyhood. Jean Paul says of himself: "I have made of myself every thing that could be made; I have done what could be done with the stuff." I presume that this capability of endurance arises, at least in part, from their judicious admixture of toil and recreation. We Americans are our own fags, and never did a big boy at college tyranize over a little one, as the American tyrannizes over himself; he stands at his desk with an invisible whip suspended over him, walks the streets with an unseen task-master behind him, he eats his dinner with the silent nervous haste of a prisoner who must hurry back to his jail. His life is a perpetual brain-fever; and visions of railroads, banks, and the flapping sails of ships, make up the dreams of his delirium. The German is quite as intent as the American on making money, but "I see no speculation in those eyes;"

the breaking of no bank will ruin him, nor will the sudden fall of cotton ever make his beer less sparkling, nor his sour kraut less savory; he is walled about with caution as with a fortress, and the fumes of his tobacco are an ever-arising incense to keep off the spirit of unrest. He drinks and he dances, he plays and he works, not everything seems done in excess, until you compare it with his other employments, for with him business and pleasures are alike employments through which he passes always in the same spirit. Although the Germans are not an elegant people, they are not without elegancies. They are distinguished by their love for music and their wonderful knowledge of it, by their enthusiasm for art, by their appreciation of the beauties of nature. They are the most metaphysical and the most physical people I have known. In many of

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

THE JAPANESE EMBASSY IN SAN FRANCISCO.

From the San Francisco Bulletin we extract the following interesting matters in relation to the Japanese embassy:

Many of the Japanese have suffered considerably by sea sickness, but arrive in good health, and are pleased with the voyage. They express themselves gratified with their treatment on the Powhattan, and are anxious that she shall remain at Panama, to take them back to Japan on their return from Washington. It is their expressed determination not to remain at Washington more than a month, but they do not appear to have any instructions limiting the time that they may spend in the United States.

Night before last, about 2 o'clock, A M., there was a splendid aurora borealis visible, the first sight of the kind ever witnessed by the Japanese. They all came on deck and manifested the most intense curiosity at the strange phenomenon. Some of them asked if it did not portend some great calamity.

The light-house at Point Bonita next attracted their attention, last night, creating quite an excitement among them, as they had never seen a light-house before.

Three Japanese interpreters accompany the embassy. They speak English only indifferently, but have improved rapidly on the way. One of them writes English very well.

The Chaplain, the Rev. Mr. Wood, has taught several of those who desired to learn our language during the voyage, and some of his pupils have proved very apt scholars, writing short sentences voluntarily, and then asking their teacher's corrections. One of them asked the Chaplain's opinion of the following sentence, which he wrote on a card: "God is us (our) father." Many very peculiar sentences, advancing quaint ideas, have been submitted to the Chaplain, which he has preserved as memoranda. He is writing a book of his observations in Japan and on the voyage.

The Japanese on board the Powhattan brought a good supply of books, for their instruction and amusement on the voyage. The print resembles Chinese characters.—Many of them are illustrated, representing incomprehensible objects; but we are sorry to say that a portion of their books are full of villainously obscene pictures, very poorly engraved at that, which they manifest no delicacy in exhibiting. The Commissioners and higher officers, however, did not seem to own or use such books. The tastes of their servants they did not interfere with.

The high officials of the Commission deported themselves on the voyage with proper dignity, and seemed to be quite social in their intercourse with the officers of the ship.

The cruise of the Powhattan has been long, eventful, and not only full of curious incidents, but fraught with great use to the American people. She seems to be a true diplomatic ship.

On visiting the Powhattan this morning, as she lay in the harbor, it seemed as if the whole ship had been surrendered to the Japanese Embassy, as it had been evidently the intention of the ship's officers to leave nothing undone that could be done to make them comfortable on their voyage, to deepen the good impression that had been made, and to secure the objects of this strange and extraordinary visit. On the upper deck staterooms had been fitted up for the use of the portion of the Embassy inferior in rank to the highest. A house on deck was surrendered to the Japanese cooks, who prepared the meals of them all. The first Embassadors had the exclusive use of the cabin usually occupied by the Captain of the ship.

The highest in rank occupied the starboard stateroom, the second took the larboard room, the third had a bunk prepared for him aft, but after a little he had it made up on the floor. At the time of our visit, the Embassadors were in the room of the Admiral. Their servants sat about the floor, enjoying themselves immensely. One was dressing the hair of his fellow. The happy recipient of tonsorial favors sat on the floor cross-legged. All had their hair dressed after the style that within the last week we have become accustomed to as universal with them.—One lay his length on the floor, cooling off quietly. One sat on his haunches, smoking his pipe. A moveable fire place was watched over by one, who, as the charcoal began to glow, set a little copper tea-kettle thereon, and as its contents began to sing, poured out and drank a cup of tea. Very little water any of them drink on board: tea is the universal dish. Chairs, of course, they never use; though at the American table they had learned to sit without awkwardness, and to eat soup with a spoon, and to handle knife and fork over beef, mutton and game with as much ease as if these arts came of instinct, and not of education.

The chiefs of the Japanese dined daily with the captain All other meals they took by themselves — eating mostly vegetables and fish, and though great tea drinkers, light eaters all.

The rank of these visitors we must remember. Of the seventy odd, twenty are dignitaries, fifty their servants. Among the former are three hereditary princes, or rulers, of provinces, and of about equal rank. They are reckoned as Governors, and the proper salute to one of them would be seventeen guns. Simme-Bojeu-no-Kuni, (that is Simme, Prince of the province of Bujeu) probably stands a little higher at home than either of the other three. When servants, or others of the company come into his presence, they prostrate themselves; then rising, deliver their message with bowed heads. At home, no inferior must sit in his presence, but in compliment to our people—believing that in Turkey they must do as Turks do—he says to any visitor, servant or other who approaches, "take a seat."

The second in importance of the Embassy is Muragake, Prince of the province of Agawe.

The third is Ogure, the Censor, who acts as his Secretary, making a clean record of all the experiences of the company the use of the Emperor. He sent home from the Sandwich Islands a diary for their trip down to that point.

The fourth is Morita Okataro, the treasurer of the party—a man who is a prince or lord only by position, not by birth. These four are of the Emperor's Council. They were all to-day magnificently dressed, but not different in appearance from the first officers of the Candinmarro. They wore embroidered silk robes, each one wearing a sword of beautiful workmanship, the blades of the finest steel.

We were allowed to circulate among the company, and to ask all the questions that our curiosity suggested. The son of the first interpreter put our queries into shape, and gave back such answers as were tendered. One with a clean shaved head and his bare feet thrust into sandals, pulled out of his belt some cash to show us. The coppers were: first, a zane, a round coin about the size of our new necket; second, a quan-si, the size of a red cent which citizens are in the habit of dropping into the Washington moument box; third, an oblong tempo, about the size of an English penny, with a square hole in the centre, and 2 cents value.

We were curious to see their silver coin, and succeeded after considerable hunt in getting sight of their itzebue, valued at 32½ cents, their ne-che-yu valued 16 cents, and their ochewoo of half the value of the preceding. All their gold, we saw none, but we were told that they had two gold coins—the ocobang, worth about $14 41, and the obang worth some $95.

The Japanese officials all seemed quick with the pencil. One was busy sketching the appearance of the city from the deck; one did a visitor from on shore the honor to sketch his personal appearance. On the trip they filled their note-books with copies of machinery on board. The officers of the ship say they could not possibly have carried seventy men of any other nation who have behaved more like gentlemen. They were always courteous and remembered that they were guests. They were eminently cleanly, careful of their appearance and neat. The cooks were dressed in blue cloth breeches leaving their legs naked and a black woolen mantle with loose sleeves. Their heads and feet were bare.

The only parties introduced to the Ambassadors were three gentlemen, the first to reach the Powhattan—Capt. Alden of the Active, Lieut. Brooke, and Mr. C. Wolcott Brooks. All parties stood during the interview. Of the Embassy, three were present as principals; the others stood in the background and were quiet. Lieut. Brooke informed the Ambassador, through the interpreter, of the arrival of the Candinmarro, of the health of the party on board, and the particulars of the reception. The Ambassador, in return, expressed his thanks for the courtesy shown his countrymen. The Ambassador is a fine looking man, about five feet nine in height, and with a very intelligent face.

In the intercourse of the officers of the Navy Yard with the Japanese officers, some curious facts were evolved, showing a similarity of origin between the aquaboo and our North American Indians. It was found that several Japanese words have a similar meaning as in use among some of the Indian tribes. For example, the Japanese word for haste is hyach'a; the Oregon Indian word for speed is hyach. When this similarity was named to the Japanese, they remarked that it was not unlikely that it might be attributed to the landing of their junks on our shores. The following facts, which we obtain from Mr. Charles Wolcott Brooks, go in a measure to justify the presumption that Japanese junks have roved a good deal more than is generally supposed:

Many years ago a Japanese junk was cast away on Inui, Sandwich Islands.

One was found below Petropaulski, in Kamskatcha, some 200 years since, of which an account may be found in Findlay's Pacific Sailing Directions.

Capt. N. C. Brooks, in the cruise of the Gambia, found the remains of a junk, of Japanese construction on Ocean Island, one of the group northwest of the Sandwich Islands, of which French Frigate Shoals is a part.

The same navigator, some two years after, picked up an abandoned junk in the latitude 42 deg. N. and 170 deg W., 900 miles from land.

Four years ago, another junk was found near Guam, of the Ladrone Islands.

In 1818, Capt. Cox, of New London, Ct., when bound north on a whaling cruise, crossed a disabled junk, and took from her fifteen or twenty of her crew. He carried them into the Okotsch Sea, and landed them finally at Lahaina, after having them some six or eight months on board.

Hence the supposition that some Japanese vessel may have been driven on to the Oregon coast with her crew is by no means improbable. Before the expulsion of the Jesuits, the Japanese built sea-going vessels. After that time, as a measure of their Home policy, junks were, by an Imperial edict, built with an open stern, on purpose to compel them to stick to the coast.

The Japanese insist that there are no words in their language which resemble words of the same meaning in the Chinese language, or which have been derived from a common root. This fact would seem to prove that the two races are of decidedly different origin.

CALIFORNIA, CHINA, AND INDIA.

The San Francisco Bulletin has the following interesting article on the products of the Washoe mines, in connection with the trade with Asia:

If the yield of silver during the coming season approximates to the general expectation entertained in our community, California will be in a position to take part in the world's exchanges, which, much as she has added to the general wealth, has never been accorded to her. The real market for silver is in China and Hindoostan. Silver and cotton are, in the main, the means with which we obtain the products of these countries. The silver has been in moderate amounts shipped direct from South America and Mexico to China; but more frequently the outflow of this trade reaches China via London and the Isthmus of Suez. It is an important question if the silver of Washoe shall take this latter route, or the better one to us of direct shipment. In the one case, we will be mere forwarders—as is now the case with a large portion of our gold crop; in the other, we shall receive and retain a portion of the profits.

Leaving to more able masters in the intricacies of pecuniary operations to calculate the differences of exchange and interest to those engaged in all the variations of London commerce, sufficient to us is the fact that time, insurance, freight, interest, commission and loss may be saved by the transfer of silver direct from San Francisco to the Chinese or Indian ports, in payment of merchandise purchased for shipment either to the United States or Europe. When the telegraph connects us with New York, and when steam connects us with Asia, a mercantile house, say in China, may advise of the purchase of a cargo or the lading of a ship, through the agents of a New York house here; the telegraph conveyes this knowledge to New York, and returns the order here to ship silver to China in sufficient amount to meet the purchase. Only two months elapse between the conception and execution of the plan, if the steam passages are made in twenty-five or thirty days—and there need be but three months' loss of interest in the transaction before the goods arrive at New York, if the cargo has been purchased, as is frequently the case, at thirty days. This silver, would be paid for from the remittances yearly for the tri-monthly shipments here—a saving to the one party of exchange towards New York, and to the other of exchange in the usual course towards London. New York, instead of London, then becomes the turning point of our exchange operations with the Eastern hemisphere, and San Francisco the clearing house and adjuster of all difficulties.—The result, therefore, would be a clear gain to our people in the full value of our product, a gain to our merchants in an added business, and an ease of payment to our bankers in the sale of silver product more profitable than that of gold, from the fact of sale and purchase being in their own country. To the country there will be a gain in the amount saved in the payment of English capitalists and their premium paid in foreign bills. The freights of our clipper ships outward will then serve to pay the ladings of our Chinese clippers homewards, and our own payments on imported goods will be need in the purchase of our products of silver. Thus, there will be profit to all branches of business concerned.

This is a matter of vast moment to our country, but it is only to be achieved by regular steam communication with some Asiatic port and San Francisco. Contemporaneously with the development and anticipated great product of our silver mines, and with the extension of the telegraph across the plains, strenuous effort should be made by our delegation at Washington to urge upon Congress the national necessity of such a line of steamers, and the expediency of giving such aid, by a postal appropriation, as may induce parties to establish it. At present there seems no such prospect of profit in the scheme, as a commercial speculation, as would tempt capitalists to embark in it.

But the time seems to us propitious for starting such an enterprise with government aid. The Pacific Mail Steamship Company, in consequence of its recent purchase of Vanderbilt's steamers, has a number of vessels for which there is not trade on the Panama or Oregon routes. With the aid of a subsidy from the Federal Government, some of these might be put on a line between this port and Honolulu, to connect at the latter with first-class steamers running to Japan and China.

FROM PEKIN.

A Chinese mail, dated Pekin, February 3, has arrived at St. Petersburg, of which the following are the most interesting advices:

Seavan, the hero of the Pehio, has been called to Pekin, to take his place in the council of war convened for the purpose of devising the best measures of defence against the expected attack of England and France. Independently of the gulf of Petcheli, Chanhaikuan is being provided with strong fortifications, and a Mongol and Tartar force has been directed in that locality. His excellency Huachana, the same who took a part in the late negotiations with the European Powers, has been granted an audience by the Emperor, and immediately after this mark of condescension on the part of his sovereign, found it advisable to dispatch himself by poison. Hai-Lan is also in disgrace. I-chan, who signed the Aihun treaty with Russia, had to spend a fortnight in the antechamber of the Emperor, when he was at length admitted. It is not mentioned whether the interview was conducive to that dignitary's bodily welfare, or the reverse.

THE PROVINCE OF AMOOR.—Gen. Muravieff, the lieutenant-governor of Eastern Siberia, who is now sojourning at St. Petersburg, has little hope for winning the immediate execution of his colonization schemes. The attempts hitherto made for that purpose seem to have been attended with signal failure. Not that the soil in the newly-conquered province of the Amoor is unfertile; not that there is any want of opportunities for exportation to California and the maritime districts of the Celestial Empire; but the course of Russian officialism has followed the emigrants to the shores of the Pacific, and Muscovite misgovernment is, after a short year's duration, equally rife in further-most Mongolia as it has been for centuries on the banks of the Neva or in the barren steppes of the Ukraine. Nay, the total of defalcations, and the gross amount of oppression, is said even to exceed in the Amoor country the usual average, to the endurance of which the inhabitants of the old provinces have been long ago trained.

The very scum of European officials, having been sent there, their sole intention was to enrich themselves in the shortest possible time, so as to allow of their speedy return to the country of their birth. This purpose they seem to have so well attained as to leave colonists in a state of utter destitution. It is very natural, under these circumstances, that the Emperor should despair of effecting a wholesome change in a region so far removed from his supervision; and this dislike is enhanced by the Cantasan in its present condition offering considerable facilities for the establishment of Russian settlers. It is probable, therefore, that the colonizing activity of the Government will be for some time limited to the latter region exclusively.—St. Petersburg correspondent of the London Telegraph.

RELIGION IN TUSCANY.

Bearing in mind all the signs of the times, it may well seem to the most zealous Roman Catholics that the greatest blessing which could befall the Italians at this present juncture would be—the Pope's curse. King Victor Emanuel and his subjects, both old and new, might well go on their knees before Pius IX., and beg him to make haste and visit their sacrileges with the heaviest excommunication that ever issued out of the Church's arsenal. Not a few of the Lombard, of the Æmilian, and even of the Tuscan clergy have dared boldly to dissociate the Pope's temporal power from his spiritual supremacy. Should Rome renew the old war of Church against State the result might be such a schism, such a revival of the old Milan discess, as might introduce into the Catholicism of Northern and Central Italy not a little of the freedom once vindicated by the Gallican Church. Political enfranchisment in Italy must lead to intellectual and moral emancipation: religion itself must be based on the principle of complete freedom of conscience; and the Papacy, spiritually as well as temporally, must learn to stand on its own legs—it must rely on its unaided powers of persuasion.

All this would come of itself, and in its proper time; but the Pope's excommunication, used as a weapon for the protection of mere temporal interests; his close connection with Austria, and the other foes to the national cause; his partiality for that incorrigible King of Naples, upon whom it was yesterday reported the Pope had conferred the Vicarship or Championship of the Holy Church—all these errors upon errors of the feeble Pontiff and of his infatuated or unprincipled advisors conspire to hasten events, to shake the faith of the most stubborn, and shock the sense of righteousness of the most timorous, so that the day may soon come in which it will become natural for a believer to say, "I am a Romanist, therefore an enemy to Rome."

Popes and Kings, however, do not live for ever. The Holy See and the throne of the Two Sicilies may yet be tenanted by men able to understand the spirit of the age. That unity of the whole Peninsula which is now uppermost in the hearts of Italian patriots may be found an impracticable scheme, and if another such man as Victor Emanuel would go share with him, extend the southern kingdom over the Marches and the lands of the Tiber, in the same measure as the Northern State annexes the Legations and the vale of the Arno, the two States, both equally free and national, might have their connecting link at Rome, where the Pope, reduced to the exercise of mere spiritual authority, might still claim the Presidency over the league indissolubly contracted between the two fraternal potentates.

These are vague speculations, of doubtful, and at any rate, remote issue. But what is of present importance is that the great interests of religious emancipation not only inevitably go hand in hand with the progress of the national cause, but receive from the blindness and unreasonableness of the Roman Court such a powerful impulse as to proceed at even a more rapid rate than some of the prudent statesmen in the Italian free States either wished or expected.

The religious emancipation of the Italians, in my opinion, must be a national work, and must be the work of the clergy. There was such a thing as an "Italian diocese" once upon a time, apart from the See of Rome. It is an idea to be revived, and to be wrought out to all its legitimate results. It may lead to an Italianism, rivalling, and perhaps outstripping Gallicanism, and even stopping little short of Anglicanism. Let the King look well to it, and seek among his Lombard or Tuscan prelates those who are to aid him in the work. The Pope and his State Secretary will not fail to afford him pretexts and opportunities for secession.

But although we must look for great results only in some such complication as above hinted, still, no doubt, there are minor agencies at work, contributing, in some measure to religious emancipation at this country. England does not stint her means, and we have here the emissaries of nearly all the churches and sects of Great Britain more or less successfully struggling into being. The Waldensian pastors, established both here and at Pisa, of whom mention occurs in my former letters, are in reality mere English missionaries, inasmuch as they carry on the war ex Anglico. The course of the religion, like that of true love, does not run as smooth as one might wish, so you will see from the following particulars:—

"On Saturday, the 17th, the Delegate, or police magistrate of Leghorn, sent for Signor Pinelli, in whose house the Evangelical services are conducted by Ribetti, the Waldensian pastor established at Pisa, three times a week, and ordered him to shut up his house, as the religious meetings would on no account be allowed. He showed him the statuto, and threatened him with six years' imprisonment if he disobeyed. Pinelli is one of the most active and respectable men of business of the middle class in Leghorn who has connected himself with the movement. The meeting room does not contain over 50 persons. It is almost full, and the almost order prevails. As the annexation is now a fait accompli, Pinelli and Ribetti have been advised to persevere and maintain their rights."

Colporteurs, or hagmen, carrying about and distributing tracts and Bibles among the people (several scores of religious works, some of them of considerable size, are being circulated through their means), have been interfered with by the police authorities at Montevarchi, Arezzo, and elsewhere. Their little stock has been sequestrated here and there, and actions have been brought against them as guilty of proselytism. An edition of the New Testament of 5,000 copies, has been stopped by the personal intervention of Baron Ricasoli.

The Government, however, both here and in Piedmont are animated by the very best intentions towards these missionaries, and bent upon establishing freedom of conscience on the soundest basis as soon as circumstances allow it. For the present, both the old Tuscan law and the Sardinian Constitution extend to the established Church a protection of which the priests may always avail themselves, to the injury of any sect not legally acknowledged.

"The priests of Santo Spirito, in Florence," my informant proceeds,

"A fortnight ago addressed the Delegate of the district about the Evangelical school for boys, denouncing it as heretical, etc. The Delegate called about a dozen of the parents to his office, and, on their answering that they were satisfied as to what their children were taught, and they wished their children to be brought up in the same faith as themselves, he was quite pleased, and allowed them full liberty to act as they thought proper."

That the clergy, some of them, at least, are very active against the sectarians, there can be no doubt, and it is also a fact that the Government entertain greater fear of the priests than they would care to acknowledge. The proprietor of the carpenter's shop which the Evangelicals, or Italian Plymouth brethren, had converted into a chapel, has been prevailed upon by the priests to serve the congregation with a notice to quit, and all the efforts of the brethren to secure another locality for their meetings have been frustrated by the intrigues of the same priests, who describe them to the ignorant people as lawless no less than Godless individuals, and inspire the owners of suitable localities with no unreasonable terror of the disturbances to which religious innovation in collision with religious fanaticism may lead. The brethren are driven to the necessity of building a chapel for themselves, an enterprise for which the funds will not soon be forthcoming, as those poor priestless evangelicals seem to be less popular with the wealthy missionary societies in England, and have but scanty subscriptions to fall back on. A small number of this small flock (about 100 of them) have seceded from the main congregation, and headed by an expriest from the Mugello, have set up a small conventicle of their own, without, however, coming to open hostilities with their brethren. It is Evangelicals and the sects under the ordinance of pastors, elders, or preachers of any description, no very good blood exists, or is indeed likely soon to spring up. The Evangelicals, to do them justice, are the objects of a universal ill-will, which they do not fully reciprocate.—Cor. of London Times.

THE AMERICAN BONAPARTES.

The Paris correspondent of the London Morning Star writes as follows:

A family council, presided over by the Emperor, and comprising Prince Jerome, Prince Napoleon, the Princess Mathilde, and two of the Cabinet Ministers, is said to have been held at the Palais recently, to hold a conference concerning the proper steps to be adopted in the affair of Jerome Patterson, which is beginning to give great annoyance to the Imperial family. The publication of the particulars of the first marriage of Prince Jerome Bonaparte—at that time merely Lieutenant Bonaparte, in the service of the French Republic—with Miss Patterson, an American citizen, as detailed in the last volume of Thier's History of the Consulate and Empire, has aroused the ingenuity as the sense of justice in the bosom of Jerome Patterson; and, upon reading the account, as given by Thiers, he immediately sent in his protestation, with the copy of the letter written by Pius VII on the occasion of the second marriage, wherein his Holiness refuses to annul the first, there existing, according to the Romish law, no reason whatever for so doing. The Emperor Napoleon then, taking advantage of the old Imperial privilege claimed by every royal and Imperial house in Europe, of sanctioning or annulling a marriage contracted by any of its members by the will of the chief of the family alone, immediately declared, in spite of the Pope, that the marriage was void, and that his brother Jerome must forthwith marry the Princess Charlotte of Wurtemburg.

Now, Jerome, who had been quietly enjoying a country life with the wisdom and dignity of a man little caring for greatness, the affliction of his family, is awakened to the idea that it is the second—not the first—marriage which is illegal. It was Madame Bonaparte's consent which had been considered necessary in order to legalize the first marriage. She had been consulted on that occasion, as she was, according to French law, by the death of her husband, the head of the family. This was, therefore, the act by which the Patterson marriage was dissolved, without the consent of the widowed head of the Imperial family. As a civil formality, and in actual defiance of the Pope's decree as a religious necessity, it must naturally be regarded as contrary to the jurisprudence of the country, and consequently of no effect—null and void—he who contracted it unconsciously guilty of bigamy, and the issue of such marriage to stand second as recognized children, not of right the heirs of the contractor.

The summons sent by the huissier to the publisher of of the second edition of the volume was of course complied with, the law for publishers having lately been made more stringent than ever on this point, and the consequence was the seizure of the whole seizure of the whole edition before it had left the printer's office, and the expunging of the offensive letter of the Pope with Jerome Patterson's protestation. Notice of protest was immediately served upon the publisher, and his application to the minister resulted resulted in an address to the throne itself for advice in this dilemma.

Jerome Patterson's defense of his conduct is most independent and noble. "For myself I seek nothing. I am as proud of my glorious title of an American citizen as I should be of that of Prince Imperial of France. During Prince Jerome's life-time no measure shall be adopted to restore those who are dependent on my love to their rightful position, but this protestation is necessary for their security in future years."

It has been decided that the volume must appear with the letter and the protest—another protest to come before the public, by way of answer, immediately afterwards. The affair is looked upon as a great annoyance, nothing more; but it is that; and were it not for the calmness with which the Emperor himself guides his family affairs, much harm might be occasioned by it. The strictest secrecy is meanwhile commanded to the journals, to all of which it has been intimated en masse that it would be considered an offense a la suppression to speak of it for the present. Meanwhile Thiers rubs his little hands, and rejoices that the world will say—Who would have thought the old man had so much mischief in him yet?

THE MOUNTAIN MEADOWS MASSACRE.

The Missouri Republican, the leading, and by far the largest Democratic paper of the Great West, referring to the late meeting of Mormons in Illinois, for the purpose of installing Jo Smith, Jr., as the successor of his father, and leader of the "Latter Day Saints," in opposition to Brigham Young, has the following burning and truthful words in relation to that atrocious, almost unparalleled, and yet unatoned-for tragedy, the Mountain Meadows Massacre:

"The recent meeting held in Illinois is not without its significance, and certainly may be more potent than an army handcuffed by instructions, whose soldiery, and even officers, have been ruthlessly shot down, while the ready blades of their comrades were made powerless even for defense, much less revenge, by the mandates of a Government that allowed not only its troops to be butchered, its high civil officers to be insulted, and their functions taken from them, but even the President of the United States himself assailed in a manner so gross and indecent, that we can only refer to it, much less describe it. The scene of the Mountain Meadows massacre, a lonely spot in the fastness of the mountains, contains a monument that is damning to our pride as a nation, so long as justice is withheld. In that desert spot, strewn with bones and skulls, and tufts of hair, a rude cross is erected which tells a story more sanguinary than Wyoming, which has been the theme of poesy and romance. It tells the story of more than one hundred and twenty men, women and children, slaughtered in a cowardly by painted satellites, who usurped the livery of the Digger savage to serve Brigham Young in. There, on that fatal day, stalwart men, citizens of the United States, who loved their country, and never were traitors to it, betrayed, decoyed, went down in blood, in the full flush of their lusty manhood; women and children were mercilessly slain, butchered, to paraphrase a well known text, to make a Utah holiday, and to enrich a Danite robber crew. True, after the carnage was over, seventeen babes were graciously spared by these white savages, and these nurslings of blood brought back to the States.

THE GREATEST DUEL ON RECORD.

An old Mississippian furnishes the following to the Woodville (Miss.) Republican:

The famous duel in which forty or more gentlemen were engaged, in 1828, is still remembered in Natchez. Col. Jim Bowie, the famous fighter and inventor of the knife which bears his name, used to spend a great deal of his time in Natchez. He was challenged by a gentleman of Alexandria, La., whose friends, to the number of twenty or more, accompanied him to Natchez to see fair play, knowing Bowie was a desperate man, and had his own friends about him. All parties went upon the field. The combatants took their places in the centre, separated from their friends in the rear for enough not to endanger them with their balls. Behind the battle array—three—Twenty armed Louisianians fifty yards behind their champion and his seconds and surgeon, and opposite them, as far behind Bowie and his seconds and surgeon, twenty armed Mississippians. Behind the lights of Natchez thronged with spectators, and a steamer in the river rounded to, its decks black with passengers, watching with deep interest the scene. The plan of fight was to exchange shots twice with pistols, and to close with knives, Bowie being armed with his own terrible weapon. At the first fire both parties escaped. At the second the Louisianian was too quick and took advantage of Bowie, who waited the word. At this Bowie's second cried "foul play!" and shot the Louisianian dead. The second of the latter instantly killed the slayer of his principal. Bowie drove his knife into the arm. The Surgeons now crossed blades, while, with loud battle cries, came on the two parties of friends, the light of battle in their eyes. In a minute the whole number were engaged in a fearless conflict. Dirks, pistols and knives were used with fatal effect, until one party drove the other from the field. I do not know how many were killed and wounded in all, but it was a dreadful slaughter. Bowie fought like a lion, but fell covered with wounds. For months he lingered at the Mansion House before he fully recovered.

RETURN OF THE UNDELIVERED LETTERS.—The Post Office Department has issued the following important instructions:

When any person shall endorse on any letter his name or place of residence as writer thereof, the same, if remaining uncalled for at the office to which it is directed for thirty days, or such time as the writer may direct, shall be returned by mail to said writer; and no such letters shall be advertised, nor shall the same be treated as dead letters until so returned to the post office of the writers and there remain uncalled for one quarter.

The new rule, it is believed, will diminish the bulk of dead letters by one-half, and at the same time prove a great benefit to the people at large.

THE CALIFORNIA EXPRESS.—As the "Pony Express" is now in operation, and has already brought us important intelligence from California, we give some information for the benefit of all who desire to use it for private or mercantile correspondence. The courier of the Pony Express will leave St. Joseph, Missouri, every Friday, carrying dispatches only, (which must be in Government stamped envelops,) and will run regularly weekly thereafter. Telegraphic messages from all parts of the United States and Canadas, in connection with the point of departure, will be received up to eight o'clock A. M. on the day of departure of the express, and transmitted over the Placerville and St. Joseph telegraphic wire to San Francisco and intermediate points by the connecting Express in eight days. The letters will be delivered in San Francisco in ten days from the departure of the Express. Persons desiring to send telegraphic messages can do so by making application at any telegraph office in the Union. Letters will be received up to two o'clock P. M., at 481 Tenth street, Washington D. C., on every Monday, and be forwarded to the Express of that week at St. Joseph.

BELLS.—We are pleased to learn that the Messrs. Meneely, of West Troy, are receiving so many orders for their justly celebrated bells, that they have been obliged to here their men work nights for several weeks past, in order to keep pace with the demand. Among the many orders received last week, were one for a bell to weigh 4000 lbs, to go to New Orleans, one for a 3000 lb. bell for New York, one of 1500 lbs. for Washington, D.C., one of the same weight for Paterson, N. J., and several of less weight for different places. In the same time, two chimes were shipped, one for Erie, Pa., the other for a Presbyterian church in a city on the line of the New York Central Rail Road. The last mentioned chime, is to be presented by a gentleman of means to the church for which it is intended. The congregation is not aware that it has been ordered, and will, of course, be pleasantly surprised.

THE GREAT EASTERN.—The London Observer states that the proposal of the directors of the Great Eastern to raise an additional sum of £100,000 to equip the vessel for sea has been attended with the most complete success. Subscribers to the fund are to be guaranteed a dividend 17½ per cent, out of the profits, subject to the charges of insurance, and redeemable at the end of two years with 20 per cent bonus. This ship will thus cost upwards of a million sterling, which is pretty good evidence that every thing about her has cost double its value in one way or another. The Manchester Guardian says the Great Eastern will be ready for sea by the beginning of June, and that she will accompany the royal squadron which is to escort the Prince of Wales to Canada.

BULWER'S "MY NOVEL."—A writer in the Boston Transcript says that this book was written in a generous rivalry with Dickens and Thackeray, each remonstrating to write a novel, the hero of which should be a writer. The results of this agreement were "David Copperfield," "Pendennis," and "My Novel." Each author did his best; each author included in his work a subtle something, drawn from his own individuality, which was not present in the work of either of the others; but, while there was a great variety of personal opinion as to the relative excellences of the three novelists the general "crowd" gave in a verdict which, we think, literary historians will sustain, that Bulwer was good, Thackeray better, Dickens best.

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.—The Atlantic Telegraph Company have dispatched Captain Kell, who has left for St. John's, Newfoundland, via Halifax, for the purpose of making a further attempt to bring their cable into working order. His first business, before ascertaining whether it tests perfectly between Newfoundland and Ireland, will be to lift nearly fifty miles of cable, and take it ashore, which will enable him to convey the end to Newperfiaux, a place in Trinity Bay, more than fifty miles from the original landing station. The object of this is to obtain a more suitable locality for the landing, and so lessen the distance to be telegraphed through, which is considered of great importance. Captain Kell will return as soon as he has ascertained that all is right on the Atlantic side, and then continue operations at Valencia, which it is expected will commence about the end of June next.

A RARE SPECIMEN.—The Florence correspondent of the Newark Advertiser mentions that the wife and children of Dr. Achilli, an apostate from the Roman Church, who has conciliated Protestant feeling both in England and the United States, are in a perfectly destitute condition, living on the alms of our countrymen. He shipped them at New York last year, under a specious pretext, with the promise to supply their wants monthly, by bills of exchange; since which the only intelligence they have had of him was through the newspaper report of his having another woman and child in an institution in New Jersey. Measures have been taken to call him to account.

REBELLION IN CHINA.—Accounts from China to the 20th of January state that the rebellion had revived, and was causing the Government considerable apprehension. The coast defenses along the Gulf of Pechelee were ordered to be repaired and strengthened. The United States Commissioners had brought their labors to a termination, and all their claims against the Chinese Government had been well adjusted. Fifty per cent., with twelve per cent. interest, will be paid in a short time.

THE NEW ARCTIC EXPEDITION.—The sum required for the New Arctic expedition has been raised, and Dr Hayes is now in a position to start in the month of June for the shores of Grinnell Land, from thence to proceed towards the open Polar Sea discovered by Dr Kane, where he confidently expects to solve the last great geographical problem of the age, the precise location of the North Pole.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT IN NEW YORK.—A bill has passed both branches of the New York State Legislature essentially modifying the death penalty. Executions hereafter are only to be for treason, arson, and murder in the first degree. In cases of death sentences the executions shall not take place until one year after sentence shall have been passed, nor until the issue of the Gov.'s warrant.

FOREIGN.

The Insurrection in Sicily.

A dispatch from Marseilles, of the 11th, gives the following latest particulars of the insurrection at Palermo and elsewhere in the two Sicilies.

The rebels attacked the Royal troops at 5 in the morning, then retired and shut themselves up in the convent, which they barricaded. A battalion of the 4th regiment of the line made a sudden assault on the insurrectionists, but were driven back with considerable loss. The Royal Artillery then opened a breach, and the convent was taken by assault. The insurgents and their arms were captured.

Several bands of rebels having risen in the environs, in order to create a division, were beaten and pursued in all directions. The official journal does not speak of an insurrection, but announces that General Salzano has placed Palermo in a state of siege, and also adds, that a telegraphic dispatch received on the afternoon of the 5th inst., affirms that all the other provinces of Sicily have been tranquil, and that the inhabitants of Palermo had not taken part in the combat of the 4th.

Letters state that on the evening of the 6th, an immense crowd, 80,000 strong, blockaded in the Rue Tolide, at Naples, and raised shouts of "Viva la Constituzione," before the residence of the Papal Nuncio. The streets were quickly cleared by the patrols.

TURIN, April 11.—According to news from Naples to the 10th, the insurgents, numbering about 10,000 well-armed men, were concentrated in the Sicilian islands, and had interrupted the canals communicating with Palermo. The troops quartered in that city were attacked every night. The Neapolitan fleet was cruising along the coast.

The Opinione publishes the following telegram, dated April 10th: "The insurrection in Sicily appears to be spreading. The dispatch of troops continues. Great agitation prevails at Naples.

New Treaty Between England and France.

The negotiations for a new treaty of navigation between England and France continue, though it is said they meet with great opposition from the French protectionists, whose organ asserts that any relaxation of existing restrictions will ruin French merchant shipping, and declares it to be a work of supererogation to grant anything to England beyond the stipulations of the treaty of commerce.

Meanwhile the Emperor pursued the even tenor of his way and on the 12th gave public notice that the superior council of commerce, agriculture and industry will proceed to an inquiry for the purpose of investigating the average prices of the articles admitted into France by the treaty of commerce with England, in order to fix an ad valorem duty upon them.

French Occupation of Rome.

The Paris correspondent of the Commercial Advertiser writes to that paper, under the 6th:

The Roman question has undergone a new phase. The excommunication launched against everybody touches nobody, and therefore amounts, as we have said, to a protest and nothing more. But the question of who is to garrison Rome with troops, has come up in such a way as not to be longer evaded, and now we have an indication that a special army is to be created at Rome, commanded by General Lamoriciere, a Frenchman, and by young French noblemen, belonging to Legitimist families. Thus, while the regular army of France will be withdrawn, a special French army, or almost one, will be created at Rome to take its place. It appears certain that a Neapolitan army would be powerless at Rome in preserving the peace, and since Spain will not, and Austria will not be permitted to garrison Rome, and since an army purely papal would be impossible, there seems no other solution left than that which takes General Lamoriciere into the combination. This would be an extra-official army, but it is said that the Emperor Napoleon, far from objecting to such an arrangement, will not refuse his assent to the privilege which all Frenchmen are required to attain in order to take service in a foreign army.

By telegraph we have the announcement of Gen. Lamoriciere's arrival and actual reception at Rome, as commander-in-chief of the army of occupation.

ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

LITOMACHEE COLORED MISSION.—Rev. J. J. Lelham writes: I reached my mission in good time. It consisted of five plantations; I have taken in two others. We are laboring under the disadvantages Bishop Andrew referred to in his letter published in the Advocate some time since. We are meeting for worship in out-houses, negro cabins, and under the spreading oak. The reason is, as the Bishop said, that the planters do not wish their servants to visit other plantations. But I am happy to say that planters are feeling the necessity of, having suitable houses of worship for their servants. Three of my patrons have consented to unite and build. I think the chapel plan will soon be adopted all through this country. The servants are sufficiently fed, well clothed, and moderately worked. They occasionally have half of Saturday, especially before church day, to wash up and prepare for church. I have never met with a more cordial reception anywhere.

TALLADEGA DISTRICT.—Rev. W. D. Matthews writes: The preachers of the District are all at their "posts," and working like men of souls. I think I may safely say that the entire District is looking up; and already we have encouraging indications of a gracious revival. I am now at my first meeting on my second round. Brother J. S. Lamb is the supply here (Talladega station), and the Church here is in a most delightful state. O for a general, sweeping revival! We have several new churches going up, and the church at Sunny Level is to be dedicated on first Sabbath in May.

LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.

NEW IBERIA.—Rev. Thos H. White writes: Our Parsonage is done. We are living at home. How sweet the word—Itinerant at home! Yes, sir, truth! Large, comfortable, neat home. Now the preacher who is read out to New Iberia—not circuits for the people will have a station preacher—station, can come right home. New Church completed; pneonnge done; New Iberia Female Institute prospering. A twelve-month ago the Methodist church here was worth $1,000; now, near $10,000. God bless the generous people. Come and see us, sir.

Thanks to Dr. Drake for his late excellent article. I suppose, perhaps, if the mistake had not been made we should never have got the very pleasant and amusing incident. If so, I am glad the mistake was made; as it was entirely inadvertent.

We have had Revs. Walker and Harp of the city with us. They are "workmen, indeed, that need not be ashamed." O, that we may now have a thorough evangelical revival! Amen.

MARRIAGES.

"It is not good for man to be alone."

On the 11th inst., by the Rev. H. D. Berry, Mr. D. L. MCGEHEE to Miss SARAH D. SMITH, all of St. Hel

Poetry.

NIGHT.

BY SALLIE M. WHITE.

Soft moon and lovely star,
Your some-time cloud-molested beams
Drop down into my waiting, loving heart
Blest dreams.

O lovely Night, I feel
The calm, poetic spell
Upon my longing spirit laid—
'Tis well.

The distant, silvery clouds
Are floating on the expanse of upper air,
Like ships with snowy sails and shrouds,
To shores afar.

Pure moonlight, weep your showers
Of peace on every weary, saddened soul,
That daily measures the rough march of life
To its far goal.

And now, while others sleep,
I wake to hear the wandering night-winds moan;
Tragedies me voices back o'er memory's deep—
Sad tone.

Children's Column.

LETTER FROM THE PINEY WOODS.

Mr. Editor: No church privileges to-day—my "better half" called to attend the sick, I have been alone, save my "little ones," who are the best of company, and while they are strolling round the yard, before which, all gathered around, we read verse about in the Bible, Engenia selecting the chapter, and then singing a hymn, she also selecting "Jerusalem, my happy home," learned in the Children's Column. I write you a few lines from this wilderness part of the globe. Last Sabbath I rode ten miles to hear a local Methodist preacher, as I thought, but I was doubly disappointed, for it was a Baptist preacher, and he did not mention baptism! In going this distance I did not pass but one house, piney woods, and long green grass, with now and then a herd of cattle, their teeth keeping time with the tinkling of their bells. Oh, the big bells of golden, sweet butter we isolated folks make here! How I wish I could hand you and yours some!

I frequently ride this distance, and farther, to hear preaching, and usually alone. What a time along this long and monotonous road for prayer and self-examination! and then, as I draw near the place of worship, I hear the sweet songs of Zion swelling out on the still air—what a sweet peace settles upon my heart! I alight and go in. How precious are the words of the minister! and by the time I reach home I have the sermon so fixed in my mind that the first leisure from domestic affairs, I sketch it down to read at a time that I can't go to church, as is the case to-day.

Ah, here comes Master Willie, with his "first pantaloons" on, who is as much delighted with us as was Master Charley of Harper; but the contents of his pocket are not as great yet.

Our Advocate is as regular as the day of the week. How could I do without it and the Circle.

Excuse me for hindering you from your duties. Some spirit put it into my mind to write you to-day.

Remember, at a throne of grace, the "piney woods" folks. Yours truly,

ELIZ. PEYTON HART DAVIS.

Bertrand Prairie, La., April 15th.

LITTLE PAQUETTE.

If you will sit down on this rustic seat beneath this old twisted beech-tree I will tell you the story of Little Paquette.

There is a path through the maple wood that leads down to the river bank. You see the river yonder winding through the meadow—how the waters sparkle in the sunlight! But it does not look thus down beyond the wood. There it is very deep, and the vews, and cypresses, and hemlocks which grow upon the banks made the waters always as black as night. The air is stifling with the odor of rank and noxious weeds; dark, lurid flowers bloom in the summer; and in the autumn the plants are covered with black, poisonous berries and horny and bristly seeds. Of the water float plants with great spotted leaves and among them the water snakes creep. On the banks dark green lizards dart in and out of the heavy foliage, and the adder coils himself on the gray rocks, his bright color looking dark and dead under the horrid shade. It is a foul and dreadful place. When I have finished my story you can go there and see it if you wish. I never visit that spot, but it was Little Paquette's favorite resort. She was six years old when she came to live with me. She came into my lonely cottage like a gleam of sunlight. I never saw her mother. My son married a French woman. She died when Paquette was very young; and soon after my son died, and left me as a legacy his child—my Little Paquette. She was very beautiful. Can I describe her? No. Can you paint an April sky?—now glowing with sunlight, now dark and heavy with clouds, now dissolving in rain, now blue, and clear, and calm? Neither can I describe her changeful beauty.

She was a strange child. From the first I knew that I could not understand her. Our minister said she was a genius. I suppose she was; and I have often wished that I had sent her away to some great person who would have taught her and trained her in different way from what I could. But it is too late now for such regrets, and I do not think I could have made her leave me; for she was very self-willed and passionate whenever anything came between her and the object of her love. She loved me devotedly—I thought with all the love of which human nature is capable. But I was mistaken. She had a deeper, an intenser love to give another. But I shall come to him in time.

And now I must tell you something about Jamie. The story of Little Paquette would be nothing without Jamie. He was our minister's son, only a year older than my little darling, and they grew up together. Neither of them ever chose other playmates. He was a fair, delicate boy, with pensive mouth and dreamy blue eyes. It was strange to see how this dreamy boy always chose the sunlight, while bright arch Little Paquette best loved the shade. He built that woodbine arbor close on the borders of the maple wood, where it overlooks the sunny meadow. And there he liked to sit and watch the grass waving in the breeze, or the lambs playing merrily on the banks; or else he would listen to the song of the birds, for he loved all tender and beautiful things.

But Little Paquette was not always in the mood to be pleased with Jamie's woodbine arbor. She liked to go down to the river side, and sit under the hemlock-trees, and she talked to the loathsome weeds, and poisonous flowers, and dark-hued lizards as if they were human beings. And when Jamie, with fear and trembling, would follow her into that dark and horrible place, she would repulse him with scorn, and speak such bitter words that he would leave her, and return sadly to his woodbine arbor. But he could not remain there long and think of Paquette sitting among the noxious plants and the water-snakes, and again he would go to her, and with soft, persuasive words would plead with her to leave such companions; and then, perhaps, she would throw her arms around his neck, and call him her dear preserver, and go contentedly back with him to the woodbine arbor, and sit there for hours talking of the happy life they would spend together. For then early these children had agreed to love each other always, and Paquette would often say that nothing but death could ever part her from Jamie. Alas! poor Little Paquette.

I like to linger over these recollections of her childhood; but I must hasten or I shall make my story so long that it will weary you. Years passed away, and they seemed but a few months to Jamie and me—so happy were we with Little Paquette.

But the time came when she ceased to be much with us. I believed for a while she ceased to love us. One summer a painter wandered into our pleasant village. I think he would soon have left it had he not seen my darling child. Her wonderful and changeful beauty captivated his fancy. This was not strange, for she fascinated every body. She threw the charm of genius over everthing she said or did. But she was a wild eccentric being; one could never account for her moods. One of her fancies I well remember. She used constantly to wear a bright, sharp little dagger in a jeweled sheath. It had been given her in France by a noble Spanish lady, she said, and as it was the only memento she had of her infantile years she would wear it for their sake. I did not like this fancy of hers, but it was vain to resist her when she coaxed and pleaded with so many pretty ways. I could never refuse her any thing.

But I less did I like her fancy for the handsome painter Master Jeremy Marmaduke. He told her that she was a child of genius—that Jamie could not appreciate her—that Jamie was of too calm and gentle a nature to feel for her that deep, strong passion which, he asserted, glowed like flame in his own heart. He drew for her such gorgeous pictures of the life she should enjoy with him in Italy, or some such fair and beautiful land, that her warm imagination was charmed. And then he described the dull, still, purposeless life she would pass with our gentle Jamie until she grew pale with dismay at such a future. She used to walk with him day after day on the sunny banks of the river down yonder in the meadow. Far better would it have been for her had she been sitting under the hemlock-trees among the water-snakes and poisonous reptiles.

What was Jamie doing all this time? How was away from home studying diligently, writing frequently to Paquette of his progress, and how the thought of her cheered him in his labors. His father intended to leave the ministry and Jamie was to take his place. And as the time for his return drew near how sweet and tender grew his hopes! how full of earnest love were his words! I need to think that if Jamie had remained Paquette would never have loved Marmaduke. But I do not know. There was a sympathy wanting between them, the lack of which she felt I doubt not. He could never reach to the height of her genius, and I fear she never sounded to the depth of his love.

He came home to find his affections thrown aside; his hopes crushed; but no murmur or complaint ever escaped his lips. He saw that she was happier with Marmaduke than she had ever been with him, and her happiness was dearer to him than his own.

But there came an end to this happiness. I scarcely need tell you how it ended. It is the same old story which has been told over and over again. Marmaduke left us in the winter, saying that in the summer-time he would return and claim Paquette for his bride. What could I do but give my consent; for I know she loved him most fervently, although I wept when I thought she could not love Jamie. And Marmaduke returned not in the summer; but there came to us tidings of the marriage of some high-born maiden. I looked for some violent sign of grief from Paquette when she was told this, but she gave no such sign. Gradually her eyes lost their sparkling brilliancy; her cheek its roundness and bloom; her step its joyousness.

I dread to tell you why October is the most sorrowful of all the months of the year to me. Many long years have passed since that fearful October night; but can I ever forget it? We were sitting on this very seat—my Little Paquette and I. It was a clear, bright night. The full moon was high in the heavens, and poured its light over all things. Then Paquette spoke to me of her love for Marmaduke, and how cruelly he had deceived her. She spoke so soft and low, and was so very calm! She showed me a letter he had written a short time before, in which he told her that he had never loved her, and that he supposed she had ceased to feel any affection for him, and concluded by hoping she was happy with Jamie. Such a letter to such a girl as Paquette! I wondered at her calmness. He requested an interview with her, in order to exchange the notes and little love-tokens which had passed between them.

"I have written to him," said she, rising, "and I go now to meet him on this river bank, under the hemlock trees."

She still spoke soft and low, and was so very calm!

She left me and went to the woodbine arbor, and out of it into the maple wood, and down that winding path to the river side. I noticed how heavily and crushingly her feet pressed upon the withered leaves, and how different it was from her usual light, airy trend. I watched her as she went through the maple wood, her white dress flitting among the trees. The golden crimson leaves were scattered over her like gems. I saw her clothed in the glory of moonlight, and then she disappeared amidst the black shadows.

So absorbed was I in thinking of my darling that I took no note of time. It may have been an hour or more after she left me that I was aroused from my reverie by Jamie. He seized my arm, and demanded of me where Paquette had gone. I could not answer him, for I was horror-stricken at his wild look and haggard face. He almost dragged me through the maple wood down to the river. I involuntarily close my eyes now when I think of the sight which met my view. Marmaduke lay stretched upon the ground—dead. The grass around him was stiff and purple with the dark blood that flowed from a wound in his side. His face was white and wan. A branch of the deadly nightshade hung over him, and the dew was dripping slowly from the flowers upon his cheek. His right hand was tightly clenched around a slender sapling of the water-hemlock. Dark-hued lizards were looking curiously into his staring sightless eyes. A huge adder was slowly trailing over the prostrate body, and water-snakes were gliding swiftly among the mushrooms which lined the river bank, and gave to the place the dead color of a charnel-house. The shadows lay heavy and black over all.

But where was Paquette? Jamie drew a little dagger out of the heart of the dead man, and picked up a jeweled sheath, which lay among the poisonous weeds.

"Hide them!" he hurriedly exclaimed. "Let nothing witness against her!"

And then he fled from the spot like one pursued by a demon. I dropped the bloody dagger and its bright sheath into the dark waters.

But where was Little Paquette? Where was the beautiful maiden I had but lately seen crowned with golden and crimson leaves, and clothed in the glory of moonlight?

That question has never yet been answered. God only knows where the Little Paquette spent that fearful night. God only knows what misery and remorse she suffered through weary years. God only knows the agony of her bitter after-life.

But Jamie said she would return to us. Weeks and months and years rolled away, and she come not—nor did we hear aught of her. But still Jamie said she would return; and with a sweet, patient hope, and a love that outlived time and sorrow, and rose above sin and despair, he sat every summer evening in the woodbine arbor to await her coming. And close beside it he built a small cottage, and every winter night you could see the light gleaming from the casement, and streaming far into the maple wood. And thus for years he watched and waited.

I used often to come to this seat under the beech-tree, and I never failed to be here on every anniversary of that awful October night when I had last seen my Little Paquetta; and once, as I sat here, with the full moon high in the heavens above me, watching the yellow and crimson leaves as they fell from the trees, and thinking of that night, years before, when I had lost my darling, I heard the same heavy crushing footstep upon the withered leaves, and then I knew she had come back. I looked eagerly to see her come out from among the shadows and darkness. She came slowly into the maple wood. The trees threw down upon her their golden and crimson leaves. The moonlight gloamed upon her like a glory, but her long hair was unbound, and it floated around her—a heavy shadow between her and the moonlight.

I did not go forward to meet her. There was one then waiting in the woodbine arbor whose right it was first to welcome the wanderer home.

When I entered the arbor I found Jamie seated on the mossy floor holding her in his arms. Her eyes were closed. Her face was very thin and pale, but on it was such an expression of sweet peace and holy love as I had never hoped to see there again. I took her hand, but it was cold as marble. I thought she was dead, and I thanked God that I had been permitted once more to look upon my Little Paquette.

But she did not die then. It was not until months afterward that Jamie and I laid her in the grave. God was very good to send us back our darling. She was gentle to Jamie and me, especially to Jamie; and we both knew that she was better, and holier, and purer than when she left us—better, and holier, and purer than she had been in her happy childhood, and with this knowledge we were content. She told us not what she had done and suffered in the years she had been away. Not for worlds would I lift the veil from those pictures of sin, and want, and despair.

And hollily and calmly she died, and peacefully she sleeps, and by her side lies Jamie; and there in that woodbine arbor you will find their grave.

THE LATE GEN. D'EVEREUX.

General D'Evereux, whose death in London has recently been announced, was well known in this country. He was connected with several of the first families of Mississippi, whom he has more than once visited. The following brief sketch of his life is from the London Spectator:

On the 26th March, Lieut. Gen. J. D'Evereux died at 47 Hertfort street, London, at the ripe age of eighty-two years. His name is probably entirely unknown to all except the students of Irish and South American history of the latter part of the eighteenth and commencement of the nineteenth centuries. But his decease deserves a passing word of notice for several reasons. In character, birth and adventures, he represented many things that are fast becoming traditions of the past, whether for the good of mankind we will not here discuss. Born in 1778, he represented one of the oldest and most indisputably Norman families in the islands. His branch, the oldest of the D'Evereux, had been settled for many centuries upon the family estates in Wexford, when the rebellion of 1798 broke out. That movement was, far more than is generally understood, guided and promoted by the old Irish aristocracy of all races; and of those who took part in it was the subject of this notice, who at the early age of 18, had the command of a division in the rebel army. On the failure of the rising, John D'Evereux made his submission to the Government, and, through the influence of Lord Cornwallis, the then Lord Lieutenant, who took great interest in him from his youth, received a free pardon and remission of all forfeitures, upon the sole condition of remaining abroad for some years. This condition was complied with, and the treatment he had received caused a strong attachment to the British rule in the breast of the young rebel. This attachment was strongly marked when the Emperor Napoleon offered Mr. D'Evereux a General's commission in the army he was preparing for the invasion of England in the early part of the century, and suggested that in the event of satisfactory service, the old domain of Evereux in Normandy, from which the family took its name, should be repurchased for him, and that he should be created a Count of the Empire. In the interview with the great Emperor when these propositions were made, which were peremptorily declined by the young man, who was great an enthusiast for liberty as he was proud of his race, D'Evereux informed Napoleon, in reply to the question whether the D'Evereuxe were not descended from the Conqueror? that, on the contrary, the Conqueror was descended from them; a spirited remark which, as well as his conduct on that occasion generally, caused him to be sought out by Alexander Von Humboldt, with whom he was afterwords closely intimate.

The principal later event of John D'Evereux's life was his raising and taking out to South America the Irish Legion, which assisted Bolivar in conquering the Independence of the South American republics. The later disasters of some of these communities have obscured the recollection of the enthusiasm which greeted their birth evinced alike the rhetoric of Canning, and in the sympathy of the general liberal public. What the Englishman John Guyon was to the unsuccessful Hungarian insurrection in 1848-9, John D'Evereux was in some sort to Venezuela and Nueva Granada in 1820, and the ensuing years. At the date of his decease, he was the senior Lieutenant-General of these republics, and in the nominal receipt of a considerable pension from them.

The most ardent enthusiasm for the cause of political, social, and religious freedom, a readiness to draw his sword and strike a blow for it wherever there was a chance of doing so, a large share of that aristocratic sentiment which, as was befitting the representative of so genuine a Norman family, despised European despotism, not merely because it is false and cruel, but because it is a parvenu, an innovation upon the grand old chivalric freedom of the middle ages, all these things made up a rare and strong character in General D'Evereux. Democracy will not do its work till it has found something like the old formula of its enemy, "noblesse oblige." Certainly not while it depends for its success, in the world, even as do certain of our prophets, upon anything short of the readiness to sacrifice life and fortune in the cause, which distinguished the fine old gentleman of whom we have given this brief account.

"SOWING HIS WILD OATS."

"Sowing his wild oats"—aye! sowing them deep
In the heart of a mother to blossom in tears,
And shadow with grief the decline of her years.

"Sowing his wild oats," to silver the head
Of the sire who watched his first pulse throb with joy,
And whose voice went to heaven in prayer for the boy.

"Sowing his wild oats," to spring up and choke
The flowers in the garden of a sister, whose love
Is as pure and as bright as the blue sky above.

"Sowing his wild oats." Aye! cheeks shall grow pale,
And sorrow shall wither the heart of the wife,
When manhood thus squanders the prime of his life.

"Sowing his wild oats." Death only shall reap,
With his keen-sharpened scythe; the fruits will be found
In the graveyard near by, neath that grass-covered mound.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

A Tribute of Respect.

At a meeting of Magnolia Circle, No. 29, April 12th, 1860, on the announcement of the decease of Brother WILLIAM B. M'CAULEY, a committee was appointed to draft resolutions expressive of the feelings of the members of the Circle, whereupon the following preambles and resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Whereas, It has pleased God in his providence, to call from our Circle to the Grand Circle above our much esteemed and valued brother William M'Cauley, thereby severing an important link in that chain which has been so long undisturbed by the visitation of death. Therefore, be it resolved—

1st. That in his death our Circle has been deprived of a worthy and devoted member, the Church a zealous Christian, and this community a noble and generous young man, whose example is worthy of imitation, and whose loss we deeply deplore.

2nd. That while we mourn the loss of this our brother, it is ours to cherish the memory of his social virtues, and humbly bow to this will of God.

3d. That, in token of our love and appreciation, not only of his general virtues, but especially of his devotion to the Temperance cause, we wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

4th. That we tender to his bereaved mother our warmest sympathies, and sincerely hope that the grace of God may be sufficient to sustain her in this her hour of severe trial; and that we offer to his brother, and afflicted sisters, our condolence, and beg them not to weep as those who have no hope, believing he is not dead, but calmly sleeps in Jesus.

W. N. BLEDSOE,
L. H. GARDISON,
H. C. BECK,
GEORGE JACKSON,
J. P. PARKER. } Committee.

☞ Exchanges please copy.

Another old Soldier gone home from War.

REV. JAMES REEMS was born in Virginia in the year 1781. He removed to the parish of East Feliciana, La., in the year 1800. In 1812 he was united in marriage with Miss Eliza Fuber, and was blessed with twelve children, eight of whom were daughters. In the same year he was savingly converted to God under the ministry of some of the first pioneers of the Gospel in these Louisiana wilds. Not long after he had united himself to the church, he began to preach. During the most of his long life he continued to fill, with great zeal and acceptability, the important offices of local preacher, class-leader and recording steward. He trained up his children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, and lived to see them every one members of the church, and among our most honorable citizens. He was zealous for family religion, and it was in the bosom of his own household that he kept the fire burning in his own soul, fitting him for every good word and work. But his work is now done, and his great sufferings at an end; and it will not be thought strange that, when the messenger Death came, on the 22nd of March, 1860, and in the seventy ninth year of his age, he was fully prepared to say to his aged companion, and to his children, grand-children and great-grand-children, "I am ready—I am ready." He was the father-in-law of Rev. Barnabas Pipkin, of the Mississippi Conference.

D. PIPES.

April 20, 1860.

MRS. LUCY HILL, wife of Isaac Hill, Esq., died April 1st, near Auburn, Ala., of erysipelas, after a week's illness. She was born in 1812 in Twiggs county, Geo., was left an orphan in childhood; was converted in early youth in Jones county, and was married in Monroe county in her 17th year to him who now mourns her loss. In 1837 she moved to Auburn, Ala., where she rests from her labors. Her pious influence led her husband to God, shortly after their marriage, and from thence they became mutual helpers in every good word and work. Sister Hill was one of the most quiet, gentle spirits on earth. Plain and unassuming in her manners, silent and retiring in her habits, only those who knew her intimately were fully aware of the rich fountain of sensibilities in her heart, and of her constant thoughtfulness to do good. The law of kindness was in her tongue, and her joy was, to find and promote in others whatsoever things are lovely and of good report; hence enmity to her was unknown. She was, indeed, "steadfast, immoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord." This inflexibility of purpose to do good and to glorify God was evinced everywhere and at all times; in attendance upon all the ordinances of God's house, and in her delight in religious associations and conversation. She entered fully into the spirit of her husband, and seconded him heartily in extending the largest hospitality, both at home, and in the frequent camp meetings, with special reference to the work of God. It gave her unspeakable pleasure to minister to the wants of preachers; many of whom cherish lively remembrances of her kindness. The college students who boarded at her house, whom she cared for with motherly kindness, and in whose prospective usefulness she took a deep interest, sorrow for her as for kindred. To her servants she was more a mother than a mistress. Her husband, as a strong man bowed with grief, testifies most affectingly his estimate of her character as a wife. Her piety was serene, trusiful, fearless; never exuberant of joy, but always assured of divine favor; it was peace, deepening, and ready to flow quietly away into heaven. Her end was peace, not a doubt nor fear arose to darken her skies. Her patience in all her sufferings was perfect. Her only distress was on account of the anguish of her husband.—She told him, "weep not, for we shall soon meet in heaven." With exhortations to all who were about her—kindred, friends, and servants—to meet her in heaven, she quietly fell asleep in Jesus; and her works do follow her. The respect cherished for our good sister, and the sympathy felt for her bereaved husband, was manifested in one of the most remarkable funeral processions ever seen in Auburn. "The memory of the just shall be had to everlasting remembrance."

E. J. HAMMILL.

Southern Christian Advocate please copy.

W. H. DAVIS, Sen., died at his residence in Clarke county, Ala., of pneumonia, after an illness of four days, in his 54th year. He was born in Marion district, S. C., March 20th, 1806. Removed with his parents to Baldwin county, Ala., in '25; professed religion, and joined the M. E. Church at a camp-meeting near French's chapel, below Suggsville, in Clarke county, in '31; married in '32; removed to Choctaw county in '35; and to the place where he died on Bashi, about '43. The country has lost one of its best citizens; the Church one of its best members. He possessed an even, quiet disposition. His life was one of temperance, fortitude, prudence and justice. As a Christian, he was spiritual and consistent; he had been soundly converted to God. What he conscientiously believed to be his duty he did, regardless of consequences. If he was not as liberal as some in proportion to his means, he was more so than the generality of men in his circumstances; and extended his charity over a wider sphere. While his virtues were admitted by all his acquaintances, much of the strength and nobleness of his character was known only to his most intimate friends. Retiring and modest, he did not go forward for the salvation of others as much as he should. One of the most prominent features in his character was his devotion to his family and friends; being always ready to help the sick and needy. Many a way-worn minister remembers with pleasant emotion the comfortabilities of his house. He was, perhaps, too anxious for his children to rise to honor and distinction; preferring their being useful men and women to their being mere drones upon society. But he never forget to teach them, both by precept and example, to be humble and holy.—He was one of the kindest of husbands; as a master, he was particularly careful about the spiritual welfare of his servants.

He was taken sick on Saturday, after his son Nimrod had died on Friday. When I visited him on Monday, he said there was not a shadow of a doubt of his future felicity; remembered how happy he was a few days before, when Nimrod was dying so triumphantly. I saw him again on Wednesday, but he was dying, and could not speak. About 7 o'clock, P. M., the spirit departed the body, and was carried by angels into Abraham's bosom.

W. H. CARTER.

MRS. ELIZA S. McINTOSH died in great peace at her residence in Franklin parish, La., March 12th, 1860. She was the daughter of William and Elizabeth Powe, formerly of Mississippi; was born Nov. 12th, 1803; and was married to Dr. John McIntosh Nov. 12th, 1839. Early in life she became concerned for the salvation of her soul, and joined the Methodist Church, under the ministry of the Rev. O. L. Nash, then a member of the Ala. Conf. After marriage she joined the Presbyterian Church of which she remained a consistent member till the day of her death. In her were combined all the virtues of the Christian.—She was a devoted wife, a tender mother, a kind mistress and affectionate friend. She was loved and respected by all who knew her. She leaves a husband and four children to mourn her loss; but their loss is her eternal gain.

J. C. PITTS.

MRS. JULIA ANN HENDRICK, wife of Major B. G. Hendrick, died near Columbus, Miss., on the 23rd of November, 1859. She was born in this county, March 2d, 1824. Having been piously raised, she embraced religion early in life, and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, of which she remained an exemplary member till her departure. I have known her from her childhood, and for some years she has been a member of my class, in Columbus. She was an amiable and interesting christian, and endeavored to discharge the duties of her station with fidelity, and I have no doubt death found her prepared for the change. Her death was quite sudden, she was only three days ill. I am informed that she dreamed that she would die during her twenty-fifth year, and often spoke of it to her friends, the dream having been repeated three times in the latter part of the year 1858. This seems to be a remarkable coincidence to say the least of it. She sleeps in Jesus.

GEORGE SHAFFER.

Columbus, Miss., April 18, 1860.

EDUCATIONAL.

DOLHEAR'S COMMERCIAL COLLEGE, OF THE City of New Orleans, founded in 1832—Chartered by the Legislature of Louisiana, with Agricultural and Mechanical Departments—Capital Stock $250,000—In the new and spacious edifice known as FIRMY BUILDING south-east corner of Camp and Common streets, entrance on both streets, open day and evening. Faculty:—

RUFUS DOLHEAR, PRESIDENT.
MATHEMATICAL DEPARTMENT.
GEO. F. BRACKETT, Professor.
BOOK KEEPING DEPARTMENT.
RUFUS DOLHEAR, Lecturer.
J. W. BLACKMAN, Professor.
ENGLISH DEPARTMENT.
HON. J. N. CARRIGAN, A.M., late Supt Education, La.; Prof. and Lecturer on Commercial Law, etc.
and, M. D. MCCARTHEY, Professor.
FRENCH DEPARTMENT.
MASC. ROUX, Professor.
DEPARTMENT FOR PENMANSHIP.
RUFUS DOLHEAR, Lecturer.
J. R. GRIFFITH, Professor.
SPANISH DEPARTMENT.
MANUEL MARINO, Professor.
GERMAN DEPARTMENT.
GEO. GESSNER, Professor.
LATIN AND GREEK DEPARTMENT.
M. MARINO and G. GESSNER, Professors
ITALIAN DEPARTMENT.
RHETORIC, LOGIC, AND ELOCUTION.

This is the only chartered Commercial College in the South-West, and the oldest in the United States, and has stood for

FOR MORE THAN A QUARTER OF A CENTURY

On its own merits alone.

Persons from 12 to 60 years of age, can attend to any branch they may wish.

Board can be had with the Professor, or other good families speaking English, French, Spanish or German, from $5 to $6 per week.

Catalogues with terms, opinions of the press and leading men of the nation, etc., sent to all who desire them.

N. B.—To prevent mistakes or impositions, Students intended for this College should bring this advertisement as special directions, as there are every winter temporary rooms open for a few months, all of course making wonderful pretences and promises, and posting flaming placards to enlighten the people of New Orleans and of the South! When three or more form Clubs and enter at the same time, ten per cent will be deducted from tuition.

☞ Citizens and strangers are invited to visit.

feb1 1y RUFUS COLHEAR, President.

SOULE'S COMMERCIAL COLLEGE, CORNER OF Camp and Common streets, entrance No. 86 Common street,—established in 1858,—open day and evening the entire year.

A full course of instruction in this institution embraces Double Entry Book-Keeping, Commercial Calculation and Commercial Law, and Penmanship. Gentlemen can enter for the full course, or any branch they desire, and at any time, as there is no class system, no copying from books, and no memorizing of arbitrary rules.

Merchants, Book keepers, and young gentlemen wishing instruction, are respectfully requested to call and examine our practical forms and peculiar manner of teaching.

For catalogues containing full information, and Balance sheet Circulars, the most magnificent work of the kind ever executed in the United States, address, GEO. SOULE, New Orleans.

FELICIANA FEMALE INSTITUTE, JACKSON, LA. The exercises of the second term of the scholastic year will commence on the first of March. Pupils entered at any time, and charged from the time of entrance.

Extensive grounds and houses have been added to the premises.

A good library, a new and complete apparatus, a full and competent corps of teachers, comfortable and newly-furnished apartments, afford the best facilities for a thorough education.

BOARD OF TRUSTEES:

WM. H. WATKINS, D D, President.
J. N. EVANS, Secretary.
Prof. W. H. N. MAGRUDER, WM LIPSCOMB,
JOHN W. BURRUSS, Esq., Col. S. S. BRYAN,
F. V. H. HAHAHAN, Esq. Rev. A. G. MILLER
Rev. JOHN C. MILLER, JOHN McKOWEN, Esq
Hon. JOHN McVEA.
5m THOS. W. BROWN, Principal.

PORT GIBSON COLLEGIATE ACADEMY, FOR Young Ladies, resumed its Exercises on the first Monday in Oct. last. A well chosen Faculty will spare no pains or care to make this Institution a pleasant and profitable place for young Lady students.

The buildings are large, well-ventilated, and well furnished. The grounds ample and beautiful.

For information and Circulars, apply to,
Rev. B. JONES, Port Gibson, Miss.

PROFESSIONAL.

JAMES J. HUTCHINSON, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, Livingston, Alabama., will Practice in Sumter and the adjoining counties. [ap24]

DR. E. D. BEACH, HAVING RESUMED THE practice of Medicine, offers his professional services to the citizens of New Orleans.

N. B.—Special attention paid to diseases of the RECTUM, PILES, FISTULA IN ANO, ETC.—Fistula in ano permanently cured without the use of the knife, cautery, galu, or confinement whatever. Office No. 8, Baronne street near Canal. ap27.

J. E. ELAM, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, HAYDEN Rouge.

REFERENCES—Henderson & Haines and Chinn & Bolton, New Orleans; W. S. Pike and A. Mutts..... Baton Rouge.

B. D. & A. W. ROBERTS, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, Floyd, Carroll Parish, Louisiana. ja19

FUQUA & KILBOURNE, ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW, Clinton, Louisiana, practice in the Parishes of East and West Feliciana, and East Baton Rouge.

References—Payne & Harrison, Byrne, Vance & Co., W. and H. Lotchford and Co., Broadwell & Haynes, and Pritchard & Flower, New Orleans. mar 7-1y

W. F. WINANS. J. T. HEATH.

WINANS & HEATH, ATTORNEYS AND COUNsellors at Law, Shreveport, La. Office—Market street. Will practice in the courts of Caddo, De Soto, Bossier, Claiborne, and Reeville.

G. SPENCER MAYO, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, Harrisonburg, La., will practice in the Courts of Catahoula, Concordia, Caldwell and Franklin Parishes.

COMMISSION MERCHANTS.

W. A. BROADWELL. A. F. HAYNES.

BROADWELL & HAYNES, COMMISSION MERchants (formerly Broadwell & Payne), No. 40 Union street N. O.

Having retired from business, I take great pleasure in soliciting for my former Partners, BROADWELL & HAYNES, the patronage and confidence of my friends, believing their experience, capacity and means, will merit its continuance, and enable them to give general satisfaction. [jel] M. U. PAYNE.

W. K. STUART, D. A. JAMES,
New Orleans. Madison Parish, La.

STUART & JAMES, NO. 43 UNION STREET, New Orleans, have associated themselves together for the purpose of conducting a COTTON FACTORAGE & GENERAL COMMISSION BUSINESS; are prepared to make the usual Advances to planters, in the way of supplies, etc., and respectfully solicit patronage

B. M. LOWE & CO., COTTON FACTORS AND General Commission Merchants, No. 97 CRAVIER STREET, New Orleans. ap6

A. H. MAY & CO., COTTON FACTORS AND General Commission Merchants, No 94 Gravier street, New Orleans. ap21y

J. U. PAYNE J. P. HARRISON.
G. W. ADDINGTON. WM. S. CAMERON

PAYNE & HARRISON, COMMISSION MERCHANTS No. 61 Union street, New Orleans. dec7-1y

S. L. WALKER, ROBT. O. CUTCHINSON
New Orleans. Caddo Parish, La.

WALKER & HUTCHINSON, COTTON FACTORS and Commission Merchants, No. 87 Carondelet street, New Orleans. jc28

J. BOYD & CO., COTTON FACTORS, RECEIVING and Forwarding Merchants, No. 4 Union street, New Orleans.

LEONARD FASH P. S. LACHAISE.

LEONARD FASH & CO COMMISSION MERchants, and Dealers in Western Produce, 61 Magazine street, New Orleans. Oct 24.

LANE, SALTER & CO., SUCCESSORS TO LANE, MAYFIELD & Co., Cotton and Sugar Factors and General Commission Merchants, No. 79 St. Charles street, New Orleans. jy6 1y

JOHN F. WYCHE & CO., COTTON FACTORS and Commission Merchants, No 119 Common street, New Orleans.

STONE'S INFIRMARY—Corner of Camp and Claiborne streets, New Orleans. This well-known institution is fully provided with everything necessary for the comfort and convenience of patients.

Separate Buildings have been erected for the accommodation of Negroes.

TERMS, including Medical attention, Nursing, Medicines, &c., $4 to $5 per day for Whites; $1 to $2 per day for Negroes.

Extra charges for surgical cases and operations.

T. G. RICHARDSON, M. D.,
Attending Physician and Surgeon,
WARREN STONE, M. D.,
Consulting Physician and Surgeon.

P. S.—Special accommodations for females affected with Uterine Vaginal Fistula, Prolapsus and other diseases peculiar to the sex. Also for patients with diseases of the eyes.

SPALDING'S PREPARED GLUE.—SAVE THE Pieces! Economy! Dispatch!

☞ "A STITCH IN TIME SAVES NINE."

Accidents will happen, even in well regulated families, it is very desirable to have some cheap and convenient way by repairing Furniture, Toys, Crockery, &c.

SPALDING'S PREPARED GLUE

meets all such emergencies, and no household can afford to be without it. It is always ready, and up to the sticking point. There is no longer a necessity for limping chairs, splintered veneers, headless dolls, and broken cradles. It is just the article for cane, shell, and other ornamental work, so popular with ladies of refinement and taste.

This admirable preparation is used cold, being chemically held in solution, and possessing all the valuable qualities of the best cabinet-makers' glue. It may be used in the place of ordinary mucilage, being vastly more adhesive.

"USEFUL IN EVERY HOUSE"

N. B.—A brush accompanies each bottle. Price 25 cents.

Wholesale Depot, 48 Cedar-street, New York.

Address HENRY C. SPALDING & Co.
Box No. 3,606, New York.

Put up for Dealers in Cases containing four, eight, and twelve dozen—a beautiful Lithographic Show-Card accompanying each package.

☞ A single bottle of SPALDING'S PREPARED GLUE will save ten times its cost annually to every household.

Sold by all prominent Stationers, Druggists, Hardware and Furniture Dealers, Grocery, and Fancy Stores.

Country merchants should make a note of SPALDING'S PREPARED GLUE, when making up their list. It will stand any climate.

jan 25 1y

BIBLE AND TESTAMENTS.—The Largest and most Varied Supply, South. Bound from 30 Cents each to $27 50 each.

Such Family Bibles in costly bindings, also smaller Bibles in Velvet and fancy bindings.

London, Oxford and Cambridge Bibles; Eyre and Spottiswoodes, Bagsters, on hand, and ordered.

Hebrew, Greek, Latin, Syriac, and Arabic Scriptures for Ministers and Students.

For Sunday Schools in Louisiana and Southern Mississippi; Testaments at reduced prices, and Pocket Testaments at half price.

Address,—Agent, S. W. Bible Society, Bible House, 185 Camp street, New Orleans.

MISCELLANEOUS.

NO. 3 CAMP STREET. EUREKA!

SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINES!—FOR PLANTation, Family, and Manufacturers' use.—Prices, $65, $80, $100, $145, $125.

These Machines have no equal; they possess all the latest improvements, the last being November 10th, 1859. Their mechanism is so simple and durable that a child can easily understand and operate them. They work with two threads, using Howe's patent shuttle, making the lock stitch; and presenting the same stitch on both sides of the fabric sewed.—They will run, stitch, hem, fell, bind and gather.

☞ ALL MACHINES WARRANTED ☜

Every variety of Thread, Silk, Needles, and other Fixtures for sale. Principal Southern Salesroom, No. 3 Camp st.

E. L. NIMMO, Agent.

MOORE'S DOUBLE LOCK STITCH FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. Until of recent date all low priced Sewing Machines were considered worthless; but the Moore Machine is a practicable demonstration that a reliable Machine for all kinds of Family and Plantation Sewing can be retailed at the low price of "Thirty-five Dollars." It sews from two spools just as they are brought from the Store, without re-winding. It works equally well on Osnaburgs, Cassimeres, Linen, and Muslin. It gathers, hems, tucks, braids and stitches equal to any Machine now sold. It makes a strong, elastic and durable stitch; that will not rip though you cut every fourth stitch. It is easy to operate, runs rapidly and quietly, and is as little liable to get out of order as any Machine now extant. It is a neat piece of furniture, as well as a useful implement.

The undersigned being the exclusive owners of the right to make, vend and use said machines in the State of Louisiana, are now having them manufactured for sale, and want Agents in every Parish in the State, and will allow remunerative commissions

One of us will travel through the State this Spring; those wishing an interest in the business will address us at Orillia, Georgia, until 1st May, after that time at New Orleans, until 1st June.

Clubs of Six desiring to purchase at the Factory can have them for $175.

JOHNSON & CO.

F. W. RADERLY.
C. H. JOHNSON.

CUDDY, BROWN & CO.—HAVING CLOSED THE office of MILES OWEN & CO., 106 first day

NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY A COMMITTEE OF MINISTERS FOR THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH---C. C. GILLESPIE, EDITOR.

VOLUME X.—NUMBER 19. WHOLE NUMBER 483.

NEW ORLEANS, WEDNESDAY, MAY 9, 1860.

$2 00 A YEAR, IN ADVANCE. OFFICE—113 CAMP ST.

LETTERS FROM CUBA.—NO. V.

HAVANA, March 27th, 1860.

I have already said so much in disparagement of the rational volante, that the reader will be surprised, doubtless, when I affirm that it is the most delightful carriage in the world. The gentle motion to which the occupant is subjected is altogether unlike anything else; unless, it may be, the soft undulations of a swinging hammock. Uncouth, and uncomfortable as they appear to the eye, you have only to take a seat in one of them, brace your feet against the dasher, give your orders to the complaisant calesero, and resign yourself to a dreamy, pleasant rocking over the strong pavement, to realize why these lazy Cubans love the volante. If you wish to see the city to good advantage you have only to choose the cool afternoon for a ride, and strike the bargain in advance with the driver, (a necessary precaution, unless you like to pay exorbitant after-charges.) A few minutes travel will take you up the Calle del Obrapia, to the Puerta de Monserrate, where you join a caravan of volantes, filled, mostly, with Cuban belles, always two, and often three on a seat, without bonnets, for these are unknown here, at least among the natives. If it is early in the afternoon, a long veil is worn upon the head as a protection from the sun, but thrown aside toward sunset, and the beautiful senoras and senoritas appear with heads uncovered, a single rose, perhaps, or a wreath of gay flowers garlanding their jet black hair, beneath which their large, lustrous eyes beam upon you with dazzling power. The gaudy fan, an instrument of warfare, offensive and defensive, with which a thousand telegraphic signals are conveyed to those about them, seems to employ the otherwise unoccupied hands, and the sweetest of languages, from the most beautiful of voices, delights the ear of the stranger, even if he be too far off to distinguish the words that are spoken. Stop your calesero, if you please, at some convenient angle of the Paseo del Isabel 2d, and listen to this spoken music. Like the soft low murmuring of a distant waterfall, or the merry music of a rivulet, journeying over its bed of pebbles, the dulcet strains of Castilian speech strikes your ear, and you are startled from the reverie into which you necessarily fall to the sudden explosion of an English sentence, falling with a splash in the great water of a glassy lake. True, those harsh, English notes take you back again to the land and friends left behind you, but the removal is a rude one, and you are glad when the lordly Americans have passed out of hearing with his friend, and left you to enjoy the Spanish music again from the lips of the fair ones who are streaming by. And now, if you look a few pieces to your right, you will see a trio of belles, who have stopped their volante, and are calling some one over the way. They do not, of course, speak a word, but yet they are talking to a friend, who patiently endures a blockade on the opposite side of the street—talking with their fans, and all going through the pantomime at once. The little blonde with the white rose in her hair has opened her fan, and shut it violently two or three times—do you understand the meaning of that? Well, she has been talking to the opposite fan, and is displeased with something it has said to her. You can see that by the gentle pouting of the rosy lips, and the head slightly thrown back, arching the beautiful neck with indignation. The senorita on her right has just elevated her fan high enough to permit her dark eyes to peep over the border, and now she gently waves it to the right, and lets it fall upon her lap. You do not understand this signal, but that fine looking young Don, who is leaning over the front of his volante, and pointing up the street, comprehends it perfectly—and if you take your stand this evening at the main entrance of the Teatro de Tacon, you will see him there looking anxiously for something which he finds after a while, and leads our fair friend up the steps of the Theatre to a box in the Spanish opera. All this is very mysterious to you, for not a word has been spoken. Meanwhile, the third fan has been very busy with some one on the left; it has described a dozen arcs, and as many angles—has touched the lips ever and anon—and now resigning its office of interpreter, is vigorously plied about its natural business, cooling the fair features of its owner. And while you are looking at these manœuvres, it suddenly occurs to you that it is not exactly courteous to watch these ladies so closely, although they do not seem to be conscious of your existence, and you look off somewhere else. In a convenient angle of the Paseo del Isabel 2d, and listen to this spoken music. Like the soft low murmuring of a distant waterfall, or the merry music of a rivulet, journeying over its bed of pebbles, the dulcet strains of Castilian speech strikes your ear, and you are startled from the reverie into which you necessarily fall to the sudden explosion of an English sentence, falling with a splash in the great water of a glassy lake. True, those harsh, English notes take you back again to the land and friends left behind you, but the removal is a rude one, and you are glad when the lordly Americans have passed out of hearing with his friend, and left you to enjoy the Spanish music again from the lips of the fair ones who are streaming by. And now, if you look a few pieces to your right, you will see a trio of belles, who have stopped their volante, and are calling some one over the way. They do not, of course, speak a word, but yet they are talking to a friend, who patiently endures a blockade on the opposite side of the street—talking with their fans, and all going through the pantomime at once. The little blonde with the white rose in her hair has opened her fan, and shut it violently two or three times—do you understand the meaning of that? Well, she has been talking to the opposite fan, and is displeased with something it has said to her. You can see that by the gentle pouting of the rosy lips, and the head slightly thrown back, arching the beautiful neck with indignation. The senorita on her right has just elevated her fan high enough to permit her dark eyes to peep over the border, and now she gently waves it to the right, and lets it fall upon her lap. You do not understand this signal, but that fine looking young Don, who is leaning over the front of his volante, and pointing up the street, comprehends it perfectly—and if you take your stand this evening at the main entrance of the Teatro de Tacon, you will see him there looking anxiously for something which he finds after a while, and leads our fair friend up the steps of the Theatre to a box in the Spanish opera. All this is very mysterious to you, for not a word has been spoken. Meanwhile, the third fan has been very busy with some one on the left; it has described a dozen arcs, and as many angles—has touched the lips ever and anon—and now resigning its office of interpreter, is vigorously plied about its natural business, cooling the fair features of its owner. And while you are looking at these manœuvres, it suddenly occurs to you that it is not exactly courteous to watch these ladies so closely, although they do not seem to be conscious of your existence, and you look off somewhere else. In

New Orleans Christian Advocate.

Terms—$2 00 per annum, in advance.

NEW ORLEANS:

WEDNESDAY, MAY 9, 1860.

ONLY $1 25 FROM 1st MAY.

From the first of May till the end of the year, the price of the Advocate will be only $1 25. We suggest to our Agents and friends to make a unanimous and vigorous effort to send us a thousand subscribers to commence with that issue. Make a special push for it, brethren, if you please.

THE RELIGIOUS DODGE IN POLITICS.

While the friends of the Constitution, the Union, and the rights of the South—for they are synonymous—may be uneasy about the dissensions in the recent Convention at Charleston, it may help somewhat to console them to observe the seeds of dissension among the enemies of the country. Mr. Seward, the embodiment and oracle of the "irrepressible conflict," which, according to him, must wage until slavery is overthrown, is thought by leading Black Republicans to be unavailable. The John Brown raid, and its reactionary influence, has made them cautious. The New York Tribune, the bitterest and most influential abolition sheet in the Union, and which avows the overthrow of slavery as its aim, says Seward will not do "just yet;" actually proposing publicly to belie its principles for the sake of success, and intimating that when they have once got the power, the Republicans will do as they please. Bates, of Missouri, or Chase, of Ohio, will do for the present.

The C. Adv. & Journal, whose editor incautiously, before the John Brown raid, declared himself a "Republican," now ignores that party, and recommends, on Christian grounds, Judge McLean for the Presidency, and says he would be supported by the majority of Christian people, South as well as North! That is decidedly—wealthy—reversing, very. We have been waiting to see what the New York Independent, Beecher's paper, had to say to Dr. Stevens' nomination. The former having preferred rifles to Bibles in Kansas, and the latter having consecrated his paper to that party which went to seed in John Brown, it was certainly appropriate that they should unite in the nomination of a candidate as a Christian platform. The Independent at last comes out, condemns the shirking policy of the Tribune, insists on a "square" candidate of the "irrepressible" stamp, to be placed on a Christian platform, (that is, the religious fanaticism against slavery,) but does not name a man.

The South, and the conservative people of the Union generally, will certainly not forget what sort of "Christianity" is proposed as the platform of these Christian political leaders. We have seen it exemplified in John Brown's faith, and in the religious addresses all over the North, on the occasion of his funeral. Both these sheets intimate that the Chicago Convention had better remember the availableness of the religious dodge. They have recently been quickened in their perceptions on this subject by the notorious, undeniable corruption, thieving, and general rascality of the New York Republican Legislators.

The people of this country will not be deceived by this religious movement. Judge McLean is a Black Republican, an official dissentient from the majority of his co-Judges on the United States Supreme Bench from the Dred Scott decision, which judicially settled the supremacy of the white race. This is the religion that pleases the Christian Advocate and Journal.

No. Much as we desire to see Christian character and life exemplified in high places, we are more afraid of "spiritual wickedness in high places" than anything else.—Running a candidate on a Christian platform is a humbug too transparent to deceive any body but Dr. Stevens. The only way for Christian influence to prevail in the politics of this country, is for Christian men, in Christian spirit, and with Christian devotion to the Constitution, to do all they can, in a regular manner, to maintain in their party platforms, sound political principles, and to have good and true men nominated and elected to represent those principles. We want no separation of Christian men from the political parties in this country, and we are not going to have it. We want them in the parties, to do their duty to their country. Their neglect has helped to bring the country to its present state. But, to ignore political principles, and run a man on a professedly Christian platform; or to profess a Christian platform merely to foist a party candidate on the country who could not be elected otherwise; is the way to get Christian people to vote against him. Not a single Southern Christian worthy the name will vote for Judge McLean, if nominated. The most unfortunate thing for him is the fact that he is nominated by a religious sheet, on a professedly religious platform. Should he now receive the nomination of the Chicago Convention, he could never recover from the prejudice thus created. Of all dodges, the religious dodge is the meanest, especially in the estimation of the people of this country.

DEATH OF REV. BENJAMIN M. DRAKE, D.D.

We are in receipt of a telegraphic dispatch, dated Natchez, Miss., May 8th, from Rev. Wm. H. Watkins, D. D., which says: "Bro. Drake died this morning of disease of the heart." We cannot express our surprise and sorrow. Though an old man, between sixty and seventy we suppose, Dr. Drake showed but little of the feebleness of age, and seemed in the habitual enjoyment of excellent health. We have none of the particulars of his death. It must have been sudden, as we had not heard anything of his being in ill health. That he died in peace, we have not a doubt. His life has been uniformly devout and pious, and of late years he seemed unusually devotional and spiritual. This was particularly marked at the late session of the Mississippi Conference, where, in the absence of the Bishop, he was called to preside. It was, to him, an unusually trying session, but his impartiality, dignity, and Christian spirit, called forth general admiration. His brethren, then, little dreamed that they should see his face no more in their annual assemblies.

Mississippi is rapidly losing her old and strong men. Dr. Winans, a prince in Israel, departed some years since. Lane, Cooper, Fly, and Rodgers are also gone. During the present year, Dr. Light, a noble man and eloquent preacher, also died, full of years and honors. Dr. Thornton, a learned and pious man, and an eloquent preacher, soon followed him. Their brethren who were well acquainted with their histories should see that appropriate biographical sketches of them should be published.

Dr. Drake served the Church long, faithfully, and devotedly. He was a most admirable specimen of the Methodist preachers of the early times. Simple, refined, and courteous in private life, and dignified, spiritual, and solemnly reverent in the pulpit, he was an excellent model for our younger men in the ministry. As a Christian gentleman and devoted clergyman, he was a happy example, and the love and admiration of him, wherever he was known, were seldom surpassed. He was a man of solid and earnest character, and of fixed principles and unswerving purposes. His manners were gentle, his form noble, his voice fine, his style chaste and fluent, and his whole bearing elegant, commanding, and impressive. He was an able and eloquent minister of the New Testament.

Dr. Drake was among the Christian pioneers in New Orleans and the Southwest. He was preparing, for our columns, a history of his early career, and of the Church in this city and the Southwest. But he is cut off, and we know not whether the sketches are completed, or whether another hand can supply them, if not. The whole Church will mourn his loss. His name is identified with her history, and has done her honor.

CHURCH BUILDINGS.

A telling paragraph, says the Nashville Advocate, contributed to this paper some time ago, by Dr. L. Pierce, has gone the rounds of the Church papers. The last time we saw it, it was doing service in a Presbyterian paper in the North-west. May it enlarge and improve many a projected tabernacle! Here it is:

CHURCH BUILDINGS.—I am now an old man, having been a travelling preacher fifty-five years; and being familiar with the common history of the country, I am fully posted on all general issues, and can affirm that I do not know a single settlement where the people have improved from truck patches to plantations, and from log-cabins to celled mansions, and yet have left the ark of God to dwell in its humble tent, or to be less figurative, have continued to meet, for purposes of worship, in the old meeting-house built in the days of their poverty, but left now as their monument of Divine respect, long after they had honored themselves with stately dwellings. I do not know such a settlement, I say, where religion and religious influence are not wanting. In some of them it is utterly paralyzed, showing very clearly that to neglect to build God's temples of praise and worship, is moral delinquency."

The multiplication of Churches is not an unmitigated good. In many parts of the country we have too many of them. If two or three were thrown together, there might be one decent and commodious house, and one large inspiring, and influential congregation, where now there are mere nominal appointments. This would make public worship imposing, pleasant, and edifying; it would be an economy in preaching labor, and in Church expenses.

Strange as it may seem, some neighborhood and individual Church enterprises ought to be discouraged, resisted. A new house of worship does not strengthen the cause, if it splits up one healthy congregation and Sabbath-school into two dispirited and starving sections. Neighborhood and family feuds should not be allowed to build to themselves monuments, under the name of churches, and devolve upon others the labor of supplying them with service. Ride a little further, good brother, and meet a large congregation, rather than walk over to the meeting-house at the corner of your field, to meet a few souls and hear a sermon to empty benches.

If the zeal of the people is up, and their benevolence flush, perhaps it cannot be better directed than to pulling down the old spiritual barns, and building new and better. Concentration must not be lost sight of in expansion.

The people called Methodists are now suffering greatly for the want of good churches. The Methodists are losing their children. They do not attach them to their altars by the gratification of that æsthetic taste which Christian education has created. At home they walk on clean carpets, in ample halls. At church, every taste of propriety is offended: windows dirty, ragged; a few strips of greasy carpeting on the aisles; seats covered with dust, stiff, uncomfortable; and all the architectures cheap, ill-arranged, unseeming. The humble piety of the old folks may reign itself to this state of things; but the young will be drawn easily away, and they will take influence and money away with them, that might be usefully expended among us. Our cheap churches are really proving very dear ones.

There is another feature of this subject we will touch upon, now it is up. By their organization and movement, Methodists are very early on the ground of new settlements. They are generally first to build a church; and one reason of this is because their ideas of a church building are easily satisfied. A few pieces of plank end scantling do the business, and it is said we have a church in such or such a growing town. Has the reader ever remarked how almost uniformly this making haste to build any sort of a house operates against us? The place improves, population gathers, moral influence centers there, and more church accommodation is called for.—What denomination is to get the benefit of these increased and ripened resources? Not the Methodists; for it is said they have a church already. Yes, they have something that passes for one, in the outskirts, perhaps, and they rest on this. The elders or deacons or vestrymen of some other denomination come in at this choice opportunity, gather the united subscriptions, select an eligible spot, and build a house that the community take pride in; and their Church is henceforth firmly established there, and dominant. The Methodists by having the advantage have lost it. Why? Because they did not use it well.

Get ample ground and eligible, and never part with any of it. Lay off a large plan for your house. Put the roof on: go into the basement: leave something for posterity to do; and when able, finish it. When finished, it will be worth having, and equal to its demands.

Verily, the Methodists must change their policy in building churches.

THE MARQUIS ROBERTO D'AZEGLIO ON THE INFLUENCE OF THE BIBLE.

One of the most remarkable signs of the times is the growing sense among political men of high standing of the influence on society of pure religion, both for the cultivation of morals, and for the advancement of civil liberty. The following passage occurs in a pamphlet recently written by the Marquis Roberto D'Azeglio, brother of the well known Marquis Masimo D'Azeglio, formerly Prime Minister in Sardinia:—

"As the most ordinary intelligence is able to judge whether the ruler of a people—whatever may be his title—governs justly or unjustly, it naturally follows that every man who can read the Bible is able to decide who among crowned heads, whether that head be encircled by a tiara or a diadem, are or are not followers of Christ's gospel: who among them protect, and who persecute truth and justice; and who are those who suffer for justice sake,—the people that ask for it or the princes that refuse it.

"The progress of public instruction reveals now-a-days to the many that knowledge which was formerly only the privilege of the few. The translated pages of the gospel may now be found in the garret and in the workshop, and the man of the people reads in it the condemnation of those who disobey its commands, and himself pronounces sentence against them. And what will that sentence be, when marking the acts of certain modern apostles, and contemplating their worldliness and pride, their ostentatious observance of the outward ceremonies of worship, and their continual neglect of justice and charity, he finds in the Gospel of St. Matthew, "Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye pay tithes of mint, and anise, and cummin, and have omitted the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and faith;" and in the Gospel of St. Mark, "To love God with all thine heart, and thy neighbor as thyself, is more than all whole burnt offerings and sacrifices?" When, looking around him, he sees on the one side the rich vestments, the banners, the wax candles, the loud music of the temple, the priestly pomp; on the other, arbitrary sentences, insolence, waste, political wrongs, political vengeance. What will that reader of the gospel say, when he notes the humble poverty of those ancient apostles who, meek, and without any outward distinction, followed with naked feet Him who had not where to lay his head; Him who said to his disciples, "Provide neither gold nor silver nor brass in your purses;" and again, "Whichever would be first among you, let him be the servant of all;" Him who condemned the Pharisees because they walked abroad in the market-place and had the highest seats at marriage feasts: and then observe the modern apostles of the Church, who, clothed in purple, surrounded with luxury, covered with military orders, are driven in carriages through the streets of the Eternal City, while the humble fisherman of Galilee, followed by a princely retinue, betakes himself to St. Peter's in the middle of a double file of Pontifical dragoons, destined to protect the shepherd against his own flock?"

These are familiar and household words with us, but they are new and strange words in Italy—nothing is more certain than that the Papal power is engaged in a contest for life or death. The Romish power must suppress the Bible or "Babylon" will be "overthrown."

OBITUARIES.

Obituaries should be brief, containing only essential and interesting facts; avoiding moralizing reflections; eschewing all attempts at fine writing; leaving prayers out of the paper, but offering them up for the afflicted; leaving scripture, hymns and poetry to be quoted in the funeral discourse. They should be modest, avoiding all extravagant and fulsome eulogy. Except in remarkable, or well known cases, they are read only by the friends of the deceased; and most of these are already much better acquainted, by personal observation, or by letter, with the facts than they can possibly become by the published obituary. What is the use to say "departed this life," instead of "died"—"the twenty-ninth day of April, at twenty minutes past three o'clock, in the year of our Lord 1860, in the afternoon, at his residence in the county of Pontotoc, State of Mississippi," instead of "April 29, 1860, in Pontotoc Co., Miss.," and so on? Why picture "the blood-washed throng," or moralize on "the uncertainty of life," in an obituary? Give the facts, in ten lines, and quit. We shall not publish these long, rambling, sentimental, pathetic, ambitious obituaries, to a certainty. We shall trim off all but the facts.—Writers of obituaries, remembering this, will save themselves the trouble of writing, and us the trouble of curtailing, such objectionable ones as we describe. Fortunately most of those sent us are short and well written. A few, however, are otherwise.

POLITICAL INTELLIGENCE IN THE ADVOCATE.

The current political affairs of this country and Europe possess unusual interest to all classes of readers. In this country, sectional fanaticism has never before been so intense, nor of such formidable and threatening proportions; nor has constitutional conservatism ever been roused to such a determined effort for the rights and union of the States. In Europe it seems that the last great battle is being fought between constitutionalism and absolutism, between freedom of conscience and priestly tyranny. The temporal power of the Pope seems tottering to its fall, and, with it, the other most unscriptural, absurd dogmas of the Roman Church—the Infallibility of the Pope, the Immaculate Conception, the denial of the Scriptures to the people. The affairs of Japan, China, and India, also, begin to assume unusual importance, and to take their place in the regular political news of the day. In view of all these facts the Advocate will regularly convey to its readers all the important political news of the time, without, however, engaging in the discussion of the party questions, proper, of this country.

"HIRAM MATTISON."

Although we oppose the platform of Northern Methodism on the subject of slavery, as represented by all parties; although we believe the ultra abolition party, who favor a change of the Rule so as to absolutely forbid all slave-holding, as more logically consistent than the so-called conservative party—who are governed by expediency and not by principle; and although we believe that the doctrine on slavery now existing in their Discipline, and generally prevalent among the most moderate Northern Methodists, to be the legitimate root of most of the ecclesiastical and political fanaticism of the North; yet we are rejoiced that Hiram Mattison, the author of the "Impending Crisis of 1860," and the real conductor of the vile and filthy "Northern Independent," is repudiated in his own (Black River) Conference—neither he nor any of the party having been elected to the General Conference. Of all the little, mean, disgraceful, abominable utterances that ever libeled the Christian name, his have been the worst we have ever seen. A more arrant hypocrite never existed, from Judas to Uriah Heep. The countenance he, and such as he, have heretofore obtained in the North has done more to puzzle us in making an aggregate estimate of Northern character than any thing else. We do not speak of his opinions, but of his spirit and character. We wish our Northern friends joy at his official decapitation.

ABRIDGED DEBATES OF CONGRESS.

This great work, which is now being issued by the Appletons, is by the late Senator Benton, author of the "Thirty Years' View" of the United States Senate, and embraces the political history of the country from 1789 to 1856. It is to be in fifteen large volumes, and substantially gotten up in good paper and library binding. It is the greatest work of political reference that ever has been, or ever can be published in this country. The official history of every political sentiment known to the halls of Congress, of every principle rejected from, or incorporated into the settled policy of the country, is herein set forth. Also, here may be found every principal measure brought before Congress, with the substance of all the leading speeches, for or against. There is nothing superfluous, for it is rigidly condensed; nothing defective, for all that is relevant and important is retained; nothing partial, for the record is scrupulously followed. It is the great American political text-book.

"AT HOME."

Amid the many improvements going on all over the city, in the way of square block street pavements, splendid new houses, and numerous smaller buildings, we take great pleasure in noticing the fine iron front building soon to go up on the square fronting the Advocate office, fronting also on La Fayette square. The excavations for the foundations are now being made. Our predecessor, Dr. McTyeire, will hardly know the place the next time he visits his old sanctum. Our own office, indeed all the house, is now beautifully painted; and, before long, we trust we shall have a pleasant, well-furnished reading-room, for the comfort and accommodation of our friends everywhere, "and the rest of mankind," where they may meet each other and enjoy themselves, when they visit the city. Those proposed improvements about the Publishing House, at Nashville, ought to be made. Give the workers comfortable offices, and the "concern" an imposing front.

ONE GOOD RESULT.

Last fall a "Young Men's Methodist Union" was formed in St. Louis, which was regarded as a sort of denominational substitute for the Young Men's Christian Association, and characterized as "sectarian." From a recent report we extract a passage which indicates the valuable influence of the movement in at least one direction:

"The fact needs no proof, when it is asserted that this organization has been attended with the most desirable results in the way of fraternizing the young men of the Methodist Church in St. Louis. A year ago, few of us were acquainted with our brethren outside of our own churches; and even among them the circle of our acquaintance was extremely limited. Now, we mutually recognize each other, though from the most distant parts of the city. This is certainly the accomplishment of at least one of the objects of our enterprise."

FORMS OF PRAYER.—The Christian Union says: "Much is said against 'forms of prayer,' such, for example, as those of the Episcopal service; and we do not say a word in their favor, as forms, beautiful as they be. But do we not hear in extempore prayers the same words uttered by the same persons, time after time? Are not forms actually adopted and retained by those very objectors?" The comparative merit of written and unwritten forms of prayer, then, is a proper subject of discussion, though it is confessed that both are wrong.

LETTER FROM NASHVILLE.

MR. EDITOR: The Missionary Board convened here on the 16th. All the Bishops were in attendance excepting Bishops Kavanaugh and Pierce. Bishop Soule has met daily with the board; his frame trembles with age, but he is still clear, and unabated in the vigor of his intellect, and he is more than willing to attempt an Episcopal jaunt to California.

The missionary field is demanding more money and men. China, Japan, Kansas, the Rio Grande, Central America, and the Pacific coast, are all pressing their claims upon the benevolence of the Church. It is difficult to resist any one of them; yet the Treasury of the Board has a bottom, alas, easily reached. The vessels are more than the oil, and the Church has lost the widow's cruse.

The report of the monies raised sounds as if there were enough and to spare; for we report ourselves to have raised in the several Conferences of the Church, $234,142 for missions; and, solemnly enough, so answer the question, "How much has been raised for missions?" But with all this solemnity the General Treasurers never handle, in all, more than $130,000, and find it hard work to raise money enough to meet the annual appropriations which this year are, in round numbers, $167,000. The difference consists of missionary "chips and whetstones" called "collections"—money paid by Colonel Smith to the brother who preaches to the colored part of the Colonel's large family. The race between the Conferences for the missionary flag is so sharp that the Col.'s colored contributions come into good play and figure largely when the Treasurer reads the report before two thousand people at the Annual Conference. This game is very pleasant to those who play it, but is a very expensive one to the missionary cause, and a very unpleasant one to the Treasurers, who, though out of the excitement, have to pay the drafts.

Still, it must be allowed that emulation has done a good deal for the Treasury. The only complaint is, that by our present method of reporting, we do not know actually what we are doing; nor is it fairly shown what the Conferences are comparatively doing. One Conference gives preaching to a large body of the colored population in its bounds, and besides that contributes to the cause of missions, say $5000. Another Conference gives about the same amount of preaching to its colored population, but counts every cent expended in that way, say $6000, as missionary money; and gives nothing beyond what she consumes herself. Yet, the latter is the Flowery Flag Missionary Conference. To correct misapprehension, the Board has ordered that hereafter the answer to the usual question, "How much," etc., shall be answered in two ways: first, the amount raised for missions, but consumed before reaching Conference; second, the amount of cash raised and paid into the hands of the Conference Missionary Treasurer. This two-column style of report will enable us to see at a glance what each Conference is comparatively doing for missions. Of all this the worthy missionary Secretary will doubtless give official notice in the exact words of the Board.

However, whether we have given more than our neighbors or less, it is quite certain that if we would sustain the credit of our Treasurer, and strengthen the hands of our missionaries, it is now absolutely necessary that we give largely over the contributions of last year. The Board have apportioned to the several Conferences the amount required to meet the actual appropriations for 1860, to wit: Missouri, $1000; Alabama, $10,000; Mississippi, $15,000; Louisiana, $10,000; Virginia, $23,000; Kansas, $1,000; South Carolina, $30,000; Tennessee, $10,000; Kentucky, $4,000; Western Virginia, $1,500; Holston, $4,000; Florida, $4,000; Louisville, $6,000; North Carolina, $12,000; Memphis, $14,000; Indian Mission, $1,300, Arkansas, $3,000; Georgia, $28,000; Ouachita, $7,000; St. Louis, $7,000; Texas, $10,000; East Texas, $7,000; Rio Grande, $4,000; Pacific, $2,000. Making in all, $247,800.

The Board have determined upon occupying as new fields, Soo Chow in China, and several points in Central America. One of the missionaries who offered for Japan, having felt the handles of the plough, has gone back; the other is perfecting himself for that most responsible enterprise of love. Shall the Church be behind the world in daring? Cannot the love of souls fire up the hearts of the young men of our Zion, full as much as the love of gold inflames the spirit of the children of the world? The spirit of adventure is exploring the hot wastes and tangled forests of Africa and South America—"why stand ye here all the day idle?" The very genius of our race and of this day demands a difficult undertaking, one which will call forth all the powers of the intellect and tax all the capacity of the body for endurance. The dangers of a frontier life had in them a charm which led our fathers to the speedy conquest of the whole West. So the obstacles which the language and superstitions and prejudices of the Eastern world present to the Church of God in America, should but invite to a larger and firmer purpose, to "go up" and possess itself of that goodly land of which the Lord has said that He will give it to His Son.

J. C. KEENEN.

Nashville, April 23d, 1860.

AN AMERICAN CARDINAL.

The following is from a New York letter-writer, who is thoroughly unreliable, and our readers are, therefore, at liberty to judge of the item as they please:

Archbishop Hughes will be made a Cardinal in October, 1860. He will be the first American Cardinal. Had Bishop England, of South Carolina, lived, he would have been a Cardinal. In making Archbishop Hughes a Cardinal, the Pope is actuated by motives that lie deep in his bosom. It is seriously whispered that if he is deprived of political power at Rome, he will wipe from his sandals the dust of that city, and remove the Holy See to some place in the West—say St. Louis, Missouri—where his agents are said to have secured immense quantities of land. The Pope may not live to carry out the plan; hence he wishes a successor who has energy, genius, will, and knowledge of the new continent. That successor he has determined shall be Archbishop Hughes. To become Pope he must first become Cardinal; and this will be accomplished this year.

RENOUNCING MASONIC OATHS.

Of Mr. Lanergan, who recently died at East Cambridge, Massachusetts, from the effects of wounds caused by the explosion of a gun, the Boston Journal says:—

"Although a prominent member of the Masonic Order, which incapacitates a man from being a strict Roman Catholic, he was still a devoted follower of the Church of Rome, and on the day of the accident, in the absence of Father Brannigan, of East Cambridge, sent for Father Hamilton, of Charlestown, who administered to him the sacrament. Before the performance of this ceremony, however, Mr. Lanergan renounced the oaths which bound him to the Masonic order, as under no other circumstances would the priest receive his confession."

It is not generally known, but it is a fact, that the Papal Church is in uncompromising hostility with Masonry. The priests wish no secrets but among themselves; the confessional discloses all others to them. There are however thousands of Masons in the Church, who regard more their personal rights in such matters than the dictation of ecclesiastics.

STATUES IN NEW ORLEANS.—In addition to the statue of Jackson, in Jackson-square, and that of Clay, in Canal-street, it is proposed to erect, at different points in Canal-street, statues of Jefferson and Robert Fulton. A statue of Washington is proposed in Washington-square.

BLACK REPUBLICAN AGGRESSION.—The Black Republican propagandists, the patrons of John Brown, tried to hold a convention in Baltimore, and were driven off. Kentucky and Virginia also spue them out. St. Louis, Missouri, tolerates them.

LITERARY NOTICES.

THE VOYAGE OF THE FOX IN THE ARCTIC SEAS. A Narrative of the Fate of Sir John Franklin and his Companions. By Capt. M'Clintock, R. N., L. L. D. With Maps and Illustrations. Boston: Ticknor and Fields. 1860.

We have received this book through Mr. S. Colman, who is agent for it, and, as our readers are aware, who is also agent for the New American Cyclopædia, and for Benton's Debates in Congress—the two celebrated works now being published by the Appletons. Our readers are already aware, through the newspapers, of the success of Capt. M'Clintock's expedition to discover the fate of Sir John Franklin. Here we have a full account of it. In view of the interest of the whole world in the fate of the brave but unfortunate navigator, the heroic fidelity and persistence of his noble wife, and the determination yet to discover the open polar sea, no book of the times will be read with more interest.

STORIES OF INVENTORS AND DISCOVERERS in Science and the Useful Arts. A book for old and young. By John Timbs, F. S. A. With Illustrations. New York: Harper & Brothers, Publishers, Franklin-square. 1860. For sale in New Orleans by Thos. L. White, 105 Canal street.

This is a little history of material civilization, for the history of scientific and useful discovery is well nigh the history of the material development of the world. The interest, apart from the value of the book, consists in the knowledge it gives us of the inventors and discoverers themselves. Many of the useful arts of the present day are associated with individual histories curious enough. Some of the narratives embrace all the ages, from Archimedes to Brunel. It is a book full of curious, interesting and instructive knowledge.

THE STORY OF A POCKET BIBLE. A Book for all Classes of Readers. Ten illustrations. New York: Carlton & Porter.

The title of this book reminds us of that charming little story, the "History of a Contribution Box," which we read somewhere many years ago. This is a story with the Bible, personified, as the hero. The hero speaks autobiographically, in the first person, and tells of his various possessors, the way he was treated, and what he saw and heard, in the most charming manner. No fiction could be more attractive, and no sermon more spiritual.

NEW ORLEANS MEDICAL AND SURGICAL JOURNAL for May. Published every alternate Month. Managing Editor, Bennett Dowler, M.D.; co-editors, Warren Stone M.D., James Jones, M.D., S. E. Chaille, M.D., W. C. Nichols, M.D. The two last named gentlemen are the proprietors. To the present number, the following writers contribute: Dr. Warren Stone, Dr. S. C. Young, Dr. Wm. Woodward, Dr. R. W. Gibbs, Dr. Nathan Bozeman, Dr. Bennett Dowler, Dr. Humphry Peake. Dr. Stone is well known as one of the most skilful physicians and surgeons of the time, but it is probably not so well known that he is also an excellent writer. His style is remarkable for transparency, perspicuity, and strength. The leading paper, on Mania a Potu, in this number, is from his pen. The editors are all connected with the medical department of the University of Louisiana, and the Charity Hospital, among the best medical institutions in the world, and we doubt if there is a better medical journal than the one they conduct.

THE CAXTONS: A FAMILY PICTURE. By Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton, Bart. Library Edition. New York: Harper & Brothers, Publishers, Franklin Square. 1860. For sale in New Orleans by Thos. L. White, 105 Canal Street.

Bulwer, Dickens, and Thackeray are considered, by common consent of the critical world, as the three greatest living English writers of fiction. Dickens culminated in David Copperfield, and Thackeray in Pendennis.—The Caxtons, we believe, is considered to be Bulwer's greatest work, though some prefer a later work, "My Novel." Bulwer, as a writer, has always been a growing man, both intellectually and morally. His genius ascends with his age, and his later works are sound in their moral tendencies.

THE PIONEERS, PREACHERS AND PEOPLE OF THE MISSISSIPPI VALLEY. By William Henry Milburn, author of "The Rifle, Axe and Saddle-Bags," and "Ten Years of Preacher Life." New York: Derby and Jackson.—1860. For sale in New Orleans by J. C. Morgan & Co., Exchange Place, and also at all the Methodist Depositories.

It treats of "De Soto"—"Marquette and La Salle"—"The French in Illinois"—"The Red Men and the War of Pontiac"—"The Cabin Homes of the Wilderness at the beginning of the Revolution"—The Cabin Homes of the Wilderness during the American Revolution"—"Sketches of Character and Adventure in the West, to the Failure of Burr's expedition, 1806"—"Manna in the Wilderness; or, the Old Preachers and their Preaching"—"Western Mind; its Manifestations, Eloquence, and Humor"—"The Great Valley; its Past, its Present and its Future." There are ten lectures. Mr. Milburn's books, this one particularly, are among the most valuable of the time. First, they have the readableness and charm of the novel. This is essential. The masses of the American people are being educated by reading, and books must be readable to reach them. Second, they have the value, to a considerable extent, of the essay, of history, of biography, and of the most popular and beneficial forms of religious literature. The field to which Mr. Milburn has principally directed his attention, the Great West, is inexhaustibly rich. We are glad to see some of its treasures brought forth by those who know where they lie hidden, before they are lost. The book is in Mr. Milburn's best style, and will be universally read.

THE THREE PINES. Harper & Brothers, Publishers. For sale at White's, 105 Canal Street.

This is the third volume of Jacob Abbott's "Stories of Rainbow and Lucky." There are four volumes in all—"Handie"—"Rainbow's Journey"—"The Three Pines"—"Selling Lucky." They are charming little volumes for the little folks, full of pictures and delightful reading.

Since writing the above, we have received the last of the series, "Selling Lucky," from Thos. L. White.

THE LIFE OF STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS. By Jas. W. Sheahan. New York: Harper & Brothers. For sale in New Orleans by Thos. L. White, 105 Canal Street.

Senator Douglas is another illustration of the superior power of American civilization in the development of intellect and character. The poorest and most uncared-for boy may reach the proudest station, if the native force be in him. The life of Mr. Douglas is interesting in this regard, and also in view of the fact that his celebrated doctrine of "Squatter Sovereignty" has agitated the Democratic party for years, and has at last resulted in its division, at the recent Charleston Convention.

THE HISTORY OF FRANCE. By Park Godwin. Vol I. (Ancient Gaul.) New York: Harper & Brothers, Publishers. 1860. For sale in New Orleans by Thos. L. White, 105 Canal street.

Such a history of Francenas is here contemplated has long been needed. One in the English language, written from an English or American stand-point, (better from an American stand-point,) guided by the intelligence and pervaded by the catholicity of later times. One which shall take its place with Bancroft's United States, Macaulay's England, Motley's Dutch Republic, etc. We sincerely trust Mr. Godwin may live to complete his great work, and that each succeeding volume may be as successful as the one before us. The work contemplates a narrative of the principal events in French history from the earliest recorded times to the outbreak of the great revolution of 1789. The periods to be described are Ancient Gaul, (embraced in the present volume) terminating with the era of Charlemagne; Feudal France, closing with St. Louis; France during the national, civil, and religious wars; France under the great ministries (Sully, Mazarin Richelieu;) the Reign of Louis XIV, and the Eighteenth Century. It is remarkable that American readers are more ignorant of the history of France—the most historic of all the great modern nations—than of any other. English historians have not furnished the needed information, and French histories are closed to the general American reader. Consequently we have cause to welcome the attempt of Mr. Godwin. We like much the spirit of his preface; and will be disappointed if his whole work shall not be imbued with a keen appreciation of his subject, and fidelity to truth and justice. The style of the present volume is full, clear, and flowing, and the text is arranged much to the reader's accommodation, with marginal dates and titles in the manner of Alison's History of Europe.

OLD LEAVES: Gathered from "Household Words." By W. Henry Willis. New York: Harper & Brothers, Publishers. 1860. For sale in New Orleans by Thos. L. White, 105 Canal Street.

Household Words, conducted by Chas. Dickens, while it existed, was probably the most popular periodical of the kind in the English language. It was more generally quoted than any other. Anything thus credited was certain to be read. It contained the cream of Dickens' genius and literary taste. This book contains the crème de la crème of Household Words. It is made up of essays, sketches and stories, full of power, beauty, pathos, and general information. In all the domain of popular literature, of this class, there is nothing so readable, genial, and beneficial.

THE MILL ON THE FLOSS. By George Eliot, author of "Scenes in Clerical Life," and "Adam Bede." New York: Harper & Brothers. 1860. For sale in New Orleans by Thos. L. White, 105 Canal Street.

It is a remarkable coincidence that the most popular English novel of last year, "Adam Bede," should have been written by a Miss Evans, and that the most popular American novel of the same year, "Beulah," should have been written by a young lady of the same name. The book under notice is said, by leading critics, to be superior to Adam Bede. No work of the kind, for this year, has been so heralded by the press of this country, unless it be Hawthorne's "Marble Faun." The Lounger in Harper's Weekly says:

That way is as quiet and winning as in "Adam Bede." The book is full of delicate dramatic skill, exquisite delineation and description—finished like an elaborate cabinet picture, and lighted with a glimmering humor throughout. There is passion in it, pathos, and power.—It is the illustration of an earnest purpose, of a heroic spiritual struggle. The fineness of the portrayal of character in the earlier part will atone for the lagging interest that presently the interest rises to the absorbing point.—The work is marked throughout by the repose and ease of conscious power; and it is surely a fair question whether Miss Evans has not already placed herself by the side of Charlotte Bronte and Mrs. Gaskell. She is less intense and passionate than the first—less perceptive by the heart (so to say) than the last; but it is doubtful, perhaps, whether she have not a greater intellectual depth and breadth as she certainly has more mental repose, than either.

FAIRSWOOD POST-OFFICE: By the author of "The Heir of Redclyffe," etc. New York: D. Appleton and Company, 1860. For sale in New Orleans by Bloomfield, Steele and Co., Camp-street.

This is a small book, containing a story of which we never heard before, but which, as far as we have read, seems interesting in plot and in style.

A VOYAGE DOWN THE AMOOR: with a land journey through Siberia, and incidental notices of Manchooria, Kamschatka, and Japan. By Barny M'Donough Collins, United States Commercial Agent at the Amoor River. New York: D. Appleton and Co. For sale in New Orleans by Bloomfield, Steele, and Co., Camp-street.

Barth and Livingston tell us of the interior of Africa; Stephens, Squier and Page have explored for us Central and South America, Oliphant has recently described Japan and the Japanese; and Mr. Collins now comes with equally interesting information from the Russian dominions of Northern Asia. The Amoor country has never before been pictured to the eyes of English readers. Opposite our own California, it is destined to divide, with Japan and China, the attention and trade of our Pacific brethren. The book is one to be read, and will repay for perusal.

THE ECLECTIC MAGAZINE for May. This cheap, excellent, and comprehensive monthly is on our table, filled with the best articles in the English journal world—Price $5 a year. W. H. Bidwell, New York.

LA GRANGE FEMALE COLLEGE.—We learn that the Rev. J. G. Pearce, of the Georgia Conference has been elected President of the LaGrange Female College, and will make collections for rebuilding the college edifice.—We consider this a happy appointment, as the well-known energy of the new President, together with his large acquaintance throughout the State, and his former success as agent of the American Bible Society, will be the best guaranties to the public of the success of the Institution.

BISHOP EARLY.—A letter to the Richmond Advocate, dated Lynchburg, April 11th, 1860, says: "Last Sabbath we were favored with a very able sermon from Bishop Early. He preached with greater vigor of body and intellect than I ever observed in any previous effort of his. He is in excellent health and spirits, and will leave "Our City of Hills" in a few days, to meet the Board of Bishops at their approaching session in Nashville. We all regret that a previous engagement will necessitate his absence from our city, at the time for the dedication of our new Church."

REV. JOHN P. DURBIN, D.D.—The Parent Missionary Board of the Northern Methodist Church recently passed a preamble and resolutions highly complimentary to their Corresponding Secretary, Dr. Durbin, in view of his great official efficiency, during the last ten years, in promoting the interests of the Missionary cause.

SUICIDE.—A young lady, a Miss Grigsby, of Columbus, Miss., recently committed suicide by drowning herself in the Bigby River. Her little sister was present. No cause is assigned.

THE COLUMBUS (MISS.) FEMALE INSTITUTE, we learn, was recently destroyed by fire. Mr. Larrabee, the Principal, will doubtless re-build and continue. The community will help him, of course.

FEMALE EQUESTRIANISM.—Lady Stamford of England is noted for her fine riding in the chase. Mrs. Colonel M'Kinney of Texas could excel her, we doubt not.

SONGS IN THE NIGHT.—A little girl in Massachusetts, under the influence of chloroform, recently sang during the amputation of her foot at the ankle, which had been crushed by the rail cars.

THE NEXT CENSUS.—Superintendent Kennedy has distributed the circulars in all the States and Territories; the Marshals will begin the work in June, and end in October.

THE COTTON CROP.—The calculation is that the cotton crop of last year will reach 4,550,000, or 4,600,000 bales, and that 2,100,000 bales will be received at New Orleans.

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

ELEVEN HUNDRED YEARS AGO.

Looking back to the year 755, the student of history finds events transpiring at that time in Italy, which, with the men engaged in them, have a singular correspondence with what is now going forward on the same field. It was in that year that, as the result of an inquisitorial bargain entered into by Pope Stephen and Pepin, King of France, the Bishop of Rome became a temporal prince. Pepin needed the help of Stephen in establishing himself upon the throne he had usurped. Having imprisoned the weak King Charles of France, in a monastery, he had seized the sceptre for himself. The Pope's influence with his superstitious subjects would materially serve his cause if exerted on his side. Stephen, on his own part, wished to add to that spiritual supremacy which was now generally conceded to the Papal Chair throughout Western Europe, the powers and revenues of a secular prince. And recent events seemed favorable to his wishes.

There were four Provinces in that part of Italy which would be most convenient for the purposes of Papal sovereignty: Ravana, Campania, Rome and Pentapolis. Of these, Ravenna properly belonged to the Greek Emperor, at Constantinople. It was garrisoned by an Exarch, as the Emperor's representative. Instigated by the Pope, and absolved by him from their allegiance, the people revolted and killed the Exarch, Paul. Campania was governed by its own duke. But he about this time was killed, and at same instigation. Rome had a municipal government of its own, but not an efficient one. Astolphus, the King of the Lombards, learning of these things, came with an army and seized upon Ravenna and Pentapolis. Stephen, having failed in an effort to bend Astolphus to his own policy, called to his aid Pepin the Short, of France, who, as we have just said, had recently usurped the throne of that kingdom. Pepin came with an army, defeated Astolphus, and then on the condition that Stephen should grant the Papal sanction to his seizure of the French throne, gave to him the four provinces named above.

It was, then, a King of France who placed Pope Stephen in possession of his temporal sovereignty. An Emperor of France has been a chief instrument in taking from Pope Pius Ninth a large portion of the territory thus granted. A Lombard king also played a part in these transactions, and in that part of Italy where he then held rule, Victor Emanuel, the prince who takes possession of the provinces which the Pope has been compelled to abandon, now reigns. It seems a singular fact that the parallel to what is at present going on should after the changes of so many centuries, be so similar to those in the original transaction.

Their mutual relations, however, are much altered. The French Emperor and the Lombard King are now the confederates, and the Pope is the victim. The method pursued in the transfer of sovereignty by which Pius Nioth loses and Victor Emanuel gains the provinces of the Romagna, is also strikingly different from that which Pepin and Stephen adopted. They played against the half heathen Lombard in game of robbery, and being stronger than he, carried the day. Neither party thought it necessary to consult the wishes of the people themselves. Victor Emanuel has submitted the question of his dominion there to popular suffrage, and is the king whom the people themselves choose. This fact illustrates how differently the relations of ruler and ruled are estimated in the nineteenth than the eighth century.

Another circumstance may be noticed. The beginning of the Pope's temporal dominion in Italy was much like what the close promises to be in one respect. The people of Southern Italy were fully as unwilling to acknowledge the arrogant Roman priest for their sovereign, as their descendants of the present century have been. It was at least fifty years from the time when Pepin the Short made his donation to Pope Stephen, before the inhabitants of the provinces submitted to be so governed. As the present French Emperor has been compelled to protect Pope Pius against his own subjects, so was Charlemagne compelled to do for Adrian, the successor of Stephen. The same thing he did also for Leo the Third, who, as Pius has been driven from Rome by his exasperated people, when they found his stupid tyranny no longer endurable, and only ventured back, like Pius Ninth again, when he had a French army at his heels.

Nor has the government of the Pope ever been patiently endured by its subjects. There is reason even now to believe, that it it should be left, without foreign interference to the will of the people, what remains of it would be speedily wiped out. Nor can this finishing event be very far off. It cannot be long before the words of the Psalmist will be literally true of the Man of Sin: "His mischief shall return upon his head, and his violent dealing shall come down upon his own pate." The dark and dreary annals of Papal usurpation are drawing to a close, and the Lord himself will, ere long, anunl that unrighteous covenant in which, eleven centuries since, a foundation for it was laid. Surely, every friend of humanity and of God must rejoice at the prospect.—Congregational Herald.

A CONSTITUTIONAL PRINCE IN GERMANY.

The Grand Duke of Baden, one of the sovereign princes of Germany, has lately given proof of loyalty to good faith and constitutional principles which have distinguished him as one of the wisest and most independent of European rulers. It is true that his dominions are not large, nor his influence among sovereigns great, but his example in the manly retraction of error, and his cheerful assertion of a great popular principle, is worthy of all honor. Baden, although only a Grand Duchy in rank, and of small dimensions, has a very numerous population—equaling some of the smaller kingdoms. It has an area of less than six thousand square miles—less than an average of eighty miles square, and a population, by the census of 1858, of 1,389,952. Its government is a limited sovereignty, of which a Diet of two chambers forms a part.

During the last year the King's Ministry arranged a concordat with the Papal Government by which extraordinary powers were vested in the Catholic Church within the territory of Baden. The Catholic Archbishop acquired jurisdiction over all causes ecclesiastical and matrimonial, and the patronage of all benefices, and the absolute control of the universities and schools, public and private. No pupil could be admitted into the public schools or universities without sanction; pupils admitted might be sent away, on his order, and the professors in the universities were all to be chosen from Catholics. It is the celebrated Austrian concordat applied to Baden. The population of Baden consists of about 800,000 Catholics and 550,000 Protestants—the remainder Jews.

The concordat was concluded without reference to the Diet, and was intended to be put into force without their sanction.

The Diet, however, insisted on their prerogative, and resisted this despotic movement. They defeated the Ministry by a vote of three to one, and a violent convulsion was evidently if the King should persist in upholding his Ministry and their work.

Wisely and frankly the King at once took the side of the Parliament, removed his Ministry and replaced it by a Liberal one. He made no half way retraction, from policy, leaving the apprehension that he would return to the rejected policy when circumstances should permit. He addressed the Diet and the people in an address, whereby he asserted his purpose to rule as a constitutional prince, and to regard the questions of church authority within the Duchy to be subjects of parliamentary discussion, and within the dominion of the law. He declares a will that the independence of the Catholic Church in the administration of its affairs should be fully applied, but that this must be accomplished by the free action of the political power.

"A law, placed under the protection of the constitution, will guarantee a secure foundation for the rights of the Church." It is in that law and in the regulations which will be subsequently appended to it that the tenor of the Concordat will find its legitimate expression. In that manner my Government will do justice to the reasonable claims of the Catholic Church without swerving from the constitutional path; and the public law of the country will receive a fresh sanction."

It is a notable fact that the agitation among the people and in the Parliament against the Concordat and his supporters were not Protestants only, nor mainly Protestants. The Catholic resistance was so marked as to make the movement a popular rather than a religious one, a public manifestation, under the lead of the Sovereign, of a determination to maintain the independence of the State from foreign influences and the rights of a Parliamentary Government.

The example is an inspiring one, and its influence extends to other German States, in which the same projects are entertained, and in one of which, Wurtemburg, have been more successful than in Baden. The Grand Duke looks upon it in the light of a great German movement in opposition to the growing designs of absolutism, and invites all the States of Germany to herd the aspects of the times, and find their only strength in union.—Pic.

SAVOY AND NICE.

The recent demands of Louis Napoleon have turned public attention to the geography of south-western Europe, and we often hear the question asked, "what and where are Savoy and Nice?" The New-York Journal of Commerce answers the question as follows:

"The mooted question of the annexation to France of the Sardinian possessions, Savoy and Nice, naturally draws the attention of the American reader to that portion of Northern Italy. The Duchy of Savoy borders upon France and Switzerland, and is about the size of Connecticut. It abounds in the most magnificent mountain scenery of Europe, and the earth is so completely wrinkled up, that we wonder that man can tie find foot-hold. Mount Blanc, so often placed by the popular mind in Switzerland, is the culminating point of Savoy. It is a country rich in mineral ore; and its fertile slopes afford abundant pasturage to herds, and some of its valleys contain luxuriant vineyards. The Duchy of Savoy contains more than six hundred thousand inhabitants, nearly all of whom speak a bastard French and Italian, besides a jaw breaking patois of their own. Chambary the capital, is in a most picturesque situation. It was here that Joseph de Maistre, the celebrated diplomatist, and Xavier de Maistre, the equally celebrated author, (of 'A Journey Around my Chamber,' &c.,) were born. It was in Chambary, also, that our countryman, Joel Barlow, wrote his famous lines on "Hasty Pudding." The Surroyards have been noted in times past for their bigotry, ignorance, and a certain naivete and simplicity of character. Since the Constitution of Carlo Albert, Savoy and the Surroyards are much changed. Railways are pushing through the Alps; telegraphic wires stretch over once inaccessible mountain passes; the press free (unless in times of war, has had a wider influence, because ten years of a better system of education has prepared the way for its ameliorating mission.

"The country of Nice is a very small portion of the Kingdom of Sardinia, comprehended between the maritime Alps and the Mediterranean, and between the river of Var and Andorra. It is but a little by comparison on the State of Rhode Island, and has 250,000 inhabitants.

"Sheltered as it is by the mural ne Alps on the north and east, it enjoys a climate almost like that of Naples. Its chief city, Nizza, or Nice, is the great resort of wealthy Englishmen, Russians, Americans and Italians who go thither in winter to seek a refuge from the cold blasts of the north. There are vast hotels and lodging houses, containing more comfort and elegance than similar establishments in other parts of Europe, and also gardens, where the rose and the myrtle bloom on the sale of the lemon and orange.

"The River Var, the present limit between Nice and France, is neither a new boundary, nor was it decided upon since the Christian era. The river Var was for in the time of the Roman Emperor Augustus, the boundary of Italy on the North. As we mentioned in a former article, Nice and Savoy have both been parts of the French Republic, and when the French Empire was proclaimed in 1818, there was an intimation or overture made for the annexation of this portion of the territory to the House of Savoy; but Charles Albert rejected it with scorn, thinking the crown of Italy worth more than a province at that time."

GENERAL LAMORICIERE.

Gen. Lamoriciere, the new commander in Chief of the Papal army, is now fifty-four years of age. He entered the French army at the age of twenty-three, and his first service was in Algeria, where he created the corps of the Zouaves. In 1837 he got his commission of Colonel, for his great gallantry at the seige of Constantine, where with his own hands he laid the train with which the gates were blown open, and was himself wounded by the explosion. He served in eighteen campaigns in Africa and gained by continued exploits and brilliant achievements to the highest rank in the army, and the great popularity as a general and a hero. On his return to France, he became a member of the Chamber of Deputies, in the closing days of the reign of Louis Philippe, acting with the Liberals, and was designated as Minister of War in the last combination by which it was thought to save the monarchy. He adhered to the Republic and supported Cavaignac in suppressing the popular insurrection of June, 1848, and was sent Minister to St. Petersburg in 1849. Returning, he opposed the measures by which Louis Napoleon precipated the coup d'etat, and voted for the bill by which the Assembly sought to protect itself against the meditated violence.

After the bloody triumph of Napoleon, on the 2d December, Lamoriciere was among the distinguished public men arrested by the new Minister of the Interior, and on his release retired to Belgium, where he has chiefly remained ever since.

In the early part of the Sardinian struggle with Austria, Lamoriciere tendered his services to Victor Emanuel. It was not accepted, and the same General now accepts the command of the Papal troops, which are to be employed in recovering the Romagna from the sway Victor Emanuel.

The military abilities and reputation of Lamoriciere are a great acquisition to the Roman cause, and the journals of Paris express their apprehension that he will be of the various and now discordant elements of the papal army, which may prove to be extremely formidable, and express their surprise that the French Government should have permitted a French General to accept a command which is so directly opposed to the aims of the public opinion in Europe.

When the Emperor Napoleon was first told of Lamoriciere's acceptance of the post, he is reported to have said: C'est fou; mais c'est chevaleresque.

A letter from Rome, of the 7th says: "General Lamoriciere has been received at a private audience by the Holy Father. He remained nearly two hours in the Ministry of War, having had conference with the head of that department, the four Direction Generals, and the Director of the Military Museums of Saint Michael." The same letter states that the General has received the authorization necessary for every Frenchman who serves a foreign military service. A letter from Paris says that, together with General Lamoriciere, several officers Francois of Modena landed at Ancona on the 6th inst. From there he will go to Kingston, and thence to Ottowa in Canada, via Toronto; thence across the lake to the Falls, and by railroad to Hamilton. He will go to Sarnia to see the Grand Trunk works there, and travel over the Western States; go to Washington and be the guest of the President; then visit the Atlantic cities, and there his fleet meet him at Portland, his departure may be from Quebec, and he may reach the Grand Trunk for Portland after the completion of his tour in the United States. Circumstances may alter the plan in some of its proceedings, but we have good reason to believe it is in contemplation by authority in England. The object of the mission is to be most capable of giving the army information as to routes, who in their turn were to be instructed what it would be needful to do. August will likely be well advanced before His Royal Highness reaches Canada.

THE SULTAN READS THE BIBLE.

A Company in Turkey writes in a recent letter: "The splendid bound Bible which the B. F. B. S. presented to the Sultan some three years ago, has been in frequent use ever since. The Sultan is reading the Bible most earnestly, not only at home but also when going abroad on visits. The Bible is well packed in a splendid box, and is carried in a red velvet case, such as they use in reading the Koran, and carried after the Sultan wherever he goes to spend a couple of hours. (It is customary to carry everything which is supposed he will call for.) Last week he went to Kiz Pasha. The Pasha had business ready for his sovereign, but the Sultan called for his Bible and after reading for two hours he rose and went off, leaving the Pasha to manage his business as best he could. The Pasha, I should imagine very angry when the Sultan was gone, exclaimed, 'It is too bad; the Sultan is poring over that book continually and gains nothing more for the advancement of the State.'

"Mr. Williams has found access to the counter apartments of the Sultan's wives or servants, eunuchs, officers of various grades, such as were not and much mixed company are in continual. He spoke to them of the way of salvation, and at one time they sat in an hour, the second time half an hour, and the third time a quarter of an hour. Four ladies appeared very attentive. Since that time the servants of the Imperial Palace occasionally visit Mr. Williams' house. Near the Palace is a great Guard House, and there also Mr. W. fell in with the Colonel, and sat down and read to him from the New Testament, and talked, while the soldiers near listened attentively or turned away with indifference, but some were touched to tears."

THE POPE AND THE KING OF SARDINIA.

The Univers Israelite, a paper of Ultramontane tendencies, publishes the following letter of Pius IX. to Victor Emmanuel:

"Great Monarch. The ideas expressed in your letter to me are beneath the dignity of an honest man, of a Catholic, and more especially of one deriving his origin from the noble race of Savoy. For a further reply I refer you to my encyclical letter. If I weep, it is not for myself, but for the sake of your Majesty's soul. For the deeds committed by you at the instigation of your advisers you have subjected yourself to the punishment of the Church, and you will become liable to further punishment should you commit the crimes which I know you intend to carry out. I remind your Majesty that within a short time you will have to render account before the most inexorable of Judges for the offences already committed, and for the evils which you inflict upon our poor Italy by your conduct. (Signed) Pius IX., Pope."

No date is added to this letter in the above-mentioned journal; but from internal evidence, it appears that it has been written within the last six weeks.

DOMESTIC.

Congressional Proceedings.

WASHINGTON, May 7.—In the House of Representatives today, Mr. Bingham, one moved a bill providing for the appointment of a Minister to Sardinia. The bill was passed. In the Senate today no business of importance was transacted.

DOVER, May 7. The Hon. Samuel Beardley died at his residence in this city to-day.

Fourth Day's Race on Rock Dog S. R. Spaulding.

BOSTON, May 7. The steamer "S. R. Spaulding," with the Massachusetts delegates to the Charleston Convention, arrived at this port this evening.

After the departure from Charleston, a fugitive slave was found secreted.

The fugitive and five men were transferred to the steamer Spaulding, with large numbers of Chinese emigrants.

Legislature.

A bill has been introduced into the California legislature granting right of way to telegraph companies, building lines by the Pacific railroad. It is said in California to the Mississippi valley, there are but 20,000 inhabitants in the Atlantic slope; 3,703,110 in the Gulf slope; west of the Mississippi, 16,131; in the west of the Mississippi, in 1850, 37.2 per cent. of the population was in the Mississippi valley, 54.8 in the Atlantic slope, and 7.3 in the Gulf slope."

The returns of the immigration for the past year give a total of upwards of 240,000. The emigrants to the United States now number about, 200,000 [illegible] sent number of slaves is something more than [illegible] the free blacks, distributed nearly equally between the slave and free states, about 250,000. The gross is the total of 31,000,000, which will probably be [illegible] figures soon to be furnished us.

LECTURE BY M. LOUIS BLANC.

M. Louis Blanc delivered a lecture in London recently, in English, on "The Mysterious Personage and Agencies in France towards the end of the Eighteenth Century," at the Eyre Arms Assembly Rooms, St. John's Wood. The lecturer began by pointing out that the love of the marvellous prevailed in France during the age of rationalism, and set out to relate details respecting the successful impostures of the Count St. Germain, who pretended, among other things, that he had live hundred years, had been on intimate terms with Francis I., and received delicate commissions from Henry VIII. and the Emperor Charles V. Yet people believed in him, flocked to him, courted him. Madame de Pompadour was one of his devotees, Louis XV. invited him to Versailles, and even the sceptical Voltaire declared that he knew everything. The lecturer next touched upon [illegible] of Mesmer, giving a picturesque account of the scenes that occurred at the house in Paris to which persons resorted with all kinds of diseases stocked by Mesmer's touch, or by the magic fluid. The second part of the lecture was almost entirely occupied by a [illegible] of the career of Cagliostro, and of the surprising [illegible] powers exercised in France, in Rome, and in Poland, where, he said, with the judgment to call upon this remarkable man by Mr. Carlyle, he became a greater than a low swindler and common cheat. He was a clever, cunning, and for that day a learned man; but, behind a higher aim than that of merely dazzling the vulgar: he wished to disorganize the Lodges of the Illuminati, that strange society, as we are assured necessary, and having for its ultimate object the overthrow of Christianity and the Monarchies.—London Times.

THE JOHN BROWN RAID—MORE REVELATIONS.

The New York Herald contains what purports to be a [illegible] conference between Gov. Robinson and Redpath and [illegible] relating to affairs in Kansas and the John Brown raid, which discloses some curious developments. The correspondent implicates the leaders of the Republican party in the Brown conspiracy, and shows that the events in Kansas were but preliminary to the raid at Harper's Ferry, both being parts of the same scheme of revolution, concocted and organized four years ago. When Robinson was examined before the Senate investigating committee, he asserted that John Brown and Redpath were the only leaders in Kansas who avowed revolutionary designs, and that the Free State party had no connection with them, and would not obey them. It appears from this correspondence that Robinson himself was one of the most active of the revolutionary leaders, enlisting [illegible] in actively even John Brown himself.

Not only did he endorse him by certificates and an address to the settlers of Kansas," but he "coldly proposed to him to assassinate all the leading Federal officeholders in Kansas." It further appears that Robinson sought to bring all the Northern States into the civil war which was about being inaugurated in Kansas, and that they responded thereto in the East for that purpose.

The following is an extract from the letter of Redpath to Realpipe:

"You will please remember just before the sack of Lawrence by the border ruffians that Robinson started East. I for one could not understand why he should want to leave at such a time, and urged him strenuously to stay; and when pressed for a reason as to his departure, he told me that he saw the whole country was going to be paralyzed in civil war, and that he was going to the free States to raise the reinforcements and the people of them to crush out the ruffians and the people of them to crush out the ruffians and the people of them to crush out the ruffians

New Orleans Poetry.

"SPRING IS COMING."

Come, oh, come! thou hast tarried long—
Come with the glory of light and song.
Earth pines for thee on a thousand shores,
Where the billow breaks and the wild wind roars.
There's a voice of wail 'mid the ancient trees,
Torn and tossed by the wintry breeze.
Gloom hath shrouded our pleasant bowers,
Death hath blighted our vines and flowers;
And every hour on its fleeting wing,
Bears away a prayer to thee, O spring.

Come, oh, come! we pine for thee,
As pines the wanderer for home at sea;
As the captive pines in his lonely cell,
For dashing waters and breezy dell.
We sigh for the influence that life renews,
For the spell of soft sunshine and balmy dews;
For the genial airs and the pleasant rain,
To awaken our blossoms and streams again.

"I come! I come! I am coming back!"
Thus answered a voice from the sun's bright track:
"I will clothe the heaven's fair face with smiles,
I will call the birds from a thousand isles;
The streams shall laugh where the violets blow,
The trees exult, and the laurels glow.
There's not a beauty, nor bloom, nor hue,
That the charm of my presence shall not renew."

Not so, O spring! no power thou hast
O'er much of beauty that's from us past!
Eyes that looked love into our eyes are dim;
Voices are hushed from our vesper hymn;
Bright young faces have passed away;
Places are vacant at full of day.
Thou canst hang leaves on a thousand trees;
Thou canst bring the flowers, and birds and bees;
Thou canst loosen the streams and silver fonnts,
And breathe a glory o'er vales and mounts:
But thou canst not restore to our yearning arms,
The vanquished past and its lovely forms.

Yet I speak to the heart in my radiant bloom,
Of a spring that opens beyond the tomb,
Where the lost and loved of earth are found;
Where the severed wreaths are forever bound.
Where comes no dimness n'er eyes of light,
And the cheek of beauty ne'er knows a blight.
There's not a beauty, nor bloom, nor hue,
That the charm of my presence shall not renew.

Children's Column.

HOW TO ACQUIRE A BEAUTIFUL FORM.

Take abundant exercise in the open air—free, attractive, joyous exercise, such as young girls—when not restrained by false and artificial proprieties, are wont to take. If you are in the country, or can get there, ramble over the hills and through the woodlands; botanize; geologize; seek rare flowers and plants, and chase butterflies. Be a romp, even though you may be no longer a little girl; if you are a wife and a mother, romp with your children.

Attend also to your positions in standing, sitting, lying and walking, and employ such general or special gymnastics as your case may require. Live, when in-doors, in well-ventilated rooms; take sufficient, wholesome and nourishing food at regular hours; keep the mind active and cheerful—in short, obey all the laws of health. Take a lesson from the English girl, as described in the following extract:—

"The English girl spends more than one-half of her waking hours in physical amusement; that is, in amusements which tend to davelop, and invigorate, and ripen the bodily powers. She rides, walks, drives, rows upon the water, runs, dances, swings, plays, jumps the rope, throws the ball, hnrls the quoit, draws the bow, keeps up the shuttle-cock, and all this without having it forever impressed upon her mind that she is thereby wasting her time.

"She does this every day, until it becomes a habit, which she will follow up through life. Her frame, as a necessary consequence, is larger, her musculer system better developed, her nervous system in subordination to the physical, her strength more endnring, and the whole tono of her mind healthier. She may not know as much at the age of seventeen as the American girl; as a general thing she does not, but the growth of her intellect has been stimulated by no hot-house culture, and though maturity comes later, it will last proportionably longer.—Hints towards Physical Perfection.

STORY BOOKS FOR CHILDREN.

Coleridge was a man singularly gifted with the power of watching and recording the history of his own mind, and able in a remarkable degree to estimate at its true value the training through which he had passed. He thus writes in regard to his earliest literary training. He says:—

"My early reading of fairy tales, and about genii and the like, had habituated me to the vast; and I never regarded my senses in any way as the criterion of my experience. I regulated all my words by my conceptions, not by my sight, even at that age. Ought children be permitted to read romances and stories of giants, magicians and genii? I know all that has been said about it; but I have formed my faith in the affirmative. I know no other way of giving the mind a love of the great and the whole.

Those who have been led to the same truths, step by step, by the constant testimony of their senses, seem to want a sense which I possess. They contemplate nothing but parts, and all parts are necessarily little, and the universe to them is but a mass of little things. It is true the mind may become credulous and prone to superstitious fancies, by the former method. But are not experimentalists (the practical men) credulous, even to madness, in believing any absurdity rather than believe the grandest truths, if they have not the testimony of their own sense in their favor? I have known some who have been rationally educated, as it is styled. They were marked by an almost microscopic acuteness, but when they looked at great things, all became a blank, and they saw nothing, and denied that anything could be seen, and uniformly put the negation of a power for the possession of a power, and called the want of imagination, judgment, and the never being moved to rapture, philosophy.

LADY THIEVES.

Let me say something then about Lady Thieves, and inform Mr. Moule and Mr Everybody Else, how I learned to handle that sort of business. When I first opened shop I knew nothing about it, and never bestowed a thought up on it; and when one day I saw a genteel-looking young girl drop her cambric handkerchief upon an article which I usually sold for a guinea, and taking them both up together, convey them to her pocket, I seized her unceremoniously, hauled her into my little back room, rung the bell for the maid; had her searched, found the article upon her, sent for a Bow street officer (there were no policemen then,) and gave her into custody. What a tool I was, to be sure! It happened that her father was a clergyman, backed by high connections, and looking forward to be a bishop before long. He bailed her out in no time, came down upon me with a charge of conspiracy, and threats of transportation for life—badgered my serving-wench out of her wits, first himself, and then sent a hatchet-faced fellow to cross-examine her, who drove her clean bewildered—more fool I for letting him do it; but I knew no better. I saw it would never do to take the case to trial with such a witness, and, by Jove, she saved me the trouble by bolting away before the day of trial came. I was obliged to withdraw the charge, and pretend it was all a mistake. The clergyman talked of prosecuting me for a conspiracy, but he had some conscience, and only talked; the girl, I have no donbt, had confessed the theft to him. As it was, I got the reputation of a monster, and only recovered my character by acknowledging that I must have been druuk at the time and didn't know what I was about—I who was never drunk in my life.

That affair cost me fifty pounds in cash; and damaged my connection to the extent of at least two hundred pounds more. I should have been ruined, but the parson got his bishopric and left the neighborhood; I put a new name on my sign board, and in time the event was forgotten.

I had learned a valuable lesson. The next lady thief who favored me with a visit, did me the honor to rob me to the amount of two pounds ten. She did it so cluosily that I could not avoid seeing her. I affected not to notice it; smilingly took her order to the amount of a few shillings, and, when I sent home the goods, put down the stolen articles in the bill. She called next day, and, with the utmost affability, informed me of the mistake I had made in charging an article which I had not sent and which she had not ordered. She brought her "companion" with her to prove that the article charged was not in the pack of goods sent—which of course, I knew well enough—I admitted the "mistake" with the perfect good humor, and she went away. It must be acknowledged that I had learned my lesson well—but though I congratulated myself on that score, I thought the teaching too expensive and resolved to try a different plan next time. I had not to wait long for an opportunity.

Lady S——, the wife of a baronet, took a fancy to some property of a rather rare description, and concealed it in the folds of her sleeve. When she had made her purchases, I requested her, under the pretence that I had something remarkable to show her, to step into the parlor. Closing the door after her, "Your ladyship is not aware," said I, "of what you have done. I have observed that at times you are very abstracted in your manner; allow me to show you what you have been doing." With that I caught her by the arm, and in an instant drew forth my property. She blushed red as fire, and her eyes flashed; but recovering herself in an instant she burst into a laugh, and cried, "Really, Mr. Brown I am much obliged to you; who would have thought I had been so distraite? Why, really, I should have robbed you without knowing it." "Hardly that!" I thought to myself, but I held my peace, bowed smilingly, and attended my lady to her carriage.

Lady-thief Number Four was a Dowager, of three-score at least, who came at regular intervals, who bought pretty freely, but always stole as much as she could. This was a difficult case, and I hardly knew how to deal with it. She wore a large pocket to contain the plunder, and was constantly dropping something into it. If I taxed her with theft, I should lose her custom, and that of her connection, which was large and of a high class. I could not persuade her that she plundered unconsciously; she was to wide-awake for that. I had serious thoughts of keeping a professional pick-pocket on the premises, to rescue my own property from her gripe, but feared the remedy might prove worse than the disease. One recourse remained; I had kept a pretty accurate account of all that she had purloined during the six months' patronage she had bestowed upon me, and when I made out her account during the end of the season, I set down each article as is proper date. The old lady sent her steward to settle the account, to which she made no objections; but she never again entered my shop.

I shall not go on with the catelogue. Lady thieves are no rarities, and may not be described individually. Thirty-five years practice as a working shopkeeper has taught me the safest mode of managing them, and that I follow; but they are a disgreceful nuisance and a constant source of pecuniary loss. When they make their appearance in my shop, I act according to circumstances. If it is a young girl, new to the trade, I sometimes send for her parents, and lay the matter before them; but this is not always a safe method—since in more than one instance the mother has induced the child to deny the theft after she had confessed it in the presence of witnesses, and with all the evidence of the crime complete. On one or two occasions I have made the thief, when she had the money in her purse, pay for the stolen articles and keep them; but far more frequently have I allowed them to walk clear off with the plunder, to save the bother and expense of a disturbance. No further back than yesterday morning a newly wedded couple came to the shop; the husband bought his young wife a bonnet one present, and she, in the most barefaced manner, stole the fellow to it. What could I do? There was a dozen people there. If I had taken her up I should have driven them all away, and perhaps had a tumult round the house all the morning; and what a skeleton I should have set up in that poor bride-groom's house for the rest of his days!

THE SHAKSPEARE FORGERIES.

The Illustrated London News at March 17th, in a review of a work entitled "An Inquiry into the Genuineness of the Manuscript Corrections in Mr. Paine Collier's Annotated Shakspeare, Folio, 1632, and of certain Shakspereau Documents likewise published by Collier, by N. E. S. A. Hamilton," says:

Mr. Hamilton's work is devoted to a question of the highest importance to the interests of literature, and to the personal honor of an industrious and well-known writer. The critors of Shakspeare—the late Mr. Singer, Mr. Dyce, Mr. Staunton, Mr. Knight and Mr. Halliwell—upon eternel evidence, were long ago convinced that nearly everything in these "corrections" that appeared new was not good, and what was good was not new; but the question of their genuineness can only be determined to the satisfaction of the world at large on paleographic grounds—i. e., by the testimony of persons skilled in ancient writing. For this reason Dr. Inglehy's clever little book, which trents of philological anachronisms, and exhibits a mass of circumstantial evidence to shew that the folio was "at least tampered with while in Mr. Collier's hands," though of the highest value and litterest to scholars, is of less weight in the scale of the general opinion than the more technical opusculum by Mr. Hamilton.—In this wo have first on account of the circumstances which led to the volume being sent to the British Museum, from Sir Frederick Madden's own hand:

"I had a great wish to see the volume, after this second avowal of doubts expressed by Mr. Staunton and Dr. Inglehy, but my mind was so free from any bias that I did not entertain the least suspicion of forgery, and in September, 1858, I eagerly availed myself of the opportunity afforded me by Mr. Collier (who had sent me a copy of the "Hamlet" of 1603, lithographed at the expense of the Duke of Devonshire) to express to him my wish to see the annotated folio, but not having the honor to be acquainted with the now Duke of Devnshire, I asked Mr. Collier if he could manage to gain me access to the volume. To this request Mr. Collier never made any reply."

Sir Frederic Madden's independent examination of the writing soon convinced him of its fictitious character, and his convictions were at once endorsed by Mr. Panizzi, Mr. Bond and Mr. Hamilton of the Museum, as well as by Mr. T. Duffus Hardy, the Rev. Joseph Hunter, Professor Brewer, and a host of skillful paleographers, who had been invited to inspect the folio. It was found that, although avidently written by the same hand, the forms of the letters were anamolous. One page exhibited words or letters characteristic of the sixteenth century, while in close juxtaposition the same word or letter bore every appearance of having been written within the present century. The ink employed was discovered to be a mere wash or paint colored to resemble faded ink, and nutaberless partially obliterated pencil corrections corresponding with the quasi-antique corrections were visible throughout the margins. Upon the application of a microscope it was found, too, in many instances, that these pencilings in a modern hand, actually underlie the writing in the feigned old hand.

Again, whole syllables or wards were discovered to occur in pencil, partially rubbed out, still legible, while close to them the same syllable or word is repeated in the antique writing. The inevitable conclusion to all of which is, that the pencil-writing had been placed on the margins to direct the alterations afterwards made in pigment.—Mr. Hamilton next proceeds to consider Mr. Collier's oft-repeated assertion that he has published every letter, syllable, word and line of the corrections, and proves undisputably, by a literal collection of a single play (Hamlet,) that, so far from this being the truth, he has not printed one-half the textual alterations which are visible upon the margin of his folio. We have not space to enter upon the vexed question of the folio's pedigree. Upon that point the render can consult Mr. Hamilton's book and an admirably conclusive article by Mr. J. A. Arnold, the police magistrate, in Frazer's Magazine of the present month.—Having brought the evidences against authenticity of the "Correct Folio," 1632, to a close, Mr. Hamilton goes on to say: "But the facts I am now about to advert to are far graver than the question of the authenticity of that or any other particular volume. They have reference to a series of systematic forgeries which have been perpetrated, apparently, within the last half century, and are in connection, generally, with the history of Shakspeare and Shakspearean literature, although other subjects have occasionally been introduced."

The first instance adduced is the magnificent copy of the folio, 1623, in the possession of Lord Ellesmere. In 1842, Mr. Collier, to whom tha late Lord Ellesmere, then Lord Francis Edgerton, had lent the volume, announced the discovery of certain MSS. aanotations on its margins, which he attributed to the time of the Commonwealth. Upon examination of thin book by Sir Frederic Madden, Mr. Panizzi, Mr. Boud and Mr. Hamilton, the marginal, emaadations were found to have been indicated first in pencil and afterwards in ink, and to be in the same handwriting as the emnndations on the "Corrected Folio," 1632. The next case in more surprising still. In 1836 Mr. Collier discovered in the library of Bridgewater House some documents regarding the life of Shakspeare, which we communicated to the public through a letter to Mr. Thomas Amyot. These instruments were represented to have been found in bundles of manuscript, probably not opened since the time of Lord Chancellor Ellesmere. Mr Collier expressed no doubt of their authenticity; But the Rev. Joseph Hunter, from intrinsic evidence, was led to entertain an opinion adverse to their pretensions as genuine documents, and in 1853 Mr. Halliwell printed for private circulation a pamphlet in which he unhesitatingly pronounced them forgeries. Of these papers, which were examined by Sir Frederic Madden, Dr. Kingsley (Lord Ellesmere's librarian) and Mr. Hamilton, the last observes, "With one exception, these documents display their spurious character at a glance, whilst two of the numbers are such manifest forgeries, that it seems incredible how they could have cheated Mr. Collier's observation."

From the Brigewater papers Mr. Hamilton passes to the manuscripts in Dulwich College: "In 1848 Mr. Collier edited for the Shakspeare Society a volume entitled Memoirs of Edward Alleyn." Amongst the documents published by Mr. Collier in this volume, is one correctly stated to be an original letter from Mrs. Alleyn, wife of the founder of Dulwich College, and addressed to her husband. The letter in itself is interesting; but the point upon which Mr. Collier mainly insists, as constituting its peculiar value, is a paragraph he prints as contained in it relative to "Mr. Shakspeare of the tiltobe," and from which he proceeds to draw various deductions. On collating this letter with the original, it appears to have been entirely misread by Mr Collier, as there is not the smallest trace of authority for any allusions to Shakspeare, or to any of the words concerning him found there by Mr. Collier and printed by him as forming part of the original document. A cleverly executed fac-simile of this portion of the letter accompanies Mr. Hamilton's book, showing clearly that, while inserting words which could never have belonged to it, Mr Collier has omitted others which are plainly visible.

Although this letter of Mrs. Alleyn, with the exceptions mentioned, is genuine, Dulwich College is no more exempt from Shakspereau fabrications than Bridgewater House. Mr. Hamilton adduces three instances, all first printed by Mr. Collier as authentic documents. The first is a letter purporting to be written by Marston, the playwright, and which may be seen in Mr. Collier's Memoirs of Edward Alleyn, p. 154. The writing of this letter is a good resemblance of Marston's hand; but a careful inspection revealed that the whole of the words had been first traced out in pencil, as is the case with the corrections in the annotated folios before mentioned. The next of the Dulwich counterfeits is a copy of verses, first published in Mr. Collier's Memoirs of Alleyn, p. 13, beginning—which is pronounced by Dr. Hamilton to be a forgery from beginning to end.

Sweete Nedde, nowe wynne another wager,

The third document is genuine, and has been quoted by Mulous. What brings it in the category of fictitious papers is an appended "List of players," with "Shakspeare," of course, among them, first published by Mr. Collier, and written evidently by the same hand as the rest of these abominations. We now reach the last and most remarkable of the impositions disclosed by Mr. Hamilton. The document in question, which is known as the "Petition of the Players," 1596, was first printed by Mr. Collier, who found it in the State Paper Office. It has no date, and is written on a half sheet of of foolscap paper, without watermark. On an examination, Mr. Hamilton was led to believe not only that the writing was not authentic, but that it had been executed by the same hand as the fictitious instruments before discussed. An application to the Master of the Rolls was followed by an official inquiry into the genuineness of the document.

On the 30th of January, Sir Francis Pulgrave, Deputy Keeper of Public Records, Sir Frederic Madden, T. Duffus Hardy, Esq., Assistant Keeper of Public Records, Professor Brewer, Reader at the Rolls, and Mr. Hamilton, assembled for the purpose of investigation. After a minute and careful scrutiny, these gentlemen decided that the Player's Petition was spurious; and the Master of the Rolls directed that their attestation should be appended to the document condemned! Such is the result of the inquiry so far; but it is obviously impossible it can rest here. Every Shakspereau document brought to light during the last half century, whether discovered at Devonshire or Bridgewater House, in Dulwich College, or in our State Record offices, must, after these startling revelations, undergo a rigid scrutiny, and upon no person is it so incumbent to render every assistance in separating what is genuine from what is false among these papers, as upon Mr Collier himself.

THE NATIONS WITHOUT FIRE.—Accordlag to Pliny, the use of fire was for a long time unknown to some of the ancient Egyptians, and when Exodus (the celebrated astronomer) showed it to them, they were absolutely in raptures. The Persians, Phœnicians, Greeks, and several other nations, acknowledged that their ancestors were once without the use of fire, and the Chinese confess the same of their progenitors. Pompanius, Mela, Plutarch, and other ancient authors, speak of nations who, at the time they wrote, knew not the use of fire, or had but just learned it. Facts of the same kind are also attested by modern nations. The inhabitants of the Marian islands, which were discovered in 1551, had no idea of fire. Never was astonishment greater than theirs when they saw it on the descent of Magellan in one of their islands. At first they believed it was some kind of an animal that was fixed to, and fed upon, wood. The inhabitants of the Philliplpiae and Canary islands were formerly ignorant. Africa presents, even in our day, some nations in this deplorable state.

AN AFRICAN CHURCH OWNING ITS MINISTER.—The Airlean Baptist Church in Augusta, Ga., owns its minister, the congregation having bought him from his former master. The members of the Church, who are mostly, if not all slaves themselves, contribute $1,000 a year for the support of their "chattel" pastor and family.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

Tribute of Respect.

Extract from the Minutes of the regular meeting of the Board of Directors of the South-Western Bible Society:—

Whereas, It has pleased that Divine Power which none can resist; that unscrutable Wisdom which none can fathom, and that infinite Love which passes all human estimate, to remove from the Church on earth, and from the circle of this Board, our colleague and beloved brother, P. H. GOODWIN; therefore, be it unanimously—

Resolved, That we deeply feel this bereavement ourselves, and, with heartfelt sympathy, condole with the family and friends of the deceased.

Resolved, That the wisdom and zeal, punctuality, and excellent spirit, which adorned the private character, and uniformly characterized the official conduct of our deceased brother, should have, and we trust will long continue to have, the happiest effect upon us, his surviving colleagues.

Resolved, That the Corresponding Secretary be requested to transmit a copy of this action to the bereaved family of our late brother, and to publish it in the record of the proceedings of this society, and in the religious papers of this city.

J. McCONNELL, Corresponding Sec.

Departed this life, at her residence in Autauga county, Ala., on Friday, the 3d inst., at 2 o'clock, P. M., JANE MASSENGALE, wife of John Massengale, in her 65th year. She joined the Methodist Episcopal Church on the 26th of September, 1813, in Madison county, at Shilo Church, where she obtained the blessing of God, and has ever since been as a shining light in the Church, and left a bright testimony behind her, that she was going to glory. To her husband she was affectionate and submissive, almost to a fault. He was the object of her first and only love, and she knew to loved her with a devotion that approached idolatry, and that he was never so happy as when contributing to her happiness, or administering to her wants, and therefore nothing was enjoyment without his participation; no place desirable without his presence. His troubles were hers, his joys hers, and his friends hers. They were emphatically, "one flesh." As he approached home, after an absence, however long or short, and under whatever circumstances, he had no fear of meeting a frown, or hearing a reproachful complaint. To her children she was kind, affectionate, and impartial; and was indefatigable in her efforts to bring them up in the way they should go, and to inculcate in their minds the importance of piety, benevolence, generosity, industry, and economy. To a friend she was candid, sincere, and generous, and ever ready and willing to incommode herself to render them assistance, or do them a benefit. To the stranger she was a true samaritan; ever ready to relieve the afflicted and comfort the distressed:—She bore her late illness with patient resignation, and passed calmly from life in the full belief of the Christian religion, and with a firm reliance on the promises of Christ.

T. A. SALE.

NIMROD T. DAVIS died of typhoid pneumonia, in Clarke county, Ala., March 29th, after an illness of nine days, aged nineteen years.

If morality and high-toned worth could give comfort in the "dark valley," he would have passed through without a fear.—But he felt that this would not suffice, and earnestly sought, and found Christ precious to his soul. While his father was praying for him at his request, he felt some comfort, but he was not satisfied. I found him greatly distressed about his soul. He said he "thought the other day that God had pardoned his sins, but did not know, wanted to be certain." He was praying in an agony, "O Lord, thou hast always blest; hear me now;" thou hast promised it; I will believe, etc.," when the "fashion of his countenance changed," and he rejoiced in hope of the glory of God, saying, "he did know God had heard his prayers and pardoned his sins." I told him none of us thought he would get well. He answered, "that he did not fear; his prospects were bright for heaven." I read to him the hymn commencing, "Vital spark of heavenly flame;" and he became perfectly exultant; he clasped me in his arms, exclaiming, "what more! what more!" I asked him if he wanted us to tell Leonidas anything (one of his brothers at the University of Virginia.) He said, "nothing in particular, only, that I am dead, and I hope he is preparing to meet me in heaven, where we can rejoice together for ever."

W. H. CARTER.

MRS. MARGARET POPE died on the morning of the 4th of April, in Yazoo county, Miss., after a brief illness of four days, in the 82nd year of her age. She was a native of South Carolina, where she was married to Mr. George Pope, who in 1811 removed to Mississippi, where he resided until his death. She had been a member of the Methodist Church for forty years. A short time before she was taken ill she spoke to her son of her happy religious feelings. When I approached her bed side I said, "Mother Pope the Lord is a stronghold, and a present help in need." "Oh, yes," she exclaimed. I asked her if she could trust in the Lord, and she responded in the affirmative. Mother Pope was a plain, unassuming, kind-hearted, sincere, old-fashioned Methodist, she lived a Christian and died a Saint.

D. H. WIGGINS.

Southern Advocate please copy.

MRS. ANNIE KYLE, wife of William Kyle, died April 6, 1860, in the forty-sixth year of her age, of pneumoala. She leaves a husband and five children, and a multitude of friends and acquaintances to mourn her loss. Her eldest son returned home from the Medical College of Philadelphia the day that she was taken sick, and she lived only a week. She was fearful that she would not live to see him again. She bore her afflictions with christian fortitude. She was an affectionate mother and wife, a kind neighbor and oilstress, and a good Christian. When she was able she was seen seated among the people of God, whom she dearly loved.

NANNIE.

Terry's Depot, Miss., April 8, 1860.

MRS. SARAH H. POWE, wife of Wm. H. Powe, died in the 15th April, in east Kemper, Miss., in the 62d year of her age. She was a native of Chesterfield district, S. C.; for some time a resident of Wayne county, Miss., where she was married, and where also she was converted, and became a worthy member of the M. E. Church. Sister Powe was decided and persevering; peculiarly so in her religious character. Her attachment to the Church of God was ardent. She loved her ministers dearly "for their work's sake." Her end was that of the perfect man—"peace." She said, in reply to a question, "I enjoy the comfort of God's presence all the time. My greatest need is grace to enable me to endure and wait the will of God still." Her spirit took its flight for the bosom of its God, just as the family were returning from church. Earthly friends were returning from the house of God to love and care for her still, but messengers from the upper sanctuary had come for her, and she was gone.

A. McILWAIN.

ZACHARIAH THOMSON died in Jasper county, Miss., at his own residence, on 17th March, 1860, in his 73d year, after a short illness. He was born in Pendleton district, S. C.; moved to Georgia, and came to Mississippi in 1829. He joined the M. E. Church about 28 years ago, and was converted shortly after. Since then he has held different offices in the Church, such as class leader, and steward, and was always faithful and consistent. By his death the Church has lost one of the most faithful advocates of her doctrines. His home was the preacher's home, and, as far as he was able, he was always ready to help them. "He was a good man," and "though he is dead, he yet speaketh." He leaves a widow, several children, and many friends, to mourn his departure.

J. W. McNEIL.

South Carolina Advocate please copy.

Died, on the 13th instant, ELLA, only daughter of W. H. and Amanda E. Slade, aged six months.

The little bud of a few bright hours—
Just plucked from earth's fast fading flowers
A moment green by Time's dark tide—
To bloom upon the other side.

Just kissed by the morning dew of life,
Untouched by shadows, cares and strife;
Transplanted now, thou early tried—
Forever cradled on Jesus' breast!

Chase by the flow of Heavenly springs,
She sweeps her bright harp's golden strings.
And weaves those ties that nevermore sever,
By the light that floods the great Forever.

Then mother, dry your streaming eye,
Your Ella links you with the sky;
The lovely, little, fragile thing,
Blooms on in one eternal Spring.

Ah, see how fair her brow is crowned;
Her white wings gleaming softly round,
As now with one, bright, dimpled hand,
She points you to that better land.

ANNIE.

Little ROBERT ZACHARY, infant son of Robert H. and Margaret H. Zachary, died on the 29th ult., aged one year, one month, and eighteen days. He was a sprightly, rosy cheeked boy; but disease seized upon him, and in twenty-four hours his prattling tongue had ceased to say, "Ma;" his beautiful blue eyes had ceased to gaze upon loved ones who eagerly bent over him. Little Robert is gone, never more to return; he is safe at the right hand of God in Heaven.

L. I. M.

Pine Ridge, Copiah Co., Miss.

EDUCATIONAL.

DOLHEAR'S COMMERCIAL COLLEGE, OF THE City of New Orleans, founded in 1852—Chartered by the Legislature of Louisiana, with Agricultural and Mechanical Departments—Capital Stock, $200,000—In the new and spacious edifice known as STORY BUILDING, south-east corner of Camp and Common streets, entrance on both streets, open day and evening. Faculty:—

RUFUS DOLHEAR, President.
MATHEMATICAL DEPARTMENT.
GEO E. BRACKETT, Professor.
BOOK-KEEPING DEPARTMENT.
RUFUS DOLHEAR, Lecturer.
J. W. BLACKMAR, Professor.
ENGLISH DEPARTMENT.
HON. J. N. CARRIGAN, A.M., late Supt Education, Sta.; Prof. and Lecturer on Commercial Law, etc and M. H. M'CARTHY, Professor.
FRENCH DEPARTMENT.
MARC. ROUX, Professor.
DEPARTMENT FOR PENMANSHIP.
RUFUS DOLHEAR, Lecturer.
J. M. GRIFFITH, Professor.
SPANISH DEPARTMENT.
MANUEL MARINO, Professor.
GERMAN DEPARTMENT.
GEO. GESSNER, Professor.
LATIN AND GREEK DEPARTMENT.
M. MAGNO and G. GESSNER, Professors
ITALIAN DEPARTMENT.
RHETORIC, LOGIC, AND ELOCUTION.

This is the only chartered Commercial college in the South-West, and the oldest in the United States, and has stood for
FOR MORE THAN A QUARTER OF A CENTURY.
On its own merits alone.

Persons from 12 to 60 years of age, can attend to any branch they may wish.

Board can be had with the Professor, or other good families speaking English, French, Spanish or German, from $5 to $6 per week.

Catalogues with terms, opinions of the press and leading men of the nation, etc., sent to all who desire them.

N.B.—To prevent mistakes or impositions, Students intended for this College should bring this advertisement as special directions, as there are every winter temporary rooms open for a few months, all of gentlemaking wonderful promises and promises, and posting flaming placards to enlighten the people of New Orleans and of the South! When three or more firm Clubs and enter at the same time, ten per cent will be deducted from tuition.

☞ Citizens and strangers are invited to visit.

feb1 1y RUFUS DOLHEAR, President.

SOULE'S COMMERCIAL COLLEGE, CORNER OF Camp and Common streets, entrance No. 80 Common street,—established in 1856.—open day and evening the entire year.

A full course of instruction in this institution embraces Double Entry Book-keeping, Commercial Calculation and Commercial Law, and Penmanship. Beutlemen can enter for the full course, or in any branch they desire, and at any time, as there is no class system, no copying from books, and no memorizing of arbitrary rules.

Merchants, Book keepers, and young gentlemen wishing instruction, are respectfully requested to call and examine our practical forms and peculiar manner of teaching.

For catalogues containing full information, and Balance sheet Curlars, the most magnificent work of the kind ever executed in the United States, address, GEO. SOULE, New Orleans.

FELICIANA FEMALE INSTITUTE, JACKSON, LA. The exercises of the second term of the scholastic year will commence on the first of March. Pupils entered at any time, and charged from the time of entrance.

Extensive grounds and houses have been added to the premises.

A good library, a new and complete apparatus, a full and competent corps of teachers, equitable and newly furnished apartments, afford the best facilities for a thorough education.

BOARD OF TRUSTEES:

WM. H. WATKINS, D.D., President.
J. N. EVANS, Secretary.
Prof. W. H. N. MASRUDELL, WM. TIPSCOMB,
JOHN W. BURRUSS, Esq., Gen. S. M. BRYAN.
F. V. R. HAGAMAN, Esq. Rev. A. G. MILLER.
Rev. JOHN C. MILLER, JOHN McKOWEN, Esq.
Hon. JOHN McVEA.
6m THOS. W. BROWN, Principal.

PORT GIBSON COLLEGIATE ACADEMY, FOR Young Ladies, resumed its Exercises on the first Monday in Oct. last. A well chosen Faculty will spare no pains or care to make this institution a pleasant and profitable place for young lady students.

The buildings are large, well ventilated, and well furnished. The grounds ample and beautiful.

For information and Circulars, apply to,
Rev. H. JONES, Port Gibson, Miss.

PROFESSIONAL.

JAMES J. HUTCHINSON, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, Livingston, Alabama., will Practice in Sumter and the adjoining counties. [jan24]

DR. E. D. BEACH, HAVING RESUMED THE practice of Medicine, offers his professional services to the citizens of New Orleans.

N. B.—Special attention paid to diseases of the RECTUM, PILES, FISTULA IN ANO, ETC.—Fistula in ano permanently cured without the use of the knife, cautery, pain, or confinement whatever. Office No. 6, Baronne street near Canal. ap27.

J. E. ELAM, ATTORNEY - AT - LAW, BATON Rouge.
REFERENCES—Henderson & Gaines and Chinn & Bolton, New Orleans; W. S. Pike and A. Matta, Baton Rouge.

B. D. & A. W. ROBERTS, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, Floyd, Carroll Parish, Louisiana. ja19

FUQUA & KILBOURNE, ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW, Chatham, Louisiana, practice in the Parishes of East and West Feliciana, and East Baton Rouge.

References—Payne & Harrison, Byrne, Vance & Co., W. and C. Letchford and Co., Broadwell & Haynes, and Pritchard & Flowers, New Orleans. mar 7-1y

W. P. WINANS. J. T. HEATH.

WINANS & HEATH, ATTORNEYS AND COUNsellors at Law, Shreveport, La. Office—Market street.
Will practice in the courts of Caddo, De Soto, Bossier, Claiborne, and Bienville.

G. SPENCER MAYO, ATTORNEY - AT - LAW, Harrisonburg, La., will practice in the Courts of Catahoula, Concordia, Caldw ll and Franklin Parishes.

COMMISSION MERCHANTS.

W. A. BROADWELL. A. P. HAYNES.

BROADWELL & HAYNES, COMMISSION MERchants (formerly Broadwell & Payne), No. 40 Union street N O Having retired from business, I take great pleasure in soliciting for my former Partners, BROADWELL & HAYNES, the patronage and confidence of my friends, believing their experience, capacity and means, will insure its continuance, and enable them to give general satisfaction. [jn1] M. P. PAYNE

W. R. STUART, New Orleans. JOS. B. A. JAMES, Madison Parish, La.

STUART & JAMES, NO. 43 UNION STREET, New Orleans, have associated themselves together for the purpose of conducting a COTTON FACTORAGE & GENERAL COMMISSION BUSINESS; are prepared to make the usual Advances to planters in the way of supplies, etc., and respectfully solicit patronage

B. M. LOWE & CO., COTTON FACTORS AND General Commission Merchants, No. 97 GRAVIER STREET, New Orleans. ap6

A. H. MAY & CO., COTTON FACTORS AND General Commission Merchants, No 94 Gravier street, New Orleans. my1y

J. D. PAYNE. J. P. HARRISON.
G. W. CUNNINGTON. WM. B. CUNNINGTON.

PAYNE & HARRISON, COMMISSION MERCHANTS No. 51 Union street, New Orleans. dec7-1y

S. L. WALKER, New Orleans. ROBT. C. CUTCHINSON Caddo Parish, La

WALKER & HUTCHINSON, COTTON FACTORS and Commission Merchants, No. 87 Carondelet street, New Orleans. ap28

J. BOYD & CO., COTTON FACTORS, RECEIVING and Forwarding Merchants, No. 4 Union street, New Orleans.

LEONARD FASIL. P. E. LAURANS.

LEONARD FASIL & CO COMMISSION MERchants, and Dealers in Western Produce, 91 Magazine street, New Orleans. Oct 24.

LANE, SALTER & CO., SUCCESSORS TO LANE, MAYFIELD & CO., Cotton and Sugar Factors and General Commission Merchants, No. 79 St. Charles street, New Orleans. jy5 1y

JOHN F. WYCHE & CO., COTTON FACTORS and Commission Merchants, No 10 Common street, New Orleans

STONE'S INFIRMARY—CORNER OF CARONdelet and Perdido streets, New Orleans. This well known institution is fully provided with everything necessary for the comfort and convenience of patients

Separate Buildings have been erected for the accommodation of Negroes.

TERMS, including Medical attention, Nursing, Medicines, &c., $15 to $5 per day for Whites; $1 to $2 per day for Negroes.

Extra charges for surgical cases and operations.

T. G. RICHARDSON, M.D.,
Attending Physician and Surgeon.
WARREN STONE, M.D.,
Consulting Physician and Surgeon.

P.S. Special accommodations for females afflicted with Uterine, Vaginal Fistula, Prolapsus and other diseases peculiar to the sex. Also for patients with diseases of the eyes.

SPALDING'S PREPARED GLUE.—SAVE THE Pieces! Economy! Dispatch!

☞ "A STITCH IN TIME SAVES NINE."

Accidents will happen, even in well regulated families, it is very desirable to have some cheap and convenient way for repairing Furniture, Toys, Crockery, &c.

SPALDING'S PREPARED GLUE

meets all such emergencies, and no household can afford to be without it. It is always ready, and up to the sticking point. There is no longer a necessity for limping chairs, spindleless veneers, headless dolls, and broken cradles. It is just the article for combs, shell and other ornamental work, so popular with ladies of refinement and taste.

This admirable preparation is used cold, being chemically held in solution, and possessing all the valuable qualities of the best cabinet makers' Glue. It may be used in the place of ordinary mucilage, being vastly more adhesive.

"USEFUL IN EVERY HOUSE"

N.B.—A Brush accompanies each Bottle. Price 25 cents.

Wholesale Depot, 48 Cedar street, New York.

Address HENRY C. SPALDING & CO
Box No. 3,600, New York.

Put up for Dealers in Cases containing four, eight, and twelve dozen—a beautiful Lithographic Show-Card accompanying each package.

☞ A single bottle of SPALDING'S PREPARED GLUE will save ten times its cost annually to every household. ☜

Sold by all prominent Stationers, Druggists, Hardware and Furniture Dealers, Grocers, and Fancy Stores

Country merchants should make a note of SPALDING'S PREPARED GLUE when making up their list. It will standaway climate jan 25 1y

BIBLE AND TESTAMENTS.—The Largest and finest Varied Supply, South. Binding from 25 Cents each to $27 50 each.

Rich Family Bibles in costly bindings, also smaller Bibles in Velvet and fancy bindings.

Loudon, Oxford and Cambridge Bibles; Eyre and Spottiswoodes, Bagsters, on hand, and ordered.

Hebrew, Greek, Latin, Syriac, and Arabic Scriptures for Ministers and Students.

For Sunday Schools in Louisiana and Southern Mississippi; Testaments at reduced prices, and Pocket Testaments at half price.

Address.—Agent, S. W. Bible Society, Bible House, 1ed Camp street, New Orleans.

MISCELLANEOUS.

NO. 3 CAMP STREET. EUREKA!

SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINES!—FOR PLANTAtion, Family, and Manufacturers' use.—Prices, from $80, $100, $115, $125.

These Machines have no equal; they possess all the latest improvements, the last

NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY A COMMITTEE OF MINISTERS FOR THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH----C. C. GILLESPIE, EDITOR.

VOLUME X.—NUMBER 20. WHOLE NUMBER 483

NEW ORLEANS, WEDNESDAY, MAY 16, 1860.

$2 00 A YEAR, IN ADVANCE OFFICE—112 CAMP ST

PROGRESS OF PROTESTANTISM IN MISSISSIPPI AND THE SOUTHWEST—NO. XIV.

Mr. Editor—Having given what light I could on the main points connected with the origin of Protestantism in Mississippi, I now change my running title, as indicative of the character of my future communications. I presume in no other portion of this Republic has evangelical Christianity in its progress met with more formidable obstacles than in Mississippi and Louisiana. Some of these obstacles have been of a general, and others of a local character. I will briefly refer to the most formidable of them. The country having been alternately under the French and Spanish governments, a large number of the original settlers, especially about the larger towns, and in the southern portions of Louisiana, were French and Spaniards; and were either professed Catholics, or Infidels, according to the school of French philosophy, in either case prejudiced against, if not unchangeably opposed to the doctrines of the Reformation. Even after Catholicism ceased to be maintained by government as the exclusive religion of the land, the Catholic population bed their ecclesiastics interspersed among them, who were ever on the alert to oppose the movements of the Protestant churches. Another opposing element was found in the fact that a large number of the American families had been so long deprived of the public means of grace, and the usual sources of religious instruction, that while the older ones had relapsed into cold indifference, if not habitual wickedness, a whole generation had grown up in ignorance, unbelief and immorality. Another very formidable hindrance to the progress of pure Christianity grew out of the fact, that while the country was under foreign government it was a place of comparative safety for all refugees from civil justice in the United States, whether they were debtors or felons.—Hence, while many worthy adventurers came in quest of good lands for themselves and their posterity; too many came to avoid prosecution for various misdemeanors and crimes. Such were not very promising materials for the gospel ministry to operate upon successfully.

The want of Bibles and religious literature, and of educational advantages in general, was another great impediment in the way of ministerial success. Even at this day I am often surprised to find in the libraries of some of our oldest and most influential families so little of that sort of religious literature which is calculated to enlighten the mind on the great truths of salvation, and to lead the heart from sin to holiness, and from a life of folly and danger to one of entire consecration to God, and a preparation for heaven.

Natchez was the center of commerce for a large scope of country, and its surroundings were very unfavorable to the morals of the inhabitants, especially young men. There was that celebrated school of every grade of licentiousness, known as "Natchez-under-the hill," made up, mostly, in the days of the Provincial and Territorial governments, of bar-rooms, gambling-houses, and brothels of the vilest reputation. These haunts of hydra-headed vice were inhabited by the most degraded and lawless men and women, whose sole object seemed to be to beguile, entrap, and ruin their heedless victims. Every available means was resorted to by these monsters of iniquity to draw the unwary within the circle of this maelstrom of vice and ruin. An opinion, as fitterly at variance with the results of observation and experience, as with the teachings of the Bible, prevailed, even among the more refined and elevated classes of society, in regard to the propriety and safety of visiting these abodes of licentiousness and crime. It was thought to be well enough for young men to make visits of observation to these suburban regions of death and hell, in order to see, that they might become disgusted with such developments of fallen humanity; and many a heedless youth went primarily to gratify "the lust of the eye," which precipitated him onward to the indulgence of "the lust of the flesh," and soon his honor was in the dust, his money in the hands of strangers, his "feet went down to death, and his steps took hold on hell." I think it is best never to see such polluting and dangerous exhibitions of the vilest passions of the most degraded of our race. A man can scarcely become all that he might have been, after having his imagination polluted, and his moral sense perverted by coming in contact with such debasing scenes.

Another fruitful source of dissipation and irreligion was the celebrated St. Catherine Race-course, now known as the Pinesalin Course, in the immediate vicinity of Natchez. When, and by whom, this race-track was originally planned and laid out I cannot tell. I have heard my mother, who was born within a few hundred yards of the track, in 1780, say that she saw racing there when she was a girl. On one occasion a rider was thrown and killed in her sight, which so shocked her feelings that she resolved never to look at another race, which resolution she faithfully kept ever afterwards. This rendezvous of sportsmen has been kept in active operation ever since. But however profitable it may be to improve the blood of horses, or innocent, under some circumstances, to test their fleetness and powers of endurance, I feel that truth requires me to say that the surroundings of the old St. Catherine Course have always been very unfavorable to good morals and true piety. Like the fabled Upas tree of Java, it has poisoned the moral atmosphere in all the region round about. Taking all these things into the account, and others that might be mentioned, we are constrained to acknowledge that gospel seed was never sown upon a more ungracious and unproductive soil. Instead of being found in its native state, which at best is bad indeed, it had been pre-occupied and poisoned by noxious weeds and brambles, which were exceedingly difficult to subdue and displace. In the States immediately north of us the laborers in the Lord's vineyard had virgin soil to cultivate, and while, in the first and second decades of the present century, they were numbering their converts by scores and hundreds, their colaborers here, with more self-sacrifice, and wasting toil, were gathering only a scanty harvest. Fortunately the gospel method of distribution is to "reward every man according to his labor," and not according to his success. But notwithstanding this formidable array of opposing obstacles, the original churches maintained their vitality, and exhibited unmistakable signs of steady, though often slow progress. Of this I shall give some account in my next.

J. G. JONES.

A SNOW STORM IN NEW ENGLAND.

This world is full of beauty. Wherever we turn our eyes, it meets us in all the fascinating forms of the heavens and earth; and if we do not enjoy its genial, soul-inspiring influences, it is because we go through life without looking with an observing eye at the grand panorama passing before our vision. What an endless variety has God displayed in his works, suited to please the taste of the intellectual world, in every season, and climate around this habitable globe! Some sudden display of his evanescent and beautiful creations, out of the ordinary way, surprise and astonish us by their wonderful magnificence; and we look with admiration upon their fading glories, and departing splendor.

But with what calm indifference we view the purple flush of the rising morn, the crimson, scarlet, and golden hues of the setting sun. They lose their brilliancy to the common observer by familiarity with the scenes. Yet, who ever saw two of these splendid views alike? The infinite is visible in the changes of each passing day, which unfolds something new for the observing eye to admire in its varied aspects. The smallest flower which blooms, trampled upon by the thoughtless, speaks of the attributes of God in silent language, more eloquent than that of the most powerful orator. How much is lost in the education of youth, in not directing their attention to this great book of nature! A book, for ever open before us, illustrated with pictures which never fail to please in their varied and beautiful forms of shade and coloring. The eye of a true artist is never weary of studying the symmetry of its forms, or tracing the delicacy of shades blended in harmony with the lovely landscape. If all are not artists, they have the principles of taste, and are capable of perceiving the beautiful in nature, which opens such sources of inexhaustible pleasure to a cultivated mind, without labor or expense. How the pomp and vain glories of the world fade away, compared to these beautiful creations of nature; and that false taste which leads so many astray would be corrected by a contemplation of its scenes.

The highest works of art, which astonish the world, are only imitations of the works which surround us, free to all. The Greeks understood this, and made nature their model for the inspiration of genius, and have left an impress of their intellectual superiority in artistic skill, over all the nations of the earth.

> "Nature never did betray
> The heart that loved her; 'tis her privilege,
> Through all the years of this our life, to lead
> From joy to joy," where God is acknowledged and seen in the variety of his works.

THE SNOW SCENE.

Last night the snow fell five inches deep, to astonish us as we arose in the morning with its strange magnificence, so late in spring.

> "A pure white robe is > Spread over each hill and dale of earth, and
> All the faded, worn out garb of summer,
> Is concealed beneath a pearly covering,
> Emblem of perfect purity; then stealing
> Down, soft as an angel wing, the tracery
> Of shadows fall, and lie in deep repose."

Here we are, surprised with a scene of most singular beauty, enveloped in a mantle—snowy mantle—which covers the whole earth with unrivalled splendor. Every tree, shrub, trellised bower, and woody fence, is adorned with the snow-wreath, light as the fleecy cloud which floats in the blue sky above us. The leafless woodlands, with their opening glades, look like coral groves, for every branch, limb, pendant bough, and twig is hung with its feathery garlands of most delicate fancy work, of exquisite forms.

Such an exhibition of external beauty is seldom seen at this season of the year, in the snowy drapery so gracefully thrown over the earth, with its angelic plumage. Imagination can find no resemblance to the fairy scene but among coral groves in the ocean's bed,

> "Where the purple mullet and gold fish rove," that could possibly equal it. The light snow-flakes hang pendant upon the drooping willow, whose yellow leat-buds form a striking contrast to the chrystal covering through which they shine. The antiquated, moss-grown walls and rocks, look like a mosaic pavement, with delicate tracery work so interlined with soft shadows, that no artistic hand could equal them. The thread of the silvery brook rushes along the slope among the rocks, gemmed with icicles, like jewel drops, radiant with sunbeams. The lilac hedge, just starting into life, is so tastefully adorned with its fleecy robe, studded with diamonds from reflected light, that their beauty almost surpasses the loveliness of spring flowers which will soon enrich them. The sun flashes out from a cerulean sky, of most intense brightness, and the melting drops hang like wreathes of pearl from the bending trees. The little leaf-buds from the trellised vine peep out from their feathery mantle, to give place to the realities of nature's slow progress, which is soon to present another aspect of liveliest green, in striking contrast. Who can paint like nature? Like Ooe who pencil's up the sky, and fringes its drapery of clouds with crimson, scarlet and gold? Hast thou entered into the treasures of snow, or hast thou seen the treasures of hail? How wonderful are the works of God, in wisdom has he made them all. The Infinite is around us, reflecting light from the fountain from whence it radiates, to beautify, enlighten, and diffuse gladness and joy over all the world, and to lead us to Him, where there is fullness of joy, and to his right hand where there are pleasures for evermore.

S. B. THOMAS.

April 21, 1860.

"HE DON'T KNOW THE WORTH OF MONEY."

I was standing near two gentlemen who were engaged in conversation a short time since, and overheard one of them make the above remark about some one of whom they were speaking. I happened to be in a serious mood, and it struck me with considerable force, and I was led to inquire whether the person who made the remark with so much self-complacency, himself, knew the worth money; for a person may prove his ignorance of the true value of a commodity as much by over-estimating as by undervaluing it. In this view of the subject it is to be feared that very few know the worth of money. Perhaps none but the dying can estimate it properly.

The man who suffers the love of money to shut the love of God out of his heart, and whose thoughts are so occupied by schemes and plans of money making that he cannot take time to think about God or heaven, certainly does not know the worth of money.

He that sacrifices justice and truth, that will be guilty of dishonesty, and betrays the trust confided in him, for any amount of money, has entirely over estimated its value, and of such it may with propriety be said, "he don't know the worth of money."

The man of wealth who is still toiling and harrassing himself to increase his store, who totally neglects his moral and religious culture; suffering his evil passions and unsanctified tempers and desires to rankle in his heart, watching his pecuniary interests with the utmost vigilance, while manifesting the greatest recklessness in regard to his spiritual welfare, evidently don't know the worth of money.

The parent who faithfully instils into his children the love of wealth, while he shows but very little interest for the salvation of their souls; who often instructs and warns them upon temporal interests, but rarely admonishes them about the evil of sin and the danger of losing their souls, and feels more anxiety for their temporal prosperity than, for their eternal well being, don't know the worth of money.

He that never gives to benevolent objects, or that does not give in proportion to his income; and regards every person who approaches him for a subscription for the promotion of some laudable object, calculated to elevate the moral and intellectual character of mankind, as an enemy having evil designs upon him, and who regards every dollar thus appropriated as so much cast into the sea and lost forever, don't know the worth of money.

Whoso thinks that money will make him happy, secure him true friendship, or make him truly respectable, while he disregards the rights and privileges of others, is proud, imperious and selfish, unjust and oppressive, has over estimated money, and don't know its worth.

Money is a very useful article and can command a great many of the luxuries and comforts of life; but there are several things it cannot do.

Money cannot make a man happy while his heart is not right with God.

Money cannot deliver the soul from the punishment of sin.

Money cannot bribe disease and death.

Money cannot make a happy death bed.

Money cannot purchase heaven for the soul.

Money may build a splendid tomb, but it cannot bribe the worms.

Let all, therefore, learn the worth of money, and use world as not abusing it, seeing the fashion of it is passing away.

S.

DR. CAPERS AT OTTER INN.

A writer in the Methodist Protestant, who calls himself Oliver Wyanoke, is furnishing a series of very racy and graphic articles, entitled "Reminiscences of Otter Inn." This unobtrusive but pleasant hotel is located in the State of Virginia, in the neighborhood of the celebrated Peaks of Otter, from which it takes its name.—These "peaks"—there are two of them—rising like giant breasts on the bosom of nature, may be classed among the wonders of the Old Dominion, with Harper's Ferry and the Natural Bridge. Otter Inn, we predict, is destined to become more noted from this visit of the somewhat mysterous but highly accomplished stranger, Oliver Wyanoke, than from the celebrity of its mountainous location. The third number of the series contains an exceedingly interesting account of an incident which occurred at "Otter Inn," while Doctor Wyanoke was guest there, in which the principal actors were the Dr. himself, and the Rev. Dr. Capers, afterwards Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

"For several days nothing material occurred at Otter Inn. The children went fishing on the margin of the river, but their hooks were nothing more than bent pins. They took no spoil of consequence. It was agreeable enough to smoke, and then nap awhile in my arm chair, or pass to the cow-pen, as Jonner did in the vale of Gloucester, and talk with our milk woman.

"We had, however, two mails in the week, and who is it, since Cowper's time, that does not love the horn of the post-boy? News, news—letters, letters. Our mails, however, were rather scanty, and the sensations they awakened were like vapors which appear for a little time and then vanish away. But upon returning one evening from the milking, a person was seated in my chair on the porch. Any one could have seen that he was a gentleman sooner than you could whistle Jack Robinson.—He rose to give me the chair. Not at all, I remarked, that chair is for the weary, and you shall not beat me in politeness. At that he resumed his seat. There was great suavity in his manner. He was bald, and he certainly fell quite below the six feet and four inches of General Scott. He told me that he had been North, but was returning South, intending to take the Greenbrier Springs in his route. Your health, then, is delicate? Quite so, he replied. My respiration is at times quite difficult, and the spasms are truly distressing. Dr. Bree, of London, I observed, has written a book on asthma, and he recommends an electuary of sulphur, rhubarb and steel dust. Oh! said he, a score of remedies have been tried; but they are all unavailing.

"He was a little uneasy at the time of our colloquy; but it struck me that a cup of Mocha might help him, and we were just then called in to supper. Don't take that cheese, said I to the valetudinarian; but he kept nibbling at it like a perch at a hook. That disease of yours is very insidious. You are easier for a monopoly, and hence you presume. Take that cheese off, continued I to the maid servant, even if it should have come from one of the Cheshire dairy farms. Were you ever in England? he enquired. Never; owing to the want of pecuniary dust. You are probably, then, a Virginia doctor. No; but there is not a doctor in the Old Dominion equal to myself in the curing of asthma. Cure me, then, he replied, and you may own my rice plantation in South Carolina. It shall be done, I answered; and that without your paying me even a rice weevil.—To all of them you are welcome, and one crop beside, he said, laughing.

"The stranger and Egn resumed our positions on the porch, after my intimating to Mrs. Irving the importence of giving him a hair bed for the night. We resumed conversation. It was a lovely night. A red harvest moon was afloat on high; the Junes was slightly murmuring; the regal peaks were communing with their Maker; the Otters were all drowned in sleep; the goats, restiff all day, had stopped their ramblings; and the birds had snuggled themselves up in their nests. How silent, save that the bucket went down once or twice into the well, the margin of which was mossy.

"You have probably, said I, been to England. Once, and that only four or five moons. Was at Haddon Hall, the seat of Clarke, the commentator. Then, I said, you must be a follower of Wesley? Only so far, he rejoined, as Wesley followed our Divine Master. It would give me pleasure, I said, to talk with you about England for half the night. We have only glanced to and fro at the country. But Dr. Wynnoke insists upon it that his patient must retire. The moral dew of heaven may be turned to pearls of silvery whiteness, but the moisture of nature may precipitate you in pain, and the night has reached its dew point. It has, he answered, and the world of grace is not without its dew-points, and its light shower-points, and cloud-points, and its bright weather-points.

"He retired. But who can tell what a night may bring forth? Dr. Chalmers once spent a night at Peebles, and a friend of his who was with him died in an hour. He himself was called away in a night. The same of Whitefield. And to be Caricyluish, once more we will just write, Whitefield.

"Captain Irving had promised me on his next trip to Liberty, that he would get a blank book in which to register all the wayfarers. This promise had not yet been fulfilled. And before closing my winkers, my conjectures were afloat as to who the interesting stranger might be; but a conscience at rest soon rocked me to sleep.

"About two hours perhaps had elapsed when my door was opened, and our landlord entered without a lantern, for the moon was bright as silver. He shook me. The gentleman's dying. Came to consult you about sending Frank to Buchannan after the doctor. Not at all, I remarked. It's asthma. Dr. Wyanoke is something more than quack, or Thompsonian, or homœopathist. I'll soon put him to sleep on a Hybian honeycomb, instead of a mammoth cheese. Haste, then, quick, for he is gasping. My blue stockings and capote were drawn on, and the doctor hurried to his patient.

"The patient was sitting up in bed, with the pillows for his supports, for a horizontal position suffocates an asthmatic. Dry or moist? said I to the patient. Moist.—Then, said I, fling up the windows. Put back the shutters. Mrs. Irving, get all the fans about the house. A Sydenham, or a Cullen, or a Boerhave must be obeyed. Patient, open your mouth and inhale the air as we ply the fans. Send down for my arm chair. Come, get up and take an erect posture. Heat vinegar, and put it into a coffeepot. Put your mouth to the spout, whilst Dr. Wyanoke lifts up the lid, and take the acid into the air cells. Any easier? Somewhat. The tight cord on the lungs somewhat relaxed. Good; your lungs will soon be playing like birds in the air. Get me an ounce of salt petre. Dissolve it in hot water. Bring me some brown paper. Put the papers into the water. Let them get saturated. Dry them down stairs. Ignite them and fumigate my chair. Drink in the fragrance, patient, as if you were in a saltpetre Spanish cave. How are you getting on? Tolerably. Good, better, and best of all. Get back to bed, and fall into the Paradise of sleep. Hope Adam never had the asthma, said the patient, as he lay down on his mattress. Never mind him; but do you take just such a sleep as Adam took when our mother, Eve, was taken from his side. Good night, said he. Mrs. Capers will be much obliged to Dr. Wyanoke. Possible, said I; are you Dr. Capers, destined to be a Bishop? But your Eve need not be concerned about her flunks, for the same would have been done for any Bishop in the Canterbury or Aberdeen line. You just go to sleep. At one time quack doctors used to wander all over Italy. He muttered out, you are no quack, and he was among all the poppies and narcotics, and we all retired, closing his door.

"It was midday when my patient came down to the porch. Take my chair, said I, as he approached. A motion, said he, has taken me to get on in the direction of Fincastle. Dr. Wyanoke, answered I, forbids. We are making you a large bundle of saltpetres, which you must stow away into your saddle-bags, and when you get home you must make yourself a pair of cratches upon which to exercise ten minutes a day. They will expand the chest; and then your cure will be perfect.

"He spent with us the afternoon and night, and left next morning. On riding off, he divided a dollar between Frank, who had carried his horse, and his wife, who had heated the vinegar. The writer never saw him afterwards; but he was a liberal man in his religion, for he had given me in conversation a most interesting sketch of Dr. Henry Kollock, of Savannah. It was nearer Wirt's account of the Organ County preacher than anything Wyanoke had ever heard. Nearly the same sketch Bishop Capers wrote out for Dr. Sprague, of Albany, and it is printed in the Annals of the American Pulpit."

In connection with this anecdote, we would remark that, in our estimation, one of the finest pieces of autobiography we have ever read, is that of Bishop Capers, published since his lamented death by, we think, the Southern Publishing House at Nashville.—Baltimore Christian Advocate.

SKETCHES OF THE NORTHERN METHODIST BISHOPS.

At present there are six bishops:—Rev. Thomas A. Morris of Cincinnati, elected in 1836; Rev. E. S. Janes, in 1844; and Rev. Matthew Simpson of Chicago, Levi Scott of Wilmington, Del.; Rev. O. C. Baker of Concord, N. H., and Rev. E. R. Ames of Indianapolis, Ind., all elected in 1852.

BISHOP MORRIS.

Bishop Morris is a native of Kentucky, where he grew up to manhood, and commenced his ministry. His education was good, though not liberal, but by diligence and good natural parts he soon attained to eminence.—Having served as circuit preacher and presiding elder, he was made Book Agent at Cincinnati in 1828, editor in 1832, and Bishop in 1836. He is now nearly seventy years old, the senior Bishop, a portly and well-to-do old gentleman, taciturn but genial, a good but not brilliant preacher, and a decidedly respectable rather than great man. His Southern proclivities are supposed to be pretty strong, and he has a son who is a preacher in the Southern Methodist Church.

BISHOP JANES.

Bishop Janes is a native of Connecticut, but his early life was passed in New Jersey, where he first entered the Methodist ministry. He continued in the regular pastoral work only a few years, relinquishing it to act as agent for Dickinson College. About 1836 he was transferred to New York, where he remained in the pastoral work for four years. He was afterwards made one of the secretaries of the American Bible Society, in furtherance of a plan, inaugurated some years before, to bring the Methodist denomination fully to the support of the American Bible Society, which previously had not been the case. This work he successfully accomplished.

He is about fifty-four years of age, a man of medium hight, a little inclined to corpulency, and generally of a good physique. His voice is peculiar—a kind of double falsetto, which, however, becomes deeper and more sonorous as he grows warm and animated in his discourse.—As a preacher, he is earnest and zealous, yet not eloquent. His sermons are distinguished for their hortatory style. As an administrative officer he is diligent and painstaking—"in labors abundant." He is constitutionally careful, and on all stirring questions is generally found on the conservative side.

BISHOP SIMPSON.

Bishop Simpson, a native of Western Pennsylvania, was a student in Allegheny College. In 1836 he entered the Pittsburg Conference, and was stationed successively at Pittsburg and Wheeling. In 1839 he was chosen President of Asbury University in Indiana, where he remained till 1848, when he was appointed editor of The Western Christian Advocate at Cincinnati. Four years later he was chosen Bishop. He is rather above the medium size, with heavy shoulders, and stooping, brown hair, and sallow complexion. His voice at the beginning of his discourse, is flat and whining, but it soon deepens and becomes musical. His elocution, though violating all the rules of the masters, is both pleasant and vigorous, and he exerts that peculiar magnetic power by means of which other minds willingly yield to his influence.—As a preacher he ranks in the first class, both as to matter and manner.

Bishop Simpson (accompanied by Dr. McClintock) visited Europe in 1857, as official visitors to the English Wesleyan Conference. They attended the meeting of the Evangelical Alliance at Berlin, and with the Rev. Dr. Nast, of Cincinnati, (a native German,) and Gov. Wright, the American minister at Berlin, (who is a Methodist,) gave quite a Methodistic character to the American delegation to that body. He then extended his travels through Greece and Palestine, returning by way of Constantinople, the Black Sea, and the Danube. For nearly a year after his return he was prostrated by sickness.

He is constitutionally a "progressive," but the Episcopal office holds him in check. In 1850-51, when the Fugitive-slave Law was first promulgated, as editor of The Western Christian Advocate he uttered strong words against its iniquity, and generally he has been recognized as an anti-slavery man. In private he is genial and communicative, and as a presiding officer he is able, ready, and pleasing. He is by many esteemed the most able man on the Methodist Episcopal bench of Bishops.

BISHOP SCOTT.

Bishop Scott was born near Wilmington, Del., about the beginning of the present century. The field of his ministerial labors has been chiefly in the city of Philadelphia and the surrounding region. He is a man of medium size, with sandy hair and beard, a pale complexion, and a calm and dignified expression. He is a good speaker, and an able minister. Though usually in rather delicate health, he performs a great amount of labor, for besides a fair share of the duties of attending annual conferences at home, he has, in the eight years of his Episcopate, visited Africa once, and the Pacific States twice. Personally he is not old-fogyish, and it is believed that on the subject of slavery his instincts and judgment are on the side of freedom; though the latitude of his birth and residence, as well as his official position, exercise a constraint upon his naturally spontaneous disposition.

BISHOP BAKER.

Bishop Baker is a native of New Hampshire. He is about fifty years old, five feet ten inches in hight, slightly corpulent, with dark hair, florid countenance, an aquiline nose, gold-spectacled, and a small and closely shut mouth. He was educated at the Wesleyan University, at Middletown, Ct., and during his earlier years was a teacher in Vermont and New Hampshire. He held the pastoral office one year, and that of presiding elder two years; and when the Theological School at Concord was organized, he accepted one of its professorships, from the chair of which in 1852, he was called to the office of Bishop.

As a preacher, Bishop Baker is rather scholarly than oratorical. His sermons are all finished productions, often delivered from the manuscript, or memoriter, clear and pointed in style. As a presiding officer he excels in his knowledge of Methodist law and precedents, and his ready recollection of passages.

BISHOP AMES.

Bishop Ames is a native of Ohio, but of the old Massachusetts stock; raised a few years over fifty; of medium height, and thick-set; dark, ruddy complexion, and a fine, robust physique. He was educated at one of the Western Colleges, and was for a short time Professor at Augusta College, in Kentucky. While yet a young man he was appointed presiding elder in Indiana, contributing largely to the ascendency of Methodism in that state, and becoming personally acquainted with its territory and people. Rumor has it that his knowledge of the country has had other than purely ecclesiastical results; that valuable investments in public lands, by the aid of such knowledge, have been made by himself and his friends. And so generally have these operations proved safe and profitable, that it has become in certain circles, a proverb in Indiana, that "a scheme in which the Bishop has a hand is sure to succeed." Settling early in the State, when society was assuming its shape and character, he entered zealously into all its social and, to some extent, into its political affairs; and it has been said that in more than one instance his personal influence controlled the state election.

In 1846 he was appointed one of the Corresponding Secretaries of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, with the special oversight of the missions on the frontier, both among whites and Indians. In this capacity he traversed the whole frontier from Lake Superior to Texas, visiting the outposts of civilization, and the Indian tribes. At the first session of the Choctaw Legislative Council in the West he was chosen their chaplain, and aided them by his counsels in forming their form of government. From 1844 to 1852 he exercised the office of presiding elder in Indiana, still further moulding the character of Methodism in that state, especially in the department of Education. In 1852, he was elected Bishop.

As a preacher he is sound, earnest, and argumentative, with a sharp and untunable voice, and but little ornamentation of style. As an administrative officer he has few superiors, while his natural powers of strategy, had he been a politician, would have made him a formidable antagonist. In his early life, his political affinities were with the old Democratic school, but on account of the mutilations of that party he is no longer of it, nor in sympathy with its leading doctrines. His instincts are clearly with the progressive measures of the denomination, on slavery as well as others,—but Methodist bishops are compelled to be prudent.—N. Y. Independent.

HOW TO BEAR LITTLE TROUBLES.

There is a kind of narrowness into which in our every day experiences we are apt to fall, and against which we should more carefully guard. When a man who is in perfect health has a wound inflicted upon him, a wound in his foot, a cut on his finger, a pain in his hand—he is always sure to feel, though it be a small member that suffers, and the suffering itself be unworthy the name, that the perfect soundness of all the rest of his body counts as nothing; and a little annoyance is magnified into a universal pain. Only a single point may be hurt, and yet he feels himself clothed with uncasiness, as with a garment of torture. So God may send ten thousand mercies upon us, but if there happen to be only one discomfort among them, one little worry, or fret, or bicker, all the mercies and all the comforts are forgotten, and counted as nothing! There may be an innumerable train of mercies which, if they were stopped one by one, and questioned, would seem like angels bearing God's gifts in their hands! But we forget them all in the remembrance of the most trivial inconvenience! A man may go about all day long—discontented, fretting, out of humor—who, at evening, can ask himself the question, "What has ailed me to day?" may be filled with shame, unable to tell! The annoyance is so small and slight that he cannot recognize it, yet its power over him is almost incredible. He is equally ashamed with the cause and its result.

We may fall into such a state merely through indifference, and remain there simply because we have fallen into it, and make no effort to get out. When a man starts wrong early in the morning, unless he is careful to set himself right before he has gone far, he will hardly be able to straighten out his crookedness until noon or afternoon—if haply then; for a man is like a large ship, he cannot turn round in a small space and must make his sweep, in a large curve. If we wake up with a heavenly mind we are apt to carry it through the day; but if we wake up with a fretful, peevish, discontented disposition, we are apt to carry that all the day, and the next day too! I have comforted myself, and risen out of this state of mind by saying to myself, "Well, you are in trouble, something has come upon you which is painful; but will you let it clasp its arms around you, and shut you in its embrace from the sight of all the many other things that are accounted joys? Will you suffer yourself to be harnessed and driven by it?" It is well to remember that there is a way of overcoming present troubles by a recognition of present or promised mercies. The Apostle Paul knew this, and so exhorted as to "look unto Jesus, who for the joy that was set before him, endured the cross, despising the shame." All that Christ had to bear he bore patiently—he carried his sorrow about him as a very little thing. Why? Because of the "joy that was set before him!" Oh! let us apply the exhortation faithfully to ourselves; and when we are worried, and tempted to give way to vexation, let us seek a sweet relief in the thought of the blessedness that is set before us to be an inheritance forever.

M. Saffi and Father Gavazzi have published declarations giving in their adhesion to the vote of the annexation of Tuscany and Piedmont.

A CEREMONY IN JAPAN.

They have a Pope, it seems, at Japan, who resides in the city of Minko, which is forbidden ground to all foreigners. This Mikado, or sovereign Pontiff, is an object of adoration not only to the Japanese, but to the Buddhists, and even to the followers of Confucius. Although monogamy is the ordinary law of the empire, the Mikado is privileged to have and to hold no less than one hundred wives, one of whom, the Ohnhime, becomes at once his spouse and his mother. The ceremony of selecting this duplicate character occurred recently at the above named holy city, amid great pomp and ceremony, in which all the high priests and astrologers of the country participated. The streets leading to the palace were strewn with flowers, white drapery was suspended from the dwellings, and men and women of every grade surrounded the numerous temples. Soon the high priest appeared in his rich vestments, followed by more than three thousand friars and deans, who served as his escort, and proceeded to the palace. At noon the curtain was drawn, and a brilliant scene was presented.—In the centre of a circle enclosure a throne was erected, composed of wide-spreading sheets of gold, adorned with innumerable precious stones, while a fine silver gauze formed a canopy above it. The young Mikado was seated on a mat upon the floor, dressed in a long white gown, with a golden mitre on his head. Opposite to him were eighty-eight women, clothed in all imaginable colors, while twelve young girls were ranged around the enclosure, wearing white robes and crowns of flowers.—Suddenly the noise of gongs spread dismay among the throng. The pontiff rose, and went a few paces from the throne, whereupon the retinue of officials presented themselves before him. A second gong-beating caused the assembly to prostrate themselves before him, whilst he implored the protection of the gods for Japan. At the third sounding of the gongs, he, in turn, knelt, when the high priest of Dauniozine spread a veil over him.—Then, to the sound of music, he made a circuit of the enclosure, and stopping before one of the girls, he covered her face with this veil, took her by the hand, and conducted her to the centre of the throne, to be forever hid from eyes profane. She was immediately proclaimed the sister, wife and mother of the Mikados, under the title of Ohnhime. The ceremony over, splendid fetes were held in Miake, which continued for eight days.—Alms were freely distributed to the poor, and considerable sums of money scattered at the temples and convents of the empire.

A LOUISIANA PICTURE.

Mr. John Antrobus, whose picture entitled Cotton Picking was mentioned in this paper about a year ago, has just completed the second of a series of works illustrative life and scenery in the South, which we have had an opportunity of seeing at a well known establishment on Canal street, where it has been put into frame. The size of the picture is, we presume, about five feet by four. The subject is a negro funeral on a Louisiana plantation. A group of negroes engaged in the burial, an overseer in the distance on one side, a planter with his daughter in the distance on the other side, and a landscape of thick set forest trees skirting the Mississippi river, form the foreground and background, the life and the nature of the picture. The design is as original as ambitious—perhaps it is even hazardous; but the execution, while not without discrimination, is certainly vigorous and gorgeous. The time is evening, the season spring, and the warm glow of a Southern sun guilds the fleecy clouds and bathes the forest of mossy cypress, sycamore, oak, and gum, with a sort of a liquid splendor which banishes those deep shadows which would otherwise give the landscape the appearance of a dismal swamp. We say the design is perhaps hazardous; for the canons of art, whether justly always or not, forbid the introduction of character and natural scenery as prominent features in the same picture. Such a combination, say art-critics, is incongruous, since there is a lack of harmonious predominance and subordination in the several parts. It produces, say they, the same discord in painting, which excess of science accessory in connection with acting produces in the drama. However that may be, we do not see how the artist in this case could develop his general design of representing Southern scenery and life in a series of works, without delineating character and landscape in the same view.—Certainly, judged according to the requirements of such a design, his achievements possess distinguished merit for originality, strength, and fullness. We should like to enter more minutely into the examination of this boldly conceived and richly wrought work, but for the present must content ourselves with the brief mention already made.—Delta.

THE OTHER LIFE.

As I grow older, and come nearer to death, I look upon it more and more with complacent joy, and out of every longing I hear God say, "O thirsting, hungering one, come to me." What the other life will bring I know not, only that I shall awake in God's likeness, and see him as he is. If a child had been born and spent all his life in the Mammoth Cave, how impossible would it be for him to comprehend the upper world! His parents might tell him of its life and light, and beauty, and its sounds of joy; they might heap up the sand into mounds, and try to show him by pointing to artificial things, grass, and flowers, and trees grow out of the ground, till at length, with laborious thinking, the child would fancy he had gained a true idea of the unknown land. And yet, though he longed to behold it, when the day came that he was to go forth, it would be with regret for the familiar crystals, and the rock-hewn rooms, and the quiet that reigned therein. But when he came up some May morning, with ten thousand birds singing in the trees, and the heavens bright, and blue, and full of sunlight, and the wind blowing softly through the young leaves, all a-glitter with dew, and the landscape stretching away green and beautiful to the horizon, with what rapture would he gaze about him, and see how poor were all the fancyings and the interpretations made within the cave, of the things which grew and lived without; and how would he wonder that he could have regretted to leave the silence and the dreary darkness of his old abode! So, when we emerge from this cave of earth into that land where Spring growths are, and where is Summer, and not that miserable travestie which we call Summer here, how shall we wonder that we could have clung so fondly to this dark and barren life.

But on, then, O heart, and yearn for dying. I have drunk at many a fountain, but thirst came again; I have fed at many a bounteous table, but hunger returned; I have seen many bright and lovely things, but while I gazed their lustre faded. There is nothing here that can give me rest; but when I shall behold thee, O God, I shall be satisfied!

PROTESTANTS AND ROMAN CATHOLICS IN PRUSSIA.

A comparison of the ecclesiastical statistics of Prussia from 1849 to 1859 establishes the fact that the increase of Protestants during this period has been considerably larger than that of Roman Catholics. The number of Protestants has increased from 10,016,798 to 10,861,965, or about 8 1-2 per cent; that of Roman Catholics from 6,079,613 to 6,556,827, which is less than 8 per cent. In 1849 there were for every 1,000 Protestants 606 Roman Catholics; in 1858 only 603. The larger increase of Protestants is, however, almost limited to the time from 1849 to 1855; from 1855 to 1858 the numerical proportion of the two Churches remained almost unchanged. The official censuses, which are taken every third year, give also the complete ecclesiastical statistics of every province and district. Children, as in all European censuses which include the ecclesiastical statistics, are counted to the denomination of their parents. The New Evangelical Church Gazette, of Berlin, gives many interesting details on the proportional increase of the two Churches in various provinces. In two provinces, Brandenburg and Silesia, and in particular in the capital of the state, Berlin, the Roman Catholics have, in consequence of immigration, increased in a larger ratio than the Protestants. In the other six provinces, especially in Posen, the Protestants are ahead. A great many false statements and rumors (for example, concerning the extraordinary progress of the Roman Church in several districts) have been refuted by the statistics; and it has become generally apparent that a more careful study of the ecclesiastical statistics will not only furnish the most reliable information on the history of religious denominations, but that it will call the attention of the Churches to many wants and interests of the Church that had formerly been overlooked. In Prussia it has in particular given a new impulse to the support of many new congregations, which have been of late founded in Roman Catholic districts.

The population of Baltimore is about 250,000; that of Boston about 229,000.

CARLYLE UPON COLERIDGE.

The following, besides being a most admirable specimen of Carlyle's peculiar style, conveys a vivid idea of the conversational powers of Coleridge:

I still recollect his "object and subject," terms of continual recurrence in the Kantean province; and how he sang and sniffed them into "om-m-mj-ect" and "sum-m-mj-ect" with a kind of solemn shake or quiver as he rolled along. To sit as a passive bucket and be pumped into, whether you consent or not, can in the long run be exhilarating to no creature, how eloquent soever the flood of utterance that is descending. But if it be withal a confused, unintelligible flood of utterance, threatening land-marks of thought and drown the world and you!

I have heard Coleridge talk with eager, musical energy, two stricken hours, his face radient and moist, and containing no meaning whatsoever to any individual of his hearers; certain of whom, I, for one, still kept eagerly listening in hope; the most had long before been given up, and formed (if the rooms were large enough) secondary humming groups of their own. He began anywhere; you put some question, made some suggestive observation; instead of answering this, or decidedly setting out toward answer of it, he would accommodate formidable apparatus, logical swim-bladders, transcendental life-preservers, and other precautionary and vehiculatory gear, for setting out; perhaps he did at last get under way; but was swiftly solicited, turned aside by the glance of some radiant new game on this hand or that, into new courses, and ever into new; and before long into all this universe, where it was uncertain what game you would catch, or whether any.

IRVING'S EARLY ATTACHMENT.

Mr. Bryant, in his eulogy upon Washington Irving, relates the following incident in his life, and which had so marked an influence upon his character:

It was during this interval (1809 to 1819) that an event took place which had a marked influence on Irving's future life, affected the character of his writings, and now that

New Orleans Christian Advocate.

Terms—$2 00 per annum, in advance.

NEW ORLEANS:

WEDNESDAY, MAY 16, 1860.

ONLY $1 25 FROM 1st MAY.

From the first of May till the end of the year, the price of the Advocate will be only $1 25. We suggest to our Agents and friends to make a unanimous and vigorous effort to send us a thousand subscribers to commence with that issue. Make a special push for it, brethren, if you please.

A FEW WORDS ABOUT SCHOOLS.

The proper culture of our youth is a subject of paramount interest to every true parent and intelligent member of society. God has entrusted to our care these precious gems of immortality, the youth of our land, to whose charge we must, in turn, leave the highest interests of humanity. How we may secure to them the inestimable blessing of a sound moral and intellectual culture, combining the principles and energies necessary to success in life, in the true sense, is one of the most solemn questions of our hearts. We may answer, generally, by providing for them proper discipline of the intellect, the heart, and the tastes; first in the family, and then in the school. But it is not enough that we are to send them to school, even after careful training at home; for how often do we see the precious seed so patiently sown by the parent eradicated at school by improper associations, and the loathsome weeds of vice planted in their stead! This, it must be admitted, is too common to need illustration. It is better, however, even to run this risk, than to consign these hopeful buds to the blight of ignorance. After all, the temptations of evil associations cannot be wholly avoided, and the only sure safe-guard against them is, sound home culture, home example, and home influence. But the evil should be avoided, if possible. In addition to colleges and seminaries, under special religious influences, there should be more pains taken to provide proper home and neighborhood schools throughout the country. As a rule, in the majority of the communities concerned, either from inexperience, indolence, or selfishness, entirely too little attention is given to these matters, considering the commendable zeal recently exhibited in the cause of education by our people. In any ordinary business we are careful to secure the best workmen or agents, without regard to difficulty or price; but when a teacher, an artificer of the immortal mind, whose influence must be seen and felt for time and eternity, is to be employed, almost any tyro, of whatever grade of mind or habits, is engaged, provided he agrees for an easy stipulation, and "keeps in" during the "regular hours." Alexander the Great would allow none but the inimitable Apelles to transmit his features to the canvas for posterity; but we often permit a mere blunderer to shape the outlines, and even daub the more delicate hues upon the canvas of the immortal character. "We can do no better than employ such as we do," is often the excuse. But this is a mistake. The supply will invariably accommodate itself to the demand. If any sort of a straggling pedagogue, with a smooth tongue, and India-rubber sentiments, or other person wishing a temporary stepping-stone to a more desirable employment, still be encouraged, then such can readily be had. If, however, a firm stand be taken against such pretenders, and liberal rewards, with proper scrutiny, be brought to bear so as to make the profession profitable and honorable, the best talent of the South may be engaged in this, one of the highest of callings. Thanks to that more liberal and enlightened policy which is already proving the feasibility of this plan by practical illustrations in some of the more favored places. With instructors morally and intellectually qualified, the way is open and easy. The sympathy and co-operation of the parents, the child's natural guardians, by the help of God, are now only wanting, and the laborious task of the faithful teacher becomes pleasant and intensely interesting, as he patiently watches and aids the developing mind, growing up for God and usefulness.

* * *

THAT ITEM OF SECRET HISTORY.

We quote the following from the Nashville Christian Advocate:

We have seldom seen any one so distressed about an "item" as was the editor of the Baltimore Advocate after perpetrating that item of secret history about Bishop Bascom. He gave it to the incredulous public some time back, impugning the consistency, veracity, sincerity, and integrity of that good man. He felt his position to be an awkward one—putting forth such a story, after such lapse of time, without any show of proof or allusion to proof. The onus weighed heavily. He was restless, and desired to be drawn out on the subject.

He objected to our notice of the item—could not bring out his reserve corps on such a challenge, and gave us a short lecture on Christian courtesy and manners.—The remarks of the New Orleans Advocate almost drew him out, but there was a defect in its rhetorical allusions. Our brother of New Orleans intimated that such conduct reminded one of the hyena and the thug. Now, hyenas go after the dead, thugs the living. At last, about to despair of an opportunity to bring forth his "good authority" for abusing a dead man, and to rid himself of a conscious awkwardness of position, the Baltimore editor finds relief:

"Since writing the above, we have seen the St. Louis Advocate, which notices the matter in a respectful manner, and asks us for our authorship in proper language. In reply, we state that we obtained the information from Rev. Alfred Griffith, who, however, did not expect us to publish it. If there is any impropriety in the publication, we only are responsible: for the truth of the story Brother Griffith vouches, and all who know him will be satisfied with his testimony. Whether any other living witness to the truth remains we do not know. We would not have published the 'item' if we had thought that Brother Griffith would object to it; we do not know that he does object to it; but it is due to him to say that he did not give it to us for publication."

Lame and impotent conclusion! Is that all? We have seen nothing in the Baltimore Advocate so morally damaging to it as this attack on the dead. The matter had dropped from our notice, till an indignant Kentuckian called on us the other day—Bascom's bosom friend, co-delegate and counsellor—who asked what the Baltimore man had to say further. How emphatically he denounced the item, it is beyond our limits to say.

The utter inability of Dr. Bond to produce any adequate proof, or even any plausible excuse, for what all must regard as a most wanton outrage of the ordinary decencies of a Christian country, is the reason we have not heretofore deemed his rhetorical evasions in reply to us, as worthy of notice. The body of his article is an argument to prove that if he is a "hyena" he cannot be a "thug." Granting his correctness, an objection to our rhetoric is no reply to our arguments; and, in so grave a case as this, such an attempt to hide is, at once, proof of the weakness of his cause, and of the same lack of refined sensibility which led him to commit the first offense.

But we are not willing to let him enjoy even the thin rhetorical shelter he has chosen.

He says a hyena outrages the graves of the dead, and a thug struggles the living. True, but while Bascom himself is dead, his reputation is living; and Dr. Bond's course, without any very great stretch of figurative language, may very properly be spoken of as an outrage on the repose of the dead, and upon the noble memory which survives him, and which he has attempted to destroy.—It is said of thugs that when they manufacture their murderous pickaxe, a lucky day is chosen; the door is closed, and the work proceeds; when completed, it is consecrated to the goddess, and one well versed in thug traditions receives it on a brazen dish.

SUNDAY SCHOOL ANNIVERSARY AT FRANKLIN, LA.—The Banner contains an interesting description of the recent anniversary of the Methodist Sunday School at Franklin, Rev. B. F. White, Pastor, Dr. J. C. Gordy, Superintendent. The School is represented as highly prosperous, and the anniversary as exceedingly joyous.

THE NEW AMERICAN CYCLOPEDIA.

A POPULAR DICTIONARY OF GENERAL KNOWLEDGE.—Edited by George Ripley and Charles A. Dana. Vol. IX. Hayne—Jersey City. New York: D. Appleton & Co. Boston: Elliott & White.

This work embraces all departments and topics of human knowledge. Without such a work a fortune would not purchase the books necessary to the acquirement of similar knowledge, nor a life-time afford opportunities to procure them. The volumes of this valuable work succeed each other with commendable regularity. The present volume has many articles of interest, and our readers will be glad to know the prominent writers.

The biographical articles are from the pens of Wm. Gilmore Sims, Charles G. Leland, Charles C. Hazewell, John W. Francis, James Freeman Clarke, Henry Carey Baird, J. A. Spencer, Robert Carter; the scientific contributions are by Dr. S. Kneeland, Jr., Dr. E. Brown Sequard, Edmund P. Blunt; the legal papers are by Prof. T. Parsons; those on language, by Dr. Charles Kraitsir; and among other contributors may be named Prof. H. B. Smith, President C. C. Felton, Prof. H. Schem, E. G. Squier, John R. Bartlett, Frank H. Storer, John Esten Cooke. Among the living characters of whom biographies are given, are Paul H. Hayne, G. P. A. Healy, Rev. Frederic H. Hedge, D. D., Arthur Helps, Rev. L. P. Hickock, Thomas Hicks, Edward Hildreth, Rev. Thomas Hill, George S. Hilliard, Rev. Edward Hitchcock, L. L. D., Richard M. Hoe, Oliver Wendell Holmes, M. D., Rev. John Hopkins, D. D., Rev. Mark Hopkins, D. D., Harriet Hosmer, W. H. C. Hosmer, Sam Houston, Elias Howe, Jr., Samuel G. Howe, M. D., Julia Ward Howe, Wm. Howitt, Mary B. Howitt, Rev. Father Hue, Bell Hughes, Most Rev. Archbishop Hughes, Victor Hugo, Heman Humphrey, D. D., Robert M. T. Hunter, Daniel Huntington, Rev. Frederic D. Huntington, Capt. Duncan, Nathaniel Ingraham, Charles T. Jackson, M. D., James Jackson, M. D., G. P. R. James, Henry James, James Jarves.

Those who desire a sort of universal library, in a condensed and cheap form, should procure this work by all means.

THE WASHINGTON CITY CHURCH.

Hon W. H. Hammett, of Point Worthington, Miss., proposes to be one of one hundred, who will each give $100 to Wm. T. Smithson, to aid in building the Washington City Church. He also proposes to be one of twenty to give $500 each for the same purpose. These are propositions which ought to be promptly met. The two, if completed, will raise $20,000. Let the responses come promptly from all parts of the country. And let all our brethren and friends remember that one Presbyterian gentleman in Louisiana gave $25,000 to their Church in Washington City; and that $100,000 have been raised in Louisiana for that Church. Do not let this be forgotten. Keep it before the people. A great many Southern people are wonderful for pious and patriotic talk, and equally wonderful for their "meekness of wisdom" in action—when money is concerned. Look at the tardiness with which money is raised for this Washington City Church, and for the steam-line to Europe from New Orleans; both of which require but a trifle from the immense purse of the South. We shall have to cease twitting the Yankees with stinginess. Southerners can beat them at their own game.

EDITORS AND SLANG.

If our editors allow slang and vulgarity of language in their columns, our people, our writers, our preachers, will be so educated in them that they will be hard to remove. If elegance and dignity of expression be not a condition of admission into the columns of our papers, the principal flood-gate by which vulgarity and coarseness may be shut out of our literature, is rendered useless; aye, worse than useless; for then our papers become the media by which the already sufficiently defective taste of our people is still farther corrupted. Our editors can do more in this matter than all our other public agencies. The test of a man's refinement and taste is, the style in which he writes, it matters not where, nor by whom, nor to what extent he has been educated. By the editorial rejection or expurgation of all language dictated by coarseness or evil temper, our papers can do more for a pure and sweet speech among the people of this country than all the schools and the books together. Home education ought to be sufficient unto this desirable end; but, in too many instances, it is not. Schools and books can teach the lesson and set the example; but only the press can, habitually, enforce the law of tasteful and refined language. When an editor allows himself addressed, in his own columns, as "Bro. Fitz.," or "Bro. Mac.," and the like, he has surely forgotten to shut down his flood-gate.

MARTIN RUTER'S CHURCH AND GRAVE.

Resolutions were adopted in the General Conference at St. Louis, 1850, approving the erection of a church in Washington, Texas, to be called the Ruter Church, in memory of Dr. Martin Ruter, first Superintendent of Methodist Missions in Texas. The result of these resolutions we have seen, and preached in it frequently. Four brick walls, cracked in several places, unplastered, with other appointments to match, tell the tale. Just outside of these walls is Dr. Ruter's grave; a few bricks bear a stone slab, on which is a long inscription, written by Dr. Winans, telling how the good man lived and labored and died. Wooden palings, unpainted, enclose the spot. In one corner of the enclosure there is a beautiful shrub, which had a bird's nest in it last year. May the sweetest songsters always, by their "loved mansionry," approve the purity and quiet of the place, and often mingle their music with the voice of a nobler worship ascending near. Our brethren at Washington intend to finish the church-building. Recently they have been busy in getting up a Female School; the next thing will be the completion and proper adornment of Ruter Church.—Texas Christian Advocate.

LAY DELEGATION AND THE LAITY.

It seems that in the General Conference of the Northern Methodist Church there is the same difficulty in incorporating the lay element into the councils of the Church that has been found to exist in the South, namely: the inactivity, and sometimes the opposition of the laity. Were they convinced the laity desired it, three-fourths of the ministry of the Southern Church would be in favor of lay-delegation. But, hitherto, the indications have seemed to be the other way. So in the Northern Church. The Buffalo correspondent of the Nashville Advocate writes: "I ought to have stated that a committee on lay delegation was appointed. It is not probable that any material change will be effected in this respect, simply because the laity themselves do not seem to favor it. There is a large majority in the General Conference who would introduce the lay element into the legislative councils of the Church, if it was clearly the wish of the people; but, as we remarked, such is far from being the fact."

NEW ORLEANS AND TEXAS RAILROAD.—Forty-three miles of this road—the distance between Trinity river, at Liberty, and the Neches river, at Beaumont—are already completed, and the work is progressing rapidly. The whole Texas portion, from Houston to the Sabine, a distance of 105 miles, will be finished, it is said, by November next. The Louisiana portion ought to be pushed forward.

THE EDITOR of this paper has been in ill health for a month past, which must be his apology for many things.

COLLEGE AND SCHOOL REPORTS.

The time of the year is approaching when the colleges and schools, "good, bad and indifferent," that "crown and crowd" our "great and glorious country," will be holding their annual festivals, or commencements; and their committees of visitation and examination will be sending their reports to the newspapers for publication. A few of these institutions are of value and importance to the country generally, and their reports, if brief and well-written, will be read. It is to be regretted when a valuable institution falls into the hands of an incompetent reporter. Long and extravagant reports of the best institutions are never read. The reports from the "ordinary run" of schools should be very brief indeed.—From experience and observation, we know whereof we affirm, when we say that, unless the suggestions above-written are heeded, examination reports are an injury both to the schools and the papers. They are not read, and the paper containing them is condemned as dull, tasteless, and spiritless. "Pub. Docs." have well-nigh ruined the General Post Office Department, and the Church papers may well be alarmed. Editors of such papers are expected to publish, without regard to taste, readableness, or value, if the contributions relate to the interests above-mentioned. Let us have short tasteful and readable reports.

A STORY FOR THE ADVOCATE.

Next week we shall begin the publication of a delightful story, "ALICE ELWYN," by Fanny Sheldon, a lady of Alabama. Of its merits, we do not choose to speak particularly now. Our readers will have the privilege of judging for themselves. We imagine, however, that they will read every number, from the beginning to the end. This much we desire to say, however: we have known the lady well, almost from her childhood. She is an honor to her sex, as a daughter, a wife, a mother, and a Christian. And we know also that the veil of fiction in which this life-story is draped and adorned is so thin as not to hide the earnest experiences, facts, and realities of which it is composed. We are personally aware of the substantial truth of most of them. The religion and the romance, the love and the sorrow, as they are woven into the narrative, are not fanciful inventions, but portrayals of realities.

TEACHERS AND SCHOOLS AGAIN.

We are greatly annoyed by letters inquiring for "teachers," and others inquiring for "situations." When you wish a teacher, send an advertisement, and five dollars to the paper; and when you wish a situation, do the same thing. Give your own address. We cannot be responsible. Neglect of this has caused many people to write to, or visit our office, to whom we were able to give no satisfaction. They were disappointed, and we were annoyed, and our precious time wasted. We have more to do now, in our own legitimate sphere, than we can do well. If, by mere volition, we could furnish every worthy teacher with a situation, and needy school or family, with a teacher, we should gladly do so. But, we cannot become general agent for either the one or the other. The advertising columns of the paper are open to both sides, and we are ready to receive the cash for advertising. That is the most business-like and satisfactory mode of proceeding.

SUNDAY SCHOOL CONVENTION AT VICKSBURG.

Rev. J. D. Shaw writes us that the Sunday School Convention of the Mississippi Conference, which met at Vicksburg, on the 9th inst., was tolerably well attended, and that the proceedings were business-like and satisfactory. They will appear in the minutes, which are to be published. A very affecting scene occurred when Dr. Watkins was called upon to give an account of the recent death of Dr. Drake. A tide of grief overwhelmed the speaker and the whole assembly. Suitable resolutions were adopted in memory of Dr. Drake, and Col. Tarpley. The principal speeches were made by Rev. Messrs. Marshall, Ebbert, (Memphis Conference) Watkins, Harrington, Clinton, and Godfrey. The next Convention is to assemble at Jackson, Miss., on the third Monday in June, 1861.

PROGRESS OF CHRISTIANITY IN INDIA.

It is stated that there are 28,000 nominal Christians in Tinnevelly, under the care of the English Church Missionary Society; and that, on a recent visit, the Bishop of Madras confirmed about 3,500 in that district, and 2,000 in Travancore. In Tinnevelly, the Bishop ordained thirteen natives, five priests and eight deacons. The service was attended by more than a thousand people.—As some of the missionaries were conversing together just before the service, an aged headman of one of the villages approached them, and said, "Ayyer, do you remember what occurred here just thirty years ago? The Missionary built us a small prayer-house, which was destroyed in the night, and now look at this great church, and think of the service about to be held in it."

NEW YORK LITERARY CORRESPONDENCE.

NEW YORK, May 4, 1860.

Humboldt's Private Correspondence—His True Official Position—The Light in which he is presented—"The Mill on the Floss"—Rawlinson's Herodotus—Godwin's History of France—Bulwer's Novels—Timbs' Stories of Inventors.

I have read the "Correspondence of Humboldt and Varnhagen," which is making such a stir in Europe just now, and of which an ill-advised publisher in New York is about to bring out a translation. It is a dreary book, notable, to the "stupid reader," for the many letters and notes from eminent persons which it contains; and to the sober thinking reader, for the saddening and disappointing view it gives of Humboldt himself.

There are notes and letters from the King of Prussia, the King of Denmark, Prince Albert of England, the Grand Dukes of Tuscany and Saxe-Weimar, Prince Metternich, Princess Lieven; Arago, the astronomer, Balzac, (who funnily writes that he has not time to call on his dear friend, but asks him, who was then 73 years old, to come to the railroad depot to see him at a certain hour!) Galzot, Janain, (a French newspaper man, who addresses Humboldt as his dear co-laborer!) Sir John Herschel, Madame Recamier, Helen, Duchess of Orleans, Thiers, Sir Robert Peel, Prescott, and others. None of these notes are of the slightest interest or importance, and only a few are even well written.

These make up, however, only a small portion of the book, which really gives the reader an insight into a part of Humboldt's life and thoughts which he carefully concealed during his life, and which it seems a pity should ever have been revealed. He was for many years a courtier, attached to the immediate court of the King of Prussia; receiving his bread for nominal, or little more than nominal services to the King and the State. I had supposed hitherto that his office was in reality a sinecure, wisely and honorably given to one whom it was an honor to any State or Sovereign to support, to one who had spent all his own substance in the cause of science, and whose services deserved any pecuniary or other reward that could be given him. This book shows that Humboldt really occupied for years a position which must have been a constant source of bitter mortification to him. That he held a place and had a voice in a government which he despised, and whose principles he abhorred; that he stood alone in opposition to his brother ministers, and that though the King always listened to him, and mostly said "yes," he had yet no influence, no power, and had to solace himself with occasional bitter speeches to his open enemies and fellow councillors, and with these letters to Varnhagen, in which all the pent up potulance and bitterness, which it was unnatural he should feel, found full vent.

How such a man could live such a life is inexplicable. Surely it had been better had he joined his comrade Bonpland in his Buenos Ayrean hermitage. Better have come to America, where he would have been welcomed and loved and valued; better have gone to England, where he could have lived with worthy men at any rate. No government in the world would have let Humboldt want; and surely to such a mind as his almost any deprivation would have been better than the dragging out of an embittered life in a false position, among men who laughed at him, and whom he despised.

He treats of many minor political matters, which we on this side the water cannot even understand—many others, which have no sort of interest for us—and touches occasionally a point of real and vivid interest to all. That on the whole the letters are unworthy of Humboldt, is generally admitted. That he is made to show himself in a very bad light in many places, is undoubted. His sneer at Prince Albert and Queen Victoria is as vulgar as it is uncalled for, and what shall we think when the great Humboldt writes, in allusion to his envious double life, "we owe the truth only to the very few who are our most intimate friends." This is in justification, apparently, of his way of abusing people in private, to whom he was civil enough in public.

If it is really true that the old philosopher wished these letters published, he must have often chuckled at the bitter pill he was preparing for those Sovereigns and great men from whom he received kind attentions during his life, only to make them the mark of posthumous abuse. It is not that he should not speak his opinions, of course. But when a man accepts friendship, and bread and butter, he must not play false, even if his name is Humboldt.

Messrs. Harper and Brothers have just published the new novel, by the author of "Adam Bede." It is called "The Mill on the Floss," and will sustain the reputation of the writer, I think, to put it in the jargon of the "literary column." The book is virtually a discussion of the question whether passion shall triumph over duty. Georga Eliott bravely decides that duty is first. It is in fact another protest against the current and subtle immorality of the novelists, who glorify passion and give to their heroes and heroines the "Divine right to do what they please." It inculcates in the finest way the great Christian doctrine of self-sacrifice; and herein, in this highest morality, and in her quiet, but forcible appeal to the best sense, and the highest and noblest feelings, this author seems to me to do her work. That the execution is of the best, it is scarce necessary to say. The tone of the story, I mean the air with which it is told, is inimitably fine, better than even Thackeray, who is a master of quiet "story telling." As for the men and women whom she now introduces to us, to me they seem to have a reality which the characters of Thackeray and Dickens mostly lack. They are tempted, struggling, sometimes winning, sometimes falling, men and women—people, each of whom carries on in his own breast, and in his own way, his own particular fight with the Devil. When I consider Thackeray's "Major Pendennis," "Becky Sharpe," "Rawdon Crawley," and the other characters he most delights to set before us, they are people who seem to have, to put it theologically, "committed the unpardonable sin." In them there is no longer a conflict—with them the Spirit has ceased to strive—to them the Devil and all his angels are the only providence. With all Thackeray's "realism," this is not real to the experience of any half-dozen of his readers. And where Dickens' characters are unything more than oddities, they have the same fault. Dickens' preachers are only hypocrites and knaves, and never by any chance have a human feeling or struggle. And so of his other characters for the most part. It is as though they were set in a certain rut, and moved along smoothly therein a given direction. But real life does not work so.

Herodotus, who has been called alternately, the "Father of History," and the "Father of Lies," is at last having full justice done to him. The pleasant old gossip, who, whether he told lies or truth, has charmed his hearers and readers for now more than 2000 years, suffered long from incredulous ignorance. Every deeper modern research into the monumental history of the ancient countries, of which the history treats, has but confirmed the correctness, often the surprising accuracy of the old historian, and now he comes forth in a splendid four volume edition, with such men as Layard, Sir J. G. Wilkinson, Sir Henry Rawlinson, and others of the most celebrated antiquarians, to bear witness to his character. Six years ago Mr. George Rawlinson promised the public an edition of the history of Herodotus, with such illustrative notes and essays as should place the reader in possession of all that more modern research has discovered, bearing upon the countries and people discussed by the ancient historian. Fortunately the preparation of the work had not gone very far, when Layard, in Assyria, Wilkinson, in Egypt, and Rawlinson, in Persia and Babylonia, brought to light such a series of most interesting facts, as necessitated a reconstruction of the ancient histories of those countries, and of course were immensely valuable for the purposes of the work in question. It was therefore not completed till these important explorations were done, and now the reader of ancient history may have before him at once, in one work, the results of all modern research, which has a bearing on that part of it which Herodotus touches. This book, so great a boon to the student and the intelligent reader of ancient history, is in course of publication by Messrs. Appleton, New York. They furnish an accurate reprint of the English edition, at less than one quarter the price. Volume III of "Rawlinson's Herodotus" is just published; and vol. IV., which completes the work, will be issued at an early day. It is a work of very great interest indeed, and especially to all Bible students.

The Literature of America is destined to shine with an especial effulgence in the department of history. Not only have our own historians done the best for our own history; but to Bancroft, Hildreth, Irving, at home, are added Prescott for Spain, Motley for the Dutch Republic, and now Parke Godwin for France. It seems right that we who are making history faster than any other people in the world, except the Romans, have ever done, should be also faithful students of history. It is really singular that there should have been hitherto no good history of France, in the English language. There are plenty of abridgements and some translations, but hitherto no history, in the best sense of that word. This want Mr. Godwin is attempting to fill, and I think with entire success, so far as vol. I. is concerned, which is the only volume yet published. He has devoted many years of his life to the attentive study of his subject, and made himself thoroughly master of it; and presents here the views of a scholar in the language of the people. And his style is free, vigorous, and picturesque.

I understand that the able article on "Darwin's origin of species," in the April number of the North American Review, to which I made some reference in my last, was written by Professor Francis Bowen, of Harvard University. The Christian Examiner for May has also a tilt at Darwin. It is an able and very readable article. The Examiner has also a paper, "Armenians and Armenianism." The Westminster takes Darwin's side, and yet makes some exceptions.

The Appletons give notice that they have in press an anti-abolition novel, which, from the ability of the writer, who remains anonymous, and the interest of the story, is thought likely to make a sensation.

Messrs. Harper & Brothers have begun the publication of a new edition of Bulwer's novels. This edition, intended for the library, and "to keep," so to speak, is printed on fine, white paper, and with good sized, new type, on a page which the printers call duodecimo, and which the reading man acknowledges to be the most convenient of all pages, both to hold in the hand and to place on the shelf. Each novel will make a volume, and the set will make a handsome appearance. This is Bulwer's first appearance in this respectable shape, in America. Some people sneer at Bulwer; but to read him has much the charm of conversing with a highly cultivated and well bred gentlemen. You may not agree with him, but he charms you, and does not offend you.—Few authors have had more readers, and none have given more unalloyed pleasure than he, in his "Caxtons," that sweet and pleasant picture of an English country gentleman's life. "The Caxtons" is the volume just published by Messrs. H. & B. in this new library edition, and if any of your novel reading (or other) readers has not read it, let him or her get this now.

Mr. Timbs's "Stories of Inventors and Discoverers in Science and the Useful Arts" is really a very interesting and valuable book; one of those volumes, now happily coming into vogue, in which well-read men are satisfied to communicate of their knowledge in an interesting way to the general public, instead of—as used to be the fashion—setting it out in dry anatomical guise to the few who knew it already. Such books as this and "Self Help," (both published by Messrs. Harper & Brothers) do more to educate the boy or girl out of school, than the majority of school-masters succeed in doing in school. Here we learn what the "Martyrs of Science" have done and suffered for their ideas and for the world, which—at first contemptuous or satiric—has at last acknowledged them for its great benefactors.

"The Three Pines" is the title of the third little volume of Mr. Jacob Abbott's new series of children's stories, called "the Rainbow and Lucky Stories." These books have met with a very considerable success, even for Mr. Abbott.

*

LETTERS FROM MRS. CROSS.—NO. XIV.

In every new country the mode of life must be more or less gregarious. People herd together for safety, or being thrown in a strange country where intercommunication of thought with old friends has been cut off, they begin to feel anxious to establish it with others; consequently, such seeks to be with his neighbor, and families congregate in common sitting-rooms, where work and conversation go hand in hand, from morning until the hour for rest, and none seems to feel that need of being alone, which becomes so pressing a want in other stages of society. Even when they begin to separate their houses into different apartments, the partitions seem to be made of pasteboard, and all the establishment is one whispering gallery. Texas forms no exception to this rule, which obtains in newly settled countries. The houses of San Antonio, though built of stone with thick outer walls, have divisions which remind one of the separating curtains of a tent, so that if your defects and peculiarities are ever being discussed by other members of the family, and these things do happen sometimes, you have a most favorable opportunity of learning in what respects it will be desirable for you to amend.

This will explain why, on a certain Sabbath afternoon in San Antonio, I felt as if I were beginning to languish for a few moments of retiracy; I, who had never affected fashion, nor style, nor gaiety, was becoming, in fact, the victim of society, though not in the ordinary sense. I could not sit in my own room and think without being afraid that somebody would hear me in the next. I was longing for a tete-a-tete with my own heart, to ask it what it had been doing, and feeling, and what it proposed doing for the future. All the ancient kindly confidence between it and me seemed destroyed; an estrangement had grown up between us—and I yearned for a renewal of our former intercourse; so I said to myself: "where, in all this city, can I sit down and feel that I am alone—only with God and my own heart?" and curiously enough, I thought of the old Spanish church, and concluded to seek solitude there, for even supposing they had service at that hour, I knew no one of that Mexican congregation, and might sit in some quiet corner unregarded and unregarded. I put on my bonnet and walked down Costa street, through the dazzling sunshine. Mexican jakals were on each side of me, and picturesque Mexican women were lounging in the doorways; Mexican dogs were coursing along the streets, thinking no more of going to church, than that half of the inhabitants of San Antonio who think the Sabbath an admirable invention, as a day of pleasure; soldiers were in the shops regaling themselves with beer and stronger liquors; some young girl, perhaps, was running her fingers over the keys of a tinkling piano, at a boarding house, whose windows, with red stuff stretched across them, seemed to indicate a place that would secure itself against the inquisitive gaze of the passer by; the leaves of the large "cotton wood" were trembling and rustling above the green waters of the ditch that flowed beneath; on the Plaza were groups of men who seemed born neither to act nor meditate, but whose lives continually suggest the lines of Cowper—

"Alas, we had been friends in youth!"

"An idler's like a watch without both hands,
As useless when he goes, as when he stands."

All these things my eyes and ears listlessly took in, as I walked past them and entered through the gate of the stone enclosure that surrounds the church, and then the open door of the church itself. Above the door stands the image of a saint in some fashion, over which I did not "stay puzzling." I walked in, though protesting at the very threshold, by my disregard of the holy water, which might have pained some pious Catholic soul, if my actions had been at all observed, but I presume they were not. Many of the seats were filled with quiet nun-like figures robed in black; an old Mexican came and took his seat behind me; his face reminded one of a familiar of the inquisition, and even while he was murmuring his prayers, I experienced a sort of apprehensiveness of a stiletto gliding in beneath my shoulder. A profound silence reigned, interrupted only by a creaking as of machinery; whence this noise came, I could not divine, possibly from some very harmless source,—but it brought to my mind unpleasant reflections connected with stories of those places that one finds by pouring water upon the pavement of churches, where there are racks and screws and wheels. Soon the women commenced repeating prayers in a low monotonous voice, and it sounded to me like tones of supplication for the departing soul of a tortured body. Every thing appeared to me solemn and mysterious. A feeling of awe crept over me, and it was a relief when a priest came in his robes, with little Mexican boys, in gaudy vestments, to perform the altar service. This consumed but little time, and was followed by a priest ascending the pulpit, and commencing in Spanish to examine the children in their catechism. The subject of the lesson was the sacraments of the church, and after proposing a question to the children and receiving the stereotyped answer, he explained, at large, the views of the Church upon the subject. These exercises were closed by a young priest arising, within the chancel, and expressing some doubts on the various doctrinal points, but these doubts were quickly silenced by the overpowering arguments of the man in the pulpit, and the young man and all the congregation were, of course, more Romanists than ever; but I could not avoid amusing myself by the question: "Suppose the young priest had refused to be convinced, what arguments would have next been used?"

JANE T. H. CROSS.

THE ANNIVERSARY AT MACON.

Dr. Sehon writes: This meeting was held on Monday evening, in the Mulberry street Church, Bishop Andrew presiding. The opening services by Dr. Lovick Pierce.

The President briefly stated the objects of the meeting, when the Annual Report was read by the Secretary.

Dr. McFerrin was then introduced to the meeting, who, in a most able manner, advocated the cause of missions, and fully sustained before a Georgia audience his past well-earned reputation as a platform speaker.

His was followed in an address by the writer.

Bishop Pierce was then introduced to the meeting.

It is not necessary for us here to speak of this effort as distinguished from many others of his past life, but in this, that here he was not only at home on the subject of missions, but he was at home personally, in the midst of the fields of his life of labor and usefulness for the Church; surrounded by the friends of his early youth and his advancing life; here, where the associations of the past, and the powerful influence of the present, alike acted upon him. Worn, pale, and feeble, from his exposure and long and hard travel in his recent journey to and from California, suffering still from chills, forbidden to labor, we feared to hear him make this effort. But his heart and soul are in the work; the great cause of missions sought his aid; his Master's call sounded in his ears; and he obeyed the call. By Divine aid he rose superior to all that hindered, and with clear and trumpet voice, in manly and encouraging notes, he called upon the Church, the whole Church, to come up to renew battle and still greater effort, going forth from conquering to conquest still, under the mighty Captain's influence, the victory over all the earth should be complete. His speech on this evening we believe to have been one of his best.

We proceeded to take the collection. Now commenced a scene over which angels who think rejoiced, and of which good men everywhere will be glad to hear. It was emphatically leading to the Lord. The collection amounted to three thousand and three hundred dollars, which will probably be made yet to reach $4000. Well done Macon! may we truly say, and justly so, when we state that at least $2800 of this amount was contributed directly by citizens of this noble Southern city. Thus has been given by Macon the key-note for missions and missionary collections to all the Southern Conferences for the year 1860. God grant that everywhere throughout our whole Connection, in sweetest tones, responses may continue to reach us. We cannot pass by unnoticed one of the proudest and brightest events of the evening. It was the continued response on the part of the Superintendent of the Mulberry Street Sabbath-school to every proposition which was made. There was, indeed a gentle sighing among the Mulberry leaves—not of sad, but most pleasant sound. More than one heart joined in and sympathized with the wish of Bishop Pierce, when he said he would like to belong to that school. He proved his interest in the school by contributing $20, to make the school a life-member of the Parent Missionary Society.

The whole amount contributed from the school was, we believe, $500. Happy the pastor, happy the Church, having such teachers and such a school. We are the more particular in noticing this act, because of our firm faith in the value of Sabbath-school instruction. It is the right hand instrumentality of the gospel; it is our hope for Church and State—our rising army for occupation and defense. Would that all our schools could be prompted to like faith and labor; then should we soon have a missionary Church and an overflowing missionary treasury.

POLITICAL.

Mr. Yancey's speech in the Charleston Convention, in defence of the rights of the South in the territories, and in opposition to squatter sovereignty, is pronounced the great speech of the occasion, and is highly spoken of even by Black Republican papers.

It is said that Hon. Caleb Cushing, of Massachusetts, President of the Charleston Convention, voted for Hon. Jefferson Davis, of Mississippi, at every ballot.

The Union Convention, which met at Baltimore on the 9th of May, nominated Hon. John Bell, of Tennessee, for President, and Hon. Edward Everett for Vice-President. No platform was adopted, except the Union, the Constitution, and the enforcement of the laws.

The mass meeting in New Orleans, to sustain the action of the seceding delegations at Charleston, those from Louisiana particularly, was large and enthusiastic. A meeting had also been held to condemn them.

Meetings are being held throughout the South to sustain the action of the seceding delegations at Charleston. In all these meetings it is manifest that no disunion sentiments are entertained by the people, but they are simply determined to stand by the principle insisted upon by their delegates at Charleston, namely: the equality of all the States in the territories.

Large and enthusiastic meetings have been held in Savannah, Ga., Mobile, Ala., Montgomery, Ala., and in various places in Mississippi and Louisiana.

Mr. Yancey was honored with a grand impromptu ovation on his arrival at his home in Montgomery, Ala., from the Charleston Convention.

Considerable effort is being made to unite all the South, and all the conservative men of the Union, upon the Baltimore nominees, Bell and Everett, especially in view of the disruption of the Democratic party at Charleston.

It is thought by some that the nomination of Bell and Everett will greatly weaken the Republican party, many of whom only wish an opportunity to vote against the Administration candidate. The Sewardites and the Western Republicans are divided, also, on the tariff question.

The Chicago Convention, (Black Republican) meets today. Our next issue will give the result of its deliberations.

ADAMS' EXPRESS.—We are very much indebted to this "institution" for the promptitude with which we receive our English and Northern papers. They are generally about two days ahead of the mail. People can have anything sent to, or brought from, all parts of the United States. Mr. J. J. McKeever, 96 Camp Street, is the Agent.

GOOD TESTIMONY.—A Presbyterian gentleman, who likes the Advocate, recently turned out and procured eight Methodist new subscribers, and sent them, with the money. There are about twenty good lessons to be learned from this fact, by a great many people. We thank the gentleman, at any rate.

THE BIBLE IN THE RUSSIAN LANGUAGE.—It is stated that a new translation of the Bible is to be published in Moscow in the vernacular language of Russia. It is to be issued under the auspices of the Metropolitan of Moscow, in numbers. The first number, beginning with the New Testament, has already appeared.

OAKLAND COLLEGE.—The commencement of this institution, located in Mississippi, and under the control of the Presbyterian Church, occurred on the 3d instant. Rev. Dr. Purviance, former President, retired, and Rev. W. L. Breckinridge, of Kentucky, was installed in his place. The college is said to be doing well.

NORTHERN METHODIST BISHOPS.—Of course, we do not endorse the sentiments, on the subject of slavery, contained in the article on our outside, entitled "Sketches of the Northern Methodist Bishops."

EDITORSHIP OF THE DAILY ADVOCATE.—The Northern General Conference entrusted the supervision of the Daily Advocate to all the editors of the Advocates and Zion's Herald, in order that it might have no peculiar bias on any disputed question in the church. These editors have appointed one of their number, Dr. Steveus, to edit it, with the understanding that it is not to commit itself to either side of any question discussed by the General Conference.

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

MAY 16, 1860.

THE SOUTHERN HOME.

BY LUTHA FONTELLE.

"All's Well!"

We came home late in November. The yellow fever, that so long had rendered every line of travel dangerous, was sated with its victims, and its scourge-deuling hands fell down with weariness. I saw the family carriage and Ben's ivory as soon as we came in sight of the depot. And there was Uncle John with his fine head above the crowd, his face beaming with joyful welcome. Before he took us from the platform, he said in his clear, bell-like tone, "All's well!" And then his silvery laugh rang out at this foretelling of the words stayed on our lips. But when he took us in his arms, his eyes were moist, and his manners gentle as a woman's. Fifty years had not sobered his mirthful humor, or cooled the warm impulses of his Southern blood.

A Chapter on Moss.

We entered the carriage, and after an hour's drive, Terre d'Amour again lay before us. How beautiful it was, with its flickering light and shade playing over its generous amplitude. It was two stories high, with wide, interseeting halls, opening, both above and below, on spacious galleries that ran around the house. The white pillars that supported them gleamed among the oak and chinn trees that with a high ambition had reached their arms above the roof and proudly sheltered it. The grey moss hung in long, hair-like masses, or linked itself in light festoons from bough to bough. How my eyes feasted on it as we rode along! To me it seems created in this alluvial soil in place of the grey rocks upheaved among the hills. It gives the scene picturesque character, the same quiet grandeur to the landscape. It tones down the otherwise monotonous brightness, and enhances the rich beauty of the verdure by throwing it out in deep relief. And yet, though sober-hued, to me it is ever cheerful, waving with such light grace in the stirred air, and changing, chameleon-like, in every ray. Sometimes, it seems a fairy mesh to imprison sunbeams, or a light net-work of gold. Then it is amber-hued; again, it is lucid crimson. I linger over this, because, as you may know, I love it, and I am sitting now on the upper gallery, enjoying all that I describe, and more.

A Rough Sketch.

Words have faint power to seize the subtle charms of nature. If our hearts thrill in reading a description, it is that we recall the bright reality, or touch the picture with awakened fancy. As I glance up from my moving pen, my whole being responds to the animated beauty before me. The graceful tufts of the chinèanne, the dark green foliage of the oak, swaying in the light breeze; stately catalpas, with their slender shafts bearing round tufts of brilliant green; the rippling moss, cool in the shade, a golden veil before the sun, and under these, youthful magnolias with large, shining leaves of intense verdure, and groups of orange trees, not now as then, heavy with golden fruit; the whispering leaves; the sweet carol of birds; the music of loved voices floating up to me; flashes of diamond light on everything; the vine-enwreathed arches in the garden; the mingled perfume of rare flowers; the scintillating light of the sun, near its setting, coming to me in its long path, between myriads of leaves and through the veiling moss; the bayou idly flowing by, and imaging tall rushes on its banks; and graceful willows, bowing before the evening breeze, and turning on their fair leaves lined with silver; a group of anglers on the bridge; a pirogue, with a solitary figure plying the light oar; the row of low white cottages among the fig trees; the negro children playing under their porches; and beyond, the rows of sugar cane and corn, diminishing in the distance; tall cedars, left standing here and there in the wide fields, leaning their heads against the sky, with black arms draped with moss; and the low cypress swamp, dark, dense, in the horizon. This is a rough sketch of the picture that stirs my pulse with a delicious thrill, as I look out upon its loveliness. And yet I cannot hold it up to you with its entrancing, varying touches. And now, as I bring back my eyes, the scene is changed. The trees are dark against the orange sky, and the moss drapery, where it droops low of its peculiar grey, shows has caught Sol's parting rays, in point amber.

Welcome Home.

But it is time we reached the gate. There, all the children of the house had gathered, their glad and loving voices mingled, like rippling strains of melody. We took the white ones into the carriage with fond caresses, and with kind words to the others, who climbed up on every side to touch our hands, we drove on to the house. Here warmer welcomes and blessings from grey heads awaited us.

Alone in the Garden.

After dinner, the gentlemen retired to the north gallery to smoke, or read; the ladies, to their rooms to chat and rest; the governess, to the hall to read a story to the children. I stole into the garden. The last rays of the November sun lit up its beauty, gorgeous with autumn flowers. I strayed down every path, noting the changes made by time, the gardener, and more tender hands, and greeting my old favorites everywhere. Wearied, at length, I sought my chosen seat in the sweet bower of roses. It had been kept with loving care, and with a grateful sense of this I languidly reclined, and gazed around me. Roses of every hue were there, scattered in charming groups, or hanging out their fragrant clusters from a rich background of ivy. How many there were, and fairer than when I left them in the spring time. All flowers were dear to me, but the rosee were my friends. From early childhood I had talked with them, revealing my quaint fancies, and wooing their fairy dreams.

The Fair Plotters.

And now they waved their perfumed heads and blushed
Their gladness at my safe return. "It was So opportune," they whispered low. They had
A secret for my ears alone. It was
The eve of a conspiracy. Autumn
Had cheered them with a glorious reign. Her bland,
Moist breath had floated over them
In gentle blessings, and her loving care
Enriched them with rare bounty, and, as I Could see, they had put on the richest robes
Of most exquisite fabric. Had I seen
Them e'er before so tastefully arrayed?

But good Queen Autumn, lovely still, her age
Was worn so gracefully, must abdicate
Her throne, and Winter, old and stern, and with
A niggard soul, would sweep away their wealth
With his chill breath, and they must perish, or Conceal themselves till he had gone.
"All is vanity."

It was
A shameful wrong that such sweet robes," such loves
Of dresses," should be spoiled by his rude touch,
Or laid aside till they were out of fashion.
They all agreed the outrage could not be Endured, if they could help it. And they had
A plan, a nice one, that would circumvent
Him. Did I know that Winter's grand, cold air,
And stern, repellant manner, hut concealed
A vulgar weakness? He was—O, so vain!

"Old Winter, with grey locks, nursing his vanity!"
I laughed aloud at the conceit.

"O, pray
Be careful," they begged eagerly, "for the Light, treacherous wind may whisper it to him,
And mar our plot."

Just then the voices of
The children reached my ear, "O, Rosalie!"
The roses closed their lips and looked demure
And innocent, as it rebellious thought
Had never crept into their glowing hearts.
They bowed their heads, and blushed beneath my glance,
And Sol's last searching rays, and as I turned Away, sighed deprecatingly, "O, stay!
Consider that we seek to save more than
Our lives, our good looks, and—our dresses!"
How were my roses changed! Or had I now
First learned their vanity? Or was it but
A passing freak of gay young spirits, full
Of life, and joy, and love? It must be hard
For them to see their sweet charms fade, if but
For a brief season. And they could not know
That all again would greet the bright spring time.
With loving pity, then, I asked, "What is Your plan, dear roses, for I would know more?"

They blushed their thanks, and with naiva dignity
Resumed their story.

"Winter is, we said,
A little vain. Would you have proof?"

Amused,
I smiled assent.

Seeking Popularity.

They nodded to a "Belle of Baltimore," and she rallyingly on:
"You see our friend has many faces. In
The North he puts on Quaker airs, and dons
A plain grey robe, and with white locks he stands
On some high mountain-top, as it to say,
'Come see a model man! No nonsense here!'

"Or, as a cold, calm judge, unmerciful,
He prompt condemns each light offence against
The season's law, and, a stern Nemesis,
Blights every bud of hope and flower of joy.

"Again, he mounts his crystal throne and rules,
Sole autocrat, o'er all his wide domains,
And nations haste to swear their fealty
With labored ceremonials.

"He frowns,
And nature, scattering wide her gorgeous robes
Of crimson, gold, and purple, every hue,
Assumes his hueless livery.

"He lifts
An icy finger, and his royal seal
Is placed on every streamlet that leaps down
The hills with joyous laughter, and on all
The lakes that, gay admirer-like, had held
In their light bosoms "Hallotypes" of each
Bright farm that stood in beauty near them.
I'd not have given them mine," she said, "to laugh
At o'er their cups with boon companions. No!
And he alone to whom my hand was pledged,
Should wear my festive's image.

"Winter comes
To us a different being. He puts on no
Imperial airs. He seldom frowns, and then
Not darkly. Here, his suit is grey and green,
Still sober, but as bright as gathering years
Admit. And he is not an old man now.
Far from it. Brown is his beard, and brown locks curl
In rich luxuriance round his calm, dark brow."

"Where did he get them?"

"Don't ask me. I should Have thought him but a younger brother of
The aged despot of the North. But he,
One year, came South in haste, and much disturbed
By all the changes rung about his ears
On our 'peculiar institution,' and
Be quite forgot to change his locks, to put Them on, or dye them, whichever it may be,
And thus I know him."

Mere Flattery.

"I am sure that now
You see our artless plot. We'll wait for him,
With our best smiles and dresses, and bow low
In timid eagerness at his slow coming.
We'll pour choice odors from our chalices
And praise his kingly presence. In soft sighs,
We'll tell him Autumn, heiress of the year,
Grieved sadly at his absence, and that fair
Young Spring stands waiting in the new year's hall
To meet him, and that nature has put on
Her richest robes to do him honor.
You'll see him melt before our smiling praise.
Our fragrant sighs, and tears, it needed.'

Only a Dream.

But
Again the children's voices, nearer still—
"O, Rosalie! dear Rosalie!" I felt
Their soft arms round my neck, their kisses on My brow, but still I moved not. I could not Shake off the fairy spell, until Aunt Grace
Said, "What! asleep, my darling! in this damp Night air! You've had a chill. The fever's on You now."

"'Tis only water's changing breath,"
I laughed, and rising, went with them to tea.

LETTER FROM JONES' VALLEY.

MR. EDITOR:—Our second Quarterly Meeting at Elyton, which embraced the third Sebbath in this month, was a precious season to the Church. Our venerable Presiding Elder, E. V. Levert, was at his post; and with his and Rev. T. F. Green's assistance, we protracted the meeting some five days, with good results. The services on Sabbath were especially profitable and interesting. A very large congregation, consisting principally of the children and grand-children of parents, to whom the Elder preached thirty-nine years ago, when a tyro, just entering upon his career of usefulness. His allusions to former times, scenes and persons, were well-timed, tender and affecting. He preached with a power fully sustaining the character of his ministry in by-gone years. It is sad to think that soon these old men will all be gone, and the Church bereft of their fatherly care and admonitions. The inquiry is a serious one: will the earnestness and zeal of Methodism—the power of the Holy Ghost—be perpetuated to the Church through their successors, a ministry formed amid the elegancies and refinements of this progressive age?

We owe an expression of thanks to Rev. Mr. Green for his efficient aid during this and a previous meeting. Having been raised among this people, and participated with them, in earlier life, in religious efforts, he feels identified with all the interests of the Church on this circuit.

When that important and often difficult question was asked by our Presiding Elder—"What is the condition of the Church?" we were delighted to be able to reply, prosperous. Methodism has been long established in this valley. There is a large and faithful membership; but never, we suppose, were the prospects for a large and growing development so encouraging as now. Up to this time we have taken into the Church about fifty, and have witnessed a number of good conversions.

A lively interest on the subject of railroads is manifest in all this country; and perhaps no portion of Alabama stands so much in need of ready and efficient means of transportation. Almost in sight of where I write, are inexhaustible supplies of coal and iron, never yet disturbed. The iron ore was pronounced, by the State Geologist, two years ago, the richest in America. Besides, beautiful specimens of marble may be obtained in some quarters. These are important interests to the State,

You will permit me to say a word about our Parsonage at Jonesboro'. It is one of the best cared for in the Conference. There is no want of anything that contributes to the comfort and convenience of a family. There is abundance of house room, corresponding furniture, and of something to eat, no end. Nor is the preacher at any trouble about supplies. Literally, our people feed their preacher—feed him well, and I believe will pay his salary to the smallest fraction. Here is temporal encouragement to a faithful ministry.

We are doing something for the Advocate, but a slow mail is very much in the way. Please send us your accounts—some inquiries for them.

W. H. ARMSTRONG.

Jonesboro', Ala., April 30, 1860.

CONTRIBUTIONS FOR CHINA.

MR. EDITOR: Permit me to acknowledge through the Advocate the receipt of the following sums for the China Mission, to be given to Mrs. M. J. Lambuth.—

Mrs. Louisa M. Richardson of New Orleans, $10; Rev. C. G. Andrews of Point Worthington, $70—of which $10 was given by Mrs. W. Hammet, and $5 by Sister Ann Worthington; from Edward's Depot, $10, without any signature; from old Sister Featherston, of Warren Co., $5; from "Lieutenant's Wife," $5; Mary Wickliffe, $5; Mrs. Love of Canton, $5; Dr. Coker of Livingston, $10; Rev. H. Copeland of Hillsborough County, $5.

I am truly rejoiced that so many friends feel such interest in the China Mission, and are willing to aid by their prayers and their money in sending the blessings of salvation to the heathen. The Lord bless these friends.

JOHN R. LAMBUTH.

Madison County, Miss., May 4th, 1860.

KEMPER COUNTY BIBLE SOCIETY.

MR. EDITOR: No doubt some have read in your paper the operations of the Kemper County Bible Society, and to correct all mistakes, it may be my duty to make a statement, viz.:

Dr.

Bibles and Testaments in New Orleans,	$361 08
" " of A. H. S. Pickalh,	29 66
Colporteur service, Rev. W. T. Bartlett,	128 44
His travelling expenses,	10 00
Expense of books at Mobile and up R.R.	14 00
Total,	546 08

Cr.

By cash from Colporteur, (his services and expenses retained out of it)	$368 10
By cash from W. G. Gill, President of Society	91 85
By cash from collections and sales,	30 75
Total,	480 70
Balance due me,	55 38

Collections at various places were as follows, as near as I know:

Pleasant Ridge,	$22 00
Scooba and Wahnlak, and vicinity,	28 70
Public collection at Bethel,	8 00
Mount Zion,	5 00
Mount Hebron,	8 75
Public collection at Scooba,	14 60
Hopewell,	9 00

Between seven and eight hundred families were visited, fifty-two families had no Bibles or Testaments, twenty-nine received a Bible as a donation, and five could not read and would not receive. A few families were not reached, and some houses not gone to, having seen the occupants at other places. There has been, during the year 1859, distributed 190 Bibles, 48 Testaments and Psalms, 76 Testaments, and 21 Psalms. Total, 338.—Believing that they are doing good—remembering that it is the sword of the Spirit, and will work, who would not wish to help in this great work?

A short time since I was called ten or twelve miles to see an aged man, who has had the misfortune to lose a leg, above the knee. While conversing with him as to his age, and that of his children, he ordered his Bible, and when it came I found it to be one of the Society dollar Bibles. He said the colporteur gave it to him. In that Bible were the names and births of his family, and the death of two daughters. His manner showed that he prized his Bible.

Now, if the 338 Bibles and Testaments are being read through the county, tell me how many angels are there, as ministering spirits that we may be heirs of salvation, hovering over our county. The little girl that died happy because her Pa promised to spend two hundred dollars on Bibles for the poor, annually, ought to stir us up to do something for the Bible, the book of books, the word of God, the chart of Heaven. Yes, it was this blessed word that lit up the path of my widowed mother, as she went down the steep of time, and in triumph shouted in death that the angels had come; and it is this blessed Bible that gives me hope that I may triumph too, and see all that is good and great.

H. HOLMES.

PACIFIC RAILROAD PROJECT.

Although the subject of communication with the Pacific coast has received more or less attention for the past eighteen years, for emigrant roads, military roads, or railways, it is but recently that the public attention has been called to the true issue presented, and the absolute requisites involved.

The same great error, which we have had occasion to expose, time and again, in our columns, which prevails among railway administrations, viz: the sacrifice of way business for through traffic, and the principle which looks for the remote termini as the great sources of income, have had an important effect on public opinion, and has led to the general conclusion, that but a single line of road is needed to the Pacific coast, and that the particular route was not of so much consequence to the enterprise.

While there can be no question that any mode of connection by railway, with any part of the Pacific seaboard, is important to the vast commercial interests affected, which will naturally and inevitably seek the preferred line, a great change is taking place in public opinion on this point, and the local effects of such a line are assuming their true scale of importance.

The principle is beginning to be daily more clearly recognized, that the mere idea of connecting the Atlantic and Pacific coasts is not the most important benefit of the Pacific Railroad, and that the military, naval and postal service of the government, and the development of the agricultural, manufacturing and mining interests of the intervening country, is of paramount consequence, and these considerations must control the eventual construction of the communication, while they shew, with great force, that no single line of road will properly meet their requirements, and that great national divisions of country, and important sectional interests, present claims which cannot consistently be overlooked.

The friends of the Pacific Railroad, of whom there professes to be so many in all sections of our country, may as well learn to look upon this question in this light: In the first place, no single line will perform the chief functions of this enterprise. The central line proposed is of no military use whatever to either the disturbed Mexican border, or that of our powerful rival on the North, of San Juan memory, nor would a Northern or a Southern line protect any other district than its own. The same thing is true of the postal service of the Government. Our country, and particularly the Western country, is not subject to any stagnation. The waves of emigration are sweeping onward, under the impulse of a fixed and certain law, and the demands on this service alone, aside from that of the California coast, are yearly expanding in an enormous ratio. A single line will not provide for this necessity.

And it is not only true that these interests, with those of the farmer and the miner, require local development, but a careful examination of the present business with California, and the present expenditures of Government in these localities, go to show that the traffic which is now waiting for the completion of this enterprise, will abundantly pay a reasonable income on this investment for two distinct lines, involving an estimated capital of some $204,000,000. Public opinion is doubtful on this subject, because the surveys, estimates and reports which abound to the extent of $1,000,000 cost, have been made by officers who are not familiar with the actual construction and operation of our important railroads, and who have neglected proper investigations of this matter. But it is susceptible of demonstration, that as a simple investment two Pacific Roads, one North and one South, would pay at once, without any regard to the expansion of business for the next twelve or fifteen years.

Aside from the harmony of sectional interests involved in this double line, and the justice of the claim proposed by the South for her splendid agricultural districts, and her prompt concessions to Northern interests, with the probability that no single line can receive Congressional endorsement and patronage, another consideration presses on the national attention, and is affected by the due consummation of this work.

If the Atlantic and Western States do not link themselves with all due diligence with California, there is great danger that she will assume her own protection in her own hands. By the terms of the Constitution, she is now prohibited from any naval guardianship, and is, at the same time, neglected by the constitutional authority; unless the Government take the step involved in the construction of this connection, and this avenue of protection, the instinct of self-preservation and the projects of independent power may cost us a valuable acquisition.

It is time, therefore, that Congress should act and that it should give the country something more valuable to it than a mere through line.

MARRIAGES.

"It is not good for man to be alone."

May 3d, by Rev. John F. Wynn, MR. JOSHUA A. BENNETT to MRS. C. SHILLINGS, both of Carroll Parish, La.

February 29th, by Rev. John F. Wynn, MR. OSMER WADE to Miss ROSATTA HUALEY, all of Carroll Parish, La.

On the 1st of May, by the Rev. W. G. McGaughey, in Carroll parish, La., at the residence of Mr. Wade, Mr. J. W. Cowen of Franklin parish, to Miss ISORA Cowen of Carroll parish.

Also by the same, on the 6th of May, at the M. E. Church in Floyd, La., Mr. R. D. ROBERTS to Miss E. A. ROBERTS.

By Rev. John A. B. Jones, at Lecache, April 26th, Mr. LARKIN GILBART and Miss SARAH P. STAMPLAY, all of Claiborne county, Miss.

By same, on same day, in Port Gibson, Mr. FRANKLIN MAYBARRY and Miss MARY E. EARLY, all of Port Gibson, Miss.

By the Rev. F. W. Thecker, May 3, at the residence of the bride's mother, in Jacksonport, Ark., Mr. JOHN G. CASTENADO of Natchitochee Parish, La., to Miss ANN L. BAIRD, of this city.

DEATHS.

At Edgefield, (near Nashville), May 3, ELIZABETH VIRGINIA (pet name, Blackhead), aged three years and four months; daughter of H. N. and Amelia McTycire.

ALBERT G. BROWN, son of William and Mary Yarborough, of Marion county, Miss, was born May 18, 1858, and died April 11th, 1860.

DOMESTIC.

Expected Arrival of the Japanese Embassy.

WASHINGTON, May 12.—The steamer Philadelphia has gone to Hampton Roads for the purpose of receiving the Japanese Embassy, which is to arrive during the present month.

Congressional.

WASHINGTON, May 12.—The five bills providing for the organization of territorial governments in Arizona, Chippewa, Dacotah, Idahoe and Nevada, were laid on the table of the House of Representatives yesterday on account of each of them containing an anti-slavery proviso. The Senate yesterday confirmed the appointment of Hon. Calhoun Benham as District Attorney for the State of California.

Severe Drought.

BOSTON, May 12.—Telegraphic dispatches from various localities in the New England States, say that an extensive drought prevails throughout the different States. In some countries the woods are on fire, thereby destroying much valuable timber.

Great Freshet.

BALTIMORE, May 12.—A very heavy freshet took place in the Patapsco river at and above this city. The river has risen to such a height that in many places the wharves are covered with water to a depth varying from five to seven feet. No serious damage has been sustained outside the city.

Compliment to Senator Bell.

PHILADELPHIA, May 12.—Senator Bell, who arrived in this city yesterday, was serenaded last night. The street opposite his hotel was densely crowded. A short time after the serenade commenced Mr. Bell appeared on the balcony and addressed the concourse in the most eloquent and patriotic language.

The Hyatt Demonstration.

NEW YORK, May 12.—A tremendous meeting was held last night at the Cooper Institute for the purpose of publicly expressing sympathy for Hyatt. Great enthusiasm characterized the meeting.

Ministerial Dispatches.

WASHINGTON, May 12.—Dispatches received from Minister McLane, say that a special messenger had just arrived at the city of Vera Cruz, from the interior of Mexico, and announces that General Miramon's Government had accepted the basis of the adjustment proposed by the governments of England and France, expecting, however, the proviso for civil and religious toleration.

Troops for Utah.

General Scott has ordered two detachments of troops now in the Eastern Department, to be immediately sent to Utah for the purpose of reinforcing the troops already stationed there.

Delegates to the Chicago Convention.

It is stated that Messrs. Eli Thayer and Horace Greely have been elected substitutes for the State of Oregon in the Chicago Convention. In the capacity of delegates they are instructed to vote for Bates.

Reception of the Japanese Embassy.

WASHINGTON, May 14.—The United States steamer Roanoke, ordered on from New York with the Japanese Embassy, has arrived at Hampton Roads, whence the Philadelphia will bring them to this city. Great preparations have been made for giving the distinguished strangers a most magnificent and grand entree into the Federal capital.

The Covode Investigating Committee.

WASHINGTON, May 14.—In the recent examinations made before the Covode Committee, it has been ascertained that several members of Congress changed their votes on the English bill preparatory to the announcement of the result. Their object in so doing has been clearly shown by the dates of checks which were drawn for the purpose of paying them the sums at which they valued themselves. The investigation by the committee is still progressing. It is said that Attorney General Black has notified the committee that he wishes to be present at the next examination of Schneibel. Quite a lively time is expected from certain parties. Hon. Robert J. Walker has got all his papers prepared, and will close his testimony before the committee as soon as possible. Among the papers now in the hands of the committee is found an original plan of Mr. Walker's inaugural address. The manuscript has a great many interlineations, which appear to be in the handwriting of the President. The document is complete on the subject of a submission of the Kansas constitution to the people.

Address to the Seceding Delegates.

The Southern address, urging the seceding delegates from the Charleston Convention to return to the Baltimore Convention, was written by Senator Toombs, of Georgia. A number of modifications were suggested, but none of them adopted.

Letter from Howell Cobb, of Georgia.

AUGUSTA, GA., May 14.—The Hon. Howell Cobb, Secretary of the Treasury, has answered a communication addressed to him by the Macon Committee, in relation to the course pursued at Charleston by the seceding delegates. In his letter, the action of the seceders is fully and cordially sustained.

Fraud in the New York Post Office—Isaac V. Fowler a Defaulter.

NEW YORK, May 15.—Isaac V. Fowler has been removed from the office of Postmaster of this city, on account of extensive frauds committed during his control of the Post Office. It has been ascertained that he is a defaulter in the sum of $179,600. It is supposed that this amount was fraudulently obtained towards the close of President Pierce's administration. The state of affairs as above recounted was brought to light on Saturday last, as a sequence of the late Charleston Convention. On Saturday Marshal Rynders had received orders from Washington to arrest Fowler, but the order being received at a late hour of the day, the latter took advantage of the following day (Sunday), and left his residence early in the morning. Although his whereabout is not known, some think a clue can be obtained in the Sixth Auditor's office at Washington. It was long ago believed that a greater part of the money was spent in carrying the Pennsylvania election during the Presidential campaign in 1856. It was rumored last night that Fowler had committed suicide, but there was no credit to be placed in the statement. Messrs. Hillyer, Solicitor of the Treasury, and District Attorney Roosevelt, are preparing the necessary papers with a view of recovering the deficiency from George Law and Augustus Conover, who were the bondsmen of Fowler. These gentlemen deny their liability, because the defalcation occurred previous to their suretyship.

Burning of the Steamer Silver Star.

EVANSVILLE, May 15.—The steamboat Silver Star, from this place, bound for Paducah, took fire on Saturday night, while at the Curlew coal mines. The flames spread rapidly, and in a short time the boat was burned to the water's edge. Five lives were lost by the occurrence. The cargo will prove a total loss. The boat and freight are insured to two-thirds of their value in St. Louis offices.

Conflagration at Nebraska.

NEBRASKA CITY, May 15.—Nearly the whole of the business portion of this city was destroyed by fire on Saturday last. The loss is estimated at $120,000.

Arrival of the Pony Express.

ST. JOSEPH, May 15.—The Overland Pony Express, with news from California and the Pacific Coast of the 5th inst., reached this place to-day. The California Legislature adjourned sine die on the 30th ult. It passed a bill granting the right of way to the San Francisco and Los Angelos Telegraph Company. It appropriated $100,000 to aid in the construction of the Trans-Continental Telegraph Line.

FOREIGN.

Improvement in Cotton—Immense Preparations for War in China—Insurrection and Anarchy in Southern Italy.

LIVERPOOL, May 3.—The sales of Cottoe for the three business days since the sailing of the steamship Brazil amounted to 30,000 bales, of which speculators and exporters took 6000 bales. The market generally closed firm, with an advancing tendency. Prices, however, are generally unchanged. The sales of Wednesday and Thursday foot up 17,500 bales, of which speculators and exporters took 2500. The imports during the week, thus far, amount to 4700 bales. The imports on Thursday amount to 3550 bales.

The English Government were negotiating to lay a telegraph cable from Singapore to Rangoon.

The Chinese Government are making great preparations for war, and are determined to dispute the passage of the Allies to Pekin by all the means in their power. They have already erected fourteen miles of fortifications, and have 200,000 men in the field.

France proposes to relinquish her rights in reference to the neutralized districts of Savoy for 50,000,000 francs.

The Bishops in the Romagna have been prohibited by an edict from the Pope, from taking any part in the reception of King Victor Emmanuel, during his triumphal tour through that country. The correspondent of the Journal des Debates has been ordered to leave Rome within twenty days.

Advices from Naples state that the insurgents had been driven from Carrino, with a loss of 250 men. The loss of the Royal troops is still greater, amounting to over three hundred men. The insurrection, however, was put down, and the town was pillaged and set on fire. Accounts from Palermo state that great misery has prevailed at that place since the execution of fifteen insurgents on the 26th. A party of Neapolitan soldiers had been surprised, captured and hanged at Carrineo. The Neapolitan army consists of 160,000 men.

Railroad from Nice to Genoa.

It is stated that the French and Sardinian Government have come to an agreement in reference to the construction of a railroad along the Mediterranean, from Nice to Genoa. The project has been received with much favor by the people of Nice, and will go far towards satisfying the discontents with the annexation to France. The railroad will be built by the French Government.

General Amnesty in Spain.

Letters from Madrid state that the Government has declared a general amnesty. The only condition is, that all parties implicated in the late Carlist movement, shall take a simple oath of allegiance to the Queen.

The Insurrection in Italy.

Letters from Messina state that the city was politically quiet, but that much discouragement prevails on account of the gloomy condition of affairs. A considerable number of arrests had been made since the quelling of the disturbance. Every one who was suspected of having given the least aid or encouragement to the insurgents was taken up and thrown into prison. It is principally owing to this fact that the citadels and prisons, are excessively crowded. There are many different reports circulated respecting the late insurrectionary movement. It cannot be accredited, many of the first families will be tried for having participated in designs to overthrow the Government.—So contradictory are the reports made that it is impossible to determine precisely who is guilty. It is said that a Neapolitan general was captured by the insurgents, and would be retained till their wrongs were redressed, if he (the prisoner) was taken from them by force. It is also reported that the seat of government is to be transfered from Palermo to Messina, where it will be more secure. The city of Palmermo is to be garrisoned by a detachment, numbering 20,000 men. The royal troops are afraid to proceed into the interior of the country, on account of the general disposition which has been shown in favor of the insurgents.

Gold from Australia.

Three hundred thousand pounds sterling of gold have been received from Austria during the past week.

American Stocks in England.

LONDON, May 3.—The most important topic in which American interests are concerned is the increased attention given to American stocks.

The Turkish Loan.

The Sublime Porte, which has been engaged some time in negotiating for a loan, finally effected one at Constantinople.—The extent of the loan is £700,000 sterling.

EDITORIAL NOTICES.

ADVERTISING IN THE ADVOCATE.

The business public are slowly learning that the Advocate is THE GREAT ADVERTISING PAPER OF THE SOUTH AND WEST. Advertisements in it are more valuable than in any half dozen other papers.

1.—It has the largest circulation west of Charleston, and South of Cincinnati; larger than any other two weeklies in New Orleans, and is increasing rapidly—will, in a few years, double its present circulation.

2.—Of medium size, and not crowded with advertisements, an advertisement is not lost in it, but can be easily found.

3.—In our "Editorial Notices," which we give to every advertisement, we specify the page and column on which an advertisement may be found. We seek to make every advertisement valuable to the advertiser and to the paper."

4.—The circulation is spread out over Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, principally; Georgia, Florida, Tennessee, Kentucky, Arkansas, partially.

5.—It is the only weekly of large and widely-spread circulation in the great and growing metropolis of the South.

TEVIS & FLY, Lawyers and Land Agents, Hallettsville, Texas, have their card in this paper, third page, sixth column. They are worthy gentlemen and good lawyers.

THE WILCOX & GIBBS SEWING MACHINE, for $35, is advertised on the third page of this paper, sixth column.—Call and examine for yourselves.

SOOTHING SYRUP FOR CHILDREN.—This medicine is advertised on this page, sixth column. If as good as represented, it will prove a great blessing to mothers.

SITUATION WANTED.—In the sixth column of this page will be found an advertisement, by a teacher, for a situation, to which we call attention.

LIVER INVIGORATOR AND CATHARTIC PILLS.—We call attention to these medicines, advertised in the sixth colmnn of this page.

RECEIPTS, BY THE POST-OFFICE,

From May 8th to May 15th, 1860.

A—J S Arbutnot, $5; W H Armstrong, $2.
B—A Battle, $2; J E Barnett, $2 50.
C—A G Cox, $5; D P Cullin, $2.
D—J Dunn, $1 25.
E—L Ercanbrack, $5.
G—M W Gillespie, $2; J J Grace, $1 24; B D Gayle, $10, A E Goodwyn, $10.
H—W Howell, $4; W H Huntingdon, $5; W B Hill, $2.
J—J A Jones, $10; W H Johnson, $11 20.
M—J S M'Leodon, $2; W A Montgomery, $1 24.
N—J D Newsom, $5; W B Neal, $6.
P—J C Pitts, $5; E Patton, $7; B P Paxton, $2; T C Parrish, $5.
T—J H Tullis, $2; W S Townsend, $4.
W—S A Williams, $3; J F Wynn, $1 18.
Y—N B Young, $5.

COMMERCIAL.

MONDAY EVENING, May 14th, 1860.

We condense the following statement from the New Orleans Price Current of the 12th instant:—

The movement in our general market has exhibited some irregularity during the past week, and in Cotton we have noticed considerable fluctuation, though in that staple and in Tobacco, an increased amount of business has been done. In Sugar and Molasses the operations have been on a moderate scale, though the rates have tended generally in favor of buyers. In Western Produce we have noticed a dull and heavy market for Flour, while a good demand has prevailed for Corn at full prices, and most descriptions of provisions have been firm. Freights have shown more firmness, and Exchange has further advanced.

COTTON.—With respect to prices, we have to remark that they have been very full for clean Cotton, and even running lots of the medium grades, entirely free from dust, may be quoted at 10 to 10¼ for Low Middling, and 11¼ to 11½ and 11¾ for Middling to Strict Middling, while mixed or average lots find a very irregular market. The lower grades have been heavy and drooping, with a degree of irregularity in the prices which renders it impossible to give any figures to represent the state of the market. Our quotations below for Low Middling and Middling apply only to mixed and average lots, which mostly contain more or less dust.

The receipts at this port since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas,) are 2,034,958 bales, against 1,582,447 bales to same date last year, and the increase of the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 772,474 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same dates last year, there is an increase of 706,999 bales to Great Britain, and of 155,557 to France, while to other foreign ports there is a decrease of 82,793 bales.

New Orleans Classification:

Inferior	6 @ 6	Good Middling	11¾@12
Ordinary	8¾@ 7¾	Middling Fair	12¾@12¾
Good Ordinary	7¾@ 8¾	Fair	—@—
Low Middling	9¾@10	Good Fair	—@—
Middling	10¾@11	Good and Fine	—@—

SUGAR.—The sales of the week amount to 7000 hhds. We quote for Inferior and Refining 3 to 4½; Common to Good Common 5 to 6¼; Fair to Fully Fair 6¾ to 7¾; Prime to Choice 7¾ to 8¼; Centrifugal and Clarified 6¾ to 9 cents per pound. The above quotations apply to round lots, but small orders of 5 hhds and under, could not be filled without paying a further advance of ¼ to ½c per pound.

MOLASSES.—Total receipts of the week 5,000 barrels. The prices obtained during the week were: Inferior to Fair, 30 to 37 cents per gallon; and Prime to Choice, 36 to 38 cents; half barrels, 35 to 40 cents per gallon.

FLOUR.—About 8,000 bbls have been sold during the past week, at from $5 75 to $6 55 for superfine, $6 75 to 7 00 for ordinary to good extra, and $6 75 to $7 50 per bbl. for choice extra brands.

GRAIN.—The receipts of Corn continue light. About 20,000 sacks have been sold at from $0 68 to 0 70 for ordinary, and $0 80 for good white. Oats have been in moderate request at 50c to 54c per bushel for good to prime St. Louis. Bran sells at $1 10 to $1 15 for ordinary to choice lots. Wheat sells at $1 15 per bushel for prime red.

BEEF.—We quote Prime Mess at $14 00 per bbl. for extra brands.

BACON.—Shoulders 7¾ to 8; Ribbed Sides 10 to 10½; Clear Sides 11 to 11¾; Sugar-cured Hams 12 to 12½ cents per pound.

LARD.—We quote 10¾ to 11¼c for prime to choice prime, in tcs., and 11¼ to 11½c. for kegs.

BUTTER.—Western generally selling at 12 to 14 cents per pound, according to quality; and Obecsa 11 to 11½.

BAGGING AND BALE ROPE.—We quote Kentucky Bagging at 14½ to 15 cents per yard; India Bagging, 12½ to 13¼; Bale Rope, hand spun, 7½ to 8c, and machine made, 8½ to 9 cents per pound.

GUNNY BAGS—Limited parcels sell at 10 cents for light and 10½ to 11c. to heavy and extra heavy bags.

COFFEE.—We quote fair at 12½ to 13, and prime at 13½ per pound.

PORK.—The principal sales reported through the week were at $17 75 to $18 25 per bbl. for Mess.

NAVAL STORES.—A good demand for Spirits Turpentine mostly on speculation. Sales of some 600 bbls at 45 to 46. Latterly holders have been asking 47½ to 50c per gallon, the market closing at the outside rate. Of Rosin some 1000 bbls have sold at $1 40 to $1 50 for Common and No 2, and $1 75 to $2 per bbl of 280 pounds for Low No. 1. The finer qualities are scarce and in request. Tar dull and nominal. Stock of some 5000 bbls on hand.

LIVE-STOCK.—Beef Cattle—Western, 7 to 8½c. per lb. net; Texas—ordinary to fair $15 to 16, and choice $30 to 50 per head.
Hogs, selling at 6 to 6½c. per pound net.
Sheep—Selling at $4 00 to $5 50 per head.
Veal Cattle—Selling at $8 00 to $14 00 per head.
Milch Cows—at $40 to $85 per head.

SPECIAL NOTICES.

NOTICE.—Persons having business with the NEW ORLEANS DEPOSITORY, will please direct to KEENER & PARKER.

VICKSBURG DEPOSITORY.—All orders should be addressed thus—"Agent Book and Tract Depository, Vicksburg, Miss."

MOBILE DEPOSITORY.—All orders should be addressed thus: "Agent Book and Tract Depository, Ala."

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

Greenville District—Third Round Quarterly Meetings.

May—Upper Deer Creek, 12th and 13th; Middle Deer Creek 19th and 20th; Lower Deer Creek, at Scola, 26th and 27th.

June—Greenville Colored Mission, 3rd; Duncan's Plantations 9th and 10th; Greenville, 16th and 17th; Bolivar, at Bogue Phalia, 23rd and 24th.

July—American Bend, 1st; Tallula, at Brunswick Landing, 7th and 8th; Sunflower, at Indian Bayou, 14th & 15th.

WM. B. HINES, P.E.

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

Poetry.

THE LORD'S PRAYER.

We lay before our readers the Lord's Prayer, beautifully paraphrased into an acrostic, by Mr. Thomas Starte-vant, jun., a soldier in the 26th regiment United States Infantry.

Our Lord and King, who reign'st enthroned on high,
Father of light! mysterious Deity!
Who art the great I AM, the last, the first;
Art righteous, holy, merciful and just,
As realms of glory, scenes where angels sing,
Heaven is the dwelling place of God our King,
Hallowed thy name, which doth all names transcend,
Be thou adored, our great Almighty Friend.
Thy glory shines beyond creation's space,
Named in the book of justice and of grace.
Thy kingdom towers beyond thy starry skies;
Kingdom satanic falls, but thine shall rise.
Come let thine empire, O thou Holy One,
Thy great and everlasting will be done!
Will God make known his will, his power display?
Be it the work of mortals to obey.
Done is the great, the wondrous work of love,
On Calvary's cross he died, but reigns above;
Earth bears the record in thy holy word,
As Heaven adores thy love, let earth, O Lord;
It shines transcendent in th' eternal skies,
It pointed to Heaven—for man the Savior dies.
In songs immortal angels laud his name,
Heaven shouts with joy, and saints his love proclaim.
Give us, O Lord, our food, our cause to give Us that food on which our souls may live!
This be our boon to-day, and days to come,
Day without end in our eternal home!
Our steely souls supply from day to day,
Daily assist and aid us when we pray.
Bread though we ask, yet, Lord, thy blessing feed,
And make as grateful when thy gifts descend,
Forgive our sins, which in destruction place
Us 'tha vile rebels of a rebel race;
Our follies, frails and trespasses forgive,
Debts which we ne'er can pay, or thou receive;
As we, O Lord, our neighbor's faults o'erlook,
We beg thou'dst blot ours from thy memory's book.
Forgive our enemies, extend thy grace
Our souls to save, s'an Adam's guilty race.
Deliver us from ev'ry ill and harm,
Deliver us from all which can annoy
Us in this world, and may our souls destroy,
From all calamities which men betide,
Evil and death, O turn our feet aside;
For we are mortal worms, and cleave to clay;
Think 't is to rule, and mortals to obey.
Is not thy mercy, Lord, forever free?
The whole creation knows no God but thee.
Kingdom and empire is thy presence fell:
The King eternal reigns the King of all.
Power is with thee—to thee be glory given,
And be thy name adored by earth and Heaven,
Thy praise of saints and angels is thy own:
Glory to thee, the everlasting One,
Forever be thy triune name adored;
Amen! Hosanna! blessed be the Lord!

Children's Column.

Children and Missions.

Some time since we received a letter from Omega, La., from a little girl eleven years old, informing us that she had read a "piece" in the Sunday School Visitor, called, "Johnny and his Verse," which made her feel like doing something for heathen boys and girls. She started a subscription paper among her little associates. Eleven of them joined and sent us $5. She gives us the privilege of appropriating the money, which we shall sacred y attend to. She made her money by sewieg for her mother. It is pleasant indeed to learn that the little girls who read the "children's column" are willieg to work, and make themselves useful, and that they also seek to glorify God, and save the heathen, by their labors. We had mislaid the letter, or we should have noticed the matter before now. All the little subscribers send their names with the paper and money, giving from a dollar down to fifteen cents.

Another Donation.

A lady some time since sent us $10 to be appropriated to benevolent purposes, without giving her name. The unknown donor is hereby informed that the money will be appropriated according to our best judgment.

LITTLE MAGIE.

The soft June breeze of a bright Sabbath morning entered the open windows of a pleasant church in Clieton, stirring the airy plumes and delicate flowars of many a beauty's hat, and ruffling the iron gray on many an old man's head. It was a pleasant congregatioe. On the desk was a tiey white vase crowned with five most delicate blossoms of the flower month, and a white rose lay upon the open page of the Bible.

A young man had walked easily up the aisle, had taken his seat at the desk, and was now sweeping his full dark eye over the congregation, as if to measure the work before him. There was little irregularities in the surface of the broad forehead, as though the brain had best against the frontal bone; the hair, thrown carelessly back, was half inclined to curl, and the lips lay together with a finish and precision, in spite of a redeess and roundness. It was a strong face; not handsome, but earcest, grave, strong.

Thes was the new minister. The old warrior who had battled the Prince of the power of the air for almost half a century, whose broad hand had touched the forehead of many and many a bride and many and many a sleeper, had but just sow gone to his rest, saying, "I have fought a good fight, I have kept the faith."

Hymns had been read in a full rich tone, prayers had been offered with humility and earnestness. The preacher rose to speak. The interest excited by the appearance and bearing of the young orator, added to the natural charm of novelty, gava him the undivided attention of every one within the walls. Commencing in a low and musical tone, without o-tentation, but with calm earnestness, he unfolded the points of his theme, "The Power of a Christian Life." As the young preacher advanced in his discourse, warming with the unthreading of his argumeet, strengthening important points and enforcing boma truths with the natural fire of his nature, his whole face and figure seemed kindled to a glow of unrestrained enthusiasm, and the light of real genius shot from his eyes. Nothing could have bece more complete and deep than the impression with which his audience was held when he said "Amen."

The central pew in the church was occepied by a family, the most noticeable member of which was a lady of fair complexion, a youthful roundness of feature, dressed in a rich silk, and carrying her head somewhat proudly. That she gave entire attention to the discourse is to be presumed, since that may be said of each of the audience. That she was impressed by the manliness and power of the young preacher—that he approached the ideal of a proud and somewhat intellectual nature—the reader may take upon the testimony of the writer.

In a corner pew, near the wall, but not far from the desk, sat an old man of not less than eighty winters, his massive face furrowed and his thin hair white as snow. From beside him a pale, classical, maidenly face peered up at the preacher. The young girl was very plainly dressed—with consummate neatness and taste, but with a grave economy. At first she sat there shrinkingly, half seeming to hide under the broad, bent shoulders of the aged grandfather; but when the tide of thought was fully around the child forgot herself, and permitted flashes of feeling to play upon the most expressive and changeful features that I ever saw. During the whole sweep of that discourse the study of her face was like the reading of a poem. When the preacher, having dwelt in glowing language upon the beauty and power of devotion to the happiness of others, closed the Bible and lifted a hand for prayer, the young girl leaned her head upon her fingers and wept in her own still way—so like the falling of an April rain.

The old gentleman tottered feebly from the church, and hence the two were the last to de-cend the steps. It was a strange sight to any but the accustomed villagers—that massive grandfather, supported so bravely by the slight creature at his side; and yet it may be questioned whether he ever doubted the strength of his sweet little protector.

The old man's foot slipped upon the step, and he would have fallen quite upon the maiden, whose white fingers were clasping his heavy arm, had not the young minister caught him at the instant and held him with a strong hand.

The old man looked into the face of the preacher, and grasping his hand, said, in a heavy and yet tremulous voice:

"You are a brave lad, my son, a brave lad. Never give way. Fight the good fight. I was young once but now I am old and broken. Young men must bear the armor now. Fight bravely, my son. God bless you! God bless you!"

The young preacher held Maggie's little hand in his for an instant, covering it quite in his broad palm, while she, looking up to his full, clear eyes with her own speaking ones, sank into herself with a sense of utter littleness.

Poor little foolish Maggie! Standing there the self-reliant protector of her grandfather, and yet looking up to the face of the young minister with such a feeling of reverence, of illimitable distance, as gave her the impression of sinking, sinking, till she half believed herself no bigger than a daisy. Genius is godlike, and has its worshippers. But these differ widely in their adoration—one bending with a self consciousness and another falling prostrate.

As she walked along slowly beside the old man Maggie felt as though she had gone back to the days of her childhood, she seemed so little! Why the very dress she wore—the little buff cotton—seemed to have outgrown her; and even the shawl, which was set so prettily upon her shoulders when she went to church, had become a world too large. And her thoughts which she had kept within her bosom, feeling them from books, and warming them with her native ardor of imagination, till her heart seemed all too big for her little figure—had come to seem so small! Foolish little Maggie!

The old man mettered to himself as he went along, leaving the maidee to her own littleness and adoration. But afterward, when bedtime had come—when the Word had been read; and prayer had ascended—little Maggie felt like talking; and she said,

"Grandfather, isn't it a noble thieg to be young, and strong, and eloquent? Oh! it is a splendid thing to be a man!"

And for an instant that expressive face lit up into a perfect glow.

"Yes, Maggie. I was a strong young fellow sixty years ago. And the work I used to do! Never saw the man who could go ahead of me then, child. But now I'm getting old—getting old—getting old."

And the old man relapsed into musings. The young girl's face fell back to its quietude, disappointed that her own high thoughts were so poorly met. So she went to her nest with her owe glow of feeling unshared.

The lady in silk met the young preacher every day; for she was the daughter of a wealthy elder, who had been requested to take him into his family for a few months. Beautiful, refined, intellectual. Nor was she unimpressed.

The high talent of the young orator had wrought upon an imagination made sensitive to intellectual influence by its own intellectual bias, until it must be confessed, she saw in him an approximate realization of her own proud ideal. Too high born and gifted to be other than his peer, she was yet coescious of an admiration somewhat too glowing for the ordinary relations of life.

A year weet by. The young minister was often called by his position to the bedside of the decaying old man. Little Maggie felt safe when he was there; for it seemed as though his great heart and strong hand could cover and protect, not only herself and her grandfather, but half the world besides.

At first she would rarely talk—for what could he care for her little thoughts?—but at length, drawn out little by little, the wealth of her tener nature began to find expression; and after he was gone little Maggie would sit a long while woodering what could make her so lose sight of herself when he was by—could make her forget what a very little, simple creature she was—and then the old inshrieking would come again.

The grandfather died—died as a speet candle flickers and is gone—died one Sabbath morning, with only Maggie by his bedside, and she not afraid of the messenger that came. As the light went out of the aged eyes the dear girl pressed her trembling fingers upoe the lids, laid her warm face to the wrinkled cheek, the ringlets falling and mingling with the snowy locks, and sobbed in abandonment of grief. The young preacher found them thus; and Maggie felt calm again—felt safe under the shadow of his great heart.

After this was the bustle of preparation for burial; the coming and going of friends; the awkward but well-meaning sympathy of the village people; the strong, uplifting words of the fueeral service; the slow procession; the last touch; the hollow fall of earth; the drear return.

Ths young preacher was called away—called seddenly and strongly to a field of labor worthy of his vigorous youth and high talent.

Poor little Maggie! Weepieg oe her pillow till she wept herself asleep, utterly conquered by her tears, till neither household activity or merry songs could hold them from gushieg out whenever she thought of this new loss. Maggie would never be thought of again! He would move among the great, make himself a name, and be very useful and very happy. Well, she should never lose her little title le him; a wee bit of a share in blessedness—there was comfort in that.

Every body said he was goieg to carry with him the elder's daughter. Maggie was very glad, for the lady was called amiable and good, though a little proud. People pronounced her a fit companioe for a minister of mark, with har olear, practical sense, and superiority of mind. Maggie hoped she would love him very dearly; but it seemed to her, so nshew, that she couldn't begin to love him as she ought. She couldn't help wishieg that the elder's daughter were a little less stately, and handsome, and proud.

The young minister had promised to come and see her once more before he left; and to-day, Saturday, would be the day, she was sure; for to-morrow was the Sabbath, and Monday morning's coach would take him away. She had sung very little to-day, her voice trembled so; and she had sewed very little, for she could not see so well as usual. But she went out into her flewar-garden and gathered a tiny little star of the snowy Bathlehem, the smallest and fairest she could find, and placed it between the leaves of her little Bible. Then when she sat down and thought of giveg it to him, Bible and all, she begae to grow little again, and wondered if he would smile at her for hoping to be remembered very long.

The young man came and went; but before he left, little Maggie weet to her table, fluttering like a wieged bird, and bringing the Bible which she had loved for so many years, put it into his hand, and asked him softly—because her voice wouldn't come—if he would carry it with him and keep it for her sake, and then the foolish little Maggie sat down and cried. A strong arm stole around her. A deep rich voice, close to her ear, said, "Yes, child! and may I carry little Maggie with me too?"

Maggie looked luto the eyes that were beet epon her. They were earneat and soul-full. Then she went down, dowe, dowe into eothingness, till she was no bigger than a butter-cup, her little heart almost stopped its beatiege, the blood left her cheeks, and her hands were as white as snow; and then the reaction came, the warm blood coursing through the arteries with almost the sound of gurgling streams; and little Maggie's fieger-tips were warm and crimson whee she laid her head on his bosom and wept in her owe still way—"so like na April rain."

She made the darliegest little wife that ever a minister had.—Harper's Weekly.

BARON MUNCHAUSEN.

The "Advee tures of Baron Munchausen" was a work written several years ago, for the purpose of putting to shame a class of writers, who, in giviug to the world accounts of their advee tures in foreign lands, told all sorts of improbable stories le order to render themselves luminous as travellers. The book which professed to give the travels of the Baron, was, of course, a work of fiotion, and the statements it contained so far outstripped those of all other travellers that it served as a severe satire upon them. When, therefora, persons on returning from abroad were detected in telling lies, or giviug greatly exaggerated accounts of what they had seeu or done, they were accused of beieg disciples of Baron Muuchausee.

Perhaps the reader has never seen the Baron's book. If so, he will be amused with one or two specimens from its marvelous pages.

One eveoieg the Baron declares that he was overtakee by a snow-storm. So much snow fell that he was obliged to dismount, and tie his horse to what he thought was the stump of an old tree, while he wrapped himself in his cloak, lay down on the snow, and fell into a deep slumber. When he awoke in the morolug, his horse was missieg. He couldn't see him anywhere. At length looklog up towards the sky, he espied the animal suspended to the cross of a church steeple! There had been a free thaw during the night, the snow had melted away, and what he had takee to be the stump of a tree the eveuing before, proved now to be eothiug less than the cross of a church steeple. Oee hundred and fifty feet of snow had fallen and disappeared in twenty-four hours. The Baron took out his pistol, fired at the bridle, shot it in two, and when the horse fell to the groned, his master at ouce mounted him and went on his journey.

On another occasion he was passiug under a gate, which fell down by accident, and cut his poor horse asunder just behind the saddle. The Baron didn't know of his loss till an hour afterward, whan passing over a brook, the horse took a drink, and hearing something gushieg out like water behiod him, Munchausen turned around and saw to his amazement that, for the last four or five miles, he had beee riding on half a horse instead of a whole one. The Baroe turned back, got the hind quarters of the animal, and sewed the body together with willow twigs, which afterwards grew to be flee trees, and proved a fine shelter to him from the sue, whee he was on his journeys.

One very cold day he was playing tunes on a bugle, when all the tunes froze belure they came out at the further extremities of the instrument. However, upon hanging it near the fire, the bugle begae playing and never ceased till all the frozen tunes were played out in their regular order.

Travellers, with all their desire to excite the admiration of lovers of the marvellous, were taught a lessou by his b ok, and, oo douht, since its publication, muoy a writer has been forced to keep the story of his adventures within the bouods of truth, by the exaggeration and cuttiog sarcasm of Baron Munchausen.

A WORD TO BOYS.

Some one has said: "Boys, did you ever think that this great world, with all its wealth and woe, with all its mines and mountains, oceans, seas, and views, with all its shipping, its steamboats, its railroads, and its inquaetie telegraphs, with all its millions of men, and all the science and progress of ages, will soon be given over to the hands of the boys of the present age—boys like you, assembled in schoolrooms, or playing without them, on both sides of the Atlantic? Believe it, and look abroad upon your inheritance, and get ready to enter upon its possession. The kings, presidents, governors, statesmen, philosophers, ministers, teachers, men of the future, all are boys, whose feet, like yours, cannot reach the floor, when seated on the benches upon which they are learning to master the mono-yllables of their respective languages."

Boys, be making ready to act well your part. Become good scholars. Read only what is instructive. Spend no time with novels. Study science and government, and the history of the world. Study agriculture and mechanism. Become as nearly as possible perfect in the occupation you may choose. Learn prudence and self-control. Have decision of character. Take the Bible for your guide. Become familiar with its teachings, and observe them. Seek wisdom and prosperity from your heaveoly Father. As you grow in stature, in bodily strength, and in years, grow in piety, in intelligence, in caution, in activity, in firmness, and in charity. Aspire to be men of the noblest character. Resolve to be useful, and we trust you will be happy. Cherish the feeling that you were born to receive good and to do good. Be manly in spirit and act.

The little word "father" (said Luther,) leaped forth in prayer by a child of God, exceeds the eloquence of Demosthenes, Cicero, and all the famed orators of the world.

TELEGRAPHIC.

The electric telegraph has not been applied to practical purposes quite twenty years, but already the statistics relating to it are astounding. There is enough telegraph wire now in use to go just four times round the world.—The United States takes the lead in this business. We have thirty-five thousand miles of wire, to Great Britain's ten thousand. Germany has ten thousand; France, eight thousand; Russia, five thousand; India, five thousand; Australia, twelve hundred. The capital invested in telegraphs is moderately estimated at fifty millions of dollars. Of submarine telegraphic cables thirty-one are now in successful operation, of which the one across the Black Sea, three hundred and forty miles in length, is the longest.—Submarine wires now connect England and France, England and Ireland, England and Holland, Italy and Corsica; and there is, indeed, no considerable body of water in Europe without one. The Atlantic cable sleeps at the bottom of the sea, but it kept awake long enough to prove that the two continents may talk together, if they will, without the assistance of the mail.

Why does not some Yankee start the thing again, putting the shares at ten dollars? Who would not give so much toward an experiment so interesting? The whole world would be inclined to respond to such an invitation, if it were made by a company headed by the right men.

WHAT THE LEAVES SAY.

You have often gazed upon the many colored leaves which fluttered in the autumn breeze, just ready to fall to the ground. Did you ever listen to hear them talk to you? or talk they do in their silent language—telling you of the bright spring time, when they drank in the geetle dew and inhaled the balmy air, and spread out their delicate fibers to the rays of the sun, and fashioned by a divine Creator, took forms of beauty; and painted by His hand, assumed the pleasant green; and how, upheld by His power, they had borne the pelting of many a pitiless storm, and the scorching heat of the noonday sun, while many of their companions had faded and fallen to the ground. And they would tell you that, one by one, they, too, should fall. Thus these fading, falling leaves, talk to us of life's evening, and whisper to us to be ready, for "we all do fade as a leaf." And do they not talk to us of something brighter and better—of the unfading leaves of the tree that grows on the banks of the river of life, and urge us to seek that heavenly world?

LITTLE GRAVES.

Sacred places for pure thoughts and holy meditatioes are the little graves le the Church-yard, says a writer.—They are the depositories of a mother's sweetest joy, half unfolded buds of leooceee; humanity clipped by the first frost of time, ere yet a ceeker worm of corruption has nestled smoeg its embryo petals. Callous, indeed, must be the heart of him who can stand by a little grave side and not have the holiest emotions of the soul awakened to thoughts of purity and joy which belong alone to God and Heaven, for the muto preacher at his feet tells of life began and eeded without etain; and sarely if this be vouchsafed to moriality, how much purer and holier must be the spiritual land, enlightened by the sue of infinite goodeess, whence emanated the soul of that brief sojourner among us? How swells the heart of the pareet with mournful joy while standieg by the earth bed of lost little ones? Mournful, because a sweet treasuro has been taken away—joyiel, because that precious jewel glitters le the diadem of the Redeemer.

AN ANCIENT RELIO—THE MARTYR'S BIBLE.—The Massachusetts Pioughman, in a letter from Mr. L. H. Hildreth, cootains the following account of ae ancient Bible, probably the oldest in the State:

At the house of Mr. Thomas Carter I had the pleesure of examieing a Bible printed by John Carwood as early as the year 1559. Mr. Carter is a direct descendant of the martyr John Rogers. This Bible is really ae ancient and interesting book, being printed in the old English black letter, with illuminated capitels, and the spelling of a bygone day. It has often been lent by Mr. Carter. The Americae Aetiquarian Society at Rochester having kept it three years, and the Rev. Roht. C. Waterston, of Bostoe, having borrowed it likewise. The most interesting associations, however, connected with it is the fact that it belonged to the martyr Rogers himself; that it was the good book which he perused, and from which he drew streogth to support him in his time of trouble, and the marks of fire are even shown upon it, where it is supposed that he carried it to the stake with him, and only handed it to his family after the flames had been kindled by which he sufferd.

CHOACH MOSIC.—A gentleman who was travelling in Germany made the inquiry in an important place in which he happened to be on Sunday, in which church he would be likely to hear the best music. The answer was "We do oot have any music le church." Somewhat surprised, he asked if no hymne were eung. The person inquired of responded in the affirmative, but seemed to have no idea that this was music; it was a religious exercise into which music came incidentally, without douht, but in such a subordinate place as to be hardly regarded for its own sake. This is the proper idea in congregational singing. Music is not the object, but devotion. The exercise must not be regarded as musical, but religious. The most rhetorically elegant preyers are not eecessarily the best, by any meaus; but, on the contrary, the rhetoric may become a positive hindrance. So with the singing of hymns; that manner which most effectually engages the hearts of the congregation, is best, though it may lack musical elegance.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

WM. B. McCAULY died at Canton, Miss., April 10th, 1860, in his twenty-fifth year. He was born in Sharon, Miss., Oct. 12th, 1835. He had been a member of the Methodist Church for about five years, and a licenced Exhorter for about three years. Owiug to diffidence he seldom exhorted, but was very useful at protracted meetings; zealous and earnest in prayer, a young man of piety and feith. He felt it his duty to devote himself to the work of the ministry, and, had his life been spared, might have become a very useful laborer in the Lord's vineyard. On the day of his death I found him in a comfortable state of mind. He said, "Pray for me; I have great confidence in prayer. If the Lord will raise me up, I will go, I will go. I want to live to comfort my mother, and to do good in the world. I feel I love God, but I want to feel more of his love." Ice was presented to him to assuage his raging fever, but he declined by seying, "Religion is better than ice. I wish I had strength of mind and body to praise God as I desire." He exhorted his friends to meet him in heaven. He manifested a deep solicitude for the conversion of his youngest sister, who had scarcely recovered from a very severe attack of fever; and taking her by the hand, said, "I have spent many sweet seasons and sleepless nights praying for you; will you meet me in heaven? Promise me that you will meet me in heaven." She having promised he appeered to be better satisfied, and said to her, "Now kiss those lips which will soon be sealed in death until the resurrection morn." Turning to his mother, he said, "Mother, I am happy," and in a short time after passed away to join the blood-washed throng. A large congregation assembled at the Methodist church in Sharon, to pay the last tokens of respect to the memory of the deceased, when the writer addressed them from First Thessalonians, iv: 13-14: "I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep," etc.

J. M. PUGH.

Sharon, April, 1860.

REV. JOHN FOUST was born in Sullivan county, Tennessee, 12th Dec., 1796. At the age of 12 years his father removed him to Smith county, Tenn., where he resided till he was grown. In the 18th year of his age he volunteered under Captain Allen, in defence of his country; was in several engagements, and among them took an honorable part in the memorable battle at New Orleans. In his 19th year, 3rd of September, 1815, brother Foust was married to Letty Morris, who has been his constant devoted companion for more than forty-four years, and who still survives him. At an early day in the settlement of Alabama, brother Foust settled in Blount county, and on the 27th of October, 1826, at Ebenezer, Cahaba Valley Circuit, by the Quarterly Meeting Conference, over which Dr. Robert L. Kennon, P. E., presided, he was licensed to preech, in which sphere he remained local till 1832. This year he entered the Mississippi Conference, but soon thereafter became a member of the Alabama Conference. At the annual Conference held at Tuskaloosa, Ala., Dec., 1832, he was ordained Deecon, and at the annual Conference held at Columbus, Miss., January, 1838, he was ordained elder, and as his credentials show, both these solemn and important rites in the church he received at the hands of Bishop Andrew. A part of the year 1834, in consequence of ill health, brother Foust was local. With this exception, he was a faithful, constant, useful itinerant preacher, from 1832 till 1859, when, in consequence of declining health, he took a superannuated relationship to the Alabama Conference, which relation he held at the time of his death, which was peaceful and triumphent, at his own beloved, quiet home, Shelly county, Alabama, on 15th April, 1860. Brother Foust may be considered one of the original pioneer—a pioneer—a frontier man, for perhaps no preacher in the Alabama Conference has the honor of having organized more circuit missions and societies than he. He was a safe man, of true piety, sound judgement, and commending person. And now our beloved uncle Foust is gone—gone to the grave—gone to his reward. His familiar face will no more, in time, be seen by his brethren of the Alabama Conference. His prayers, songs, exhortations, and sermons are all hushed in death, and not until the dawn of eternity will the measure of his usefulnese be fully known. His mantle has descended, and for ought we know, God, in his providence and grace has caused it to rest on Brother Foust's beloved son, now at Summerfield, Alabama.

J. M. M'CLANAHAN.

Shelly Co., Ala., May 2, 1860.

MRS. NANCY CAMPBELL, of Choctaw county, Alabama, departed this life on the morning of the 15th February last, after a short illness; aged eighty-seven years. She was originally from Fayetteville, North Caroline, and consort of Edward Campbell deceased. She had been a consistent member of the church some thirty years.

April 20th, 1860.

N. C. papers please copy.

MRS. ELEANOR CAMPBELL, of Choctaw county, Ala., was called to her long and happy home, on the morning of the 23d March last, after a protracted illness of thirty-six days; le the fifty-sixth year of her age. She was a true friend, an obliging neighbor, a kind and affectioeate mother, and a true Christian. Among her last words were: "Oh, let me die the death of the righteous."

April 20th, 1860.

MARY ILLINOIS, daughter of Major Walter G. Kearney, and Mrs. Susau Kearney, died April 7th, at Vernon, Miss., being twenty months and thirteen days old.

J. P. THOMAS.

EDUCATIONAL.

DOLBEAR'S COMMERCIAL COLLEGE, OF THE City of New Orleans, founded in 1832—Chartered by the Legislature of Louisiana, with Agricultural and Mechanical Departments—Capital stock, $1 0 000—in the new and spacious edition known as STORY BUILDING south-east corner of Camp and Common streets, entrance on both streets, open day and evening. Faculty:—

RUFUS DOLBEAR, President.
MATHEMATICAL DEPARTMENT.
GEO. E. BEACRAFT, Professor.
BOOK-KEEPING DEPARTMENT.
RUFUS DOLBEAR, Lecturer.
J. W. BLACKBAN, Professor.
ENGLISH DEPARTMENT.
HON. J. N. CARNIGAN, A.M., late Sup't Education, La; Prof. and Lecturer on Commercial Law, etc
and M. B. M'CARTHY, Professor.
FRENCH DEPARTMENT.
MARC. ROPA, Professor.
DEPARTMENT FOR PENMANSHIP.
RUFUS DOLBEAR, Lecturer.
J. B. GRIFFITH Professor.
SPANISH DEPARTMENT.
MANUEL MARINO, Professor.
GERMAN DEPARTMENT.
GEO. OESSNER, Professor.
LATIN AND GREEK DEPARTMENT.
M. MARINO and G. OESSNER Professors
ITALIAN DEPARTMENT.
RHETORIC, LOGIC, AND ELOCUTION.

This is the only chartered Commercial college in the South-West, and the oldest in the United States, and has stood for FOR MORE THAN A QUARTER OF A CENTURY

On its own merits alone.

Persons from 12 to 60 years of ago, can attend to any branch they may wish.

Board can be had with the Professor, or other good families speaking English, French, Spanish or German, from $5 to $6 per week.

Catalogues with terms, opinions of the press and leading men of the nation, sent, sent to all who desire them.

N.B.—To prevent mistakes or impositions, Students intended for this College should bring this advertisement as special directions, as there are every winter temporary rooms open for a few months, all of course making wonderful prizes and promises, and putting flaming placards to enlighten the people of New Orleans and of the South! When three or more form Clubs and enter at the same time, ten per cent will be deducted from tuition.

☞ Citizens and strangers are invited to visit.

feb 1 1y RUFUS DOLBEAR, President.

SOULE'S COMMERCIAL COLLEGE, CORNER OF Camp and common streets, entrance No. 64 Common street, established in 1856,—open day and evening the entire year.

A full course of instruction in this institution embraces Double Entry Book-keeping, Commercial Calculation and Commercial Law, and Penmanship. Gentlemen can enter for the full course, or any branch they desire, and at any time, as there is no class system, no copying from books, and no memorizing of arbitrary rules.

Merchants, Book keepers, and young gentlemen wishing instruction, are respectfully requested to call and examine our practical forms and peculiar manner of teaching.

For catalogues containing full information, and Balance-sheet Circulars, the most magnificent work of the kind ever executed in the United States, address, GEO. SOULE, New Orleans.

FELICIANA FEMALE INSTITUTE, JACKSON, LA. The exercises of the second term of this scholastic year will commence on the first of March. Pupils entered at any time, and charged from the time of entrance.

Extensive grounds and houses have been added to the premises.

A good library, a new and complete apparatus, a full and competent corps of teachers, comfortable and newly-furnished apartments, afford the best facilities for a thorough education.

BOARD OF TRUSTEES:

WM. H. WATKINS, D.D., President.
J. N. EVANS, Secretary.
Prof. W. H. MARBURER, WM. LIPSCOMB,
JOHN W. BURRUSS, Esq., Col. S. M. DRYAN.
F. V. D. HADAMAN, Esq. Rev. A. G. MILLER
Rev. JOHN C. MILLER, JOHN M'KOWEN, Esq
Hon. JOHN M'VEA.

Om THOS. W. BROWN, Principal.

PORT GIBSON COLLEGIATE ACADEMY, FOR Young Ladies, resumed its Exercises on the first Monday in Oct. last. A well chosen Faculty will spare no pains or care to make this Institution a pleasant and profitable place for young Lady students.

The buildings are large, well-ventilated, and well furnished. The grounds ample and beautiful.

For information and Circulars, apply to,

Rev. B. JONES, Port Gibson, Miss.

PROFESSIONAL.

JAMES J. HUTCHINSON, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, Livingston, Alabama., will Practice in Sumter and the adjoining counties. [au24]

J. E. ELAM, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, BATON Rouge.

REFERENCES—Brederson & Gaines and Chien & Bolton, New Orleans; W. S. Pike and A. Matta, Baton Rouge.

FUQUA & KILBOURNE, ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW, Clinton, Louisiana, practice in the Parishes of East and West Feliciana, and East Baton Rouge.

References—Payne & Harrison, Byrne, Vance & Co., W. and C. Letchford and Co., Broadwell & Haynes, and Pritchard & Flower, New Orleans mar 7-1y

W. P. WINANS. J. V. HEATH.

WINANS & HEATH, ATTORNEYS AND COUNsellors at Law, Shreveport, La., Office—Market street. Will practice in the courts of Caddo, De Soto, Bossier, Claiborne, and Bienville.

G. SPENCER MAYO, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, Harrisonburg, La., will practice in the Courts of Catahoula, Concordia, Caldwell and Franklin Parishes.

COMMISSION MERCHANTS.

W. A. BROADWELL. A. P. HAYNES.

BROADWELL & HAYNES, COMMISSION MERchants (formerly Broadwell & Payne), No 40 Union street, N. O. Having retired from business, I take great pleasure in soliciting for my former partners, BROADWELL & HAYNES, the patronage and confidence of my friends, believing their experience, capacity and means, will merit its continuance, and enable them to give general satisfaction. [jul] M. U. PAYNE.

W. R. STUART, New Orleans. H. B. A. JAMES, Madison Parish, La.

STUART & JAMES, NO. 42 UNION STREET, New Orleans, have associated themselves together for the purpose of conducting a COTTON FACTORAGE & GENERAL COMMISSION BUSINESS; are prepared to make the usual Advances in planters, in the way of supplies, etc., and respectfully solicit patronage

A. H. MAY & CO., COTTON FACTORS AND General Commission Merchants, No 94 Gravior street, New Orleans. au21y

J. U. PAYNE J. F. HARRISON.
D. W. SUTHERLIN. WM. A. HARRISON

PAYNE & HARRISON, COMMISSION MERCHANTS No. 61 Union street, New Orleans. dec7-1y

S. L. WALKER, New Orleans. ROBT. C. HUTCHINSON Caddo Parish, La.

WALKER & HUTCHINSON, COTTON FACTORS and Commission Merchants, No. 67 Carondelet street, New Orleans. jn28

LEONARD FASH. P. H. LAUBANE.

LEONARD FASH & CO COMMISSION MERchants, and Dealers in Western Produce, 61 Magazine street, New Orleans. oct 24.

LANE, SALTER & CO., SUCCESSORS TO LANE, MAYFIELD & CO., Cotton and Sugar Factors and General Commission Merchants, No. 79 St. Charles street, New Orleans. jy5-1y

JOHN E. WYCHE & CO., COTTON FACTORS and Commission Merchants, No 14 Common street, New Orleans.

BIBLE AND TESTAMENTS.—The Largest and most Varied Supply, South. Bibles from 50 Cents each to $47 50 each.

Rich Family Bibles in costly bindings, also smaller Bibles in Velvet and fancy bindings.

London, Oxford and Cambridge Bibles; Eyre and Spottiswoodes, Bagsters, on hand, and ordered.

Hebrew, Greek, Latin, Syriac, and Arabic Scriptures for Ministers and Students.

For Sunday Schools in Louisiana and Southern Mississippi; Testaments at reduced prices, and Pocket Testaments at half price.

Address,—Agent, S. W. Bible Society, Bible House, 103 Camp street, New Orleans.

BENTHUYSEN, LEWIS & CO., 116 CANAL Street (adjacent to the CLAY Statue), would call attention to their large Stock of

PLANTATION,
HOUSEKEEPING,
AND FANCY DRY GOODS,

Comprising all qualities and descriptions, to any quantity to suit Purchasers, at

VERY LOW PRICES.

An examination of our Stock is requested.
Country Orders promptly filled.

BENTHUYSEN, LEWIS & Co.,
April 24, 1860. 116 Canal street. 1y

SOUTHERN CLOTHING ESTABLISHMENT.—26, 28 and 30 St. Charles street, corner of Common. Clothing and Furnishing Goods at Wholesale and Retail

Just received, per late steamers, one of the largest and most magnificent stocks of FASHIONABLE SPRING AND SUMMER CLOTHING ever brought to the South, which, for style, material, Workmanship and Cheapness, is not surpassed. Goods are divided into Three Departments, but all under one general view:

Store No. 26 St. Charles street, for Boys' Clothing;
Store No. 28 St. Charles street, for Men's Clothing;
Store No. 30 St. Charles street, for Furnishing Goods and Shirts.

L. W. LYONS,

Nos 26, 28 and 30 St Charles street, corner Common st.
Salesmen speak French, Spanish and English. [oc12

BOYS' CLOTHING EMPORIUM, 30 St. Charles-st. between Canal and Common.

This store is exclusively for YOUTHS', BOYS' AND CHILDREN'S CLOTHING; SHIRTS AND FURNISHING GOODS, WHOLESALE AND RETAIL.

Just opened a large and excellent stock of SPRING and SUMMER DRESS and SCHOOL CLOTHING, embracing every style and quality, all of which will be sold at VERY REASONABLE PRICES.

☞ Salesmen speak French, Spanish and English.

L. W. LYONS,
oc12 Nos. 26, 28 and 30 St. Charles street, corner Common st.

SHIRTS! SHIRTS!! SHIRTS!!!—Just received, by late steamers, a large assortment of SHIRTS OF THE LATEST FASHION, of all the various qualities and sizes. White and Colored, manufactured EXPRESSLY FOR THE NEW ORLEANS CITY TRADE, to fit Men, Youths, Boys and Children.

L. W. LYONS,
oc12 Nos. 26, 28 and 30 St. Charles street, corner Common st.

TRUNKS, TRAVELING-BAGS AND VALISES, UMBRELLAS, and WATER-PROOF CLOTHING of the most styles and qualities, made to order and warranted

L. W. LYONS,
oc12 Nos. 26, 28 and 30 St. Charles street, corner Common st.

TO MERCHANTS AND PLANTERS.—MANUFACturers' Commission House. Large stock of BOOTS, SHOES and HATS. Call and examine the stock, at No. 38 Magazine street opposite the Arcade, New Orleans.

nov 1a R. W. RAYNE.

R. A. STEWART'S NEW PROCESS FOR DEFEcating and Clarifying Cane-Juice, Syrup, Molasses, and other Saccharine matter

Planters wishing to use this Process can obtain the right to do so by calling on or addressing STUART & JAMES, No 42 Union st., New Orleans, where samples of the Sugar may be seen. [au31]

R. A. STEWART.

MISCELLANEOUS.

NO. 3 CAMP STREET. EUREKA!

SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINES—FOR PLANTation, family, and Manufacturers' use.—Prices, $65, $80, $100, $115, $125

These Machines have no equal; they possess all the latest improvements, the last being November 10th, 1859. Their mechanism is so simple and durable that a child can easily understand and operate them. They work with two threads, using Howe's patent shuttle, making the lock stitch, and presenting the same stitch on both sides of the fabric sewn—They will run, stitch, hem, fell bind and gather.

☞ ALL MACHINES WARRANTED ☜

Every variety of thread, Silk, Needles, and other fixings for sale. Principal Southern Salesroom, No. 3 Camp st.

E. L. NIMRO, Agent.

CUDDY, BROWN & CO.—HAVING CLOSED THE office of MILES GWEN & CO., on the first day of January, 1857, my business connections in future in this city will be with Messrs. Cuddy, Brown & Co., 88 Camp street. MILES GWEN.

D. J. WASSON, CARPENTER AND BUILDER.—Also, Sash, Blinds, Doors, Cisterns, Lumber, &c., le lots to suit purchasers. Orders promptly attended to.

Box 388 Mechanics' Exchange, 19 St. Charles st. Shop, 855 and 857

NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY A COMMITTEE OF MINISTERS FOR THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH---C. C. GILLESPIE, EDITOR.

VOLUME X.—NUMBER 21.
WHOLE NUMBER 481.

NEW ORLEANS, WEDNESDAY, MAY 23, 1860.

$3 00 A YEAR, IN ADVANCE
OFFICE—112 CAMP ST

PROGRESS OF PROTESTANTISM IN MISSISSIPPI AND THE SOUTHWEST—NO. XV.

Mr. Editor—Soon after the establishment of the Territorial government in Mississippi, the original Baptist church which had been planted and nurtured "in troublous times," began to spread abroad in the land. The denomination received many valuable accessions by emigration from South Carolina, Georgia, and Tennessee. About the year 1800, a second Baptist church called New Hope, was organized on Second Creek, in Adams county, and about the same time another near Woodville, called Bethel. In 1805 New Providence, and Ebenezer churches were established in Amite county. In September, 1806, these five churches appointed delegates to meet at Salem for the purpose of organizing an Association. From some cause the organization seems not to have been perfected until the next annual meeting of delegates, which took place at Bethel, near Woodville, in September, 1807. This Association was called "the Mississippi Baptist Association," and it adopted the Calvinistic creed in all its details, defined its own powers, and agreed on sundry rules of order and decorum. From this time the denomination had encouraging success in every direction. New churches were annually added to the Association. In 1813, eighteen churches were represented; in 1815, the number had increased to twenty-four; in 1817 to thirty-six; and in 1818 forty churches sent their delegates to the annual Association. The original Association having by this time become unwieldy on account of its size, and the extent of territory occupied by its churches, took the preliminary steps in 1819 to organize two other Associations, both of which met for the first time in 1820. The Union Association was duly constituted in September of this year, and the Pearl River in November. As early as 1819 an Association existed in Louisiana; west of the Mississippi river, as I infer from the appointment of messengers from the Mississippi Association to attend their annual meeting, but when, where, or by whom this association was originally formed, I have not the means of knowing. The Baptists have been a zealous and progressive branch of the general church, in the Southwest, from their first organization, so that now they have churches and associations, here and there, all over Mississippi and Louisiana. I have looked into the history of their progress, and think I have learned what agencies, under the Divine blessing, have mainly contributed to their success. They had at an early day a fair supply of preachers, so far, at least, as numbers were concerned. It is true that many of them did nothing more than earnestly harangue the people on portions of gospel truth and christian experience; but their irregular discourses, full of pathos and sympathy, and delivered in that peculiar cadence called "the heavenly tone," suited the majority, and were the means of doing much good. A fair proportion, however, of the early Baptist preachers were fully up to mediocrity, and some of them were men of superior education and commanding talents in the pulpit. Elder Thomas Mercer, whose name is often found in the minutes from 1808 to the time of his death, was a man who preached "in the demonstration of the Spirit and of power." He was the revivalist of his day, the Boanerges of the Baptist church. There was generally a shaking among the dry bones where he preached. In those days hymn-books were very scarce and hard to obtain. To remedy this evil Mr. Mercer made a selection of hymns suitable for private, family, and public worship, and published them in pamphlet form, and distributed them generally among the people, who sang them with much earnestness and good effect. Most of his collection of hymns and choruses were appropriate for the use of all christian people, but to some of them Pedo-Baptists would object, especially the one commencing—

"In Jordan's tide the Baptist stands; Immersing the repenting Jews."

Doctor David Cooper came early in the present century as a missionary of the Baptist church. His name first appears in the printed minutes of 1808. He was a man liberally educated, polished in his manners, and attractive and useful as an able minister of the New Testament. For more than thirty years he was a file-leader in building up and extending the Baptist churches in South-western Mississippi. He was a warm advocate for a higher grade of ministerial education than existed generally among his co-laborers. As early as 1817, as chairman of a committee appointed for that purpose, he presented a paper to the Association on the importance of ministerial improvement, that would read well as late as our day. Another thing which contributed greatly to the edification and extension of the Baptist church in those early days, when Bibles and religious books were so scarce, was their pastoral circulars, which were annually printed with their Associational minutes, and distributed generally among the members and patrons of the church. It is true, there are some things in those official circulars to the churches, which, as Arminins and Pedo-Baptists, we cannot receive as Bible truth, but there is a great deal of solid truth on the subject of doctrinal, experimental, and practical godliness set forth in those pastoral letters, well supported by appropriate quotations from the Holy Scripture, and doubtless they were a blessing to many. David Cooper, Thomas Mercer, Moses Hadley, and David Snodgrass were generally depended on to write the annual addresses to the churches, until, at a later period, Elders James A. Randleson, Daniel M'Call, and other men of learning and piety became prominent among the Mississippi Baptists. Another agency which contributed largely to the extension of the Baptist church in early times, was their itinerant preaching. The Association had no regular plan of itinerant preaching, such as we have in the Methodist Episcopal Churches, but most of the ministers kept up a sort of irregular itinerancy, that proved a great blessing to destitute settlements, and was the means of originating new churches in various places. In 1814 the Association formally resolved, "that it be recommended to, and enjoined on, the preachers of our order that they use their utmost diligence in the practice of itinerant preaching." Many of those primitive Baptist preachers in the South-west were a stirring class of men. They often made extra sacrifices and exertions, and turned out of the beaten track in order to preach to the destitute, and verily they had their reward in the rich harvest of souls they were instrumental in gathering in.

These original Baptist churches, however, did not enjoy uninterrupted peace and prosperity. In addition to opposition from without, they were often distracted by internal commotions. I do not suppose they were more inclined to heart and church divisions than any other christian people, but they seemed not to have the means of settling them so promptly and permanently. The history of old Salem, the first church, presents a sad and melancholy picture to the pious heart. After it had enjoyed about fifteen years of prosperity, and, about 1812-13, had been favored with the most extensive revival known in the country, differences of opinion grew up between some of the leading members, which led to ill temper and angry words. These matters were finally brought into the monthly conferences of the church, where they were long debated, until parties were formed, and the membership was agitated from center to circumference. From that unnatural and unchristian feud, we date the decline and ultimate downfall of the first Baptist church in Mississippi. The faithful few struggled hard and long to maintain their organization, but having no more revivals to recruit their numbers, and suffering diminution constantly from deaths and removals, they at last yielded to their hapless fate and ceased the fruitless strife. About twenty years ago the woodwork of the church was accidentally destroyed by fire, since which time the brick walls have been gradually taken away for neighborhood purposes, until now nothing remains to designate the spot to the passer-by but the grave-yard, where reposes the precious dust of some of the best of our race. The descendants of several of the leading Baptist families still live in the vicinity of the old church, but they are not Baptists, and too many of them are not christians at all. In contrasting its present utter desolation with its former glory, an indescribable feeling of sadness comes over the soul. But the fruits of old Salem are not all lost. In her chivalrous days she sent out a number of vigorous colonies, which yet live and prosper. Salem was not the only church that was distracted and torn asunder by these unholy feuds, for many others shared a similar fate. It seemed as if some men could not get along quietly. They must have some debatable question before the church in the form of a "query," or a "resolution," about Freemasonry, or something else just as irrelevant. Finally the followers of Alexander Campbell came into the country and made sad havoc of some of the oldest and largest Baptist churches in the State. But let us turn away from this gloomy picture. After all the Baptist is next to the largest denomination in the land, and enjoy at this time an encouraging degree of prosperity in all the benevolent enterprises connected with their Church. In my next I intend to individualize several of the leading ministers and members of the early Baptist churches, not heretofore mentioned.

J. G. Jones.

THE GENERAL CONFERENCE AT BUFFALO.

SKETCHES OF PROMINENT MEMBERS.

The Methodist General Conference has been in session daily since its first meeting on Tuesday, the 1st of May. The body is unwieldy on account of its magnitude, and, as its members are not generally experienced parliamentarians, much time is consumed in unnecessary discussions and side motions. This evil is, however, not greater than is usually experienced in the assembling of a newly formed deliberative body, and there is good cause to believe that, after a few days, business will proceed rapidly. There has already appeared enough to show that the body comprises a large share of real ability, such as would compare not unfavorably with the House of Representatives at Washington, or any deliberative body of like numbers in the country. The members are generally middle-aged men, ranging in years from forty to sixty.—The proportion of D.D.'s must be pretty large, for nearly every speaker is announced as Doctor somebody. The speaking thus far has been chiefly in form of motions, and discussions of points of order, in which there is but little room for the display of oratorical powers—and from the size and structure of the hall in which the Conference sits, it is almost impossible, for ordinary speaking to be heard. It may be hoped that it will be better when more formal debates become the order of the meeting.

In the absence of anything in the proceedings of the Conference of general interest, a looker-on may amuse himself by a study of the persons before him, and accordingly your correspondent sets himself at work to sketch a few of the most noticable ones.

DR. JAMES FLOY.

Dr. James Floy of New York is a man of medium hight, thick set, a bronzed complexion, large head and slightly stooping. He is a native of New York city, aged rather over fifty, was educated at Columbia College, and has been in the itinerant ministry, in and about New York, for more than a quarter of a century. He is an excellent preacher, an able debater, and is especially gifted with that indescribable something called tact. He is a member of the New York East Conference, and is held in high esteem by his brethren of that body. It is sometimes said, complainingly, that his will is often the law of the Conference, though his friends declare that he uses his great influence both discreetly and modestly.—Dr. Floy has been known from the first as a genuine anti-slavery man. In 1836, while among the youngest members of the N. Y. Conference, he, in company with some three or four others, was tried for "Abolitionism," and sentence of expulsion from the ministry was pronounced against him, but afterwards removed without being executed. Since that time he has faithfully battled for the cause of anti-slavery, and now he sees the two Conferences into which that which condemned him has been divided, promoting the cause it once persecuted in his person. Dr. F. is a good writer, and has been a frequent contributor to The Methodist Quarterly Review and other Methodist periodicals. For several years he has been Corresponding Secretary of the Methodist Tract Society, and general Tract Editor. He speaks but seldom in the Conference, and is always listened to with respectful attention. There are few nobler men in this or any other body. What he may be before this General Conference shall close, it might be difficult to state with certainty!

DR. ABEL STEVENS.

Dr. Abel Stevens is a small man, about five feet six, and rather lightly built; with a long face and pear-shaped head, aged about forty-five. He was born and chiefly brought up in Philadelphia, but, while yet a boy, was sent to school at Wilbraham, Mass., an institution then presided over by Rev. Dr. Fisk, the pioneer in the cause of Methodist education. When about twenty he commenced his public ministry in Boston, where his eloquence and ability, together with his youthful appearance, procured for him great celebrity, and caused him to be called a second Summerfield. But his health was destroyed by overstraining, and he was compelled to desist from his regular ministerial duties, and strangely enough the peculiar magnetic power of his preaching seems to have forsaken him. He afterwards travelled abroad, and at length became the editor of Zion's Herald, the Methodist paper of Boston. He continued in that office till 1852, when he was called to New York to superintend the New York Book-Concern. In 1856 he was appointed editor of the Christian Advocate at New York, which office he now fills. Dr. Stevens is an able writer, but not a skilful controversialist, excelling in authorship rather than as an editor of a weekly paper. His works, chiefly on subjects relating to matters connected with his denomination, and especially his recently published "History of Methodism," have been well received by the public, and by them he has become known beyond his own Church. While at the head of Zion's Herald he was recognized as an earnest anti-slavery man; but since he came into his present position, he has labored steadily and earnestly against the progressive party in the Church. Dr. Stevens is not a member of the General Conference, but is in attendance as editor of the Daily Christian Advocate, the paper issued by the General Conference during its session.

DR. DANIEL CURRY.

Dr. Daniel Curry is one of the ablest and most influential members of the Conference. He is a person of more than medium size, commanding presence, white hair, with a pair of fine black eyes that sparkle with every sentence that he utters. He is about fifty-five years of age, yet looks younger. There is not a more amiable man in the Hall, nor is there a better conversationist among all the guests quartered at the tea-tables of the good people of Buffalo. He is a native of Peekskill, in this State; his birth-place being within a stone's throw of the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher's farm. Dr. Curry is a clear, vigorous, yet easy writer, who does not fear to lighten the gravest subject with a little gilding of humor. If he is not a good man for a bishop, it would be difficult to say of what stuff a bishop should be made.

DR. D. W. CLARK.

Dr. D. W. Clark, of Cincinnati by residence, but a member of and delegate from the New York Conference, is a man of about fifty; a little above medium eight, and of rather a full habit,—with a fresh countenance and dark red hair. He was born in the State of Maine, and pursued his collegiate studies at Middletown, Conn., and graduated in 1836. He was for several years at the head of a large seminary at Amenia, N. Y., and in 1844 he became a member of the New York Conference; continuing in the work of the ministry till some six or seven years ago, when he was appointed editor of The Ladies Repository, a monthly magazine issued by the Book Concern at Cincinnati. In all his various callings, Dr. Clark has been eminently successful, and especially in his present one; for under his management The Repository has became a first-class family magazine, and its circulation is scarcely second to any other monthly in the country, Harper's only excepted. He is a man of general though not profound scholarship, a good writer, and a most excellent preacher—especially as to the matter of his discourses. His elocution is not perfect; he drawls slightly at the beginning, and there is a measured movement of his sentences that tends to a wearisome sameness. He participates freely in the proceedings of the Conference, and is listened to with deference by his associates. It is whispered that in case the Episcopal Board is to be strengthened he is somewhat in danger of being led to the bench.

DR. EDWARD THOMSON.

Dr. Edward Thomson of Delaware, Ohio, a native of England, but a most thorough American in heart and character, is a small spare man, rather over fifty, with a sallow and bloodless countenance, and a general appearance of physical weakness. He has been for many years at the head of the Ohio Wesleyan University at Delaware and under his direction that institution has assumed a place among the very best and most prosperous literary institutions of the West. He is a good general scholar and a very fair writer. As a preacher he excels in clear and lucid statements, and earnest appeals to the heart through the understanding; and though assisted by a commanding presence, or by a specially excellent elocution, yet he seldom fails to gain the attention, and to awaken the thoughts and feelings of his hearers. But it is especially in private and social life that his high excellences are displayed. A peculiar magnetic power seems to go out from him, at once charming and awing his associates, so that all love him, and feel themselves to be lured in return, and yet seldom or never does that feeling grow into unrestrained familiarity. When he rises in the Conference and addresses the chair, in his thin and squeaking voice, all are intent to hear him, and frequently he is called on by those of a distance to speak louder, and to repeat his opening sentences. He is a decidedly good debater; less, however, by reason of anything in his manner, than by the clearness of his views, and the pertinency of his remarks to the immediate topic of discussion. On the subject of slavery,—which is the great subject of the Conference,—he belongs to the extreme progressive party, and readily brings all his powers to bear in favor of the "extirpation of the evil."

DR. FRANCIS HODGSON.

Dr. Francis Hodgson of Philadelphia is another of the small men (physically) of the Conference, being scarcely larger, but more robust than Dr. Thomson. He is English by birth and American by education. Under the ahl of Providence, he owes his success in life much more to his own efforts than to any extraneous advantages. He is now somewhat over fifty years old, but apparently in the full enjoyment of both physical and intellectual manhood; having a compact mass of bones and muscles, covered with a bronzed skin, and crowned with a fine and full black thatch. Dr. Hodgson has spent his life thus far in the regular work of an itinerant Methodist preacher, and has filled a very large number of important pastoral charges in and about New York and Philadelphia. He excels as a preacher, and, on special occasions, when fully prepared, he is overwhelming. The writer remembers having heard him twenty years ago, at a camp-meeting near Sing Sing, when after holding the immense audience in almost breathless attention for the better part of an hour, he at length came to the peroration, when nearly the whole body, apparently unconsciously, rose to their feet. He is also somewhat distinguished as a controversialist both as a preacher and writer, and frequently does both the old and the new divinity of the Calvanistic churches receive his not very respectful attention. As to the live questions of the day, he is strongly conservative, insisting that the Methodist discipline shall remain as it is, and having an especial horror of "Abolitionism."—Independent.

RECEPTION OF THE JAPANESE EMBASSY IN THE UNITED STATES, AND ITS EFFECTS.

The Japanese Embassy is now in the United States. So far the Government has acquitted itself very creditably, in according an appropriate reception to the Japanese. They were entertained at San Francisco, Panama and Aspinwall in a manner which must have impressed them most favorably towards this country.—At Panama, the American squadron received them with booming guns and flying colors, and upon arriving upon the end of the Isthmus journey, the Home squadron greeted them in like manner at Aspinwall, so that they found the maritime power of the United States represented on both shores of the continent—a fact which could not fail to strike them with a conviction of our national importance.

Amidst the gay group of our ships, decorated with the colors of all nations, yards manned, and guns thundering a welcome, there was one war vessel, solitary and alone, which spread no colors, gave no sound of welcome, nor participated in any way in the festivities, which must have presented a forcible contrast to the eyes of the Japanese visitors. That vessel was a British man-of-war of the West India squadron, which had just arrived at Aspinwall, with, we believe, the British Admiral on board. This conduct of the British ship is but another evidence of the petty sulks and jealousies which John Bull is so fond of exhibiting towards this nation. On the Eastern question he seems to be especially sore. The press and the Parliament of England both united in sneers and abuse of our Minister to China. Lord Palmerston stated that Mr. Ward submitted to humiliations and indignities from the Chinese Emperor which no British statesman would submit to; while at the same time it is notorious that Lord Amherst was subjected to and accepted all kinds of indignities at the hands of the Emperor during his mission to China.—British history is clear upon this point. Even the good offices rendered to Lord Elgin by our Consul, Mr. Harris, in Japan, which compelled the British Government to recognize them by the gift of a gold box to an official, did not soffice to appease the foolish animosity of John Bull towards this country for its success in establishing friendly relations with the Eastern nations; and this refusion of the British ship-of-war Emerald towards the Japanese Ambassadors at Aspinwall, is the latest manifestation of that small jealousy which animates Mr. Bull upon all occasions. But let it pass.

The Japanese have a very extensive idea of the area of their own empire. Like the Chinese—some of whose geographers, in representing the map of the world, occupy nearly the whole space with China, and stick the rest of the globe into a corner—they are impressed with the conviction that Japan is a place of great extent; but when these Ambassadors were conveyed from San Francisco—where they found the American eagle in his eyrie—along the coast of Panama, and again found the stars and stripes floating there from our national vessels; and, crossing the Isthmus, were greeted again by an American squadron in the Atlantic; and from thence along our shores to New York bay, they must have been pretty strongly impressed with the extent of the country with which the empire of Japan has entered into commercial relations.

Then, when they are received at Washington with all due honor, and visit this grand commercial metropolis, it may be that they will be struck with the fact that while in Japan and China the capitals where the Emperors reside, and even the interior of the country, are closed to strangers, the President of the United States insists upon their being first received at the national capital by himself in person, and the government of the first city of the Republic tenders them a hospitable welcome—all these things, combined with the display of power and prosperity which will everywhere meet their eyes, must do more than anything else to revolutionize the ideas of our Eastern neighbors, and impress them with the importance of the relationship which the recent treaties have established.

We believe the reception of the Japanese Embassy in this city will be the finest ever accorded to visitors from any other country. More money has been appropriated for the purpose than for any event of the kind, and the preparations generally are of the most complete description. But, independent of the action of the municipal government, the merchants of New York, who are more interested than any other class in the mission which brings them here, should inaugurate a grand reception of their own. Above all, they should charter a fine steamer and show the Japanese all over the harbor and rivers, and let them all see the vast commercial facilities which the metropolis commands, together with the immense forests of masts which line the shores of both rivers, and the fleet of steamers which play upon their waters. This will be a sight the grandeur of which they will carry back to their own people, to be remembered for all time.—N. Y. Herald.

STUDY THE HIGHER SCIENCES.

The astonishing discoveries in physical science within the last century have given such a preponderating impulse to studies of this description, that comparatively no progress has been made in mental science. While the phenomena of electricity have been analyzed; while steam has been subdued to the will of man, and while the results of the currents of the sea and the winds of heaven have been explained to the satisfaction of the mariner, little or nothing that is new has been demonstrated in relation to the laws of psychology. The tendency of all this has been to give a materialistic turn to the otherwise advanced nineteenth century. Just as anatomists, in their too exclusive attention to the structure of the human frame, are apt to ignore the existence of the spirit independent of the body, so, whenever a generation is principally engrossed in physical science, it has, in the nature of things, a proclivity toward materialism, and retrogrades in spirituality and all the loftier studies.

We do not oppose the prosecution of physical science, but only contend that other studies should not be neglected. We should have chemistry, geology, astronomy, meteorology, metallurgy, and every other physical science pursued with even increased assiduity. But while this is being done let not psychology be forgot. Already the evils of this neglect of the latter science have been made manifest in a delusion as loud as that of the Salem witchcraft, and immeasurably more extended. While the composition of the real muscle has been analyzed, while the amount of gases which a man breathes daily has been traced in all its thousand ramifications through the human system, no investigations deserving the name of scientific have been undertaken, or, if undertaken, properly prosecuted, into the laws of mind, or even of life.

Of biology, using that term in its critical sense, we know next to nothing. Hence it is, that, in an age of railroads, spinning jennies, magnetic telegraphs, delusions like spirit rappings have arisen. Hence it is, also, that too many who are not atheists are ardoous believers in the wildest religious delusions.

The age is rendered materialistic in another way, by the preponderating importance attached to physical discoveries. Our civilization has become almost purely material. What we shall eat, what we shall drink, and wherewithal we shall be clothed, is the great inquiry, the object that absorbs nearly all our time. History will describe this vaunted nineteenth century as inferior in many particulars to others less celebrated which have gone before. The age of Luther, Xavier, and Latimer, for example, was an eminently spiritual one. The age of Queen Elizabeth was an eminently heroic one. The age of Voltaire, De Alembert and the French Encyclopædists was so eminently intellectual one. All these several ages acted, moreover, on the higher elements of society. But this nineteenth century has done little, so far, except to advance physical science. It has enabled mankind to dress more cheaply, to transmit messages more rapidly, to travel more rapidly, and has, in a hundred ways, in short, increased the material comforts of the civilized races. But it has done nothing, absolutely nothing to teach him by careful instruction the laws of his mind, or to develop the higher instincts of his nature, and in this it has come short of its duty.

Ministers tell us that religion is declining, and moralists bewail the increase of lawlessness and crime. What wonder? We are developing our civilization abnormally, and must expect to pay the penalty. Not that we must abandon physical science, but that we must prosecute the higher sciences at the same time, so that knowledge of the mind and spirit may advance hand in hand.

LAY REPRESENTATION.

The question of lay representation in the Conferences is not a new one. It has been often and ably discussed. Heretofore the decisions reached have been adverse to it. In the organization of the Church this question was yielded to that of efficiency under the peculiarity of our system.

It was believed to be fully compensated by the other grants to the laity—such as a lay ministry in the office of local preachers, now numbering about 8000; the sub-pastorate, in the office of class-leader, an office peculiar to Methodism, and exercising the gifts and graces of a still larger number of our most excellent laymen; the authority to license men to preach, and to recommend them to the traveling connection or pastoral office, and in the ministry consenting to depend upon the voluntary contributions of the people for their support.

No Church so fully employs her laity, or more highly honors them, than does the Methodist Episcopal Church. In no Church have they more influence and control.

The matter is one of expediency, and resolves itself into these two questions—is it practicable, and will it be useful? In our judgment, there are great, if not insuperable, difficulties, in the way of introducing lay delegates into the Annual Conferences, as co-ordinate members of those bodies. We do not consider it appropriate to specify these embarrassments in this address.

We are of opinion that lay delegation might be introduced, in one form, into the General Conference, with safety, and perhaps advantage—that form being a separate house—the General Conference being composed of a house of clerical, and house of lay delegates, deliberating together, but voting as separate houses, and no action being valid without a majority of each, separately obtained. We believe this would be fully satisfactory to our intelligent laity, who appreciate the value of our peculiar ecclesiastical polity, and we judge would not be unsatisfactory to the ministry of the Church.

The necessity of this change does not appear to us to be so great, nor the call for it so general, as to induce us to recommend its adoption. But the subject is before the Church, is being discussed in our church papers, and will be brought to your attention by the journals of the several Annual Conferences, and we deem it suitable and proper for us to intimate our judgment as to the extent to which it may be allowed, without destroying the peculiarities of our economy, or impairing our efficiency as an aggressive church.

Some of the Annual Conferences have taken action on the question of extending the term of ministerial service. We do not regard this as a matter of vital importance either way. Possibly the term might be extended one year without serious difficulty in the administration or injury to the work. To us it seems that the advantages would be incidental, and shared by the few, both of the ministry and churches, to the dissatisfaction and disadvantage of the many.—Address of the Northern Methodist Bishops to the General Conference.

THE ENGLISH BANK FRAUD.

The details of the fraud, as we are informed by the Directors of the Union Bank in their report to their constituents, are as follows:—William George Pullinger had been a cashier in the banking-house of Sir Claude Scott and Co., and in the year 1839 was appointed a cashier in the Union Bank. For sixteen years he served in subordinate capacities, and about five years ago was raised to the situation of chief cashier, in which post he gave such satisfaction to his employers that about three months back his salary was raised to 600*l.* per annum. The Union Bank keeps an account with the Bank of England. It was Pullinger's duty to pay all checks, gold and silver coin, bank-notes, etc., not required for the immediate purposes of the Union Bank, into the Bank of England. These payments were verified by a docket specifying the particulars of each, and by the "pass-book" of the Bank of England. This pass-book was in Pullinger's keeping, and he made it the turning point of his frauds. Every day he should have delivered the pass-book to the ledger-keeper, who then checked the entries in it against the Bank of England by the items in his ledger. If the account kept by the ledger-keeper tallied with the account in the pass-book, and all appeared to be correct, he would report the Bank of England balance to the accountant, to be posted in the general ledger. Pullinger operated on the balance in the Bank of England as we have before stated, and concealed his operations from the knowledge of the ledger-keeper and accountant at the Union Bank of London by means of a fabricated pass-book, in which the balance exhibited was apparently in harmony with the figures in the accountant's ledger. Some suspicion having arisen, inquiry was made, for the first time the other day at the Bank of England, when it was ascertained that the balance standing to the credit of the Union Bank of London, instead of being 568,706*l.*, as supposed, was but 305,636*l.*, thus exhibiting a deficit of 263,070*l.* This enormous sum had been lost by Pullinger in a system of time bargains on the Stock-Exchange. He had from time to time abstracted portions of the balances which it was his duty to pay into the Bank of England, and had contrived to conceal his frauds by the simple expedient of double pass-books; one for the use of the Bank of England—this was the true one—and the other for the daily inspection of the ledger-keeper at the Union Bank of London. It seems there had been nothing about the man's habits or ways of life to engender suspicion. His case, for example, was not such as that of Redpath, where there were obvious marks of expenditure far in excess of the amount which his position in the world would justify. The man seems to have lived quietly enough. His one vice was that of jobbing on the Stock-Exchange, a good respectable vice, which stood him instead of a hundred others which carry with them more apparent and immediate discredit.—London Times.

LORD ELGIN'S SECOND CHINESE TOUR.

This day Lord Elgin sets forth once again for the scenes of his former labors in the Far East. With a more imposing force than that which accompanied him in his first essay, and with a more intimate knowledge of the difficulties that are to be overcome, we may hope that he departs with sanguine anticipations of a more complete and enduring success than that he before achieved. If force should become necessary, the English and French Plenipotentiaries have sufficient fighting men at their backs to escort them through China, or to make nominal conquest of the Empire. The superiority which the new weapon of European warfare must have over the rude arms of an Asiatic rabble may, perhaps, here find its first illustration upon a grand scale and in an open field. On the hundred and twenty miles of flat lighting ground which intervene between the shores of the Pecheli Gulf and the suburbs of Pekin, and upon the old-fashioned walls which enclose the Imperial City, will be found a most favorable opportunity for demonstrating to the most ancient civilization in the world how far it has been outstripped in the science of slaughter. It is, we fear, a necessity that this truth should be cut deep into the minds of those who rule at Pekin. We have no difficulty with the people and very little difficulty with the mercleants; whenever it shall have been made clear to the Mandarins at Pekin that our arm is long enough to reach them we shall have no more difficulty with the Government. If it should be necessary for Lord Elgin and Baron Gros to go to Pekin, they will go there only to show that they can go, and, having demonstrated this, they will never have occasion to go there again. As a military operation it ought to be a mere promenade. It is the fashion to do everything now in a cumbrous, costly manner, and to make difficulties about the lightest and most easy operations; but it has been the common achievement of a small body of Europeans, from the time of Xenophon to that of Sir Hugh Rose, to march over great tracts of Asiatic territory, and to scatter before them any given numbers of Asiatic soldiery. So far from there being any difficulty in marching these 120 miles, and dispersing these Tartars with their bows and arrows, and gingals and bamboo spears, the matter ought to be as easy as a march to Hounslow. Lord Elgin, therefore, has abundant force to do all that he may wisely determine to do. We hope that he will have the moral courage to use that force so far as it may be necessary to obtain the object of a lasting peace and the enjoyment of this nation's rights; and we are sure that he will, as a merciful man and a Christian gentleman, stay the operation of this great force at the earlier point where true mercy may be shewn—that is, when the necessary impression has been made, and peace has been secured.

SYMBOLISM AND ART.

The earliest architecture with which we are acquainted is that of tombs and temples; and the earliest sculptures and paintings are found associated with them.

Thus art, taking its origin from a sacred source, and having an especial reference to sacred things, partook of their representative character, and became essentially symbolical.

Symbolical representations of things sacred were coeval with religion itself as a system of doctrine appealing to sense, and have accompanied its transition to ourselves from the earliest known period of monumental history.

Egyptian tombs and steles exhibit religious symbols still in use among Christians. Similar forms with corresponding meanings, though under different names are found among the Indians, and are seen on the monuments of the Assyrians, the Etruscans and Greeks.

The Hebrews borrowed much of their early religious symbolism from the Egyptians, their later from the Babylonians, and through them this symbolical imagery, both verbal and objective have descended to ourselves.

The Egyptian priests were great proficients in symbolism, and so were the Chaldeans, and so were Moses and the Prophets, and the Jewish doctors generally, and so were many of the early fathers of the Church—especially the Greek fathers.

Philo of Alexandria was very learned in symbolism, and the Evangelist, St. John, has made much use of it.

The early Christian architects, sculptors and painters drank deep of symbolical lore and reproduced it in their works.

Their successors, Nicola, Pisano and his scholars, Giotto, the painter and his pupils, artists in Italy and Germany, the Van Eycks, Albert Durer and his followers, and the great masters of the Italian schools down to the time of Raffaelle and Titian inclusive, were all, more or less, influenced by symbolism and its principles.

There are certain associations of ideas, and cooeclved correspondencies between things intellectual, or pertaining to the inner life, the life of the soul, and objective existencies in nature of which mankind have in all ages perceived the relation, and felt the analogy: This, in fact, is the origin of Symbolism, and in this is the secret of its agreement among nations.

THE ARABIAN MESSIAH.

The London Times, commenting upon the recent insurrection against the French Government in Algeria, has the following remarks about the superstitious belief of the Arabs in the coming of their Mahommedan Messiah:

"The explanation of this affair is not difficult. The Arabs are credulous of prophecies. Thirty years ago, when the French first landed in their country, the Arabs believed that resistance would be vain, for that it was fated that the Christians were to have a period of dominion. They have for some time believed that this period is expiring or has expired. Every Arab lies down every night expecting that he shall be called to arms by the Messiah who is to lead him to the extirpation of the Christians. He is not more certain that Mahomet is the prophet of God than he is that the Moule-San shall come in a moment, which no one can foretell, and shall change all things. This "Lord of the Hour" has been described in prophecies which every Arab has by heart. His name has been fixed, and his personal peculiarities have been depicted. Abdel-Kanka believed in him as implicitly as the meanest Arab. When Bou Maza arose and proclaimed himself the Arab Messiah, Abd-el-Kader sent secret messengers to compare the features of the pretender with the description given in the prophecies. If he had been satisfied with their report, he was prepared to resign to him his command. This "Man of Destiny," however, is to be preceded by the Moule-Dras, or Lord of Force. Abd-el-Kader at one time believed himself to have this mission. It is now claimed by the fanatic who has excited this shortlived rebellion. This is what the Moniteur means when it calls the adventurer an "imposter." The French are so thoroughly conversant with these Arab prophecies—as well they may be, for a fanatical falsehood is an awkward practical truth—that they speak of them as our old Indians do of Hindoo figments, almost as if they believed them. This also explains why General Desvaux thought it so necessary to hurry all his available force down upon this incipient rebellion, why it was that the rebel army was gathering so fast, and why General Desmarest feared to give time to form his order of battle, lest his native troops should hesitate. Every Frenchman knew that with the encouragement of the slightest check to the French force half a million of Arabs would be in open resurrection, and Algeria would have to be reconquered."

AN AMERICAN SPIRITUALIST.

An English correspondent of the Southern Presbyterian writes: We have had in our midst an American spiritualist; his name is the Rev. T. L. Harris. When he arrived in England some months ago and preached, all the spiritualists that believed in media and table-turning, flocked to hear him. Some of them were comparatively moderate in their views, but the majority were intensely fanatical, and very "far gone" in their delusion. Judge, therefore, of their horror, when in his discourse, he laid bare, with an unsparing hand, the atrocious and immoral results of spiritualism in the United States. Still he continued to be regarded as the American spiritual preacher, and to preach in the Marylebone Institute.—A paragraph, evidently furnished to the Morning Star by an admirer and disciple of "this signally gifted minister," relates how a public meeting was recently held to bid him farewell. He claims, we are informed, to have the faculty of spirit sight, and he brings before his hearers vivid pictures of the ideal world; but denounces the modern methods of calling spirits from the "vasty deep," as dangerous alike to the individual and society. He allies himself with no sect, but expresses his sympathy with all, so far as they work on the Divine will, in a life of charity and usefulness. It is to be feared that Mr. Harris, with all his denunciatory plausibilities, is, after all, an apostle of dangerous heresy. William and Mary Howitt are reported to have sympathy with spiritualist views. I can scarcely believe this. They live at Highgate, near one of our beautiful suburbs, and I found them one week evening among a congregation whom I addressed on the Irish Revival. Mary Howitt has contradicted the report that she had become a Swedenborgian.

MR. BENJAMIN THE TRAVELER.

This gentleman has, as we see, excited considerable attention in the West; in Cincinnati assistance was promised him at a public meeting where the Reverend Doctors Wise and Lilienthal took an active part. The Mission Society of New Orleans also subscribed three hundred dollars per annum for three years, to be forwarded to him when on his journey to enable him to continue his researches. We should judge from what we have learned, that Mr. Benjamin intends visiting England before he sets out on his new expedition; and in view of the success of his journey conferring a general benefit on Israelites, the expense incurred should be borne by our European brothers no less than those in America. No doubt there are many subjects to be investigated relating to the scattered Yehudhi all over the world, and it is simply our duty to seize the proper means of acquiring the needed information and to aid our almost lost brothers, say of China and Abyssinia, to restore them again to the general family of Israel.—If there be also similar disjointed members of our house in Kurdistan, they too ought to be looked after. If Mr. Benjamin now can satisfy our learned men in Europe that he is the proper instrument to effect this great good, we trust that he may be instructed by them as to the points whither he is to extend his inquiry, and to supply also a portion of the means needed, and we are sure that Americans will do their part of the duty. One or two intelligent men, we think, ought to be sent to accompany Mr. B. to aid him in his researches. The subject is so highly important that a part accomplished even, will be of great value. We shall be pleased to hear of a successful issue of the proposed mission.—Occident.

If good people would but make goodness agreeable, and smile, instead of frowning, in their virtue, how many would they win to the good cause!

A MINISTERIAL ABILITY.

The ability to be alone is a great ability. Is it not peculiarly important for the gospel minister, upon the requirements of whose heart and brain such vast interests depend? At the same time every church member should be taught its importance for himself. The ability to be alone (we can mean, of course, only alone in regard to the presence of human beings) with pleasure, facility and effect, is an ability not as easily attained or retained as some may suppose. Doubtless Satan is ever ready to infuse an irksomeness and glo om into the soul in retirement. To remain half an hour resolutely and passively alone, shut up with God, is such a grand security for his intimate, enlightening and invigorating manifestations, that Satan plies all his powers to prevent it. Satan is not so much opposed to set seasons of hurried prayer, which modify rather than remove business or social perturbation. He is not so much opposed to merely an intellectual glance each morning at a short psalm or half a chapter of the Bible, especially if it be followed by an hour's heart-plunge into a newspaper. He is not so much opposed to an exciting discussion or controversy in the social group on the current topic in the public mind. Nor would he be much opposed to solitary reveries which continue flights of fancy, or throbs of emotion, started in the busy world under his guileful influence. But Christian solitude, especially if daily, systematic, obtaining the force of a habit, Satan will spare no pains to prevent. His envious malice is committed against it as against the sight of the soul's intimate familiarity with the source of bliss; and the reader and writer must be resolute and watchful, or be kept short of it.

WHO DISCOVERED SALT LAKE?

Among the "thousand and one" articles of freight and baggage which went down to the Bay by the steamer Queen City yesterday, were two old flint-lock, smooth-bore rifles of the real old "Kaintucky" stripe. They were brought on board by a man who looked as weather-beaten, flinty-locked, and hard-stocked as themselves.—Being curious to learn their history, and who it was that possessed them, we made a few inquiries, and the owner, being mellowed by the genial influences of the vintage, communicated the following facts: His name was Seth Grant, a Scotchman by birth, who came to America at an early age, in the year 1819, and joined the American Fur Company. In 1826, he accompanied Bridger—the founder of Fort Bridger—and his partner, Col. Vasquez, to the then unknown wilds of the West, far beyond the head waters of the Platte or Yellowstone. It was on one of these far-seeking, marauding expeditions that the Frenchman, Col. Vasquez, while out on an excursion, discovered the Great Salt Lake of Utah. The immense extent of the lake with its mountains and islands, so deceived Vasquez and his party that they reported to their fellows that they had discovered an arm of the Pacific ocean; and so, indeed, it seemed, for it was years before the error was corrected. The two rifles in possession of Mr. Grant were a portion of the arms of the original party, and bore the marks of having seen long and honorable service. Mr. Grant values them highly, and, being on his way back to his own native land, intends taking them as trophies, to be hung up with the tartans and claymores of his countrymen.—*

New Orleans Christian Advocate.

Terms—$2 00 per annum, in advance.

NEW ORLEANS:

WEDNESDAY, MAY 23, 1860.

ONLY $1 25 FROM 1st MAY.

From the first of May till the end of the year, the price of the Advocate will be only $1 25. We suggest to our Agents and friends to make a unanimous and vigorous effort to send us a thousand subscribers to commence with that issue. Make a special push for it, brethren if you please.

SOUTHERN WOMEN AND LITERATURE.

Northern and Southern Women—No Undue Partiality—Influence of Women in Literature—Dangers—Development of Southern Womanly Mind—Fiction not the only Sphere—Books not the Only End—The Newspaper Press—Patient Practice Necessary—Usual Excuse of Home-duties Fallacious.

Our American women, whether Northern or Southern, enter largely into the interest, and pride, and hope we feel in contemplating the growing culture and power of this country. As with American literature, so with American women; we do not indulge an undue sectional partiality; we emphasize the Southern only because we are better acquainted with it, more responsible for it, and can do more good through it; because Northern women have already a sufficient advocacy, and because Southern women have not. We would not disparage the one, but we would encourage and inspire the other.

It is now an obvious and admitted fact, that, whether well or ill, women have come to wield a power in English literature undreamed of a quarter of a century since. In England and the United States—in poetry and polite literature generally, in history and biography, in fiction and didactics, in romance and religion, in books and periodicals, in all that popular literature that is read by the million, and moulds the public opinion of the masses—women have come to exercise a share of influence somewhat corresponding with that which they exercise in the home circle. And it would seem that the measure of influence they rightfully possess in the domestic relations of life affords a just suggestion as to the measure of influence they ought to exercise in literature. It is, and ought to be, different from that exercised by men, in both the one and the other. Wherever there is antagonism, or attempted usurpation, there is error and wrong. Although this comparatively new phase of civilization is attended with dangers, from the natural liability to error and extravagance, especially in the assumption of previously untried relations and responsibilities; yet we cannot doubt that woman has a natural place in literature, and that her influence in that sphere is in accordance with that Providence which watches over the progress of the race. Man is male and female, and so should be all human influences, without violation, however, of their natural spheres and relations.

After the expression of these thoughts, it will be supposed that we feel deeply interested not only in the development, in the ordinary way, of the womanly mind of the South, but also in the more recently inspired thought of making its genius and taste available in the power and refinement of Southern literature, particularly, and of American literature generally. We are rejoiced, also, that there are increasing evidences of the realization of this thought. Many of the most popular books of the time, especially in the department of what is called "light literature," are being written by Southern women. We trust that the tide will continue to flow without an ebb, and that it will become much wider in its sweep than the single channel of romance and fiction. A good fiction is a work of art, and it is not given to every woman of literary genius to produce such a work of art, any more than it is to be a good sculptor, painter, or musician—any more than it is given to every gifted man to be a great naturalist, mathematician, engineer, or orator.—Fiction is not the only, nor the highest, expression of female literary gifts and art. Our native gifts and providential sphere, in this matter, are to be discovered, like the life-vocations of men, by prayerful and patient study of ourselves, and of our providential circumstances and leadings. And, indeed, there is far too much fiction-writing and fiction-reading, even where fiction is good. Bad fiction is corrupting to the last degree.

Moreover, the writing of books is not the only end of literary abilities. Indeed, it is to be doubted whether such an end should be desired at all—whether it should not come as a natural and providential outgrowth of patient literary culture, rather than as manufactured product of a foregone purpose. Not one in a hundred of those who can write and ought to write, can write or ought to write a book. There is too little writing and too many books. The newspaper press affords an ample field for those who, without selfish ambition, but with a pious desire for culture and usefulness, devote themselves, as much as may be consistent with the other duties of life, to the use of the pen. Charming sketches of scenery, fact, and character; short and readable stories of life, experience, and imagination; brief essays of thought, feeling and devotion; where there is neither the time nor the art for anything more elaborate; may, through the newspaper press, reach tens of thousands of readers, the rich and the poor, the old and the young, the happy and the sad, and plant the seeds of truth, of hope, of purity and of joy.

And it should be remembered that excellence in literature is the result of much reading and study, and of long, patient, and persevering practice. Familiarity should be sought with the best books and the best styles; the best thoughts, and the most beautiful imaginative creations and illustrations should be studied; knowledge of human nature, of all things, as far as may be, of the Bible, of the spirit of God, and of our own hearts, should be diligently sought. Repeated failure, and unfavorable editorial judgments, should be accepted as a part of the necessary discipline.

We have written these things for the benefit of those Southern women who have the talents and the taste—but not the aspiration, the industry, and the sense of duty—to do good to themselves and to others—to enrich their own characters, and to beautify their homes and lives—to improve their hours of leisure, and to relieve the monotony and ennui of a too material and utilitarian home-life—by the cultivation of literature, in the use of their pens, as well as in the perusal of books. The usual excuse for neglecting such a course of culture and usefulness—sometimes the objection to it—that wives, mothers, and daughters are better employed in home duties than in writing for the press—is entirely fallacious. In the mind of a true woman there is no antagonism between them. Home life, home duties, and home experiences are full of the earnest, thoughtful and happy inspirations which fit a gifted and cultivated woman to delight and do good by her pen. And the use of the pen is a far better recreation than those too generally sought by the majority of these same wives, mothers, and daughters—many of them decidedly objectionable and hurtful—in the costly gayeties, and questionable and dissipating amusements, becoming, unfortunately, too common.

Of course, it is not to be expected that every cultivated woman should write for the press, any more than that every cultivated man should be a public man. The gift of the happy use of the pen among women is about in proportion to the gift of oratorical speech among men. But all women should cultivate a literary taste, whether they write or not.

A large amount of news and other important matter is laid over till next week for want of space.

EDUCATED AND UNEDUCATED.

There are two distinct laws of Providence exhibited in the action of mind as related to the advancement of society. One law is, that the so-called humbler classes of the world, through their representative men, should exert a most salutary and effective agency in the progress of humanity. The other law is, that the learned and cultivated—those who are distinguished above their fellow-men in point of native gifts and acquired power—should also contribute, in an eminent degree, to the same great end. According to God's plan, it would seem that the ministry of human service, rising up age after age, and co-operating with the merciful purposes of the Holy Spirit, embraces these two divisions of intellectual and spiritual activity. At times, one of these instrumentalities may appear to be more prominent, more serviceable, than the other. To-day, the unlearned, the despised, the sons of poverty and want, may be suddenly thrust forth into commanding attitudes before the eye of the public; and by might of simple-heartedness and holy zeal, change the aspects of society. And to-morrow, they are withdrawn, or if not withdrawn, other workers, with other and higher endowments, are moving the minds of men. But, seen in a proper light, these two orders of intellect and character are really parts of the same working economy of Providence—each aiding the other, neither a complete system in itself.

Now it is all-important to take these two facts together. For when great truths are thus united, to separate them is something more than breaking the bond of connection; it is to annul the force of the truths themselves, considered in their individual bearings. If husband and wife are rudely torn asunder, each is less of a human being than before. And thus, when those principles which exist in beautiful wedlock are dissevered, their inherent vitality is weakened, and, by the degree of injury, they cease to stand as divine exponents in the affairs of mankind. Next, therefore, to our veneration for truth itself, is that wise and jealous sentiment which prompts the mind to preserve the inter-relations of truths and looks upon their careless or wilful severance as but one remove from the destruction of truth itself. A man may hold any given truth so as to convert it into a practical falsehood; and, probably among all our dangers in the way of self-deceit, none is more common or more alarming than the license which some persons borrow from their supposed homage to one principle to assail or to neglect other principles of equal value.

The truth, then, that we wish just now to enforce is, that educated and uneducated persons are both closely identified with God's work. Let us see how the matter stands.

Among the Apostles we have such men as Peter, John, Andrew. They were miraculously endowed for their great office. Fresh men, bold men, men of firm nerves and iron muscles; everything but learned men.—But their work did not exclude the necessity for Paul. "Not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble are called," to call others. Lay the emphasis on "many," and you have the fact as Scripture teaches it. "Not many;" very true; but some are needed. Paul was one of these, and therefore Paul represented the Apostleship in a select form and phase. Paul was the man for Mars Hill, for Corinth, for Rome. Miracles have ceased, but the truths which miracles embodied and displayed have not ceased; and the great reason for the miracles of the early Christian era, so far as we are concerned, was, that we might see the cardinal and permanent laws of God's administration set forth so impressively as that we might never lose sight of their transcendent importance. The law of miraculous endowment, then, illustrates two facts: The relation of the unlearned, and the learned, to God's work. This is a fixed law. It is for all Churches and for all generations. Out of the law grows the duty of providing a ministry to meet this two-fold requirement. It ought to be a ministry for the world in the entire scope of its mind, reaching both extremes, of ignorance and culture, serving all classes of intellect, universal in adaptation, liberal in spirit, and sympathetic in feeling. And hence, while we hold the absolute necessity for what are called "ignorant and unlearned men" in the ministry, let us not accept this truth at the expense of that other truth: that talents and "gifts" are God's bestowments, and are invaluable when sanctified to the glory of the Cross. Nor let us forget that St. Paul in his argument respecting "gifts" in I Cor., 12th chap., exhorts us to covet earnestly the best gifts; and furthermore, that when he speaks in this connection of "a more excellent way," he means the way of "charity," and not the way of some clever, good people, who undervalue talents and "gifts."

THE PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The prospects of this great national work are now apparently brighter than ever before. Senator Wigfall's bill now before Congress avoids sectional jealousy by proposing two routes, and otherwise obviates political objections. We publish below the substance of a memorial to Congress, in behalf of that bill, of the Chamber of Commerce of this city. It is exceedingly interesting.—The view it presents of the future of the three great representative cities, New York, New Orleans, and San Francisco, under the influence of their proposed union by the completion of these two railroads, is grand and inspiring. The bill does not in any way involve or relate to any of the slavery or political issues of the day, but rests upon simple geographical facts, and its success would be conducive to the interests alike of the people of the North as of the South. It offers one undeniably practicable route for a road to the Pacific which would be immediately entered upon, if the aid asked of the Government was afforded. The necessities of commerce, as well as the protection and convenience of the great region lying intermediate between the Mississippi river and the Pacific ocean, demand that all the constitutional aid Congress can give be extended to two grand trunks of railway, one upon a Northern and the other upon a Southern parallel of latitude, which shall be tributary respectively to the two great commercial cities of the Union, New York and New Orleans.

In addition to the merits of the great work, and of the fairness of the bill, which should receive the favor of our Congressmen from all sections of the Union, both the Democratic and Republican parties have pronounced in favor of a railroad to the Pacific, and inserted a corresponding "plank" in their respective platforms. It is hoped, therefore, that the bill will pass. The memorial says:

It is a great national necessity and while in its military, postal and social aspects it is essentially necessary to the preservation of the Union, its commercial advantages to New Orleans make it the duty of the Chamber of Commerce to invite to its success the early and favorable action of your honorable bodies. Its value to New Orleans cannot be exaggerated. A city commanding the vast and accumulating trade of the valley of the Mississippi, and already the focal point for the net-work of railroads from the Southern Atlantic slope, will reap the benefits of the traffic in heavy articles in which a communication with the Pacific necessarily ensures to the first important seaport connected with foreign commerce.

In contemplating the destinies of this great national enterprise, it is not assuming too much to predict that New York, New Orleans and San Francisco will become, at no distant day, the centers of the world; for it is no stretch of the imagination to suppose that a railway and telegraph to the Pacific will render the United States the medium of communication between Europe and Asia, and the rich products of silks, teas and precious metals of the latter will be bartered on our own soil for the manufactures of the former, which now, by the aid of our cotton, control the commerce of the whole world. It is not, therefore, an idle speculation to look to the day when New Orleans, New York and San Francisco will become the rivals of London and Canton.

Your memorialists recognize the justice and nationality of the bill introduced into the Senate by Senator Wigfall, which proposes aid, free from any Constitutional difficulty, to two Roads, one North of 38 deg of N. lat., and the other the Southern Pacific Railroad Company chartered by the State of Texas. It is a just distribution of the funds in a common Treasury, and long before their completion the two roads will be demanded by the business of the country.

There is an aspect of this great subject which your memorialists regard as entitling them to urge its importance and consideration on your honorable bodies. Independent of its manifest national character, a large and influential portion of the business citizens of New Orleans are deeply interested in its success. More than six hundred are stockholders in the Southern Pacific Railroad Company chartered by the State of Texas, having invested at par value near $400,000 in an enterprise whose sagacious founders first established, by a costly survey, the practicability of a railroad route to the Pacific, and after surmounting at great expense and labor the necessarily incipient difficulties of a stupendous work, have now in successful operation 25 miles of road at the beginning point of a soil and climate which, extending 800 miles West between 30 deg and 35 N. lat., gives a monopoly of the growth of cotton; Brazil, our only rival in the same latitude South, preferring to cultivate sugar and coffee.

While offering congratulations on the commerce and increasing prosperity of other cities in our extended country, your memorialists would do injustice to the object of their petition were they to omit any notice of the commerce of New Orleans.

We beg leave first to call your attention to the fact that the estimated value of the principal articles received in this city from the interior, for the year 1859, amounted to the sum of $172,952,664 (one hundred and seventy-two millions nine hundred and fifty-two thousand, six hundred and sixty four dollars). That the foreign exports of the same period amount to one hundred millions, seven hundred and thirty-four thousand, nine hundred and fifty-nine dollars; while the exports to domestic ports would swell the amount to more than one hundred and fifty millions of dollars. That the foreign imports for the same year amounts to sixteen millions of dollars, while there is a growing disposition to engage largely in the import trade. That the tonnage for the same year amounted to one million, one hundred and eighty-two thousand, engaged alone in external commerce, and during the same period, there were three thousand five hundred and fifty-nine arrivals of steamships and steamboats, engaged in domestic commerce.

In this connection your memorialists may refer with just pride to the rapidly progressing advantages of the two great channels of commerce, the Great Northern and Great Western Railroads; and as a further and more impressive evidence of the growth and importance of the commerce of the city your memorialists refer you to the astounding fact that over 2,100,000 bales is the estimated receipts of cotton at this port for the present year, being nearly one-half of the total crop of the United States, and equal to the whole crop in so short a time ago as the year 1850.

OUR MISSIONARY REPORTS.

The following remarks of the Southern Christian Advocate upon the form of the missionary reports in several of the Annual Conferences are worthy of candid consideration. They are much of the same tenor with the remarks of Dr. Keener, in his letter from Nashville, published in this paper week before last. It will be remembered that the custom of reporting missionary money varies with the different Conferences—some reporting only what is actually paid into the missionary treasury, and subject to draft, and others reporting, in addition, all paid for the support of missionaries on the various missions, white and colored. The lack of uniformity is perplexing, and unfair toward the Conferences reporting in the manner first named. Again, it is self deceptive, and will, it seems, prove ruinous to the cause. We are glad to see the question discussed, and hope to hear all that can be said on both sides, and we also trust that right conclusions may be reached and harmoniously adopted. In the meantime, the plan, adopted at the recent meeting of the Board, to report in two columns, separating the amounts paid into the treasury from those paid on the missions, will go far toward remedying the evils complained of. But, nothing but a separation between the funds for foreign, and those for domestic missions, will ever completely remedy them. The Southern Advocate says:

The report of the present year shows this fact. The aggregate collections reported amount to $234,442 00, a handsome sum, indeed, if paid into the Treasury and at the disposal of the Board for our missionary work. But this is not done. A part comes from the General Government and can be used only in aid of schools among the Indians. So the Secretary reports, and he further says "nearly one half of the remainder is paid to missionaries themselves in their different fields of labor." To what low figures does this statement reduce our absolute collections—about $110,000 only left to the Board for domestic missions to the destitute whites—for those Conferences which form no missions of this objectionable character, but pay all their missionaries through appropriations of the Board—and for Indian, German and Foreign missions.

But the Board needs much more than this sum, as witness the appropriations made at its last meeting—168,050 00. But this is not all that is wanted—for $40,000 are required to meet "the deficiency now existing." Put these figures together and they show what the Board needs to meet its past and prospective obligations—nearly $210,000 00. See above what is reported as having come into the hands of the Treasurers—about $110,000 00—and a blind man can see, that unless the policy of the past is speedily changed, we will soon be in debt $100,000 00—while we report $234,000 raised for missions.—There is a ruinous deception in this method of doing business. We have fought against it for years: we shall fight against it "to the bitter end." We insist that we never can conduct our missionary business safely or without imminent risk of total bankruptcy, until the Board adopt the policy of never reporting a dollar as pertaining to the Society's income, that has not been paid into the hands of one of its Treasurers—or, what amounts to the same thing, paid to redeem the Bishop's drafts on a Treasurer—the drafts being returned to him as so much cash. No sound business man would count among his assets funds over which he never had, and never can have, any control; and when a Society reports a certain sum as its annual income, which it never can have in possession, it is always liable to overdraw its funds.

The evil should be arrested at once—for it grows annually. The report goes to the next Conferences that our Society has received $240,000 00. This seems a large sum, and each Conference being pressed to form such missions as we here condemn, allows more and more of the money heretofore going to the Treasury to be absorbed on the work where the so-called missionary money is paid. This each does without knowing how much of the reported annual collection has been so absorbed the past year, or how much every other Conference will absorb next year. Thus the evil grows as it has been doing—and while perhaps the aggregate reported, and the demands for large appropriations increase, each year the amount at the disposal of the Board annually decreases. In 1857, when the Government was reported as paying $20,000 for Indian schools, the Board had control of $160,000 00, while only $36,000 00 of the sum total reported was used without an appropriation in the various Conferences. Yet, now the Secretary tells us that nearly one half of the aggregate reported—independent of the Government funds—say $110,000 00 has not come into the Treasury. How long will it be, before, at this rate of decrease, the Treasury is empty, and the Board left without money to appropriate, while we are boasting of large collections.

RECEPTION OF THE JAPANESE EMBASSY.

Nothing stranger, and nothing grander than the recent arrival and official reception of the Japanese Embassy, has occurred in the history of the United States. It is also gratifying, and full of promise, in view of the prospect that China and Japan will afford a profitable commerce with San Francisco, and, by the Pacific railroad, with the whole country. When this road is finished, Europe and the East will mutually trade and travel over it. European missionary operations in the East will also be conducted by means of the Pacific railroad, to say nothing of those of this country. The United States will be the "meeting-house" of the European and Asiatic nations, and the mediator between their civilizations.

More than two hundred and fifty years ago, the first Japanese Embassy ever sent abroad was received at the Court of Rome. Romanist civilization first tried its power upon this people, and disastrously failed. Protestant civilization at length has its turn. So far, everything augurs well for its success.

When the "Roanoke" arrived with the Embassy, they were received in the most imposing manner by the military and civil authorities of the United States, at Washington City, and, amid the smiling admiration and curiosity of thousands of ladies and gentlemen, and a vast multitude, were conducted to magnificently prepared rooms.

From the Washington States of the 18th, we extract the following account of the official presentation of the Japanese Embassy to the President:—

To-day at 12 o'clock the formal presentation of the Japanese Embassadors to the President of the United States took place in the East Room of the Executive Mansion.

Preparatory to proceeding thither, the Embassadors made every arrangement appropriate to the great occasion. By the orders of the Ty-coon it is made their duty to conduct the ceremonies of presentation in the very highest style, and most respectful manner known to their whole system of Court etiquette.

So far as in their power, they arranged the ceremonies in strict Japanese fashion. They had in the procession standard-bearers and pike-men, and each officer occupied a carriage to himself. They appeared in full dress. The Embassadors were placed each in an open barouche, with their attendants on each side, (afoot), being the standard-bearers. All of the other officers followed and occupied separate carriages.

The military were drawn up in single rank on each side of the row of carriages, headed by the band, and the procession moved with a measured slowness up the Avenue to the gateways at the White House, making its way through a vast concourse of people who filled the streets and occupied every available place.

Before their arrival, a detachment of minor officers had come to see if everything was right. They were delighted, and shook hands quite freely with those assembled in the East Room. A very large number of officers of the army and navy were present, in uniform. There was a very full deputation from the Senate and House, and the entire Cabinet were present. By twelve o'clock the East room was crowded with ladies and gentlemen.

The arrangements for the presentation were first made by two lines of officers being drawn up opposite to each other, and reaching from each side of the main entrance to the sides of the large eastern windows. At the latter place, Lieutenant Gen. Winfield Scott stood, surrounded by several officers of the army.

The President, precisely at 12 o'clock, appeared at the main entrance, accompanied by all of the Cabinet, and proceeded to a position near Gen. Scott. The Mayor of Washington also formed a portion of the group.

The main door opened, and a general hush of the busy hum was heard, and several of the minor officers walked up, bowing and salaaming to the President, accompanied by the Commissioner.

They then retired, backing out, and in a few moments the Commissioner escorted the three Embassadors to the head of the columns. They bowed many times in their approach to the President. They were dressed in their peculiar but elegant style, and wore a novel-shaped hat on their heads.

The group having been formed, the principal Embassador presented the letters of credence to the Secretary of State, and, through the Interpreter, said:

THE EMBASSADOR'S SPEECH.

His Majesty, Ty-coon, has commanded us that we respectfully address to his Majesty the President of the United States, in his name, as follows:

Desiring to establish on a firm and lasting foundation the relations of peace and commerce so happily existing between the two countries, that lately the plenipotentiaries of both countries have negotiated and concluded a treaty.

Now, he has ordered us to exchange the ratification of the treaty in your Imperial city of Washington. Henceforth he hopes that the friendly relations shall be held more and more lasting, and he is very happy to have your friendly feeling; that you have brought us to the United States, and will send us to Japan in your men of war.

The President then made the following address, repeating a few lines, and stopping for its translation to the Embassadors by the Interpreter. When thus understood, they bowed very low at each sentence.

THE PRESIDENT'S SPEECH.

I give you a cordial welcome as representatives of his Imperial Majesty, the Ty-coon of Japan, to the American Government. We are much gratified that the first Embassy which your great Empire has ever accredited to any proper power has been sent to the United States.

I trust that this will be the harbinger of perpetual peace and friendship between the two countries. The ratifications you are about to exchange with the Secretary of State, cannot fail to be productive of benefits and blessings to the people of both Japan and the United States.

I can say for myself, and promise for my successor, that it shall be carried into execution in a faithful and friendly spirit, so as to secure to the countries all the advantages they may justly expect from the happy auspices under which it has been negotiated and ratified.

I rejoice that you are pleased with the kind treatment which you have received on board of our vessels of war whilst on your passage to this country. You shall be sent back in the same manner to your native land, under the protection of the American flag.

Meanwhile, during your residence amongst us, which I hope may be prolonged so as to enable you to visit different portions of our country, we shall be happy to extend to you all the hospitality and kindness eminently due to the great and friendly sovereign whom you so worthily represent.

After the President's speech they all shook hands with him, wearing a very grave countenance, and conducting the ceremonies with a great deal of dignity. The Commissioners then presented all of the Cabinet, and the Interpreter explained their offices and relations to the Government.

After the Cabinet, came the Mayor of Washington and Speaker Pennington, who were called from the crowd. The Vice-President was not present.

The ceremony of hand-shaking being through, they all retired with their faces to the President. None of the presents were given in public.

The Embassadors were then escorted to their carriages through a platoon of the police, and a large group of the army officers, to say nothing of the immense crowd on the outside.

SPENDING THE SUMMER.

Many are now debating the question, "How shall we spend the summer?" It is a foregone conclusion that the summer is to be spent, or, in plain English, to be pretty much wasted. No doubt many need the relaxation.—Overtasked brains, weak nerves, sickly sections of country, call for change, and it is perfectly right for people of means and leisure to recruit themselves for future work. But "spending the summer," as most persons practice recreation, is simply the dissipation of folly, or the luxurious indulgence of idleness. And religious people, too, often fall into this snare, waste their time, spend their money and corrupt their souls by running into the extravagance of fashion and yielding to that spirit of worldliness, which is the greatest enemy in our day to vital godliness.

If you have earned leisure, if your health and spirits demand rest and refreshment, do not forget that in laying off the burdens of business and seeking recreation, you are to do do so as God's servants. You have no more right to be worldly in your hours of relaxation, than to commit sin in any other way. Travel is a good thing in itself, but as most persons use it, a worldly temper is encouraged, religious duties are neglected, frivolity is yielded to, and thus Christians are guilty of backsliding. Human nature is weak at all times; but it is very weak when people attempt to show off themselves and their families at watering-places, to parade their wealth, to advertise their self-importance, and to surrender their hearts to worldly evils. And, therefore, brethren, suffer a word of exhortation. If you visit these summer-resorts, go in the fear of God, and remember your calling. Go, as "the salt of the earth," and not as spice to give additional flavor to the follies and dissipations of other people.

THE BRUTAL SPIRIT OF THE AGE.

One of those strange counter movements which so often occur in the history of civilization, is now exhibiting itself in the passion for prize-fighting. A few bullies, anxious to win notoriety on a field that has usually been considered the domain of tigers and lions, have succeeded by dint of perseverance and the very gracious help of newspapers in creating a cannibal's taste for human blood, except indeed that the poor cannibal laps his tongue in it while we prefer the enjoyment through the eye. At first, we were disposed to think this sudden outbreak of beastliness as altogether unworthy of notice. But now that leading and influential papers, the accredited organs of opinion, are feeding their readers with the delicious details of how one man bruised and battered another man, it really seems time to examine into the merits of our boasted refinement so as to see whether the nineteenth century is fairly entitled to plume itself on its superior virtues. The fact is, our gay feathers, like the peacock's, point downward and draggle a little too much in the dust for any boasting.

This whole thing is low, base, degrading. It is sheer brutality—a mere bullfight, in which human beings take the place of bulls, and for horns use iron fists. There is nothing to recommend, nothing to extenuate, nothing even to whitewash the unmitigated grossness of such a spectacle. Vices exist that do make some appeal to the imagination, and foster a sort of manliness that one can understand, even while the moral nature recoils from them. But in this instance, to see men glorying in a long and painful discipline simply for the sake of knocking out an eye with dexterity, or otherwise maiming a human body for life, is to witness a display of depravity that has nothing about it except the love of wickedness for its own enjoyment. Surely we have heathenism enough without reviving gladiatorial sports, and it is rather a long stretch for ingenuity to go back among the effete things existing centuries ago to find entertainments for a popular crowd. Perchance, however, some good may come out of the advertisement of our brutality, and at least it may serve to show us what, terrible amount of depravity is repressed rather than destroyed by our civilization. Underneath all these fair forms of outward life, there are awful evils lurking; and give them any sort of an opportunity, let a newspaper patronize them, gather a few brawlers about them, and straightway, thousands are found to support their enormities. Such things can only be cured by an enlightened and rigid public sentiment, and to form this sentiment we must rely supremely on Christianity. But also, this is just what we fail to do. We depend on government, law, opinion, as if they were the guardian-angels of our civilization, when the truth of common sense and lesson of common experience ought to teach us, that the Gospel of Jesus Christ is, to-day, the solitary barrier between us and the worst of barbarism.

OUR COLLEGE COMMENCEMENTS.

These are charming occasions, full of glad and buoyant life, inspiring to the fancy, and ennobling to our better sensibilities. We do right to make them festivals, for such scenes speak to human hopes, and cheer the fellowship too often interrupted or estranged amid the experience of the world. But it has often struck us that these beautiful seasons have a larger capacity for good in them than we recognize. Instance our commencement sermons. Preachers on commencement Sabbaths are apt to abate the spirituality of the Gospel and to give a somewhat freer scope to their intellects in respect to trains of thought, not perhaps directly literary and scientific, but yet below the true standard of gospel thinking. The spirit of the lecture, the essay, the oration, insensibly steals in, and there is a deference to the popular aspects of the hour by no means salutary. Of course, such discourses ought to suit the specialty of the occasion. If men cannot adapt themselves to the distinctive character of the day, they ought to decline the service; but allowing for all this, commending too the wise tact that suits the word to the needs of the time, we yet insist that the Gospel ought always to be the Gospel, and preaching should never relax its strength, fervor, sanctity, to borrow the least aid from any sort of worldliness.

Give a good broad margin for individual peculiarities. Yea, verily, let Paul be Paul, Apollos be Apollos, and if Bourges choose to thunder, let him thunder. All this is perfectly consistent with thorough spirituality. The essential thing is to hold all subordinate to the cross of Christ, and so to preach as that the divine ends of preaching may be as fully answered here as anywhere.—Ends, mark you, ends—such as converting, renewing, edifying men—drawing them to Christ, reaching their sins, exposing their false disguises, piercing their consciences—building up the Church, enlarging its thoughts of duty and service, quickening its zeal and animating its devotions. A minister has a perfect right to vary his style of preaching. If he neglect to do this, he is a workman that needeth to be ashamed. But he has no right to vary preaching itself—no right to convert it into an entertainment, to degrade it into elegant criticism and rhetorical gymnastics. Doing this, he sins before God and corrupts his soul, and yet without at all preaching on worldliness or descending to the low arts of popularizing the ministry, he may wisely discuss such themes as have the heart of Christ in them, and stir the Church to conquer the intellect and the science and the literature of the age, for the honor and glory of God.—Paul at Mars Hill was precisely the same Paul as when he called together the Ephesian Elders, and uttered those sentiments which yet stand unmatched for depth of pathos, for heroic strength, for noble manhood. Nevertheless, he remembered his occasions, saw their meaning, caught their spirit, and while he became all things to all men, he likewise became all things to all times and seasons that God's providence gave him for improvement.

THE FINANCIAL FRAUD MANIA.

There are some prophecies which are only interpreted by time and progressive historical fulfilment. And there are some Scripture axioms whose profound philosophical truth is similarly developed and illustrated. One of these latter is in words following: "The love of money is the root of all evil." The most striking modern phase of this truth is the fact that the love of money keeps pace with the increase of money. Now, when the world is overflowing with money—when more gold has been dug out of the earth in the last twenty years than the world ever before possessed—when the cotton of the great South of the United States is making all the world rich in all departments of industry and commerce—when money is more easily obtained, by legitimate means, than ever before—now, the love of money has grown to be a positive mental and moral disease, distorting the judgment, weakening the will, and defiling the conscience. It has become a mania, and frauds, great and small, astounding and insignificant, are breaking out everywhere, as ulcerous indications of the diseased state of our civilization. However humiliating and alarming the thought, it seems that the diseased blood of dishonesty has become a very part of the life of the time. For the frauds which are discovered, even those which exist and are not made public, do not approximate a revelation of the dishonesty, in principle, which actually exists. Caution, pride, fear, restrain a thousand villains at heart from overt crime for every one that is detected.

But the evil actually threatens to become epidemic. Representative cases have recently occurred in various parts of the civilized world. Baron Bruck, a great Austrian nobleman, is detected in gigantic frauds, and commits suicide. George Fullinger, a clerk of the Union Bank in London, misappropriates funds to the amount of about one million dollars. Isaac V. Fowler, the Postmaster in the most important post-office in the United States, defaults to the amount of about two hundred thousand dollars. Less notable instances may be counted by the thousand. Places of public official trust, involving the management of large amounts of government or public funds, where patriotism would seem to be a prop to honor, seem to have become, in many instances, seats of systematic robbery. Government, railroad, and bank treasuries are defrauded of millions every year by those who should most sacredly guard them. Men in high places, representatives of the honor and dignity of the greatest nation on earth, and who should be the conservators of all its interests, use the public money for the furtherance of their own selfish, personal ends, and thus corrupt thousands of inferior beings who, but for their example and temptation, might have remained honest men. State elections are carried by the highest bidder, and parties elect Presidents by the strength of their purses. Truly we have fallen upon evil times.

There is no remedy but in the earnest promulgation and practice of the Christian religion. It is now evident that among public men, and their followers, there are but few who are guided by strict principle, except where principle grows out of conscience toward God. National conscience and national piety are the wants of the times, and the gospel alone can supply them.

THE RELIGIOUS DODGE AT A DISCOUNT.

The "religious dodge" men of the Black Republican party (Dr. Stevens, Beecher, and the Independent,) have been utterly ignored by the Chicago Convention, as we predicted. As to Dr Stevens' candidate, Judge McLean, he had no showing whatever. If he had any chance before, Dr. Stevens' nomination killed him. The "Christian platform" men were probably too eager and officious, and disgusted the worldly-wise Republicans. We understand that the fare between Buffalo, the seat of the Northern Methodist General Conference, and Chicago, the seat of the Convention, both being in session at the same time, was only half price—a significant fact. Our Northern brethren, in 1844, tried hard to get up a hue and cry of conlition between Southern Methodists and Southern politicians, led, as they reported, by Dr. Capers and Mr. Calhoun. But the positions of the goring "bull" and the slain "ox" are now reversed. They, led by their great "Republican" "official organ" at New York, now affiliate with the only "sectional" and "disunion" party. Southern Christians act, politically, only as citizens; seek no "entangling alliances" between Churches and parties; represent no sectionalism, but maintain the Constitution, the Union, and the equal rights of all the States. As to the Independent's platform, which combines the "religious dodge," and "irrepressible conflict" planks, the Convention was equally oblivious. Whatever its conductors may think of Mr. Lincoln, the platform upon which he is placed represents neither the religious fanaticism to which they recommended an appeal, nor the "irrepressible conflict"—the religious and political elements of a furor which they hoped might be aroused. It takes ground against any interference with slavery where it already exists, and it condemns the lawless invasion of States, after the manner of John Brown, "under whatsoever pretext," as one of the gravest of crimes. It denounces the old Lecompton Constitution. It proclaims against extravagance, and in favor of economy in the administration of the Federal Government. It declares against the right of the South to carry slaves to the Territories; in favor of the immediate admission of Kansas as a State; in favor of the Homestead bill and the Pacific Railroad; and against any change in the laws of naturalization.

ITALY AS A MISSIONARY FIELD.

A foreign correspondent of one of the English journals, now in Italy, in referring to the state of things in Genoa, remarks:—"But a great change is passing over the Italian mind, and the political emancipation and civil liberty to which they have been recently brought are accompanied, in many instances, by a desire for the liberty with which Christ makes his people free. And in general, the feelings of the populations, as well as of the civil authorities, are greatly modified with regard to Protestantism. Those whom they have been taught to call heretics, and who, according to the teaching of their priests, must go to hell, and ought to be avoided and hated, are not found to be such wicked people as they were made to believe, and they begin to look upon them with increasing favor. I was surprised to find that, upon inquiry in many parts of the city, I was directed with great courtesy to the residence of the Bible Depositary, who seemed to be well known. People will speak freely about the labors of the Italian Church and the converts, who have left Romanism and embraced the gospel. This is a very striking proof of the change which public opinion is undergoing, and may we not hope that this will lead a vast number, who are now halting between two opinions, to openly declare themselves on the Lord's side. The cry from every quarter is for laborers to enter into the field which are whitening for the harvest. And I trust that the Church is adopting the right means to attain this end, by earnest prayer to the Lord of the harvest to send forth those whom he has fitted with gifts and grace for the great and important work. I shall reserve for another letter a fuller notice of the work in and about Genoa."

THE CUBAN MESSENGER.

We have received, says the Picayune, the first number of this well gotten up paper, recently started in Havana, by Messrs. J. W. Bryant and J. L. Wyman. The Messenger is the first newspaper in the English language ever published in the Island of Cuba, and will prove a great desideratum, both to the English speaking residents of the island and to our own people who will find in it much valuable information concerning the "Gem of the Antilles." The trade between the United States and the West Indies, and more particularly with Cuba, is acquiring new developments every day, and the thousands in this country interested in that trade, who do not speak the Spanish language will hail with pleasure the advent of this reliable medium of information. Besides editorial and local articles of interest, the first number of the Cuban Messenger contains a full and able review of the Havana and Matanzas markets, and a complete price current report. The Messenger will be a welcome visitor on our exchange table.

UP THE RAILROAD.

The editor of this paper is in the habit of traveling and preaching on the line of the Jackson and Great Northern Railroad, nearly every Sunday at Arcola, and sometimes at Amite. This ping region is happily adapted to the formation of elegant and healthful summer residences. Arcola is now a beautiful place, and growing more so constantly, as handsome residences increase. The little community, whether from the city or country, is composed of intelligent gentlemen, who harmonious labor for its improvement and welfare. A good male school is now in operation, and, under the right kind of man, a better place for a prosperous female seminary is hard to find. A good man who wishes to build up a good school would be liberally supported.

TO OUR AGENTS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Many preachers complain that we have not sent them our accounts, when the fact is, they have not sent us lists of the post offices on their works. Brethren, please attend to this at once. We are annoyed, and our business delayed, without we have your postoffices.

We earnestly urge our preachers, members, and friends to give us all the assistance they can, in the increase of our circulation during the present year. We increase constantly, but not fast enough. We have the back numbers, still, from May 1st, at $1 25 to the end of the year.

We are sending out accounts to all who have not paid up to the end of the present year. We wish to close the year with a clean list. Then every subscriber will know at the beginning of the year, that the time for renewal has come, without any information from us. It will save a world of trouble.

When our preachers fail to receive the Advocate, they should let us know at once, and not fail to give their postoffice address; otherwise, the paper cannot be sent. Preachers often fail to receive the paper because they have never sent for it.

When Agents send the names of new subscribers, and the paper does not come, they should write us at once, giving all the particulars.

When accounts sent out are believed to be incorrect, we should be informed at once, and all particulars should be given.

We say again, obituary writers will please leave poetry out—indeed, everything but the essential facts.

HARPER'S SCHOOL AND FAMILY SERIES, by Marcius Wilson, including School and Family Primer, The First Reader, The Second Reader, The Third Reader, and The Fourth Reader, have been sent us through Thos. L. White, 105 Canal Street. This valuable series has been amply noticed, heretofore, in these columns, by our New York Literary Correspondent. The leading idea of these Readers is, while teaching children to read, to impart valuable knowledge in a popular way.

HARPER FOR JUNE has been sent us through Thos. L. White, 105 Canal Street. It is the beginning of the twenty-first volume. Its leading papers are, "A Summer in New England"—"Ancient Monuments in the United States"—"Insects belonging to the Cotton Plant." The "literary" papers, and the editorial department, are interesting as ever.

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVCCATE.

MAY 23, 1860.

LOCAL AND INTERIOR.

THE REPORT OF YELLOW FEVER in the city is utterly without foundation. Let the interior rely upon the Reports of the Board of Health. Whenever there is yellow fever here, they will find it out. Pay no attention to malicious or ignorant alarmists, who return annually with mosquitoes and flies, and are about as worthless and annoying; but rely upon the veracity of the city press.

THREE DAYS AND A THIRD TO NEW YORK.—A telegraphic dispatch to a gentleman here from one in New York, states that he made the through trip, by the Jackson and Great Northern mail route, from New Orleans to New York, in exactly three days and eight hours. This is quick time, and is made every day.

VIGILANCE COMMITTEE.—The Baton Rouge Gazette & Comet says that a terrible condition of society obtains in the Opelousas parishes at this time. There are vigilance committees, and counter vigilance committees, perpetrating outrages too varied in nature and too numerous to mention. Is not this such a state of things as the constitution provides against, when the Governor is made commander-in-chief of the army and navy of this State, and of the militia thereof, except when they shall be called into service by the United States?

REV. THOMAS CASTLETON.—The Baton Rouge Advocate intimates that the Rev. Mr. Castleton, an eminent and able divine of that city, has been called to take charge of one of the Presbyterian churches of Houston, Texas. Mr. Castleton is now on a visit to Houston.

TEXAS AND NEW ORLEANS RAILROAD.—The Galveston News, has gratifying accounts of the progress of the Texas and New Orleans Railroad, the connection to be made with the Opelousas road at New Iberia. The road is by this time completed from Beamont, on the Neches, to Liberty, on the Trinity, a distance of 43¼ miles. From Beaumont eastward to the Louisiana boundary at the Sabine, the distance is 22 miles; from the Trinity westward, the distance is 39 miles to Houston, where connections are already made with Galveston, and with the Texas railroad system. On these divisions laborers are at work throughout the whole route. The iron for the entire road is obtained, and has been received, and the News gives assurance that the whole road, from Houston to the Sabine, will be completed before the first of November next. This ought to give a new impulse to the friends of the Opelousas road, to strengthen the hands of that company, so as to enable them to push forward the work on the line towards New Iberia, and thence to the Sabine, to meet these energetic Texas people in their road, to open the communication between the fertile regions of Texas and the city of New Orleans.

MARBLE WORKS IN SHREVEPORT.—A traveller who visited the marble works in Shreveport, La., speaks as follows: "This store is a branch of the well known Empire Steam Marble Works of St. Louis. They employ the first artists in the country, and I think from the samples I saw there that our artists can well rival those of Europe; they equal them at least in execution, if they do not in design. There, upon a statuary marble, of the purest Italian marble, I saw the copy of Thorwalden's "Day and Night," the first I have ever seen in this country. I saw the original while visiting Rome, and this comes up to it in execution. During my travels through the Southern country, I have never seen a finer display of manufactured marble."

AFRICANS AT KEY WEST.—At last accounts the newly arrived Africans were still in excellent health and the object of many curious visits. Nothing of course was known at Key West of their future disposition, though it was thought they would be sent back home again. When the slaver Wildfire left the coast there were fourteen vessels waiting for cargoes of negroes. The bark William left eight days before her, with 750 on board. Two Spanish armed steamers were also waiting at the Congo river for cargoes of 1500 negroes each, bound for Cuba. So confident were the people on board the Wildfire of not being overhauled, that their hatches were not even closed.

POLITICAL.

The Democratic State Central Committee of Louisiana have requested the re-assembling of the State Convention which elected the delegates to Charleston, not for a new election, but to determine what shall be done under the circumstances. The disposition of the party in Louisiana seems to be, to sustain the seceding delegates, and yet to seek reconciliation in Baltimore.

Two meetings have been held in Mobile, one sustaining, and the other condemning, the secession at Charleston.

An immense meeting has been held in Memphis, sustaining the secession at Charleston.

The Boston Courier says that the people of this country will not suffer the candidate of the Chicago Convention to be elected President, and that there never will be another Black Republican Convention.

The Democratic press of the South, and the Southern Rights Opposition press, generally sustain the Charleston seceders.

A grand ratification meeting was recently held in Selma, Ala., to sustain the nomination of Bell and Everett.

The Democratic candidate for U. S. Senator from Connecticut in opposition to Lafayette P. Foster, was Wm. W. Easton, of Hartford. Mr. Easton made a speech in Democratic caucus, taking strong grounds against Mr. Douglas and his doctrines, declaring that the seventeen Democratic States repudiated them, and ably defending the Southern view of the Territorial question.

Richard Wallach, one of the candidates for the Mayoralty of Washington, D.C., in the coming June election, is a nephew of Mayor Stith, of this city. It is denied that Mr. W. is a Black Republican, as has been alleged; he supports Bell and Everett.

The Democratic Executive Committee of Georgia have called a State Convention at Milledgeville, on Monday, the 4th day of June.

The five bills for the organization of the new territories—Arizona, Idahoe, Dacotah, Nevada, and —containing the Wilmot Proviso, have been tabled in the House of Representatives, by the Democrats, assisted by the South Americans, and a few conservative Republicans—the latter an unexpected and significant concession.

Ex-Gov. Herschell V. Johnson, Judges Nisbett and Warner of the Supreme Court, and other prominent Georgians, have published letters condemning the seceders from the Charleston Convention, and advising the sending of delegates to the Baltimore National Democratic Convention. Hon. Alexander H. Stephens has been appointed a delegate to the State Convention to be held for that purpose.

The voters of the town of Van Buren, in Ohio, have elected a negro justice of the peace over a regular Republican nomination.

It is thought by some that the non-committal platform of Bell and Everett, and its unmistakeable smacking of a Whig reorganization, will make them powerless. It is thought, however, that it will draw off more strength from the Republicans than the Democrats, and may lose them Pennsylvania and New Jersey.

It is said that a movement is being made to bring out Gen. Sam. Houston as an independent candidate for the Presidency.

The National Intelligencer and the Louisville Journal, the two leading Old Line Whig journals of the country, warmly sustain the nomination of Bell and Everett.

Gov. Wise, it is said, earnestly sustains the Charleston seceders, and the proposed Convention at Richmond. Senator Hunter seeks the re-union of the Democracy.

Hon. W. L. Yancey addressed the citizens of Montgomery, Ala., last Saturday night. The Mail says that no ball in the city sufficed for the vast throng that had assembled, so the meeting adjourned to Market square. Great enthusiasm prevailed, and the course of the Alabama delegation was unanimously approved.

Nineteen Democratic Senators have published an address to the Democracy of the United States, sustaining the platform demanded by the Southern delegates at Charleston, recognizing the necessity of their withdrawal from the Convention, but advising an adjournment of the Richmond Convention until after the one at Baltimore, and also recommending another effort to unite on the platform.

Hon. Alex. H. Stephens of Georgia, has published a letter in which he argues that "non-intervention" was not satisfactory to him, but that it was demanded and accepted by the South; that good faith requires adherence to it; that neither non-intervention, nor the Cincinnati platform embody Squatter Sovereignty; that the South should not have made a further demand at Charleston, and recommends re-union at Baltimore.

Hon. Howell Cobb has written a letter in response to the Macon Committee, fully and cordially sustaining the seceders from the Charleston Convention.

Ex-Gov. Hunt of New York, who presided over the Baltimore Union Convention, caused it to be understood that he would not consider himself bound to support the nominations of that body. He would wait for more light before deciding. The New York Express, we see, which led off for and advocated the claims of Sam Houston, publishes an address to the people of that State, in favor of the hero of San Jacinto, and inclines to the idea of taking him in preference to the nominee of any Convention. All this looks like bolting the Constitutional nominations.

The Legislature of Maryland, at its last session, passed a law prohibiting the manumission of slaves, by deed or will, after the first of next month.

THE BLACK REPUBLICAN CONVENTION AT CHICAGO.

This body assembled at Chicago, on the 16th inst., David Wilmot temporary Chairman, in an immense temporary hall, capable of containing 10,000 persons, and costing $5,000. Those mentioned as candidates are, W. H. Seward, John McLean, Simon Cameron, S. P. Chase, N. P. Banks, Wm. Pennington, John Bell, Ed. Bates, J. C. Fremont, and Abraham Lincoln.—The call of the Southern States which sent no delegates was received with a storm of hisses and groans, Virginia was allowed twenty-three votes; Maryland, eleven votes; Oregon, five votes; Kentucky, twenty-three votes; and Texas, six votes. According to the report, the votes given each of the above-named States were cut down below the full double electoral vote. The report of the Committee on Business and, Rules of Order was then received. It considered the minority rule as one requiring only a majority to make a nomination.

Judge Jessup, on behalf of the Committee on Resolutions, made their report, of which the following is a synopsis:

1st. That the history of the last four years establishes the necessity and the permanency of the Republican party.

2d. That the principles promulgated in the Declaration of Independence, and embodied in the Constitution of the United States, are essential to the preservation of Republican Institutions.

3d. That while a sense of disloyalty is manifested towards all disunion schemes, the Republican party looks with favor on the rights of the several States to control their own domestic institutions.

4th. That the Republican party denounces the lawless invasion by armed force of any State or Territory under whatsoever pretext as one of the gravest crimes.

5th. That the present Administration is subservient to exactions of sectional interests in forcing the infamous Lecompton Constitution on the protesting people of Kansas, and far exceeds the apprehensions of the Republican party.

6th. That the people view with great alarm the reckless extravagance pervading every department of the Federal Government.

7th. That a return to strict economy in public expenditures is absolutely necessary, and that a personal accountability is indispensable.

8th. That the new dogma which holds that the Constitution, of its own force, carries slavery into the Territories, is a dangerous and a political heresy, revolutionary in its tendency and at variance with the explicit provisions of the Constitution, and entirely subversive of the peace and harmony of the country.

9th. That in their normal condition, all Territories are open to the exercise of full and perfect freedom, and that it is our duty by legislation, to maintain the Constitutional provision that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty or property, without due process of law.

10th. That Kansas should be admitted under the recent Constitution; demanding the passage of the Homestead Bill, and opposed to a change in the naturalization laws.

11th. That a Pacific railway, and a Daily Overland Mail is regarded with favor.

The resolutions were amended by adding the prelude to the declaration of Independence, and then adopted amidst the wildest excitement of an immense multitude and raising ten thousand voices in deafening cheers for the sentiments contained therein.

The unbounded applause of the delegates and visitors attracted many outsiders, who, on hearing the cause, re-echoed the cheers.

Among the resolutions offered was one in favor of adjusting the import duties and of encouraging American industry.

The resolution was received with unbounded enthusiasm by the Pennsylvania delegation and deafening cheers by all of the delegations and spectators.

BELL AND EVERETT.

Mr. Bell is about 63 years old. He was born near Nashville, educated for the bar, elected to the legislature as soon as he was of age, elected to Congress in 1827, opposed the Jackson policy and became identified with the Whigs. Beat Mr. Polk for Speaker of the House in 1831; supported Judge White for the Presidency in 1836, and helped to make Tennessee a Whig State till 1856. Kept his position in the House till 1841, when called into Harrison's Cabinet, which place he resigned on the accession of Tyler. Chosen U. S. Senator in 1847, re-elected in 1853, and beaten by A. O. P. Nicholson in 1859. He was a Whig, supported Whig policy, and is an "American" in sentiment. He is in robust health. He is a patriotic, conservative statesman.

Mr. Everett is about 66 years old. He is as well known as any man in the Union. He was born in Massachusetts, graduated at Harvard, studied Divinity, was settled as pastor of Brattle street Church, Boston, was chosen Professor of Greek in the University, spent five years in Europe preparing for his duties, and on his return added to his Professorship the editorship of the North American Review. He was elected to the House of Representatives in 1824, supporting John Quincy Adams, and kept his seat ten years. Elected Governor of Massachusetts in 1834, re-elected successively till 1839. Appointed Minister to England in 1841. Elected President of Harvard in 1845. Appointed Secretary of State by Mr. Fillmore in 1850 in place of Mr. Webster, deceased. Elected to the U. S. Senate in 1853, and resigned next year from ill health. In private life since, he has devoted himself to the Mount Vernon enterprise. He is a patriot, a man of genius and learning, a great orator, and has discharged all his public duties well. He also is a Whig and an American.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN, OF ILLINOIS.

Hon. Abraham Lincoln, of Illinois, was born on the 12th of February, 1809, in Hardin county, Kentucky. His family were not blessed with much of this world's goods, and he was forced to fight his own way through the opening struggles of life. He became intimately acquainted with the industrial classes, and they now claim him as "The Flatboatman." Engaged in rural pursuits, or in piloting down the Mississippi, he permitted no opportunity to escape for the improval of his mind. Admitted to the bar, he settled in the town of Springfield, Ill. When the "Black Hawk War" broke out in 1832, Mr. Lincoln was elected captain of a company of Illinois volunteers, at the head of which he distinguished himself. He was afterwards elected to the State legislature, taking decided ground as a Whig of the Henry Clay school. In 1846 he was elected a member of the XXXth Congress, where he acted with the Whig party; and at the National Convention which nominated Gen. Scott for President, he was elected to represent Illinois in the Central Whig Committee. In 1856 Mr. Lincoln entered into the Republican contest, and two years later the convention of that party nominated him in opposition to Judge Douglas, who defeated him.

FOREIGN.

The San Juan Affair.

Lord John Russell, in reply to inquiry in the House of Commons (England), stated that the proposition made by the British Government for the settlement of the San Juan difficulty, had been rejected by the American Government.

New English Reform Bill.

The new English Reform Bill, introduced by Lord John Russell, has passed to a second reading in the House of Commons. The opposition to its final passage appears to be growing less violent.

Affairs of Northern Italy.

The King of Sardinia continued his tour through his newly acquired provinces in Italy.

He was enthusiastically received at Bologna, where he was presented with 5,000,000 francs, it being a voluntary contribution from the people of that province.

Numerous arrests continued to be made at Messina. Naples was represented as being more tranquil, there being large reinforcements of royal troops in the city. Garibaldi has determined not to go to Sicily, Count Cavour having dismanded him from his original purpose.

Fresh Troubles in Sicily.

It was currently reported on the continent that fresh troubles had broken out in Sicily. It is certain that an almost universal dispute took prevails throughout the island.

General Amnesty in Spain.

Telegraphic dispatches from Madrid say that the Queen has granted a general amnesty to all those who participated in the late insurrectionary movement in favor of Count Montemolin.

Discontent in Hungary.

Continued discontent prevailed in Hungary. The Governor General had given great offence to the Hungarians by the arrogance of his course. It is reported that General Klapka is in full correspondence with all parties in Hungary.

Indemnity from the Sultan.

It is stated that England and France have addressed an energetic note to the Sultan, demanding of him 400,000 francs indemnity for the Jeddah massacre.

Mazzini's Proclamation.

Paris, May 7.—Advices have been received that General Mazzini had issued a proclamation calling upon and urging the Sicilians to unite with King Victor Emanuel, and assuring them that it is the only hope of their obtaining their liberties.

The Patrie says that no definite action or decision has yet been made regarding the late execution at Rome.

The latest news by the steamship "Europa," is dated May 8. A leading article in the Paris Patrie says that no terms have yet been concluded by which the evacuation of Ancona may be secured.

Miscellaneous European News.

The sad news was telegraphed to the "Asia," at Queenstown, that the Liverpool Sailors' Home was burned on the night of the 28th ult., and that 30 lives were lost.

The London Times publishes a letter from Sebastopol, stating that the English graves there had been violated, and that the remains of Commodore Hammet were entirely exhumed, and his bleaching in the sun.

M. Thiers is on a visit to the field of battle of Waterloo, to prepare materials for the 15th volume of his history, which will comprise the Hundred Days.

Before leaving for America the Prince of Wales will first complete his term at Oxford, and will not probably set out for Canada before the first week in July.

Advices from Sicily state that the insurgents continued to keep a guerrilla warfare in the interior of the country.

Lord Cowley, the English Ambassador to France, made the last passage over from Dover to Boulogne in 97 minutes.

The immense majority for annexation to France has been the subject of great rejoicing in Savoy, where a monster banquet was given.

On the other hand the French Government intends to celebrate the annexation of Nice and Savoy by a fete, and a number of Savoyards and Nicois are to make a triumphal entry into Paris. There are to be illuminations, fireworks, theatrical displays, &c.

General Garibaldi has left Northern Italy, with an expeditionary corps for Sicily.

The French garrison stationed at Rome will most probably be reinforced by a detachment sent from France. The French camp at Chalons will number 40,000 men, under the command of Marshal McMahon it is the intention of the Emperor to make it the centre of the army of observation along the frontier bordering on the river Rhine. The whole number of men comprising the army is 90,000, under the command of the Emperor Napoleon.

Customhouse Appointment.

WASHINGTON, May 18.—The Senate has confirmed the appointment of Mr. Claiborne, as General Appraiser of the New York Customhouse.

Reception of Hon. John Bell.

NASHVILLE, May 18.—The Hon. John Bell, who made a tour through some of the Northern cities, after the adjournment of the Baltimore Convention, has arrived at his home in this city. On reaching the depot, he was met by a large crowd of citizens with the utmost enthusiasm.—A welcome address was delivered by the Hon. Neil S. Brown. The remarks were of the most flattering nature and highly complimentary.

Chicago Republican Convention.

CHICAGO, May 18.—Third Day's Proceedings.—The President announced that the regular order of business would be to ballot for a candidate for the Presidency. On the first ballot the number of votes cast were favorable to Seward. On the second ballot several of the nominees withdrew their names previous to calling the roll. The result was that Mr. Seward remained the same while his principal competitor, Mr. Lincoln, received a larger vote, but not sufficient to nominate him. On the third ballot Mr. Lincoln, of Illinois, received a majority of two and a half votes, and was then duly declared nominated.

The Convention then received the names of candidates for nomination for Vice-President. A number of candidates were presented on the first ballot, but finding it would be impossible to arrive at an early result, many of them withdrew. On the second ballot, Hon. Hannibal Hamlin, of Maine, was nominated as a candidate for the Vice-Presidency. His nomination was made unanimous.

Further Developments of Fraud.

NEW YORK, May 19.—Rumors are circulated that the over issue of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company's stock ranges from $300,000 to $400,000. The embarrassment of the Company seems to have seriously affected all kinds of stock. For the past few days, the Secretary whose duty it was to prepare the accounts of stock, has been missing. He was last seen on Tuesday. The investigation of the matter still continues.

LATE AND IMPORTANT FROM VERA CRUZ.

State of Affairs in the City—Uraga Victorious and about to march against the Capital—the English and French snubbed by the Liberals—the Clergy for Zuloaga—Departure of the French Minister.

The correspondent of the Delta writes from Vera Cruz, May 16th, 1860:

All apprehensions of Miramon again approaching the city during the fever season have ceased; Gen. Uraga is at Guanaxuata, with 12,000 men, well provisioned, and equipped with artillery, and large supplies of arms and ammunition. The city of Guadalajaho was expected to fall into the hands of the Liberals, at an early day. It is currently rumored that Uraga contemplates an early movement against the city of Mexico.

The Liberal Government has given the cold shoulder to the French and English scheme of intervention.

The latest accounts from the capital state that Miramon had left on the 10th for the interior, taking Zuloaga with him. The unfortunate ex-President had been arrested by a spy named Lagarde and brought to the Palace. Miramon doubtless took a grim satisfaction in finding his false friend in his power. Ever since Zuloaga resigned the Presidency to Miramon, because he couldn't help it, he has mourned that fatal exhibition of cowardly magnanimity.

The report brought to this place that he had displaced Miramon from the Presidency, and proclaimed himself, was not true as to the whole extent of the statement. He undoubtedly was engaged in a movement of some kind when he was nabbed by the little President, and made to walk Spanish along with the army.

The departure of M. Gabriac is hailed by the Liberalists with delight. They look on it as a favorable omen to their cause, since his intrigues against the Constitutional Government have been productive of much embarrassment. It is thought that his recall is an indication of a change of policy on the part of the French Emperor.

LETTER FROM BALTIMORE.

MR. EDITOR: The past week has been a lively one. On Monday our city presented quite an animated appearance, on the occasion of the visit of the Editorial corps. The public institutions of the city were thrown open to the fraternity, and they were accompanied in their perambulations by a committee of the City Council. On that day there was a very large parade of citizen soldiery, which gave to the whole an appearance of a very imposing character. In addition to the military, the Steam Fire Department turned out in full strength, and gave the excursionists a specimen of its ability. At night a complimentary entertainment was given them at the Eutaw House, by the business men of the city, and it was a signal triumph, of hospitality and good feeling. This great excursion of Editors, numbering nearly three hundred, from the western and southwestern States, arrived in Baltimore on Saturday, in a special train, over the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and remained in this city until the Tuesday following, when they left for Washington City. It is hoped that these controllers of the press will be able truthfully to chronicle the order, peace and good behaviour of the citizens of the Monumental City.

Hugh Lenox Boad, Esq., the brother of our Dr. Thomas E. Boad, of the Baltimore Christian Advocate, was a few months since appointed Judge of the Criminal Court of Baltimore, by Governor Hicks, in the place of Judge Stump, who had been removed for neglect of duty and bad habits. And so far Judge Bond has proved himself true to the task imposed upon him; he has very promptly tried cases and punished those guilty parties, who before had been permitted to go unpunished altogether, or very moderately fined.

A new Police force has been organized by the Police Commissioners, who were selected for that purpose by an act of our last Legislature; and on last Monday said police force entered on duty, under very rigid rules and regulations for their direction and government. With an efficient and well regulated police force, and a prompt and righteous Judge on the bench of the Criminal Court, there is reason to hope that we shall in the future have quiet and good order.

On Wednesday last there was a large gathering of delegates and others from almost every part of the country to attend the Constitutional Union Convention. Our principal hotels were well filled with strangers. The nomination of Messrs. Bell and Everett for the Presidency and Vice-Presidency, appears to be very satisfactory to the "Opposition" in Baltimore.

We had very heavy and disastrous freshets the last few days of the past week. Very considerable damage has been done both in the city and the surrounding country, from the overflow of a great quantity of water.

Our Churches all seem to be enjoying quietness at this time. The attention of our people is directed at present to the action of the General Conference now in session, in Buffalo. We know not what may be the result of the doings of that body, whether we shall longer remain as at present, or be morally constrained to unite with the M. E. Church, South.

It was our happy privilege yesterday to listen to a discourse from the Rev. Dr. J. C. Keener, of your city. Dr. Keener preached in the Charles-street M. E. Church. His subject was the Transfiguration; text, St. Luke 9th chap., verses xxvii, &c. His sermon was original, practical and thrilling, and was delivered in so natural and forcible a manner that it was impossible to fall in producing a happy effect.

M.

Baltimore, May 14, 1860.

LETTER FROM JACKSON, LA.

MR. EDITOR: On the 22nd of April we closed a meeting here, which had continued over three weeks, and which resulted in an accession to the Church of sixty-six whites, and ten or fifteen blacks. The students of the Centenary College were greatly blessed. The college halls, night after night, resounded with the praises of God, and were scenes of abundant outpourings of the Spirit. Religion became, among the students, the all-absorbing topic.

The Church, as she sees her old ministers who have been faithful in the truth, sinking into the tomb, prays that God will lay his hand on many of these young men to take their places. And verily her prayers shall be answered—are already being answered. About half the students in the College proper, and a great many in the lower department, are members of the Church, and a fair proportion feel called to the ministry.

T. B. W.

OUR ARKANSAS LADY CORRESPONDENT, with the coming of spring, has been inspired to write us once more. She says the Advocate has many friends in Arkansas, and is doing much good. She is pleased with the sketches of "LUTHA FONTELLE." She says she wishes she had some way of sending us a bouquet of pinks, and a fine mess of strawberries. We wish some of her sisters lived nearer the city.

EXAMINATION AND COMMENCEMENT AT SUMMERFIELD.—On this page, fifth column, may be found the programme of the Examination and Commencement of Centenary Institute, Summerfield, Ala., beginning June 19th. Drs. Pierce, Neely, Sasnet, and Harmon, a strong company, are the speakers. We are informed that Centenary Institute has prospered this year beyond precedent. The Church and country may well be proud of the success of this useful institution of learning.

MARRIAGES.

"It is not good for man to be alone."

At the residence of Major James H. Brigham, the bride's father, in Prairie Jefferson, Louisiana, by the Rev. J. L. Wright, on Thursday, the 3rd day of May, BENJAMIN K. FLASKEN, Esq., late of East Feliciana, to MISS JOSNIE E. BRIGHAM, of Morehouse Parish.

At the residence of Mr. M. Bowman, of Morehouse parish, on the 2nd of May, by the Rev. J. H. Stone, Mr. E. B. KENNEDY, formerly of Tenn., to Miss L. A. TUCKERVILLE, of Jefferson parish.

May 13th, at the residence of the bride's father, in Shelby county, Alabama, by Rev. N. H. Self, Mr. JAMES H. POWELL to Miss MANERVA C. ELLIOTT, all of Shelby co., Ala.

RECEIPTS, BY THE POST-OFFICE,

From May 15th to May 22d, 1860.

H—H D Berry, $10; J H Boult, $5; J J Bunch, $20; L R Bell, $1 25; G W Brown, $1 24.

D—D W Dilleny, $10; E Dunlap, $2.

H—T L Hart, $1 24.

L—J H Lockhart, $1; W E M Linfield, $5.

M—S M Tryde, $30; T P Maughum, $2; A H Mitchell, $17 85.

P—H M Pirtell, $2; A H Powers, $5.

R—A R Ramey, $1 50.

S—W H Shumaker, $1 24; J H Shelton, $3; J J Stewart, $2; C Strider, $5.

W—L M Wilson, $1 27; J A Watkins, $1.

COMMERCIAL.

MONDAY EVENING, May 21st, 1860.

We condense the following statement from the New Orleans Price Current of the 19th instant:—

The movement in our general market has exhibited some irregularity during the past week, and in Cotton we have noticed considerable fluctuation, though in that staple and in Tobacco, an increased amount of business has been done. In Sugar and Molasses the operations have been on a moderate scale, though the rates have tended generally in favor of buyers. In Western Produce we have noticed a dull and heavy market for Flour, while a good demand has prevailed for Corn at full prices, and most descriptions of provisions have been firm. Freights have shown more firmness, and Exchange has further advanced.

COTTON.—With respect to prices, we have to remark that they have been very full for clean Cotton, and even running lots of the medium grades, entirely free from dust, may be quoted at 10 to 10½ for Low-Middling, and 11¼ to 11½ and 11¾ for Middling to Strict Middling, while mixed or average lots find a very irregular market. The lower grades have been heavy and drooping, with a degree of irregularity in the prices which renders it impossible to give any figures to represent the state of the market. Our quotations below for Low Middling and Middling apply only to mixed and average lots, which mostly contain more or less dust.

The receipts at this port since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivels from Mobile, Florida and Texas,) are 2,034,358 bales, against 1,582,447 bales to same date last year, and the increase of the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 772,474 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same dates last year, there is an increase of 706,099 bales to Great Britain, and of 155,567 to France, while to other foreign ports there is a decrease of 82,793 bales.

New Orleans Classification:

Inferior	5 @ 6	Good Middling	11¾@12
Ordinary	8½@ 9¾	Middling Fair	12⅜@12¾
Good Ordinary	7¾@ 8¾	Fair	—@—
Low Middling	9⅜@10	Good Fair	—@—
Middling	10⅜@11	Good and Fine	—@—

SUGAR.—The sales of the week amount to 7000 hhds. We quote for Inferior and Refining 3 to 4¼; Common to Good Common 5 to 6¼; Fair to Fully Fair 6¾ to 7¾; Prime to Choice 7¾ to 8¼; Centrifugal and Clarified 9 to 9 cents per pound. The above quotations apply to round lots, but small orders of 5 hhds and under, could not be filled without paying a further advance of ¼ to ½ per pound.

MOLASSES.—Total receipts of the week 5,000 barrels. The prices obtained during the week were: Inferior to Fair, 30 to 37 cents per gallon; and Prime to Choice, 36 to 36 cents; half barrels, 35 to 40 cents per gallon.

FLOUR.—About 8,000 bbls have been sold during the past week, at from $5 75 to $6 55 for superfine, $6 75 to 7 00 for ordinary to good extra, and $6 75 to $7 50 per bbl. for choice extra brands.

GRAIN.—The receipts of Corn continue light. About 20,000 sacks have been sold at from $0 68 to 0 70 for ordinary, and $0 80 for good white. Oats have been in moderate request at 50c to 54c per bushel for good to prime St. Louis. Bran sells at $1 10 to $1 15 for ordinary to choice lots. Wheat sells at $1 15 per bushel for prime red.

BEEF.—We quote Prime Mess at $14 00 per bbl. for extra brands.

BACON.—Shoulders 7¾ to 8; Ribbed Sides 10 to 10¼; Clear Sides 11 to 11¼; Sugar-cured Hams 12 to 12½ cents per pound.

LARD.—We quote 10¾ to 11¼ for prime to choice prime, in tcs., and 11¼ to 11¾c. in kegs.

BUTTER.—Western generally selling at 12 to 14 cents per pound, according to quality; and Cheese 11 to 11½.

BAGGING AND BALE ROPE.—We quote Kentucky Bagging at 14½ to 15 cents per yard; India Bagging, 12½ to 13½; Bale Rope, hand spun, 7½ to 8c, and machine made, 8¼ to 9 cents per pound.

GUNNY BAGS.—Limited parcels sell at 10 cents for light and 10¼ to 11c. to heavy and extra heavy bags.

COFFEE.—We quote Ioir at 12½ to 13, and prime at 13½c per pound.

PORK.—The principal sales reported through the week were at $17 75 to $18 25 per bbl. for Mess.

NAVAL STORES.—A good demand for Spirits Turpentine mostly on speculation. Sales of some 600 bbls at 45 to 46. Latterly holders have been asking 47½ to 50c per gallon, the market closing at the outside rate. Of Rosin some 1000 bbls have sold at $1 40 to $1 50 for Common and No 2, and $1 75 to $2 per bbl of 280 pounds for Low No. 1. The finer qualities are scarce and in request. Tar dull and nominal. Stock of some 5000 bbls on hand.

LIVE-STOCK.—Beef Cattle—Western, 7 to 8½c. per lb. net; Texas—ordinary to fair $15 to 16, and choice $30 to 50 per head.

Hogs, selling at 6 to 6½c. per pound net.

Sheep—Selling at $4 00 to $5 50 per head.

Veal Cattle—Selling at $8 00 to $14 00 per head.

Milch Cows—at $10 to $85 per head.

SPECIAL NOTICES.

NOTICE.—Persons having business with the NEW ORLEANS DEPOSITORY, will please direct to KEENER & PARKER.

VICKSBURG DEPOSITORY.—All orders should be addressed thus—"Agent Book and Tract Depository, Vicksburg, Miss."

MOBILE DEPOSITORY, No. 11, Water-Street, Mobile, Alabama.

JOHN F. EARLY, Agent.

LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.

New Orleans District—Second Round of Quarterly Meeting.

May—New Orleans Circuit, 27th, at Carrollton.

June—Germana Missions, 3rd, at Piety-street; Baton Rouge, 9th and 10th; Plaquemine and B. Gros Tete, 10th and 17th, at Livonia; Morean Street, 24th.

July—Carondelet-street, 1st; Felicity-street, 8th; Jefferson City, 15th.

J. C. KEENER, P. E.

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

Grenville District—Third Round Quarterly Meetings.

May—Upper Deer Creek, 12th and 13th; Middle Deer Creek 19th and 20th; Lower Deer Creek, at Scole, 26th and 27th.

June—Greenville Colored Mission, 3rd; Duncan's Plantations 9th and 10th; Greenville, 16th and 17th; Bolivar, at Hogue Phalia, 23rd and 24th.

July—American Bend, 1st; Tallula, at Brunswick Landing, 7th and 8th; Sunflower, at Indian Bayou, 14th & 15th.

WM. B. HINES, P.E.

☞ MRS. WINSLOW, an experienced nurse and female physician, has a Soothing Syrup for children teething, which greatly facilitates the process of teething by softening the gums and reducing all inflammation—will allay all pain, and is sure to regulate the bowels. Depend upon it, mothers, it will give rest to yourselves, and relief and health to your infants. Perfectly safe in all cases. See advertisement in another column.

may16 1y.

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

From the Freeman's Journal, New York, Aug. 6, 1859.

SPALDING'S PREPARED GLUE is such a simple and cheap preparation that it is a pity any house should be without it.

CENTENARY INSTITUTE, SUMMERFIELD, ALABAMA. Annual Examination begins TUESDAY, June 19th, and closes FRIDAY following.

SUNDAY, June 24th—Commencement Sermon, by Dr. Lovick Pierce, of Columbus, Ga.

MONDAY, Forenoon—Exhibition by young men. Address before Literary Societies of the young men, by Rev. Dr. J. W. Harmon, of the Alabama Conference. Night—Exhibition by young men.

TUESDAY—Competition by the junior class of the Female Department. Address on Music, by Rev. Dr. Phil. P. Neely, of Alabama Conference. Night—Concert by junior portion of the Music Class.

WEDNESDAY—Commencement day: Regular Exercises; Address by Rev. Dr. W. J. Bassett, of Auburn. Night—Grand Concert by Professor J. E. Gieffer and class in Music.

J. S. MONTGOMERY, Pres. Female Dept.
D. C. B. CONNERLY, Pres. Male Dept.

INFORMATION WANTED.—MRS. ELIZA NEVIN, formerly Miss ELIZA GREEN, of Washington City, D.C., wishes to hear from her sister, believed now to be a resident of Mississippi, and who, when last heard from was Mrs. S. Hunter, since a widow, and again married—the name of her present husband not known. If living, she will greatly oblige by writing to Mrs. ELIZA NEVIN, Cambridge, Guernsey county, O.

ELIZA NEVIN.

☞ Newspapers in Mississippi will confer a great favor by giving this an insertion. 1t*

TEACHERS DESIRING SITUATIONS.—A GENTLEMAN, thirty-four years of age, member of the Methodist Church, and a Teacher by profession, having had an experience of over Twelve Years in conducting both Male and Female Schools, desires the superintendency of some Seminary, or High school or a Professorship in a College. Has taught both in the North and South, but principally in the latter. Would be willing to build up a School, of high order, in some flourishing town, or neighborhood, where sufficient inducements are afforded.

A young Lady, of superior qualifications, and eminent as a Teacher, also desires a situation. Reliable Testimonials and References will be given. Address, W. C. HUNTINGTON, A.M., Melrose, Nesogdoches county, Texas.

May 14, 1860. 6t

S. M. IRVIS. B. F. FLY.

IRVIS & FLY, Lawyers and Land Agents, Hallettsville, Lavaca county, Texas, will practice their profession in the counties of Lavaca, Gonzales, Dewitt, Victoria, Calhoun, Jackson, Colorado, Fayette, Caldwell, and Guadalupe, and in the Supreme Court at Galveston and Austin.

Special attention will be given to the collection of foreign debts in the Federal Courts held at Galveston and Austin, to the investigation and quieting of land titles, paying taxes, and buying and selling lands in any portion of Western Texas.

REFERENCES.

R. C. Estes, New York City.
Henderson, Terry and Co., New Orleans.
T. H. Mechlahan and Gilbert, Galveston, Texas.
D. Ayres, Galveston, Texas.
Rev. James C. Wilson, Texas Conference.
Rev. A. Davidson, Texas Conference.
Rev. Wm. H. Seal, Texas Conference.
Hon. O. R. Singleton, M. C. from Mississippi.
Rev. O. G Gillespie, Editor New Orleans Christian Advocate.

May 16, 1860.

A PERFECTLY RELIABLE SEWING MACHINE, for THIRTY-FIVE DOLLARS!

The WILCOX & GIBBS Sewing Machine has now become an established favorite with this community, large numbers having been sold, and to the perfect satisfaction of the purchasers, to whom we take pleasure in referring. We claim it to be the simplest, fastest, most thorough, and altogether the best adapted Machine for family and plantation use that there is now made, and shall take pleasure in examining any one of the fact if they will call and examine for themselves.

May 16, 1860. DAVIS BROTHERS, Agents, 58, Camp-street.

WANTED—A Situation to Teach either in a Family or School, by a lady of superior qualifications and ability, as an instructress. She can present ample Testimonials of her qualifications, and give good references. She is qualified to instruct in the various English studies, Latin, French, Music, &c. &c. She would accept a situation in the country, in Ala., La., Miss., or Tenn. Letters of application addressed to A. B. at this office, will meet with prompt attention.

☞ Would like a situation as Principal—has filled that capacity successfully. May 16 1860.

PIANO FOR SALE.—A very Fine Rosewood Piano, 7-octave, quite new, Lemuel Gilbert, maker, will be sold cheap for Cash. For particulars apply at this office, or to Messrs. McCrate & Langey, at the Masonic Hall, New Orleans.

THE MOBILE DEPOSITORY HAS THE FOLLOWING BOOKS FOR SALE:

Pioneer Preachers and People of Mississippi Valley (Milburn)	1 25
Confessions of a Converted Infidel (Bayley)	1 00
Marriage as it is and as it should be	0 75
The Mine Explored	0 75
Watts' Hymns and Moral Songs	0 60
Bradley's Sacred Melodies	1 25
Do. do. Leaves	1 25
The Palace of the Great King	1 25
Modern Philology	1 75
Mystery of Evil and God	1 00
Christ of History	0 75
Use and Abuse of Tobacco	0 60
Alcohol—its Place and Power	0 60
Harbaugh's Heavenly Home	1 10
Do. do. Recognition	0 75
Do. Heaven or Sainted Dead	0 75
Do. Poems (new)	0 75
Madame Guyon. 2 vols	2 00
Self Help	1 00

ALLINE ELWIN: A TALE OF ALABAMA.

BY FANNY SHELDON.

Preliminary Chapter.

"Around the old homestead the wintry winds sigh,
And lonely it stands on the wind-beaten hill;
I gaze on it now with a sorrowing eye,
For, crumbling to ruins, 'tis dear to me still."

It was a neat, pretty village where I once resided, where once had a home. Oh, what a wealth of melody, what thrilling rapture, breathes in this name to every heart Time may have changed it, rude hands may have marred its beauty, and neglect may have cast its withering blight over all that was dear to me there; but yet I would wish to look on it again; still would I revisit those scenes hallowed by the memory of childhood's guileless sports, by girlhood's bright imaginings, and woman's early hopes and loves, and griefs and silent sorrows. Wherever I go, my spirit turns to its far-off shrine, and very often in my dreams I stand again in that old home, on that dear spot, while the soft, gentle voices of mother, sister, brother, fall in low music on my hushed, enraptured soul.

"Hark! oh, in this word
What depths of feeling deep are stirred!"

In this village, and near this home, stood our dear old Academy, surrounded by giant oaks and tall hickories.—I fancy even now, as the past rises in misty loveliness before me, with its joyful memories and sweet associations, that I see our faithful Preceptress. Dear, kind old lady! Though loved and respected by all, yet many were the jests uttered at her expense by the rude and thoughtless; and many a smile wreathed the lips of mirth-loving ones as her quaint form made its appearance among us. With what eagerness and devotion we applied ourselves to our tasks, that her reputation might be sustained at our annual examination! These girls all, doubtless, cherish her memory yet, though the earth has long been laid between her and those to whom she devoted the energies of her mind and the labors of her life. Dear, unforgotten woman, the days of your life have already been told; but many a bright footprint have you left in this dark wild, to prove that your labor of love was not in vain, and, though many of those bright and beautiful beings, those gentle, dove-like spirits, that once crowded around you eager for instruction, "have folded up their pinions and in darkness gone to rest," still there are many warm hearts left to swell with gratitude in your memory. Under the shade of those old trees I have spent many hours of intense happiness, and many, too, filled with sad memories of days that were past, of friends that were gone, and of partings that would soon be realized by hearts that had mingled together for long months and even years in sweet association. We were soon to go forth into the world, soon to make our debut. That time was coming which had, to our imaginative anticipations, from childhood, appeared distant, dim, shadowy, and which our hearts had fancied must be an elysium free from wrong, sorrow, little dreaming of the cares of civilization in and scattering of, from the natural liability to [illegible] and extravagance, especially in the [illegible] from care and viously untried relations [illegible] monranful separatione and [illegible] friends, "some at the bridal and some at the tomb," which occur at this period in the life of the young. Some there were, joyous and glad, whose bright hopes and fond anticipations thus far had been all realized, and whose hearts were buoyant and happy; but there were others whose past had been cheerless, gloomy and friendless, and whose future promised but little else than a rayless night. If the destinies of these young girls just entering on life's—to them—unruffled sea, could have been read to them, how different their feelings, what contrasts there would have been; what material for sad hours and anxious fears; and what need of great faith and earnest trust in Him who promised His love to those who seek him early.

They were lingering in mournful groups for the last time in the school-room, or, with arms twined round each other, seated under those old trees; their ringing laugh was hushed; their young hearts were all too sad for mirth or amusement now; they were bound by an earnest, enduring friendship, which the alluring, visionary brightness of the future, or even the realization of their fondest dreams, would fail to weaken or dispel. There were several gathered under the spreading branches of a chest nut tree, and it is with this group that we are to become better acquainted. We now design to follow them through the many changes and varied circumstances through which it was their destiny to pass.

They resided in the same village, where their education had commenced, and where it was now "finished." From childhood they had been associated together, at home and at school; and though these were to remain when they had spent so many happy days, yet many of those who had shared their labors and had enjoyed their recreations, were soon to leave them for other scenes and far distant homes; and many a shadow dimmed their faces as they spoke of these partings; yet they were hopeful and happy. Ah! how kind that the veil of futurity cannot be raised, that it still hides their coming days. With what vivid interest and deep emotion they picture, in fancy, the scenes which are, as yet, hidden from them.

Farewells have been spoken, tears have fallen, gentle wishes have been breathed, and all have turned from those silent old rooms; but not from the gentle tones heard, and the loving associations formed there. Long will their hearts retain those sweet memories.

"Like a vase in which flowers have once been distilled,
You may break, you may ruin the vase if you will,
But the scent of the roses will hang round it still."

Children's Column.

THE CAMDEN CATASTROPHE.

We have not the heart, says the Charleston Courier, to offer comments and reflections on the memorable and melancholy calamity by which nearly the whole town of Camden, and many families in its vicinity, have been placed in mourning.

The Courier publishes the following letter:

CAMDEN, S. C., May 6.—We are in the midst of one of the most awful and mysterious providences in the annals of our people. A fishing party, of some fifty or sixty, started off yesterday morning full of life, and twenty-five of the number have met with a watery grave—all of them quite young, the eldest being about thirty or thirty-five. Such a sight I never witnessed. May God grant I may never see another such. I have not had an hour's sleep since Friday night, and am almost broken down with lutiguo and excitement. You will probably see the particulars in the papers, and I will only add that in one family there were four, and in another five victims. We took them to their respective homes last night, and oh, such wailing and screams I never heard. May the God of Justice be a God of Mercy, and pour the oil of comfort into their hearts.

I merely write to let you know that I am preserved and kept by the goodness and mercy of God. Oh, that it may be a warning to us all, and that we may lay it to heart. Oh, God, so teach us to number our days, that we may be prepared at any moment for the fell destroyer.

From the Sumter (S. C.) Watchman we extract the following particulars of this distressing affair:

On Saturday morning, the 5th inst., a most happy company, composed of young ladies and gentlemen, children and parents, left their homes in Camden for a day of pleasure and amusement at Boykin's Mill Pond, about ten miles from that place and upon the line of the railroad. These were joined by others from the neighborhood, forming a party of considerable size.

A flat-boat had been placed upon the pond for purposes of pleasure. The company embarked upon this boat, intending to pass over and around the pond. These consisted chiefly of young ladies, there being but a sufficient number of gentlemen, as was supposed, to manage the boat.

They had been out some time, and were near the centre of the pond, when the boat ran on a snag. This excited little or no fears, as it was supposed that a speedy extrication would be effected. Soon it was perceived that the great pressure of the boat upon the snag (in consequence of the number it contained) was puncturing its bottom, and that the water was making its way inside. Momentarily the danger became greater, and momentarily the excitement of those on board, as well as those on shore, became more intense. It seems dell verance would have come and that the boat would have probably been pushed off and run near enough to the shore for many if not all to escape, had it not been that those who stood at each end, (a white man and a negro) with their poles, laboring with all their power, shoved each in the same direction, thus mutually destroying the effects of their efforts. Soon she began to sink. When this was seen, and the fact that she could not be moved because so apparent, the scene became frightful indeed. The wildest excitement and fear seemed to seize every heart, and but few if any were sufficiently collected to enable them to employ their efforts for rescue advantageously. In a few moments she sank, when the scene may be better imagined than described. Piercing cries and shrieks, and calls for help, both from those on shore and those on the boat filled the air.

The boat seems to have committed them to the bosom of the water, huddled together, mainly, in a mass. The water is supposed to have been about twenty feet in depth. Thus thrown together, one clinging to the other, with that grasp which belongs only to those in a drowning condition, there was little opportunity for the males in the company to rescue the ladies, or even save themselves.

But a few (we have not been apprised of the exact number) were solved, of those upon the boat. One act of daring, manly and gallant rescue, demands especial notice. Mr. Jones, a fireman upon the Camden train, rushed to the spot, and by almost superhuman efforts, coupled with most cool and manly courage brought three of the drowning persons to the shore. We have not learned the names of these.

Mr Richburg, with noble devotion, lost his life attempting to save another. These, with two negroes, complete the melancholy list.

Efforts to secure the bodies of the unfortunate drowned were immediately employed. Some were taken from the water. Others could not be found. The flood-gates of the pond were soon hoisted, but the body of water was great, and could not be soon run off.

At half past three yesterday eight bodies were at the Methodist Church, where funeral ceremonies were being performed, in the presence of a large congregation. Almost every eye was moistened by the tear of sympathy or bereavement.

INDIAN CAPTIVES IN ARIZONA.

NARRATIVE OF MRS. LARSENA A. PAGE.

I had been married but little over two months and was living with my husband, Mr. J. H. Page, in a rude cabin at the mouth of the grand canon leading to the pinery of the Senate Rita Mountains. Our family consisted of myself and husband, a little Mexican girl eleven years of age, Misare Kirkland, and Mr. Wm. Randall, who was engaged with my husband in the lumber business.

On the morning of the 16th of March, after an early breakfast, my husband left us at camp for the purpose of putting some Mexicans to work, and Mr. Randall going out to kill a deer, Misare and myself were left quite alone.—As it was washing day, I had started to procure some water, when the little girl screamed and said the Apaches were on us. They came up in a run. Having a six-shooter (Colt's Revolver) in my hand, I turned to fire at them, but they were already so close that before I could pull the trigger they had rushed upon me and secured the weapon. They then proceeded to plunder, seizing on everything they could carry off—flour, blankets, clothing, etc.; and, not satisfied with this, they destroyed the tabaoe. We balloed and screamed for assistance, but the Indians struck me with their lances, and told us to keep quiet, or they would kill us. They packed up what they could take, and marched us off, hand-in-hand, in a hurried and barbarous manner. After proceeding thus far a quarter of a mile, they separated us, in order to prevent our talking together, the little girl being a little in advance of me.

We traveled thus all day over a very rocky and mountainous road, penetrating deeper and deeper into the mountain, and finally almost reaching the summit. Having suffered much from recent attacks of fever and ague, I was in a very enfeebled condition, totally inadequate for the fatigues of such a journey; and my inability to travel at the speed which they desired was the cause of my receiving the most brutal treatment at their hands.—They several times pointed a six-shooter at my head, as much as to say that my fate was already decided upon, and that I was to be made a victim of savage barbarity. The little girl, who was ahead, would occasionally fall back, crying, and tell me that the Indians [illegible] understood to [illegible] and uneducated persons came were going to identified with God's [illegible] little Spanish, yet enough was to awaken my fears and fill me with apprehension. I knew that my strength, which was rapidly failing, would admit of my proceeding but little further, and that unless my husband and other parties were following to rescue me, I must fall a victim as soon as my strength entirely failed.

We had proceeded thus about sixteen miles, as nearly as my limited ideas of distance will enable me to judge, and I now lagged behind so much that my savage captors grew impatient, and resolved to kill me. They stripped me of my clothing, including my shoes, and left me but a single garment. They then thrust their lances at me, inflicting eleven wounds in my body, threw me over a ledge of rocks, or precipice, some sixteen or eighteen feet high and hurled large stones after me, to make sure of their victim, and then left me, supposing that I must die, and too barbarous to end my misery by entirely extinguishing the spark of life. This occurred near sunset. I had nine lance wounds in my back and two in my arm, and my head was cut in several places by the rocks which were thrown after me, but most of the latter glanced without striking me.

I had alighted on a bank of snow, almost in a state of nudity, and in a senseless condition. In counting up my camping places before reaching home, I think I must have laid there in a state of unconsciousness for near three days. When I came to I took some snow and put it on my wounds. I recollected the direction traveled, and the position of the sun from camp at sunset, and with these guides started for home. My feet gave out the first day, and I was compelled to crawl the most of the distance.—Did not dare to go down to the foot of the mountain, for fear I could find no water, and was therefore compelled to keep inside, steep and rocky mountain. Sometimes, crawling up a steep ledge, laboring hard for half a day, I would lose my footing and slide down lower that the place from which I started. As I had no fire, and no clothing, I suffered very much from the cold.

I was at a point said to be six thousand feet above the sea, and only wonder that I did not freeze. I scratched holes in the sand at night, in which to sleep, and before I could travel was obliged every day for the sun to warm me up. I traveled what I could every day, and in the meantime had to subsist on grass alone. On the fourteenth day I reached a camp of some workmen in the pinery, which was untenanted. There I found a little food and some flour which had been spilled on the ground. The fire was not quite out, and I kindled it up; scraped up some of the flour and made me a little cake, the first food I had tasted since I left home. I was now near the workmen in the pinery, and within two miles from my home, but was too weak to go on. I could hear the men at work, and sometimes saw them, but could not attract their attention. At length I crawled along to the road over which they must pass, and was found there and carried home, after being out sixteen days.

On the third day of the session, Capt. R. S. Ewell, U. S. A., arrived in Tucson with the little girl who was taken captive by the Indians with Mrs. Page. Her release was effected by an exchange of prisoners. The entrance of the party into Tucson was signalled by the most lively demonstrations of joy. The church bells were rung, the populace assembled in the Plaza, and the little girl, now a heroine indeed, passed from one to another to receive their embraces, congratulations and welcomes. Such a scene of hugging and kissing! Capt. Ewell, too, was not forgotten, and blessings were showered on his head for the active part he had taken in the rescue.

It was doubtless a proud moment for him, to which he will look back with satisfaction as long as he lives. He had not returned as a victorious chieftain with the laurels of victory encircling his brow, but he had restored peace and happiness to a despairing family, had snatched an humble captive from the hands of savages who subsist on grass or roots, and who offered her the head of a rat as a choice morsel of food! It was but one of the many noble acts of an eventful career in which he had won the hearts of the people. The church was thrown open, and the devout populace with the child at their head knelt before the altar, and poured forth their prayers of thanksgiving and gratitude.

REMARKABLE CASE.

The adage that "truth is stranger than fiction" has been illustrated by a remarkable circumstance, which has occured within the last week, in the neighborhood of Nettlebed, Oxfordshire, and excited very great interest in that part of the country. It was on the afternoon of Thursday, the 19th inst., that Mr. Heaman, living at Huntercomb Farm, Nuffield, was walking homewards, when he came up with two respectable persons, who remarked that they were going into the wood, near Ipsden, to see an old Roman well there. As this is a spot which has attracted the notice of many lovers of antiquarin researches, Mr. Hensman said he would accompany them. The well, which has been dry for years, was reached, and the party began examining the material of the top part. One of them stooped down to look into it, with the view of ascertaining whether he could see the bottom. By general repute the well is considered to be of the depth of 100 feet, and a stone was thrown down, thinking it would give the party some idea as to the accuracy of the rumour on this point. As soon as it reached the bottom a noise was heard, which one of them asserted was the cry of a child. The others ridiculed the notion of a living creature being there; but further listening, with carefulness, convinced them of their friend's statement. Mr. Heaman then went to Parrot's farm, a short distance off, and stated that he wanted a person to go down the well, as there was evidently a child there, and alive. A boy was asked if he would go, and he (Mr. Hensman) said he would give him a half-sovereign; others, also anxious that the well should be searched, offered smaller amounts, and in a little time a liberal sum was realized to give as a reward to the boy. The sanction of the mother of the boy having been obtained, he was secured by strong ropes, but, before descending, the precaution was adopted of lowering a candle to ascertain if there was any foul air in the well. The candle continued to burn, and the state of the well in that respect being satisfactory the boy was let down. When he reached the bottom he called out to those at the top that there was a child there, and alive. He was asked if he could manage to hold it, and he called out "Yes." Having secured the child in his arms, the party at the top began pulling him up gradually, and in a few minutes he arrived at the opening of the well with a fine female infant of about 15 months old. It was alive, but in a state of exhaustion from having been without food for two or three days. There was a considerable crowd collected by the time of the child being brought up out of the well, and on some of the cottagers looking at it they recognized it as belonging to a young woman who was seen going in the direction of the wood two days previously, and had since been missing from the neighborhood. Mr. Heusman took the child to Parrot's farm, where the mistress of the house took charge of it and gave it milk and other nourishment. It was very ravenous for food, but it was given with caution. On being examined no injury appeared on the body, but there was a little bruise and scratch on the upper part of the left cheek. This remarkable case has excited great sensation in the locality and much curiosity to see the child which has had such a narrow escape from death. As it was but little injured, it is supposed that the inhuman mother contrived, by means of a long rope, to lower it to the bottom of the well, and then left it to die of starvation. The police have been active in their inquiries to trace the mother, and it is expected that she will soon be in custody. One careful inquiry it was ascertained beyond all doubt that the child had been in the well part of two days and one night. Under careful treatment the child is doing well, and will no doubt ever be regarded with interest, and as the wonder of Ipsden Wood. When the story was first related at Wallington on Friday last scarcely one would believe it, but Mr. Hensman, being in the town, he was sought out by several respectable people, and he assured them of its truthfulness, and that he was the person who took the child from the boy at top of the well.

THE OLDEST TREE IN THE WORLD.—An extraordinary tree is stated by Sir J. Emerson to exist in the island of Ceylon. It is known as the "Bo-tree" of Amar-sjapoora, and is, in all probability, the oldest historical tree in the world. It was planted 288 years before Christ, and hence it is now 2147 years old. Ages varying from 1000 to 500 years have been assigned to the baobabs of Senegal, eucalyptus of Tasmania, the dragon-tree of Grotavo, and the chesnut of Mount Etna. But all these estimates are matters of conjecture, and such calculations, however ingenious, must be purely inferential; whereas the age of the Bo-tree is matter of record; its conservancy has been an object of solicitude to successive dynasties, and the story of its vicissitudes has been preserved in a series of continuous chronicles among the most authentic that have been handed down by mankind. Compared with it, the Oak of Ellersllo is but a sapling, and the Conqueror's Oak, in Windsor Forest, barely numbers half its years. The yew-trees of Fountains Abbey are believed to have flourished there twelve hundred years ago; the olives in the Garden of Gethsemane were full grown when the Saracens were expelled from Jerusalem; and the cypress of Soma, in Lombardy, is said to have been a tree in the time of Julius Cæsar; yet the Bo-tree is older than the oldest of these by a century, and would almost seem to verify the prophecy pronounced when it was planted, that it would "flourish and be green for ever."

The case of Eugene Aram was a real incident, and was not invented either by Bulwer or Hood. He was born in 1704, and in August, 1759, after a trial at York, he was proved guilty of the murder of a shoemaker named Clark, at Knaresborough, and was hung three days after the trial. He was a scholar of unusual accomplishments, and was engaged in preparing a comparative lexicon of the English, Latin, Greek, Hebrew, and Celtic languages when he was arrested on the charge of murder. Passages from the preface of this lexicon are said to be still extant. He defended himself at his trial with great ingenuity, and after his condemnation confessed his guilt, but declared that he was instigated by jealousy of Clark, whom he suspected to have made love to his wife. The night before his execution he tried to commit suicide, but he was discovered and the deed prevented. Eugene Aram left a wife and six children. Both Bulwer and Hood have invested his fate with a romantic interest. Walter Scott, to whom it was dedicated in December, 1831, praised Bulwer's novel highly; and Hood's ballad is permanent in English literature.

[illegible] the custom of reporting missionary incidents varies with the different [illegible]

HOW THE THISTLE SAVED SCOTLAND.—The following is related as the origin of the use of the thistle as the national emblem of Scotland:

When the Danes invaded Scotland, they availed themselves of the pitch darkness of night to attack the Scottish forces unawares. In approaching the Scottish forces unobserved, and marching barefooted to prevent their tramp being heard, one of the Danes trod upon a large prickly thistle, and the sharp cry of pain which he instinctively uttered, suddenly apprised the Scots of their danger, who immediately ran to their arms, and defeated the foe with great slaughter. The thistle was thenceforward adopted as the national insignia of Scotland.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

BEXAR LODGE, No. 230 OF MASONS.

Tribute of Respect.

It has pleased the all-wise Creator to remove from us, and from his sphere of usefulness on earth, our beloved brother, citizen and friend, BENJAMIN R. McDOUGLE, who was born January 27th, 1824, and departed this life April 18th, 1860. He was an exemplary and faithful husband and father; a pious and consistent Christian, a devoted member of the Church, a true member of the mystic fraternity, an exemplary and benevolent citizen. Therefore be it resolved:

1st. That while we would bow in humble submission to the will of the supreme ruler of the Universe, yet we sincerely deplore the death of our beloved Brother.

2d. That in his death his family has lost a faithful, pious and exemplary husband and father; the Church a pious, faithful and consistent Christian member; the mystic fraternity, a true confidential and benevolent member; the community an exemplary and faithful citizen and benefactor.

3d. That while we mourn his loss, we sorrow not as those who have no hope.

4th. That we deeply sympathise with the disconsolate family, and commend them to the all-wise Ruler of the Universe, who has promised to be a husband to the widow and father to the orphan.

S. G. HARRAL,
W. T. BISHOP, } Committee.
J. T. COWDEN,

W. T. BISHOP, Secretary.

JOHN WATSON was born in South Carolina August 22d, 1797. At the age of 14 he came to this State with his parents. He embraced religion about ten years ago, at Pleasant Valley, during a protracted meeting held there by brother Erkinbrack, and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church; he lived and died a faithful and consistent member of the same. Bro. W. died of a congestive chill, at his residence near Brookhaven, Lawrence county, Miss., April 26th, 1860. The Sunday before his death he occupied his usual seat in church, but before another Sabbath dawned, he was taken to the Church triumphant, in Emanuel's land, "where sickness and sorrow, pain and death are felt and feared no more." To his heart-stricken widow, his many sorrowing children, his numerous relatives and friends, we offer our sympathy, and would say,—serve the God whom he served and ere long you may greet him in the sun-bright clime above.

M. J. WHITWORTH

Brookhaven, Miss., May 4th.

MARY W. LAWSON, wife of Daniel Brown, was born in this State, January 27th, 1812. Joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1832. Was married to Daniel Brown January 15th, 1835. Died April 6th, 1860. Sister B. was a professor of that religion which makes glad the heart, lights up life's pathway, inspires a glorious hope of entering into "rest," gilds the dark scenes, and sheds a brighter lustre over the sunshine of life's pilgrimage. Sister B. was suddenly and unexpectedly called home without warning, but if to live in the daily discharge of all the Christian virtues is evidence of a preparation for the better world, then we justly say, it was faithful to the end, to meet our departed friend and sister in "that bright world above, where parting is no more."

B. H. BAIRD.

Conshatta Chute, La., April 29th.

Sister ELIZA W. GALLOWAY, consort of Rev. A. D. Galloway, and daughter of Cornelius and Frances Dabney, was born in North Carolina Nov. 4th, 1793, and died near Brackville, Drew county, Ark., 2nd of March, 1866. In Monroe parish, La., she was married to Dr. A. D. Galloway in 1809. In 1833 she removed to Chicot Co., Ark. She joined the Methodist Church at a camp-meeting held on Bayou Bartholomew, and found peace in God. Up to the day of her death she lived a faithful and devoted member of the Church. Her house was the preacher's home when houses were few and far between.—When the summons came, her house was in order.

L. P. GREEN.

MARTHA ELENOR SIMS, wife of B. H. Sims, daughter of Nicholas and Elizabeth Hanss, was born in Tuskaloosa county, Alabama, died 22nd April, 1860, in Oktibbeha county, Miss., aged 24 years and 11 months, of consumption. She was a child of much affliction, but learned to be patient, and to resign all into the hands of God. She said she was confident that as soon as she died she would go to heaven, that death would be a sweet messenger to her. She was never heard to complain. She here testimony that there was a sufficiency in God's grace to make the soul rise superior to all pain. All was peace in her soul. She professed religion in early life, joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, and has been a faithful, acceptable member.

J. W. FOWLER.

MRS. ANGELINE E. LIGON, wife of R. H. Ligon, Esq., aged thirty-four years, died in Summit, Mississippi, on the 14th March, 1860. She was born in Pike county, Miss., 12th of March, 1826, was the daughter of Jeremiah Bearden. She was married on the 11th Feb., 1841; she joined the M. E. Church in the Spring of 1846, and was a shining light in the church up to the time of her death; all who had the pleasure of her acquaintance loved her; she had not an enemy dead or living; kind, dignified, and generous towards all. She has left her companion and eight little children to mourn her loss. What a happy sight to see her little ones gather around her knees at night to offer up their prayers to the giver of all good. She died a Christian, and has gone home to wait for her, dear ones who are left behind.

L.

☞ Nashville Christian Advocate please copy.

MRS. F. D. HIGHTOWER, wife of Mr. J. R. Hightower, was born in Putnam county, Ga., in 1817, embraced religion and joined the M. E. Church in early life; was married to Mr. J. R. Hightower, July 17, 1834, and removed to Greenville, Butler county, Ala., 1851, and died April 20, 1860, in great peace. She was a most exemplary Christian, and to know her was to love her. She was heard to say "My trust is still in God."

H. J. HUNTER.

☞ Southern Christian Advocate please copy.

MRS. CHARITY MAHEN, died at the residence of her son, Thomas Mahen, in Yazoo county, Miss., Feb. 9, 1860, in the eighty-first year of her age. She was born in Orange county, N. C., 1779. In 1800 she was married to William Mahen, and moved to Rutherford county, Tennessee, where she professed religion at a Camp meeting, and joined the Methodist Church, at the age of thirty years; she then removed to Mississippi, where she spent the remainder of her days. Sister Mahen had combined in her character all the virtues of her sex:

"None knew her but to love,
None named her but to praise."

She lived the life of the righteous, and her last end was as his.

J. H. SHELTON.

MR. GEO. WINFIELD, died of consumption 25th April, near Tunnpaho, La. He was a native of Virginia, but for the past twenty years has been a citizen of New Orleans. And although he had lived an irreligious life he made a full surrender of his heart to God and found peace in believing before he died. He was in his 40th year, and has left a devoted wife and child and other relatives to mourn.

HENRY D. BERRY.

EDUCATIONAL.

DOLBEAR'S COMMERCIAL COLLEGE, OF THE City of New Orleans, founded in 1852—Chartered by the Legislature of Louisiana, with Agricultural and Mechanical Departments—Capital Stock, $210,000—in the new and spacious edifice known as STORY BUILDING south east corner of Camp and Common streets, entrance on both streets, open day and evening. Faculty:—

RUFUS DOLBEAR, PRESIDENT.
MATHEMATICAL DEPARTMENT.
GRO. E. BRACKETT, Professor.
BOOK-KEEPING DEPARTMENT.
RUFUS DOLBEAR, Lecturer.
J. W. BLACKMAN, Professor.
ENGLISH DEPARTMENT.
HON. J. N. CARRIGAN, A.M., late Sup't. Education, La; Professor and Lecturer on Commercial Law, etc
and M. R. McSWEENEY, Professor.
FRENCH DEPARTMENT.
MARC. RUIZ, Professor.
DEPARTMENT FOR PENMANSHIP.
RUFUS DOLBEAR, Lecturer.
J. B. GAUFFIN, Professor.
SPANISH DEPARTMENT.
MANUEL MARINO, Professor.
GERMAN DEPARTMENT.
GEO. GESSNER, Professor.
LATIN AND GREEK DEPARTMENT.
J. M. MARINO and G. GESSNER, Professors.
ITALIAN DEPARTMENT.
RHETORIC, LOGIC, AND ELOCUTION.

This is the only chartered Commercial College in the South-West, and the oldest in the United States, and has stood for
FOR MORE THAN A QUARTER OF A CENTURY
On its own merits alone.

Persons from 12 to 60 years of age, can attend to any branch they may wish.

Board can be had with the Professor, or other good families speaking English, French, Spanish or German, from $5 to $6 per week.

Catalogues with terms, opinions of the press and leading men of the nation, etc., sent to all who desire them.

N.B.—To prevent mistakes or impositions, Students intended for this College should bring this advertisement as special directions, as there are every winter temporary rooms open for a few months, all of course making wonderful pretenses and promises, and posting flaming placards to enlighten the people of New Orleans and of the South! When three or more form Clubs and enter at the same time, ten per cent will be deducted from tuition.

☞ Citizens and strangers are invited to visit.

feb1 1y RUFUS COLBEAR, President.

SOULE'S COMMERCIAL COLLEGE, CORNER OF Camp and Common streets, entrance No. 86 Common street,—established in 1856,—open day and evening the entire year.

A full course of instruction in this institution embraces Double Entry Book-keeping, Commercial Calculation and Commercial Law, and Penmanship. Gentlemen can enter for the full course, or any branch they desire, and at any time, as there is no class system, no copying from books, and no memorizing of arbitrary rules.

Merchants, Book keepers, and young gentlemen wishing instruction, are respectfully requested to call and examine our practical forms and peculiar manner of teaching.

For catalogues containing full information, and Balance-sheet Circulars, the most magnificent work of the kind ever executed in the United States, address, GEO. SOULE, New Orleans.

FELICIANA FEMALE INSTITUTE, JACKSON, LA. The exercises of the second term of the scholastic year will commence on the first of March. Pupils entered at any time, and charged from the time of entrance.

Extensive grounds and houses have been added to the premises.

A good library, a new and complete apparatus, a full and competent corps of teachers, comfortable and newly-furnished apartments, afford the best facilities for a thorough education.

BOARD OF TRUSTEES:

WM. H. WATKINS, D.D., President.
J. N. EVANS, Secretary.
Prof. W. H. N. MAGRUDER, WM. LIPSCOMB,
JOHN W. BURGESS, Esq., Col. S. M. BRYAN,
F. V. D. HUGHAN, Esq., Rev. A. G. [illegible]
Rev. [illegible] MILLER
Rev. JOHN C. MILLER, JOHN MCKOWEN, Esq
Hon. JOHN MCVEA.
THOS. W. BROWN, Principal.

6m

PORT GIBSON COLLEGIATE ACADEMY, FOR Young Ladies, resumed its Exercises on the first Monday in October. A well chosen Faculty will spare no pains or care to make this Institution a pleasant and profitable place for young Lady students.

The buildings are large, well-ventilated, and well furnished. The grounds ample and beautiful.

For information and Circulars, apply to,
Rev. B. JONES, Port Gibson, Miss.

PROFESSIONAL.

JAMES J. HUTCHINSON, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, Livingston, Alabama., will Practice in Sumter and the adjoining counties. [m24]

J. E. ELAM, ATTORNEY - AT - LAW, BATON Rouge.
REFERENCES—Henderson & Gaines and Chinn & Bolton, New Orleans; W. S. Pike and A. Matta..... Baton Rouge.

FUQUA & KILBOURNE, ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW, Clinton, Louisiana, practice in the Parishes of East and West feliciana, and east Baton Rouge.
References—Payne & Harrison, Byrne, Vance & Co., W. and C. Latchford and Co., Broadwell & Haynes, and Prichard & Flower, New Orleans. mar 7-1y

W. P. WINANS. J. T. HEATH.
WINANS & HEATH, ATTORNEYS AND COUNsellors at Law, Shreveport, La., office—Market street.
Will practice in the courts of Caddo, De Soto, Bossier, Claiborne, and Bienville.

G. SPENCER MAYO, ATTORNEY - AT - LAW, Harrisonburg, La., will practice in the Courts of Catahoula, Concordia, Caldwell and Franklin Parishes.

COMMISSION MERCHANTS.

W. A. BROADWELL. A. F. HAYNES.
BROADWELL & HAYNES, COMMISSION MERchants (formerly Broadwell & Payne), No 40 Union street, N O.
Having retired from business, I take great pleasure in soliciting for my former Partners, BROADWELL & HAYNES, the patronage and confidence of my friends, believing their experience, capacity and means, will merit its continuance, and enable them to give general satisfaction. [jel] M. U. PAYNE.

W. R. STUART, New Orleans. DR O. A. JAMES, Madison Parish, La.
STUART & JAMES, NO. 42 UNION STREET, New Orleans, have associated themselves together for the purpose of conducting a COTTON FACTORAGE & GENERAL COMMISSION BUSINESS; are prepared to make the usual Advances to planters, in the way of supplies, etc., and respectfully solicit patronage

A. H. MAY & CO., COTTON FACTORS AND General Commission Merchants, No 94 Gravier street, New Orleans. au2 1y

J. U. PAYNE, G. W. RUTHERFORD. J. P. HARRISON, WM. B. HAMMOND
PAYNE & HARRISON, COMMISSION MERCHANTS No. 61 Union street, New Orleans. dec7-1y

S. L. WALKER, New Orleans. HON. O. HUTCHINSON Caddo Parish, La.
WALKER & HUTCHINSON, COTTON FACTORS and Commission Merchants, No. 37 Carondelet street, New Orleans. je28

LEONARD FASH. P. S. LIPSCOMB.
LEONARD FASH & CO COMMISSION MERchants, and Dealers in Western Produce, 61 Magazine street, New Orleans. Oct 24.

LANE, SALTER & CO., SUCCESSORS TO LANE, MAYFIELD & Co., Cotton and Sugar Factors and General Commission Merchants, No. 72 St. Charles street, New Orleans. jy6 1y

JOHN F. WYCHE & CO., COTTON FACTORS and Commission Merchants, No 14 Common street, New Orleans.

BIBLE AND TESTAMENTS.—The Largest and most Varied Supply, South. Prices from 30 Cents each to $27 50 each.
Rich Family Bibles in costly bindings, also smaller Bibles in Velvet and fancy bindings.
London, Oxford and Cambridge Bibles; Eyre and Spottiswoodes, Bagsters, on hand, and ordered.
Hebrew, Greek, Latin, Syriac, and Arabic Scriptures for Ministers and Students.
For Sunday Schools in Louisiana and Southern Mississippi; Testaments at reduced prices, and Pocket Testaments at half price.
Address,—Agent, S. W. Bible Society, Bible House, 163 Camp-street, New Orleans.

BENTHUYSEN, LEWIS & CO., 110 CANAL-Street (adjacent to the CLAY Statue), would call attention to their large Stock of PLANTATION,
HOUSEKEEPING,
AND FANCY DRY GOODS,
Comprising all qualities and descriptions, in any quantity to suit Purchasers, at
VERY LOW PRICES.
An examination of our Stock is requested.
Country Orders promptly filled.
BENTHUYSEN, LEWIS & Co.,
110 Canal street.
April 24, 1860. ty

SOUTHERN CLOTHING ESTABLISHMENT.—20, 28 and 30 St. Charles street, corner of Common. Clothing and Furnishing Goods at Wholesale and Retail.
Just received, per late steamers, one of the largest and most magnificent Stocks of FASHIONABLE SPRING AND SUMMER CLOTHING ever brought to the South, which, for Style, Material, Workmanship and Cheapness, is not surpassed. Goods are divided into Three Departments, but all under one general view:
Store No. 26 St. Charles street, for Boys' Clothing;
Store No. 28 St. Charles street, for Men's Clothing;
Store No. 30 St. Charles street, for Furnishing Goods and Shirts.
L. W. LYONS,
Nos 26, 28 and 30 St. Charles street, corner Common st.
Salesmen speak French, Spanish and English. [oc12

BOYS' CLOTHING EMPORIUM, 26 St. Charles-st. between Canal and Common.
This store is exclusively for YOUTHS', BOYS' AND CHILDREN'S CLOTHING; SHIRTS AND FURNISHING GOODS, WHOLESALE AND RETAIL.
Just opened a large and excellent stock of SPRING and SUMMER DRESS and SCHOOL CLOTHING, embracing every style and quality, all of which will be sold at VERY REASONABLE PRICES.
☞ Salesmen speak French, Spanish and English.
L. W. LYONS,
oc12 Nos 26, 28 and 30 St. Charles street, corner Common st.

SHIRTS! SHIRTS!! SHIRTS!!!—Just received, by late steamers, a large assortment of SHIRTS OF THE LATEST FASHION, of all the various qualities and sizes, White and Colored, Manufactured EXPRESSLY FOR THE NEW ORLEANS CITY TRADE, to fit Men, Youths, Boys and Children.
L. W. LYONS,
oc12 Nos. 26, 28 and 30 St. Charles street, corner Common st.

TRUNKS, TRAVELING-BAGS AND VALISES, UMBRELLAS, and WATER-PROOF CLOTHING of the best styles and qualities, made to order and warranted.
L. W. LYONS,
oc12 Nos. 26, 28 and 30 St. Charles street, corner Common st.

TO MERCHANTS AND PLANTERS.—MANUFACturers' Commission House. Large stock of BOOTS, SHOES and HATS. Call and examine the stock, at No. 38 Magazine street opposite the Arcade, New Orleans.
nov 14 R. W. RAYNE.

R. A. STEWARTS NEW PROCESS FOR DEFIcating and Clarifying Cane Juice, Syrup, Molasses, and other Saccharine matter.
Planters wishing to use this Process can obtain the right to do so by calling on or addressing STUART & JAMES, No 42 Union St., New Orleans, where samples of the Sugar may be seen. [au31]
R. A. STEWART.

MISCELLANEOUS.

NO. 3 CAMP STREET. [illegible]

SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINES—FOR PLANTAtion, Family, and Manufacturers' use.—Prices, $65, $80, $100, $125.

These Machines have no equal; they possess all the latest improvements, the last being November 10th, 1859. Their mechanism is so simple and durable that a child can easily understand and operate them. They work with two threads, using Howe's patent shuttle, making the lock stitch, and presenting the same stitch on both sides of the fabric sewn.—They will run, stitch, hem, feil, bind and gather.

☞ ALL MACHINES WARRANTED. ☜

Every variety of thread, silk, needles, and other fixtures for sale.
Principal Southern Salesroom, No. 3 Camp st.
E. L. NIMMO, Agent.

CUDDY, BROWN & CO.—HAVING CLOSED THE affairs of MILES OWEN & CO., the great majority of my business connections in future in this city will be with Messrs. Cuddy, Brown & Co., 38 Camp street.
MILES OWEN.

D. J. WASSON, CARPENTER AND BUILDER.—Also, Sash, Blinds, Doors, Window-frames, Lumber, &c., on hand to suit purchasers. Orders promptly attended to.
Box 388 Mechanics' Exchange, 19 St. Charles st. Shop, 355 and 357 Rampart st., First District, New Orleans. mar20-1y

ROB'T H. READ. F. BRAUMONT, JR.
ROBT H. READ & CO., DEALERS IN DRUGS, MEdicines and Chemicals, Oils, Perfumery, Instruments, Patent Medicines, Toilet Articles, Letter paper, Ink, Pens, etc., No. 108 CANAL STREET, near Royal, New Orleans.
☞ Special attention given to

NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY A COMMITTEE OF MINISTERS FOR THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH---C. C. GILLESPIE, EDITOR.

VOLUME X.—NUMBER 22.
WHOLE NUMBER 485.

NEW ORLEANS, WEDNESDAY, MAY 30, 1860.

$2 00 A YEAR, IN ADVANCE
OFFICE—118 CAMP ST.

A FEW LEAVES FROM OUR "HOUSEHOLD WORDS."

BY LUTHA FONTELLE.

We found all the family in the south parlor, which Margaret had named Reunion, because we always assembled there before entering the dining room. The heavy curtains draped the windows with their rich folds, and a bright wood fire gave an air of comfort and cheerfulness to the room which the lamp filled with a clear, but not dazzling light. It gave a mellow tint, like that of age, to the choice landscapes and exquisite heads by the best native artists, that welcomed me from their familiar places. Grand-pa sat near the door, erect as ever, in his own arm-chair, with his marked features indicative of an indomitable will and powerful intellect. His head was crowned with the grey dignity of age that lay in heavy masses above his wide brow. His robust frame had battled with the storms of life for seventy-five years, and appeared still ready to serve his active mind. As we came in, a smile of rare sweetness lit up his whole face, and when he took my hand in passing, there seemed a well of tenderness in his falcon eyes. He was one who ruled his household well, not with a rod of iron, but with a firm hand and wise kindness. Grand-ma was not far off, and a charming old lady she was. True she was only six years younger than her husband, and had no longer the tithe, slender figure of her early wifehood; but the delicately chiselled features had lost nothing by the fulness that preserved their soft coloring unmarred by timely wrinkles. Above this face, so beautiful in its calm dignity, and so beloved, on which every Christian grace had left its impress, the fine hair lay in smooth bands scarcely less white than the snowy cap which shaded them. Had she condescended to wear false hair she might have cheated time out of fifteen years at least, but we could not then have approached her with such reverence. On the other side of the room was aunt Eleanor, a lovely, gentle woman, of a winning presence and rare excellence of character. I cannot better describe her than in the words of one of the sages of antiquity who lived about a thousand years before the Christian era: "Her husband is known in the gates when he sits among the elders of the land. Strength and honor are her clothing, and she shall rejoice in time to come. She opens her mouth with wisdom, and in her tongue is the law of kindness. She stretches out her hand to the poor, yea, she reaches forth her hands to the needy. She looks well to the ways of her household, and eats not the bread of idleness. Her children rise up and call her blessed, her husband also, and he praises her. She shall do him good and not evil all the days of her life. Many daughters have done virtuously, but thou excellest them all. Favor is deceitful, and beauty is vain, but a woman that fears the Lord she shall be praised." She was conversing in a low voice with Miss Harper, the new governess. The latter seemed to listen to aunt Margaret's kind, cheerful tones, and to note the warm interest expressed in her face and manner, like one who had been long a stranger to human kindness, and drank now with a delicious thrill of grateful love, of the full, clear fountain whose waters were gushing up and overflowing around her. I was glad to see that she already wore a home-look, and had found it impossible not to feel that she was regarded as "one of us." Cousin Edith who had been out "on household cares intent," was coming in from the hall with a little basket of keys in her hand. She said something brightly to Miss Harper, which made her face glow with quick sympathy, and then hastened to meet us.

All this, which has taken me so long to relate, was daguerreotyped on our hearts in a moment. Our well-bred escort fell back when near the door, to allow us to precede them, and as they did so, aunt Grace laid her finger on her lip, and they stood like statues. The door was open, and as soon as our eyes became accustomed to the light, they wandered over the room and rested lovingly upon the familiar objects. As we passed in she removed the embargo, and they gathered around the different groups and told their story with little peals of laughter, their merry voices in every sweet key, now heard alone, now mingling in their eager recital, like the glad notes of silver bells. "We've found Rosalie! Here she is! But such a time as we have had looking for her!"

"How is that, my child?" said Grand-ma, as I sat down on an ottoman at her feet.

"Let them tell, if you please," I replied, glancing at their earnest faces.

"Well, Lucy, you may begin."

Lucy drew up her gracefully poised head and neat little figure with the would-be-womanly air of sago thirteen, and said modestly, "As we were so restless in our joy at aunt Grace's return, and eagerness to have Rosalie all to ourselves again, Miss Harpor kindly promised to read us a new story while they were resting after their weary days of travel."

"And very good it was of her," said Grand-ma, glancing kindly at Miss Harper, as we all did. She looked up with a very sweet smile that said as plainly as words could do, "It was a very little thing that gave me great pleasure," and the smile drew her nearer to us.

"And while we were waiting for her she went out a-lons," said cousin Charles, complainingly; half for himself, and half for my solitary condition.

"Pardon me, Charles, I thought you were engaged with your lessons."

"I think cothen Rothe did'nt have rotheth enoagh in her room, though we did fill ever tho many vatheth with the thweeteth flowerth!" lisped three year old Belle from Uncle John's knee.

"And so our Rose took herself off to the roses for company; that is your wise conviction, eh, Belle!" laughed uncle John.

"O, it was so funny!" said Emma, shaking her curls. "We waited and waited, the hours never seemed so long."

"Confess, now Em," cried her brother Will, "did you think of Rosalie once while listening to that capital story."

"Indeed I did. I wished every minute she could hear it. We waited till almost sundown, and then, fearing she might sleep too long and get a headache, we ran up to her room. But she was'nt there, or any where in the house."

"It was a pretty sight," said Grand-pa, "to see them flying through the halls and over the galleries, putting their bright heads into every door, and crying, 'Rosalie, is Rosalie here? Where is Rosalie?' It gave me a new lease of life, having Grace beside me, and knowing the lost fawn would soon be hunted down."

"Then we went to mammy's house," continued Lucy; to our inquiries, she replied, "An is him Miss Rose yer wants? Her was here and read from the Holy Book as her master. Bless her sweet face! 'Pears to mo her mighty glad to see her old mammy agin. I do so! Her be one posy himself, an' I reckon her done gone to look arter her kin.'"

"Did'at wo tell them so, Puss?" cried uncle John, looking triumphantly into Belle's blue eyes.

"We did that!" laughed she, archly, as if she comprehended the whole affair."

"But where did you find her?" asked aunt Margaret.

"Why, don't you think"—began little Jamie.

"No," said his mother, smiling.

"Well, would you believe, then, mamma, that after we had ran races all over the garden, we found Rosalie so fast asleep in the arbor that we could not wake her even with kisses"

"Indeed!" exclaimed uncle John, "that was a rare discovery, an unimpressible young lady, in this romantic age!"

"I was tempted," said Grand-pa, glancing archly at me, "to hasten the denouement. You have heard of the old lady's innocent question?"

"How was that?" asked aunt Grace.

"Please tell us!" echoed the children, gathering around with their sweet, winning ways, and eager expectancy.

"An old lady received a call from a gentleman whom she had not met since her girlhood. They ran through the usual gossip about old friends, new changes, and their mutual experiences. At length, the old lady, after listening attentively to his relation of the circumstances attending a severe illness, which occurred shortly after he left his native State, inquired with the most intense interest, 'And did you live?'"

We all smiled, and then uncle John's rich voice rang out with the silvery laugh of the children, like a chime of Christmas bells: "Well, did Rosalie ever wake?"

They laughed again, and Belle cried, "O yeth, Grand-pa! Ath thoon ath aunt Grace thpoke, Rothe opened her eyethe."

"Of course," replied uncle John, "there is always a mysterious communication going on between those two spirits. Were not each so complete in herself, I should imagine there was but one soul between them."

As I looked into the tender eyes of aunt Grace, Edith touched the bell, and a servant came in and placed a small oval table, on which the tea equipage was arranged, before her. While she, with skilful hand, was preparing the refreshing beverage, two little round tables were placed before Grand-pa and Grand-ma, and the usual light supplies of warm biscuit, light-bread, fresh butter, and a few delicate relishes, were passed around to the rest. The children usually took a dish of light bread and sweet milk. Edith and I, ranking ourselves amongst the thinking class, preferred tea, citing in response to Charles' raillery, Prof. Hall, as authority for the choice, who says in his Journal of Health, that the use of tea and coffee becomes more general in proportion as a nation progresses in mental culture; the theine and cafine supplying, very happily, the waste of the nervous system, when temperately used. This was the favorite meal of the day. The servants were dismissed after completing the simple arrangements, and conversation flowed on with quiet cheerfulness as before. The children vied with each other in the interchange of little courtesies, and in gracefully proffering every needed attention to their elders. It was a charming season, redete with brilliant fancies, keen wit that never wounded, and the timely words and deeds which bud and blossom only in the warm atmosphere of unselfish home-affection. Miss Harper entered into the spirit of the hour. She could not well do otherwise. Though the new comers received an unusual share of attention, she was never forgotten. The older members of the family elicited her thoughts, and gave the same interested attention to her remarks, or questions, as to each other; and as a natural result, the younger ones listened, or appealed to her with marked deference. Sometimes, a kind, sisterly word, a brotherly attention, or noble thought, called a quick glow to her face, followed by a momentary shadow, as it some buried happiness was recalled. What an expressive face it was! I could read in it each swift thought and passing emotion. So, I perceived, could aunt Grace. Several times, as Miss Harper glanced towards her, she unconsciously replied to the revealing features, as if the lips had spoken. Then, the radiant smile and tear-dimmed eye showed how precious to her was this mental sympathy.

About half an hour after tea, uncle John placed a chair near the lamp-stand, and invited Miss Harper to give us our customary evening treat which was then due from her pen. He opened a large book, named "Household Words," in which each article was copied, and disclosed a large sheet closely written over. Miss Harper took it up, and in a sweet, distinct tone, thus replied to our awaiting silence:

"NOT A WHOLE MEMBER."

While observing the frequent struggle among professed Christians to reconcile their duties, as such, with the requirements of fashionable society, their own inclinations, the love of riches, or the desire for distinction, and while listening in the Conference meeting to confessions of a divided life, of years passed in the endeavor to withhold some cherished object from the Lord, and meanwhile enjoy a Christian's privileges, I have frequently been reminded of Uncle Joe's half membership.

Among the hills of Mississippi, whose worn-out soil, washed ruinously by every rain, requires the renovating touch of scientific agriculturists, lived the hero of our sketch—Uncle Joe. He was tall and slender, of dignified bearing, with an intelligent expression in his dark face. His age was uncertain, like that of adult negroes in general. Being subject to a pain in his chest, he was exempt from field labor, and had been promoted to the rank of coachman. Always neat in appearance, when on duty, with his bright, well-kept carriage, and the glossy coats of the horses, he passed among us as a model coach-boy.

As I was entering the carriage alone one Sunday, I perceived that several ladies and gentlemen intended to remain through the service for the blacks, and asked Joe if he would not like to stay. "Much bligo to yer, Missus, for the sideration, but I puffers not, as I is done heard one sermon."

"Are you not a member of the Church, Joe?" "No, Missus, I canna say I is a member of the Church, and I canna say I is no member." "How is that?" De fact are, Missus, I is not whole member." "You are on trial then?" "No, Missus, I is been mitted to full membership, but I is ony half member." "Have you been baptized, Uncle Joe?" "Yes, Missus, I kin say I is bin baptize." "And do you commune with the Church?" "I communes wid de Church when I is pessent, but I dussent style meself whole member." I endeavored to explain the matter to him, but to all my lucid statements and illustrations, he replied as before: "Yes, Missus, I sees all dat, but I does'nt feel somebow, I is mon'n half member."

I then remarked on the duties of Christians, their privileges, etc., with the design of eliciting the mystery of his half-membership. He listened very attentively, but when the carriage rolled through the gate, he replied, "When I is done felt all dat, praps I kin say I is whole member, but I is feared to go for to say dis pessent time, dat I is mon'n half member."

A few weeks after, the cause of this half-membership transpired. I ordered my horse one morning, as I was passing along the gallery to the breakfast-room, and was informed that "Joe is not come out; he is done got his-self sick again." Another boy came up to the gallery, and removing his sheep-skin from his head, said, "mornin, Missas! Hopes Missus finds hisself well dis bright mornin. I is de boy for to bring up Lightfoot for Missus; I can saddle dat hoss, an he are guy as one colt, safe and perfectin." So uncle Gabriel brought up my horse, and Joe remained in his cabin, shutting out with its closed door the glad sunlight, the bland sweet air, and all living beauty.

A few days after, a note came from town with the information that a box of goods had arrived for me per express, and the same day we received an invitation to attend the wedding-party of our young physician.—What was to be done? It was in the hurried season of cotton picking; no field hand could be spared.

We were at the mercy of Uncle Joe's indisposition.—The widow-mistress of the plantation stated the case as hopeless. I proposed an appeal to the invalid, and accompanied by the pet-daughter of the house, proceeded to the Quarter. We opened the door of Joe's cabin and stepped in. I could see nothing in the dim light, and the unpleasant odor of the confined air made us turn quickly to the entrance again. I had been there before, and as I lifted the latch, said, "how are you to day, Joe?" I heard a stir in the corner, then a groan, and "O Missus, I is got sich a pain in my chest! I is never had sich a pain afore."

We went to the bedside, felt his pulse, and announced that he had no fever, his symptoms were decidedly favorable, etc. Joe acknowledged that he "did feel better that day."

I promised to send him some "sugar-pills," that would charm away his pain, which was by this time located in his jaw, and coffee, of which he was very fond, for supper. Joe assured me, gratefully, that he "would be hisself again in a few days." I then named the necessity of his going to town the next morning, and painted in glowing colors the festivities of the following night.—These were too strong temptations for Joe; and he promised to be forthcoming in the morning, "if dis disease done cure, as I hopes for it would."

At breakfast, next day, the mistress was in some excitement. "That worthless Joe! pretending to be sick half of the time, and making use of his leisure to steal all the eggs to sell in town, when we never have enough for the family use at this season." I replied by a look of inquiry. "The overseer noticed that all Joe's pockets protruded more than usual, and quietly found an opportunity to peep into them. All were full of eggs. To think that he should so abuse my kindness!" I suggested that he might have been supplied by others.—"Not he! Jeo has been delaying the wagon all the morning under pretence of not finding the mules, just to get all the eggs and sell them at half price."

After Joe's return, the overseer asked him how much he got for his eggs; he looked up with innocent astonishment at the question, but seeing that he was detected, dropped his eyes, and said, sheepishly, "Noting, Massa, noting! 'Twas a judgment pon me for takin dem eggs, dey all done broke in my pocket, cept two little uns. God meant to show dis nigger dat I is wrong to go for to sell dem eggs. I no dares to take eggs to sell again." And he pointed to his yellow-striped garments. Uncle Joe said truly that he was "only a half member." "His case," said Grandpa, "affords a moral on which many a professing Christian would do well to ponder."

Albert Edward, the eldest son of Queen Victoria, was born November 9, 1841, and consequently was eighteen years old last November. As a Prince of England, Scotland, Ireland and Germany, he has, by birth and by letters patent, the following titles: 1. Prince of Wales, by patent, 1841, English. 2. Duke of Cornwall, by birth, English. 3. Earl of Chester, by patent, 1841, English. 4. Great Steward of Scotland, by patent, Scotch. 5. Duke of Rothsay, by birth, Scotch. 6. Baron of Carrick, by birth, Scotch. 7. Baron of Renfrew, by birth, Scotch. 8. Lord of the Isles, by birth, Scotch. 9. Earl of Dublin, by patent, 1849, Irish. 10. Prince of Coburg and Gotha, German.

It is declared, in an English journal, that Geo. Eliot, author of Adam Bede, and the more recently published Mill on the Floss, had received $10,000 down, and will have $5000 for the second edition, $5000 more when the work reaches the fourth, and extra bonus on its reproduction in a cheaper and more popular form. The "trade" ordered 5000 copies (at $4 50 each) of the first edition, and will sell them at $7 50.

PROGRESS OF PROTESTANTISM IN MISSISSIPPI AND THE SOUTH-WEST.—No. XVI.

MR. EDITOR—The early Baptist churches in Mississippi had their troubles, not only with unfaithful and disorderly laymen, but also with a number of their preachers. Here and there in the printed minutes, the churches are apprised of the deposition of former preachers, or cautioned not to receive as such certain impostors and disorderly walkers. The fall of two of their leading ministers, Elders Josiah Flowers and Lawrence Scarborough, was cause of deep sorrow, not only to the churches, but to all who admire and love ministerial purity and fidelity. Josiah Flowers was a man of commanding personal appearance, with a mind susceptible of great improvement. He was bold and self-reliant, and became quite popular and influential as a preacher. His residence was south-west of Port Gibson, and his name first appears in the minutes of 1810 as a delegate from Buyou Pierre Church to the Association. He seemed to study his sermons with care, and had an extraordinary talent for making exact Scripture quotations. His discourses were earnest and searching, and his language, voice and gestures in the pulpit were pleasing. He was for several years the pastor of Fellowship church, of which my mother was a member, so that I became well acquainted with him, and up to the beginning of his apostacy, loved no minister as I did him. Often did my young heart melt under his discourses, and often did I secretly vow, at his monthly visitations to our church, to lead a new life. But, alas! after a brilliant and successful career as a preacher, about 1821 or 1822, he fell, where many mighty men both in Church and State have fallen. He became a hopeless sot! He was wrong in principle on the use of alcoholic drinks, and this error led him into a fatal practice. While he took a bold stand against drunkenness, and often denounced it as one of the most degrading and ruinous vices, he looked on rum and whisky (then the common beverages of the country) as among the "good creatures of God, that might be received with thanksgiving," and safely used in moderation. He made the experiment, but his moderation soon degenerated into excess. His approach to the fatal precipice was so insidious that neither himself or his friends apprehended his danger until he was a ruined man. For a few months before his arraignment, fears were entertained that he had become a regular drinker. His breath was constantly scented with whiskey, his face became bloated; he was egotistic and loquacious, and finally the forebodings of the church were confirmed by his coming to one of our monthly meetings so intoxicated that he forgot to introduce the exercises by singing and prayer, but rose up and commenced preaching without these preliminary devotions. Soon after this he came one evening to the house of a relative, where I was stopping, so drunk that he had lost his usual self-control, and though it was most deeply mortifying to our hearts, the family and myself were called upon by the members of the church to testify to the fact. Notwithstanding all this he came to our next monthly meeting and ascended the pulpit as usual. The members held a brief conference out doors, and appointed one of their number to follow him into the pulpit and inform him of the allegations against him, and that he would soon be arraigned for trial. They consented for him to preach that day, but he was not his former self at all, and the occasion to my mind yet seems as one of mourning and woe. He lived several years after his deposition from the ministry and exclusion from the church, but I fear not to repent and reform. In all my life I have seldom known a brighter sun to go down behind a darker cloud.

Lawrence Scarborough first appears in the minutes of 1809, and continues as late as 1822. He was plain in person, manners, and style of preaching, but was zealous and energetic, and acquired considerable influence as a preacher. His manner of preaching was rather boisterous, and his gesticulation violent. He had acquired the "heavenly tone" in great perfection, and could sing and wail out his hymns, prayers and exhortations equal to any man I ever heard. The elocution of the pulpit has so changed since then, it is likely many of your readers do not comprehend what is meant by the "heavenly tone," and, partial as I was to it in my boyhood, I must acknowledge my inability to describe it. It was made up of assumed intonations of the voice, expressive of earnestness, whining, and wailing, and was intended to arouse the sympathies of both preacher and auditors. We seldom meet with the "heavenly tone" at this day, except as very imperfectly imitated by some of the colored brethren in their public prayers and exhortations. Mr. Scarborough was conspicuous as a preacher among the Baptists about fifteen years, when he committed a blunder that overthrew him in this country. The minutes containing the adjudication of his case are not extant so far as I know, and I shall not undertake to give the details of the case from memory. The charge, in substance, was an unscriptural and unlawful marriage to a young woman. Soon after this he precipitately left the country, and settled, perhaps, about the head waters of the Darbonne, near the line between Louisiana and Arkansas, where I heard of his preaching in an irregular way many years afterwards. How needful for ministers, even old and successful ministers, to "keep their bodies under and bring them into subjection, lest that by any means, when they have preached the gospel to others, they themselves should be cast away."

But we find a more lovely picture than the preceding in Elder Daniel McCall, who came as a Baptist Missionary to this country about 1820. Himself and wife had been regularly educated, and were both highly accomplished, and in their social and christian character seemed to be without a blemish. As a means of supporting his family, as well as benefiting the community, he established a school of high grade about three miles south of Port Gibson, where, with the assistance of Mrs. M'Call, he devoted five days in the week to teaching, while Saturdays and Sundays, including other vacations, were industriously devoted to his ministerial work. As my only sister was his pupil, and he was for some time pastor of our church, and frequently stopped with us, I became intimately acquainted with him, and his truly christian spirit and holy conversation and walk, made an impression on my young heart which has never been effaced. Once I was at his house when he was getting ready for a long and laborious missionary tour through the southern part of the State. We had the usual family devotions about sunrise, and then breakfast, but just as he was ready to mount his horse he called us to prayers again, and in language earnest and melting, commended his wife and little ones, including all the inmates of the family, to the care of God, invoking, at the same time, a special blessing on his contemplated missionary tour, and then, like a true evangelist, turned his face toward his work. On one occasion he was detained at my mother's house by stress of weather and high waters, over the Sabbath. During the day he heard the sound of axes and mauls in the neighborhood, and his spirit was stirred within him at such a desecration of the holy day of rest. A white man, of low grade, had hired some negroes to split rails for him on the Sabbath. Mr. M'Call asked me to accompany him to the place that he might warn these sons of Ham of their danger and certain doom if they persisted in Sabbath-breaking. His exhortation was powerful and effectual, at least for that time. In order to make it more effectual he concluded it by telling them if they did not desist he would be compelled, as a law-abiding citizen, to have them arrested under the statute of the State. The poor culprits took up their tools and left forthwith. On the same day he heard that a widowed Presbyterian lady in the vicinity had a grown son in a dangerous decline, and was unprepared for death. He proposed that mother and myself should accompany him on a visit to the sick man; and there was a point in this visit which arrested my attention at the time, and has had a salutary effect on my mind ever since in similar cases. When he was introduced to the family as a minister, he politely declined being seated, but went immediately to the bedside of the invalid, and in tones of brotherly kindness inquired into his spiritual condition. Having received for answer that he had made no special preparation for death, Mr. M'Call addressed to him an earnest and very affectionate exhortation, containing suitable instruction, warning, and encouragement, and then called us all to unite with him in prayer, and it was only after these services were ended that he would consent to be seated. His example may be safely imitated. If religious services in the chamber of the sick and dying are of the first importance, why should they not be the first in order? Mrs. M'Call seemed to be an embodiment of "whatsoever things are lovely and of good report." She died in May, 1823, within a few hours of the death of my sainted mother, though at a distance from each other. I thought then, as I have often since, of the unexpected, though joyful meeting which these two congenial spirits probably had "on the other shore."

Mr. M'Call's health also began to decline rapidly; on returning from one of his preaching excursions, he called at our house with a burning fever, and took to his bed. When the fever had somewhat abated, he sat on the bedside, and in prophetic language said with great emotion, "I have come to Mississippi to preach the gospel to the destitute, and lo, I die!" He felt that his end was near. Soon after this he took his two little motherless sons, and made an effort to get them to their relations in the North. The next we heard of him he had gone to the spirit land. He was one of the most perfect examples, in all the relations of life, of ministerial purity and integrity I have ever known.

I have only left myself space to refer briefly to one or two laymen who were prominent and useful here in early times, but these will suffice as illustrations of many others that might be exhibited, for though there was some chaff, there was a good deal of sound wheat among those primitive Mississippi Baptists. William Snodgrass was here as early as 1802 or 1803, and was a merchant in Greenville, then the county town of Jefferson county. I infer this from the fact that I have often heard my mother speak of his faithfulness in visiting May and Sutton, the accomplices of the celebrated robber, Mason, both of whom were imprisoned and hung at Greenville, as highway robbers and murderers, about that time. Mr. Snodgrass furnished them with copies of the New Testament to read during their incarceration, and one of them professed hope in Christ before his execution. After this Mr. Snodgrass settled in Natchez, and I presume established the first bookstore we ever had in Mississippi, which contributed largely to the dissemination of religious literature in the country, especially of the Calvinistic cast. He was a polished gentleman, as well as an earnest Christian, and commanded respect us such wherever he went. Being a man of fine business talents, he was often elected clerk of the Association, appointed on important committees, and to superintend the printing and distribution of the annual minutes. He was a sensible talker on the subject of experimental religion, and gifted in prayer, though quiet and unobtrusive in his religious life. His spiritual consolations were not outwardly emotional, but full of inward peace, and he died saying, "O, the joy! O, the joy!"

Willis M'Donald was quite a character among the Baptists in this country, for at least forty years; he resided in the northern part of Jefferson county, and as early as 1808 represented the Bayou Pierre Church in the Association. He was a great "go-to-meeting body," and generally attended all in his reach. Often when there was no service in his own church, he would dash off early on Saturday morning to some distant church, where he would remain until the close of the Sabbath exercises, and then return as rapidly home. He took an active part in all church matters within his sphere, and as often as occasion required opened his private dwelling to the accredited ministers of every denomination to hold forth the word of life to his neighbours. One of the first Methodist sermons I ever heard was under his roof. I have forgotten the name of the preacher, but I have never heard the name "Redeemer" uttered more sweetly than he did it. Mr. M'Donald was one of the original members of Fellowship church, in communion with which he died. He was an unlettered man, which prevented his gaining information from books, but by listening, observation and experience he became one of the dispensers of practical wisdom in his neighborhood. He did not allow his inability to read to excuse him from the evening and morning family devotions, which was so common among the Baptists of these days. At the appointed time he would assemble his household, and, after sitting a moment in silence, as though he was composing his mind for this near approach to God, would call them to their knees. In his younger days he had been familiar with the scenes of the Revolution, and was ever after fond of celebrating our national anniversary. On one of those occasions, while yet in lifehood's prime, he indulged a little too freely in the usual beverage. As soon as he felt the fumes of the liquor affecting his brain, he mounted his horse, took fast hold on the pommel of his saddle, and rode home at a rapid rate. He was deeply mortified and humbled at the occurrence, and in a few days rode round among the members of his church to confess his fault and ask their forgiveness. Among others he called on my mother, and with meekness and humility, which evinced true penitence, said, "Sister Jones, I was not to say really drunk, but my head swam amazingly." The church received his voluntary confession in a Christian spirit, and I never heard any further complaint against him on that score. He attained to more than four score years, and had as many marks of the true Christian inscribed on his character as any man within my knowledge. His death was occasioned by a fall from his horse. Father M'Donald left a numerous posterity in the country, many of whom are worthy members of the Baptist and Methodist Churches. He was the maternal grandfather of Rev. Wm. H. Watkins, D.D., of the Mississippi Conference. In my next I wish to add a few items about the progress of the Presbyterian Church.

J. G. JONES.

CLAIBORNE'S LIFE OF DALE IN ENGLAND.

The English literary weekly reviews, as the Critic, the Athenæum, Saturday Review, and others, now devote regularly much space to American works. Those criticisms are in a fair spirit, and we can see no difference between the dealing with American and British literary production. We have recently been struck with the long articles on Parton's Life of Jackson, Hawthorne's Marble Faun, Whitehead's Wild Sports of the South, Claiborne's Life and Times of Gen. Sam Dale, Abbot's French Revolution of 1789, Fisher's River Scenes and Characters, (by a Southern clergyman) and Dr. Cross's American pastor in Europe, have all had most highly appreciative notices; while Parker's Reminiscences of Rufus Choate, Willis's Idlewild letters, and Prenticiana, (by the editor of the Louisville Journal,) are very thoroughly "vevtilated," but not much to the honor of the authors. Some American writers have said, "why cure for what England, or any other nation, says of our library productions?" and have affected an utter indifference to blame or praise coming from over the seas. But we think that Macaulay, who, as a successful essayist, poet, and historian, could afford to be independent of criticism, was right when, in a private letter he wrote to Hon. Edward Everett that, the reception of his history upon the Continent was in every way more favorable and flattering than he could have expected; and that he valued criticism from that quarter beyond all others, as the judgment of foreigners upon a literary work was more like that of posterity than any other.

The biographies of Jackson, and of Dale, though their subjects are so dissimilar, seem to have given the English a new insight into the formation of our country. They are struck with the vigor, freshness, and undaunted perseverance of the men who went upon the frontiers, or plunged into the depth of the wilderness, struggling like heroes in subduing the wild man, and the still wilder nature. High praise is awarded by the London Critic to the industry displayed by Mr. Parton, and to the interesting manner in which he presents the hero of New Orleans; and at the conclusion of a long article on the first volume of the life of Jackson we find the following: "Those curious about the past of America, political and social, and who would wish to trace in the infancy of the United States the striking peculiarities of its manhood, will find a great deal to interest and amuse them in Mr. Parton's large and laborious volume.

Mr. Claiborne must also feel flattered by the receptinn which his stirring Life and Times of Gen. Sam Dale has had in the Mother Country. The old Mississippi partisan has aroused sympathetic hearts in the fast-anchored Isle, and the reviews, by long extracts from the book of his admirer and biographer, show that Dale was made of the right stuff. The English are crazy to know about Indians. Give them reindeer, Niagara Falls, and a buffalo hunt, and the John Bulls will go home perfectly contented. Our poets and later story-tellers do not paint the Indian as he is, when his wigwam is unfortunately built within sound of the backwoodsman's axe.—But both of the volumes referred to will give a truer picture of frontier-life than a hundred ideal descriptions. The English reviewer takes a right view of the case, and the pluck displayed by Dale is rightly appreciated.—"He," says the London Critic, "fairly earned his military promotion, and conducted himself with such manliness as to be entitled to the honor of biography." In regard to the stirring times in which the "partisan" lived, the same reviewer says: "A vast deal of heroism was displayed in these Indian forays. They were, too, exactly the occasions to call personal prowess into play; and as we may believe that Achilles and Hector would not have individually made a very successful stand against modern artillery, so we can have little difficulty in saying that 'big Sam Dale,' often acquitted himself where it is more than possible that Napoleon or the Iron Duke would have failed." We might add other paragraphs of a eulogistic character, but this will suffice.—N. Y. Journal of Commerce.

The Legislature of California has passed bills authoring San Francisco to take $600,000, and Santa Clara county $200,000 in stock of the San Francisco and San Jose Railroad. This road through the Santa Clara county is viewed as a link in the chain connecting the Atlantic with the Pacific States.

NEWS FROM EUROPE.

Important from Sicily—Mazzini's Manifesto—Aid Demanded by Naples—Garibaldi's Expedition Denounced as Piracy.—The French Troops in Rome.

The London Herald of May 9 has a dispatch from Rome, stating that, notwithstanding the statement of the Sardinian journals that the French troops will have entirely evacuated the Papal States before the end of June, it is certain that the Duke de Grammont, in accordance with instructions received from Paris, has declared to the Holy See that the French garrison will not leave the Papal territory until the Sovereign Pontiff himself shall have acknowledged that the departure of the French troops could take place without any danger to the tranquility and safety of his States. The Patrie believes itself correct in stating that no decision has yet been taken relative to the evacuation of Rome.

The Paris Patrie of Tuesday evening, the 8th inst., says: Gen. Garibaldi's departure for Sicily has been fully confirmed. He left during the night from the 5th to the 6th inst. The Piedmontese Government had ordered all arms and ammunition which had been deposited at Quarto, near Genoa, to be seized, and had also given orders for the port of Genoa to be watched. The expeditionary vessel, which had taken her papers for Malta, had put out to sea two days previously. Gen. Garibaldi joined the vessel immediately afterwards, and she, instead of proceeding to Malta, went to Sicily. The Piedmontese Government made every possible protest against this act of Gen. Garibaldi, which may involve the new Italian State in serious difficulties. General Garibaldi, being in connection with the committee in London undertaking the collection of English subscriptions for Sicily, had, in order to replace the arms which he feared would be seized by the Sardinian Government, received other arms, which had not passed through Piedmont. The Pays contains intelligence identical with that given by the Patrie. The Opinione Nationale says: the different vessels belonging to General Garibaldi's expedition will unite off the Island of Capraja; they will then direct their course towards Sicily.

No news has been received direct from Sicily; but letters from Naples to the 5th inst., state that the insurrection continued in the interior of the Island. Government had raised the state of siege at Palermo, but the court martial was to sit permanently. General Balzano had demanded a reinforcement of five thousand men, in consequence of Garibaldi's expedition.

The following is the text of the proclamation addressed by Mazzini to the Sicilians:

Sicilians—When I, almost thirty years ago, inscribed on the banner of Young Italy the word "Unity;" when I said that a popular insurrection might expel Austria from Lombardy, and overthrow the thrones of the despots of Florence, Rome and Naples, practical men laughed at me for thinking of impossible dreams, and declared as a Europian scheme what is now the most ardent wish of every Italian—the political unity of that peninsula.

Facts have justified my assertion; the revolutions of 1848 have proved that not a throne, even when supported by foreign bayonets, could stand against the will of the people; the events which have taken place in Italy during the last twelve months clearly show that that unity will be no longer a dream, but a reality, when the people who still groan in chains give a strong and fresh impulse to events, and resume a vigorous initiative.

Sicilians! Be you the first; show that you have not degenerated since the days of your ancestors. Revolution is permanent in Sicily, says old Europe; let it be once more right, and let this time be the last. Let insurrection spread from one end to another of your island; fight like heroes, as you are in the habit of doing, and you will be victorious.

The government of the Bourbons having been broken down, we will proclaim that which Central Italy has already chosen—the only one that can be called Italian, that of the brave and gallant King. Let us, therefore, inscribe on our banners the word "annexation."

Before being a republican I was in favor of unity, for it appeared to me that a Republic alone could lead to it. I was mistaken. Victor Emanuel made Italy progress toward that object; he will lead to it, if the people will assist him. I thus sacrifice old ideas to old principls; and with you, Sicilians, and with all the other people of the Italian peninsula, who will henceforth from only one nation—with you, I cry, "Long live Victor Emanuel, King of Italy!" Sicilians, the hour has struck. In the name of Italy, to arms!

Vienna, May 7, 1860.—The King of Naples is alarmed, and, being very anxious for the future, he has applied to the Northern Courts for their counsel, and, probably, for their moral support. The Austrian Government is likely to advise his Majesty to begin his reforms by breaking the arbitrary power of the police, and by enforcing the law of the land, but such counsel would hardly be of avail, as the feeble monarch is completely in the hands of the designing persons who are around him.—The Queen Teresa, who is in uninterrupted correspondence with her relatives at this Court, is believed to be the principal supporter of the present system. That she is the protector of the Jesuit party in the kingdom of Naples is a fact that admits of no denial.

Some of the Prussian and Italian papers have learned from this city that there was an understanding between Baron Bruck and M. Robart, the millionaire, who about a month ago blew out his brains. M. Robert was a declared enemy of the deceased minister, and his character was without blemish. It was yesterday generally related that the property left by Bruck had been placed under sequestration, but the report requires confirmation.

The correspondent of the London Post says: A very extensive and augmented camp is forming at Chalons.—There is to be a grand review this year. Preparations are being made at Thoulon and Marseilles to receive the siege artillery of the army of Italy, originally intended to reduce the strong places of Venetia.

The Constitutionnel has an article by its chief editor, M. Grandguillot, condemning the efforts which are being made to cause the fall of Count Cavour. It details the difficulties which have been successfully overcome by Piedmont, and points out the political importance which she has acquired with the consent of Europe. It extols the policy of Count Cavour, and condemns him for resisting the efforts of those who would exceed that policy. This article clearly declares that Europe, and France particularly, will energetically disapprove aggression, and that the work of Piedmont is no longer to extend her boundaries, but to assimilate herself to the annexed provinces. The Paris Patrie, of May 7, says that Gen. Garibaldi has left for Sicily with an expeditionary corps d'armee.

The Paris Patrie adds: General Garibaldi by acting thus commits an act which falls under the application of the law against piracy. The same journal further says: The Sardinian Cabinet has ordered the Sardinian vessels off Sicily to oppose with armed force any attempt which may be made by persons who have embarked in vessels hoisting the Sardinian flag.

The London Herald's Paris correspondent says:—"With whom are we going to war next?" is the general question in French military circles. The camp at Chalons will consist of cavalry, infantry and artillery complete, amounting to 40,000 men, under Marshal MacMahon, and will in reality be the center of an army of observation for forming along the Rhine frontier, the right wing being eschelaned from Besancon to Strasburg, and the left wing from Ers to Lunaville, the whole force amounting to 90,000 men, to be under the command in chief of the Emperor. The writer says the last year's events prove the source of this information to be reliable.

THE JAPANESE.

Heathen Good Humor and Christian Snobbery—The Liberality of the Japanese—Their Skill in Mechanism—Curious Toys—Their Mode of Learning English, etc.

Were not the Japanese the best humored people on the face of the earth, they would lose all patience with the equivocal attentions that are showered upon them, decline further negotiations, and go home by the most expeditious route. Their own gentleness and nice consideration, the habitual deference they show to each other, and the simple cordiality that invents all their demeaner with a charm for those who are susceptible to it, are wholly lost upon the majority of the people with whom they are brought into contact. It is not the rabble of the street who off end most grossly.

The "fine ladies" feel at liberty to say such things to them as they say to their pet poodles. They make targets of them for their conversational pop-gunnery. They flaunt in upon them while they are eating and note minutely their processes of deglutition. The "fine gentlemen" are absorbed by their hands and sandals, and are thrown into convulsions by their attempts to speak English; persuade them to take drinks; exert great practical jokes upon them.

In return for all these civilities the Orientals have only smiles and pleasant salutations, and pleasant words to give. However equivocal the attention may be, they never fail to reciprocate it earnestly. Their store of presents seems to be as inexhaustible as it is varied. Sheets of paper, pipes, fans, embroidered handkerchiefs, sugar-plums, toys, and all sorts of knick-knacks are among the least valuable of the gifts they bestow. Their supremely happy moments seem to be those devoted to their presentation, and it is good to see the smile that lights their features as they suddenly produce some article and extend it to the stranger exclaiming, "present! present!"

The most common present is a picture. Each individual of the Embassy has brought a huge portfolio of illustrations of the characters and scenes of his country. These are highly colored. The most favorate subject is a woman. Landscapes, almost including within their horizon the sacred mountain Fusi Yama, are also numerous. These p

New Orleans Christian Advocate.

Terms—$3 00 per annum, in advance.

NEW ORLEANS:

WEDNESDAY, MAY 30, 1860.

THE SOCIETARIAN CARNIVAL AT NEW YORK.

The great annual societarian carnival of New York is over. The principal associations which have held their anniversaries are, the New York Bible Society—the Society of Inquiry of Union Theological Seminary—the Society for the Amelioration of the condition of the Jews—the American Seamen's Friend Society—the American and Foreign Christian Union—the Young Men's Christian Association—Magdalen Female Benevolent Society—Inebriate Reform Convention—American Temperance Union—American Congregational Union—New York Sunday School Union—American Tract Society—American Home Missionary Society—American Female Guardian Society—New York State Colonization Society—Institution for the blind—American Bible Society—Swedenborgian Societies—Woman's Rights Association—Universalist Conference—American Board of Foreign Missions—American Sunday School Union. There were doubtless many others, but these few were the principal representative associations.

We find the financial reports of but few of these, but those reporting show gross receipts for the year amounting to about one million and a quarter dollars. The amount of capital invested we do not know. It would be interesting to know the total amount of the capital invested in all the voluntary associations of the United States, and the average annual gross receipts of all. It would be a great and suggestive fact in the study of American finances—an indication of the religious tendencies of American civilization, and of the relative strength and influence of the Christian Churches on the one hand, and of voluntary societies on the other. Some of these societies, however, "belong to the Church," though not the largely moneyed ones.

There is one favorable view, at least, of this tendency to associational effort. It is an evidence of the increasing desire for Christian unity among the different branches of the "Holy Catholic Church." Unable to unite those different bodies into one ecclesiastical whole, and yet feeling the need of the unity and strength of such a consolidation, Societarian platforms are invented, where ecclesiastical and doctrinal differences are ignored. All hold to the "Constitution," (the Bible;) all are willing to adopt the "Cincinnati Platform," (the general faith of Christians,) but upon "strict construction" from bare and agree, and do not attempt [illegible] "honorable separation" they cannot [illegible] friends, "agree to disagree" [illegible] exempt it. However much we may be opposed to this compromising mode of attaining an inharmonious unity, we cannot withold our sympathy from the spirit of which it is the evidence. "The unity of the Spirit" should be earnestly sought by all Christians. It should bind together all Christian Churches. Nothing should be done to mar it. All personal and ecclesiastical sacrifices of mere feeling and self-complacency should be made for its maintenance.

But these associational unions do not accomplish the end desired. Holding, as their individual members do, to the divinity of the Christian Church, and to the integrity of their respective branches, as constituting it, these societies weaken and despoil the Church, and thus violate the ecclesiastical faith and rights held in reserve in their formation. On the other hand, they do not promote, in the least degree, the spirit of unity among the Churches, as such; rather the contrary, for the respective denominationalities are ignored—the Churches, as such, are not represented.

They also do positive harm. They insensibly and unintentionally foster the sentiment, somewhat among themselves, and more among "those without," that there is not much need of the Churches, at least for any of the great purposes of human amelioration. They thus strengthen the union between Pilate and Herod—between Romanism and Infidelity—in their opposition to "sectarianism," as they are pleased to term all devotion to the Church of Christ, as constituted by the various Christian denominations. By that hue and cry of "sectarianism," many timid Christians, and other religious minded persons, are frightened away from their allegiance to the Church Evangelical—some into Societarianism, some into High Churchism, some into Romanism—and a great many natsiders into Indifferentism. When a man begins to lose faith in the Church, he begins also to lose faith in the Christian religion; for the Church is an integral part of that religion—the body for its soul—the form for its power. If he becomes frightened at this tendency, he is in danger of going to the other extreme, of High Churchism, of Romanism. The truth is, Societarianism is the Rationalism of Anglo-Saxon Christendom.

We confess we are sick of Societies. We may be wrong; if so, we hope for pardon, and more light. There is a cold, heartless, mechanical utilitarianism about this exclusive associational way of doing good that crushes out all individuality of reason, affection and progress. Societies grow fat and strong, and individual Christian character remains stationary, or rather assumes dwarfish proportions. It is a sort of concentration of all the surplus energy of the artificial, cantish yankeeism there is in American character. It is true there must be associated effort. We do not deny that. But it should be harmonious with those individual aptitudes and social relations and sympathies which God has ordained. Such association we find in the Church. God made our individual constitutions, he established our social relations and sympathies, and he ordained the Church. They are all harmonious. It may be said that, condemning High Churchism, we are High Churchmen ourselves. In the sense of giving the Church the place, and the importance, and the allegiance, intended by its Divine Founder, and set forth in the Scriptures, we are High Churchmen. We have almost as little sympathy with Low Churchmen, of any School, as for Societarians. They both undervalue the Church in theory, or are unfaithful to their own Church ideal. High Churchism, in the sense of giving the Church a character and power not taught in the Scriptures, is the other extreme. Societarianism and Low Churchism lead to Indifferentism and Infidelity; High Churchism, in the sense just named, leads to Romanism. Devotion to the Church of Christ, as set forth in the Bible, as "the purchase of Christ's blood"—as "the body of Christ"—as "the pillar and ground of the truth"—as the "kingdom" of Christ, against which the gates of hell shall not prevail—is simple Christianity, as far as it goes.

MORE MORTARA CASES.

It is not doubted that the flagrant crime against nature in the case of the abduction from his parents of the Jewish boy Mortara, and his captivity to this day, has been one of the principal causes of the downfall of the Pope. It has roused the opposition, not merely of opposing creeds, but of humanity, whether Catholic or Protestant. It reveals also the enormities that would be committed, even in this country, had Romish priests the power they have been accustomed to wield in some countries of the old world. While these priests are getting up sympathetic meetings for the Pope in this country, notwithstanding the sympathy of the civilized world with the struggling patriots of Italy, it may be well to notify all concerned that these Mortara cases are multiplying. Two have recently occurred in Ireland.

Eight months ago a sailor named Sherwood died. He left a widow and seven children. Mrs. Sherwood succeeded in getting the children into a "Protestant Orphanage" institution in the county of Galway. They were taken to the Midland Great Western terminus in Dublin, and booked for the place of their destination. The little passengers were locked up in a carriage, the guard had undertaken to look after them on the road, and the matron of the Protestant Orphanage was to meet them at Galway. In the carriage with the children were two men named M'Robins and O'Connor, who entered into conversation with their young fellow passengers, and soon possessed themselves of their story, and determined to upset Mrs. Sherwood's scheme. When the train arrived at Galway, and the matron of the Orphanage presented herself on the platform to receive her charge, they boldly showed fight for the prize, and positively succeeded in carrying off four of the infants—three boys and a girl,—whom they put into a covered car and took away with them. It seems to be ascertained that on the 22d of March these children were taken by M'Robins to Dublin, but from that time to this all trace of them has been lost.

Before the judges have had time to dispose of the cases of the Sherwoods, another application was made for a writ of habeas corpus, directed to one Henry Corr, of Donnybrook, ordering him to bring up the bodies of Patrick and Ailcin Murphy within the usual period.—The motion was grounded on the affidevit of Alice Murphy, the mother of the children who had been spirited away. She states that in October, 1857, at the instance of several gentlemen—Governors of the Josephian Female Orphan House, she put her daughter into the school to be maintained and educated; that up to September, 1858, she was always allowed access to her daughter; that since that time she made several applications to see her daughter, and on each occasion was informed by the matron (Miss Byrne) that the child was not there, and could not be seen, as she was gone to the country with a monk. On the 28th of July, 1858, Rev. Denis Heffernan, of Phibsborough chapel, asked her to visit the schools in Denmark-street, to see if she would like to have her son placed there. In order to get Mr. Heffernan out of the house, she consented to visit the school with him, but on going away she left her son Patrick in the house in the care of one Anne Taaffe, who resided in her house, until she returned. That when she got to the school, the Rev. Mr. Heffernan left her, saying that he would return in a few minutes. That she waited in the school-room nearly half an hour, and finding that the Rev. Mr. Heffernan did not return, she left the school to return home. That on the way back she met the Rev. Mr. Heffernan, but did not speak to him. That when she returned home her son Patrick was absent. On making inquiry from Anne Taaffe in the presence of one Rose Short and Catherine Connolly, where the child was, Anne Taaffe replied that the right owner of the child h[illegible] That on the [illegible] strength, which would admit of my proc[illegible] falling, would admit of my proc[illegible] and that unless [illegible] of the 28th of July, 1858, deponent repaired to Phibsborough chapel, where the Rev. Mr. Heffernan resided, but was told by the porter at the chapel-house that the rev. gentleman was not at home. That seeing the Rev. Mr. Heffernan coming up the road, she went to him and asked for her child. He replied that if she would not go away he would get her charged to the police. That after making several endeavors to find out where the child was placed, she ascertained in November last that Henry Corr, of Simmon's court Donnybrook, had taken upon himself the care and guardianship of the two children, alleging that he did so under a will stated to be made by her husband; says that she has never seen such will; that Henry Corr has offered to let her see both her children, provided that she agreed to sign a paper undertaking not to interfere with the education of her children, which she refused to do. That she was prevented from making an earlier application to the Court in consequence of a difficulty of obtaining professional assistance, and from the fact that until November last she did not ascertain with certainty who had the custody of the children. On the above statement counsel submitted that the Court would grant an absolute habeas corpus.

WORK IN THE CHURCH AND WORK OUT OF THE CHURCH.

We must work. To be idle in anything is to be dead that far, and to be idle in everything is to be dead altogether. Not only is each faculty a working force, but it carries within itself a working instinct, so that it tends constantly to put itself forth in exertion.

A disposition to work for Christ is the true measure of Christian character. If we love him we will labor in his service, for in no other way can we express our affection towards him. Nor is this all. The strongest element in love is a desire to perpetuate its feelings, and in order to effect this object it instantly seeks to organize its thoughts, sentiments, and impulses, in such habits as will preserve and enlarge its existence. The natural result of this instinctive law of love is work, and hence, whenever we love, we strive to embody that love in our actions, so as to save it from decay and increase its activity.

Working for Christ is not a general, benevolent spirit of exertion. It is a specific thing. It is doing good, not in our way, and not in the world's way, but in Christ's way. There are many forms of usefulness. Every man, indeed, is more or less useful. It is scarcely possible to live and not, directly or indirectly, contribute something to society. Our very selfishness serves the interests of the world. But mere usefulness is far from being Christian work; and just here Christians often commit great errors—they suppose that usefulness is Christian work, but this is not necessarily the case. Outside of the church there are many modes of benevolent activity, nor ought Christians to be shut out from them; and yet it is vital to sound principle to insist on the fact that Christians frequently labor in such fields more as men than as Christians. It cannot be disguised that in such enterprises of usefulness there is often a worldly temper, a worldly taste, a worldly influence, not at all favorable to religious excellence. Nor have we the slightest doubt that many Christians most seriously impair or altogether destroy their capacity of doing good as Christians, by resorting to these external channels of moral activity. And why? Because Jesus Christ has instituted his Church as the ordinary means of usefulness. If we are called to do good, it is in his own vineyard, and hence the precise sphere of our activity in his church is just as much a matter of divine law as activity itself. We have no right to appropriate our talents as we please. If we consult our tastes and inclinations in this particular, it is quite likely that selfishness will vitiate our work. Useful we may be, but not useful according to Christ's purpose.

There is no worse practical heresy in our day than the common belief that mere usefulness is Christian service. A vast deal of usefulness has no cross, no salvation, no Christ in it, and therefore, whatever is accomplished on the score of evils abated and good secured, is yet far short of the divine standard. The results go over to the account of civilization and earthly advantages, not primarily and chiefly to the honor of Christ's Church. Now this cannot be considered as work for Jesus, nor is it the method to mature Christian character. If we wish really and truly to work for God, we must subdue our will, and exercise our virtues, and employ our gifts in such a manner as God provides through the instrumentalities of his Church.

Never before has the Church of Christ had such open and wide-spread fields of usefulness. The influences of education, of literature, of charitable beneficence, are largely under her control, while all the highest and purest means of doing good are her exclusive property. But the great obstacle to her triumphant success is the failure of her members to work through her for the redemption of the world. Remember, brethren, what ever you may effect in other spheres of benevolence, your talents are buried in a napkin, so far as the Church of Jesus Christ is concerned, if you fail to work first of all for her purity and power. This is a great and grievous wrong. It is robbing Christ of his own peculiar honor. It is denying the headship of the Church in the moral and spiritual service of humanity. Look well to this evil. Every day it is growing in our midst, and sadly weakening the heart and muscle of Christ's elect. The time has come to sound the alarm and cry out against the worldliness of our usefulness. Examine this thing carefully and prayerfully. Give the Church your talents, your time, your industry, which are now far too much bestowed on outside modes of usefulness. And then, sure of the aid of the Holy Ghost, you will enrich the resources of your own souls, instead of impoverishing them in worldly usefulness, and do a work for your generation that will live to glorify Jesus Christ.

OUR EDUCATIONAL INTERESTS.

A few weeks more and another educational year will close. It is a fit time, therefore, to reflect on those great interests which are embraced in the subject of Church education.

The past year has witnessed, beyond all doubt, a decided advance in the general tone of thought and feeling as related to this branch of our duty. Acting at first within a small sphere, proceeding by slow and cautious steps as the way opened, we have advanced into clearer and broader light, our opportunities of useful activity have wonderfully enlarged, and to-day, one of the most gratifying spectacles that our Church presents is the deep and earnest spirit animating her heart in behalf of this noble enterprise. Nor do we regret that this sentiment has been gradually formed, for by this means it has been the natural outgrowth of our experience, the fruit of character, the legitimate result of organic life, and not a scheme in advance of providence. The system of education now in operation among us, whether viewed in its direct relation to our own wants, or to the general aspects of Christian civilization, is in that true line of development which always follows the faithful preaching of the gospel, and the organization of a community of devout believers. It accurately defines a stage of progress. It is a cheering sign of God's Spirit in our midst, and, as such, accepting its blessed tokens and rejoicing in their indications, we thank God and take courage.

We have alluded to the advance in the sentiment of the Church on the subject of education. There are many illustrations of this fact. The period of dim views, of narrow conceptions, of irregular and vacillating impulse, has gone forever, and we begin to see that to [illegible] operate on the intellect of society is next in importance to operating on its heart. The grand aspects of Christian education are revealing themselves, and instead of the feeling that our best men are somewhat out of place in this work, we are learning that it is a noble sphere for our noblest minds. One of the problems that every Church has to solve is to combine culture with piety, to unite gifts and graces, to promote civilization as well as ensure godliness. And just now this problem is given us to work out, and hence the spirit of active inquiry waking among us. The most encouraging sign in this connection is the anxious solicitude to make education a Christian service, not ecclesiastically but really, not nominally but truly, a Christian service. Our Conferences are increasingly alive to this conviction, that our Institutions must be practically and thoroughly religious; and if this spirit grow, we may confidently hope that Methodism will prove a blessing to the world through the instrumentality of education, next in degree, next in importance, next in power, to its advantages by means of its pulpit and missionary energy.

The point, therefore, to claim attention and to stir our zeal is to carry the whole-hearted life, the undying fervor, the sacrifice of self, into the work of education, as we have done in other fields of Christian activity. If we baptize our educational labors with this spirit, we shall give a new meaning to the influence of the Christian Church, and vastly enhance its ability to glorify the cross, and benefit the human family.

PRINCIPLES AND SYSTEMS—ANCIENT LONDON CHURCHES.

The evil of a stereotyped system in religious and ecclesiastical matters becomes more and more apparent. Without fostering a morbid love of change, a healthful, flexible, expansive adaptiveness in Church economy is the rule of Scripture and reason. A striking illustration of this is seen in the condition of the many churches in what is called Old London. Charles Dickens, in his papers called "The Uncommercial Traveler," draws some gloomy pictures of their deserted, monidy, death-like condition. The City of London—that is to say, the ancient settlement, comprising an area of about a mile in length by half a mile in breadth—contained, in 1660, ninety-two parish churches. After the Great Fire, the ecclesiastical divisions of the city were unnecessarily numerous, and the number of churches was brought down to fifty-eight, though so thickly were even these new parishes planted that four or five steeples may still be counted in a space not exceeding that of Grosvenor-square. Strange as such excess may now appear, it was by no means uncommon in former times. The same thing, in fact, may be seen in many of the old towns, where churchyards all but touch each other, and where twenty or thirty houses are as many as go to a parish. Every house of more than ordinary pretension had its private chapel, though the parish church might be within one hundred yards of it, and every cluster of householders was provided with its particular place of worship by the munificence of some citizen or the zeal of some prelate.

This multiplication of city parishes is producing very embarrassing results at the present time. The endowments of each parish are the property of the parish, and applicable to the use of that parish only. It has happened in the course of events that the whole area of the City of London, with its fifty-eight parishes, has become comparatively depopulated. The old city is there, but the citizens have migrated. The houses are chiefly warehouses, deserted at night and empty on Sundays.—The principal tenants reside three or four miles off in more fashionable districts, and their clerks in less expensive suburbs; so that the city churches are left without congregations, and their incumbents almost without cures. It has been urged as an argument for keeping things as they are that such ecclesiastical sinecures offer a convenient provision for learned and studious clergymen. The Bishop of London, however, and his friends are anxious for a practical reform. On the outskirts of the old city lie districts crowded with a poverty-stricken population, all but destitute of spiritual aid. An imaginary line separates churches without congregations from congregations without churches, and divides ecclesiastical endowments from the duties which ought to be attached to them. This line the Bishop would efface. He desires to "unite" the unendowed benefice and its 10,000 souls with the endowed benefice and its empty church; or, to take down the useless church and re-erect it in a district where it would find tenants.

All this comes of being wedded to a system, instead of to principles, which, in earlier times, naturally crystallized into that system, as most appropriate to those times.—Devotion to principles is both conservative and progressive; devotion to system is conservatism without progress, which, in the growth of things, becomes laicshood and death. Devotion to fundamental principles is the philosophy of Methodism, and is, at once, the secret of her stability and her growth. Whenever she becomes wedded to a system, her progress will cease. True principles, in their development, and application to a growing country and civilization, will necessarily change, gradually, their first forms. It will be well if our people keep this distinction in mind.

MR. BUNTING AND MR. BRIGHT.

Most of our readers will recollect that in the earlier discussions of the Church-Rate question in England, a committee of Parliament was appointed to find out the state of feeling among the Dissenters. Most of them, of course, desired the abolishment of Church-Rates, because of their injustice in making them contribute to the support of the Church of England. It is rather notorious, we believe, that the British Wesleyan Methodists, in addition to their commendable reticence, as a Church, on political questions, have so far yielded to a toadyish deference to caste, especially among the ministry, as to give, very unnaturally, a quasi support to the pretensions of the Church of England, particularly in the matter of Church-Rates. Nevertheless, a large body of the laity, and some of the ministry, with honorable truthfulness to themselves and their principles, are opposed to these claims of the Anglican Establishment.

As far as we can learn, only two leading Wesleyans, Rev. Mr. Osborne, we believe, and Thomas Percival Bunting, Esq., son of the late Dr. Jabez Bunting, were called to give testimony as to the opinions of Wesleyans. Both testified that there was little or no opposition among the Wesleyans to Church-Rates. This testimony, it is believed, was far from being fair and disinterested. We are glad to see that Mr. Bunting has received in Parliament a merited rebuke from Mr. Bright. He said:

I shall refer only to the evidence of one of these gentlemen—Mr. Bunting. I suspect that when the name of Bunting was mentioned, there was a general impression that this was the evidence of a man who, although not nominally, yet actually, was Bishop or Archbishop, and almost Pope of the sect of which he was so distinguished a member. But that is not the case. The hon. and learned gentleman, not for the first time in his life as counsel learned in the law, has been beholden for his brief to an attorney practising in Manchester. Mr. Bunting is not a minister of the Methodist Church, as I understand, but is in the profession of the law, (a laugh), and therefore I must strip him of any authority he has upon this matter, in connection with the Methodist Church in consequence of his bearing the name of Bunting. I must say further that this gentleman, although in some sort a Nonconformist, inasmuch as I presume he attends a Methodist Chapel, is a politician of a peculiar kind, such as is not found very frequently among the dissenting body. I dare say he agrees with the most obstructive, if I may use the term, Conservative or Tory among hon. gentleman opposite, and if we had taken his opinion upon all those questions of policy which this House has decided in favor of popular rights and justice to the people during the last 20 years, I have not the least doubt that Mr. Bunting would have been as conclusive against all those concessions as he appears to have been upon the question of church-rates. But the hon. and learned gentleman did not treat the House quite fairly in stating the evidence of this gentleman, because he did not feel himself courageous enough to say that the Wesleyan body was in favor of church-rates. I find [illegible] whether were chosen, he says, in answer to a question [illegible] there was any likelihood of petitions being sent by t[illegible]

"No; from a fear on the part of those who sympathize with the Church of England of eliciting an opinion to the contrary. There is among us a general agreement not to disturb questions which we do not consider essential. The opposition would, I believe, be from a minority in our own body."

"A distinct minority?—I think I should call it so."

The House will see from this that although Mr. Bunting is not remarkable for great hesitation generally in his opinions upon this matter, yet he does hesitate to say that the Wesleyan body was with any sort of unanimity in favor of church-rates. And I can give my testimony, living as I do in a neighborhood where they are very numerous, and the question of church-rates is mooted and contests take place, although a few leading men are anxious to keep the question quiet, because it is one which might disturb their body, as far as my observation goes, a very large number, I think a majority, who attend their chapels have generally acted with the party by which church rates were opposed. As I have said, great numbers of them—I believe a great majority—vote in opposition to church-rates whenever a contest takes place, and do unite in sympathy upon this question with the great body of Dissenters belonging to other sects. I should not have said so much about this particular body had it not been for the extraordinary importance which the hon. and learned gentleman has given to this part of the subject. But I find that even from Conference Methodists there have been 135 petitions presented, from the Methodist New Connexions 97, from the Methodist Free Church 164, from the Primitive Methodists 265, from the Calvinistic Methodists 108, from the United Methodists, the Methodist Reformers, and the Wesleyan Association, 47; making a total of more than 800 petitions which have been presented from that body in favor of this Bill.

THE PETITION-MANIA.

In the Northern Methodist General Conference over one hundred and fifty petitions on the slavery question were received in five days. Whether that ends the list, we do not know. May the Lord deliver the Southern Church from any such agitation and petition-mania. The paper mania never exists in connection with a worthy cause, nor with an honest desire for the truth. It is unmistakeably suggestive of humbuggery and demagoguery. Whenever a cause demands the evidence and advertisement of certificates, it is apt to be unsound, and its advocates are apt to be selfish adventurers. It is a regular patent medicine, or sewing-machine affair. It is strange that the abolition fanatics, and the women's rights propagandists, and the ism-mongers generally, of the North, do not become ashamed of their own shame. A disgusted world will pass sentence on them after a while. Their existence and history is a stronger argument against republicanism than was ever dreamed of by Macaulay, Lord Grey, or the London Times.

Do not our Northern Methodist brethren begin to see that non-legislation, in Church Councils, is the only Scriptural and safe ground, whatever may be our opinions on the subject of slavery? Do they not feel, with us, that it is an ineffable pity that the Church ever legislated on this subject? We say to them, come back to the Bible, and let us preach the Gospel to master and servant, and trust to the simple Gospel to accomplish the will of the Lord. The South is perfectly willing to hold and to preach all that the Bible clearly teaches on this and all other subjects.

LITERARY PREACHERS.

It is a notable fact that, in proportion to their number, the clergy contribute more largely to our literature than any other class of men. This is a natural result of their studious and reflective habits of life. It is noticeable, too, that they are not by any means confined to the range of theological or devotional literature.—There are clerical workers in every department of the literary domain. Were it possible that many men in this country could follow literature as a profession, we might wish that more laymen, and fewer ministers, should devote their time to such pursuits. But this is not the case. The literary profession, or vocation, is too unpromising in this country, pecuniarly, for many men to adopt it exclusively. Most American literary productions are the side-achievements, the result of unprofessional digressions, of men engaged in other pursuits.—And but few vocations, except that of the ministry, are favorable to literary pursuits. Hence, but few Christian laymen, comparatively, can engage in them. Therefore, until literature as a calling shall become more pecuniarily promising, we are dependent, mainly, upon the clergy for a due infusion of the Christian element into our literature. Were this not the state of the case, we might justly complain of the expenditure of so much ministerial talent and pastoral time upon book-making, as hurtful to the spirituality, and derogatory to the success of the ministry. There is, however, no antagonism between a zealous and effective ministry and literary pursuits, if the latter is not allowed to become an absorbing passion. In that case, harm is done, and it must be vigilantly guarded against. This done, ministerial study affords material for both books and sermons.

SOUTHERN TEACHERS—THE GRADUATING CLASS OF CENTENARY INSTITUTE.

The Southern people have often been charged that the influence of their "peculiar institution," and of their culture and social sentiments, were unfavorable to industry, enterprise and self-reliance. It has been a taunt of our enemies, and a complaint at home, that the South could not produce her own teachers. It has also been urged as a fault of Southern institutions of learning that so few of their graduates devoted themselves to the noble Christian calling of teaching. But, as our institutions grow older, the reproach, we are happy to say, is being wiped off. The President of Centenary Institute writes us that there are in the graduating class of that institution a number of young ladies who have prepared themselves for teachers. Some of them are prepared to give instruction in all the branches usually taught in our best colleges, including vocal and instrumental music, French, Latin, Drawing, Painting. All of them can teach the regular branches as taught in our colleges. Those wishing to employ teachers can gain all necessary information by addressing Rev. J. T. Montgomery, Summerfield Ala.

NEW YORK LITERARY GOSSIP.

New York, May 21st, 1860.

In these days nothing is talked of with us but Japan and the Japanese. Even the question of Presidential nominations is only turned to for a passing moment—the Japanese form the standard subject of talk. It is a matter of interest, therefore, to know where to read upon the great subject; and it may help some of your readers if I mention here that "Lord Elgin's Japan and China," (Harpers') "Perry's Japan Expedition," and Dr. Terne's abridgement thereof (Appleton's) and "Hildroth's Japan as it was and is," will give them as much of an insight into Japanese manners, customs and knowledge as they are likely to need for every day purposes. Besides these, I must mention, with gratitude, a little book published by the Harpers, in their "Family Library" series, which contains in a small space as much real information and interesting gossip about that curious people as would nearly suffice to make two or three portly volumes. I read it first, many years ago, in the harbor of Yeddo, and have lately looked through it again, and both times with great benefit.

The death of Macaulay gives employment to a good many writers and collectors of it in England. Adam Black, the Edinburgh publisher, has reprinted the fine biographical essays contributed, "for friendship's sake," by Lord Macaulay to the Encyclopedia Brittannica, and has prefixed to them some account of the connection which existed for some years between Lord M. and the Edinburghers, whom he represented in Parliament till they and he differed, when they elected somebody else—but relented after some years, and again returned him. It should be premised that Adam Black is one of the foremost citizens of Edinburgh, and was the one who came most intimately to contact with Lord M. as representative in Parliament. The account of that acquaintance is modestly and charmingly written, and proves to me that those who gave the impression that Lord M. was an aristocrat in feeling, were mistaken. The Messrs. Longmans have put to press their collection of Macaulay's miscellaneous writings, which will form two volumes. It will be republished here by the Harpers. The poetry includes an epitaph on Henry Martin, written when Macaulay was only twelve years old, and lines to the memory of Pitt, written in his thirteenth year. For the next seven years he produced no poetry, until in his twentieth year, when he wrote a radical war song and a ballad: "The Queen is Come." This will be altogether the most interesting collection that remains to be made of Macaulay's writings. For so voluminous a writer he has left singularly little uncollected; and for this we and the world have to thank the enterprise of American publishers, who in his case, as well as in DeQuincy's and others of the best British essayists and reviewers, first collected the stray reviews and "articles" into a volume. Lastly, a London firm has just published "Letters of Hannah More to Zachary Macaulay, Esq., containing, notices of Lord Macaulay's youth, edited and arranged by Arthur Roberts, M.A., Rector of Woodersing, Norfolk," whose father was the original editor of Mrs. Hannah More's extensive correspondence; in which, I believe, these letters do not appear. The book is said by the London critics to be a humbug; having only very meager accounts of the boy Macaulay, and not enough to justify the title. Nevertheless there is a letter from young Macaulay to Mrs. Hannah More, written in 1815, when he was only fourteen and a half years of age. It is a little ponderous, "humptious" perhaps is the word, for a lad of that age, but nevertheless straightforward and unhesitating, as ever after in his criticisms. It is curious enough to give here:

"Clapham, January 16, 1815.

"My dear Madam,—My mamma was on the point of writing to inform you that a supposed favourable alteration has taken place in Mr. Henry Thornton's case. His physicians are still sanguine in their expectations; but his friends, who examine his disorder by the rules of common sense, and not by those of medicine, are very weak in their hopes. The warm bath has been prescribed; and it is the wish and prayer of all who know him that so excellent and valuable a character may be preserved to the world.

"You will believe, my dear Madam, that no one rejoices more than I do at your recovery from the effect of the fatal accident which threatened us. Events like these prove to us the strength of our affection for our friends, and show the esteem in which great characters are held by the world.

"We are eagerly expecting the promised essay which will, indeed, be a most important addition to the literary history of the year eighteen hundred and fifteen, ample as that already is. Every eminent writer of poetry, good or bad, has been publishing within the last month, or is to publish shortly. Lord Bryon's pen is at work over a poem as yet nameless. Lucien Buonaparte has given the world his 'Charlemagne.' Scott has published his 'Lord of the Isles,' in six cantos, a beautiful and elegant poem; and Southey his 'Roderick, the last of the Goths.' Wordsworth has printed 'The Excursion,' (a ponderous quarto of five hundred pages) 'being a portion of the intended poem entitled 'The Recluse.' What the length of this intended poem is to be, as the Grand Vizier said of the Turkish poet, 'n'est connu qu'a Dieu et a M. Wordsworth.' This forerunner, however, is, to say no more, almost as long as it is dull; not but that there are many striking and beautiful passages interpersed; but who would wade through a poem

——'where, perhaps, one beauty shines
In the dry desert of a thousand lines?

"To add to the list, my dear Madam, you will soon see a work of mine in print. Do not be frightened! It is only the index to the thirteenth volume of the 'Christian Observer,' which I have had the honour of composing. Index-making, though the lowest, is not the most useless round in the ladder of literature; and I pride myself upon being able to say that there are many readers of the 'Christian Observer' who could do without Walter Scott's works, but not without those of, my dear Madam, your affectionate friend,

"Thomas B. Macaulay."

There is also some poetry, of which these few lines on Henry Martyn, the lamented missionary, written when the boy was but fourteen, are better than most of such efforts of early genius preserved to us:

"Here Martyn lies! In manhood's early bloom,
The Christian hero found a Pagan tomb!
Religion, sorrowing o'er her favorite son,
Points to the glorious trophies which he won.
Immortal trophies! not with slaughter red,
Not stained with tears by helpless orphans shed;
But trophies of the cross! to that dear name,
Through every scene of danger, toil and shame,
Onward he journeyed to that happy shore,
Where danger, toil, and shame are known no more."

The good old lady always liked the boy, and always thought he would make something, but unhappily she did not live to see the fulfillment of so good promise. The first mention of him in these letters is in 1808, when he was eight years old. She writes, "give my particular love to Tom. I am glad his classicality has not extinguished his piety. His hymns (he had been writing hymns) were really extraordinary for such a baby." In the next, three years after, she says, "Love to dear Tom," and after sending him advice to "apply hard to business, be very neat and improve his handwriting," &c., adds, "you need not add a part of my message, though it is very true, that he is a jewel of a boy."

In 1812, she says he "ought to have competitors (at school.) He is like a prince who refused to play with anybody but kings." Further on she says, "I wish he would condescend to read a little prose," which gives us a curious indication of his early reading. She feared he would be a poet and never write prose; and by and by he did something which leads her to write, "I am afraid he must be a lawyer; what a pity! but really his talents seem to lead that way;" and again, she wants "Tom's powerful genius more in exercise, especially the Bar," though in 1824 she writes, "I wish he was rich enough to be in Parliament; he would eclipse them all." A word, the complete truth of which she did not live to see proved. This is the greater part of the gossip about Macaulay.

I have a mind to bore your readers with a little synopsis of a pamphlet just published here, in New York, and in which is set forth the "Constitution or organic law of the Pantarchy," said Pantarchy being a new form of government under which society is to be conducted to its true Harmonial destiny on earth," which true Harmonial destiny is catalogued as follows by the writer: "the whole people shall be housed in palaces; the earth shall be cultivated like a garden; Equity, and Human Religion, shall reign universally; health and beauty shall be the common inheritance; all human affairs shall be radiant with a True Millenial Glory."

The "Pantarchy" is a kind of "beneficent despotism" in which all the men of talent and genius are to be provided for at Government expense—which will be a very good thing for the men of talent and genius—to read all the books of "a highly useful nature, but not promising a circulation extended enough to reward private enterprize,"—of which kind of books a publisher lately told me he had above 600 or 700 submitted to him every year—will be published at Government expense, to be the great relief of poor devil authors; in which, in fact, true teachers and pioneers of the progress of the race are to be supported at their work." How the true teachers and pioneers are to be discovered is not yet revealed. But if the Pantarch will solve that riddle for the world he will have accomplished more than all the philosophers since Plato. That is the little point which his lever needs to pry over the world.

I ought not to omit to mention that "a Court Journal will be established, (as soon as the government is going) to communicate to the subjects of the new government (who will all live in palaces) the actions of government and the progress of events."

I suppose it is not revealing any very tremendous secret to say that the deviser of this new and [illegible] Utopia is Mr. Stephen Pearl Andrews, who is for the present the "Pantarch," signing himself "Andrews," and requiring the faithful (and requesting outsiders) to send in their little contributions toward the support of the new government. Lest any of your readers should not know what manner of man Mr. S. P. Andrews is, I quote the description of him, (as Pantarch), from his own document:

"The Head of the Pantarchal State, representing the monarchial principle, or Individuality of Lead, is the Individual, self-elected, but powerless except as he is voluntarily acknowledged and obeyed, who is the most conclusions of power to devise, constitute, and direct a true Harmonious, and Triumphant Social Organization, adapted to the wants of all mankind—power to lead humanity through Science, and the Revival of Faith, and the operation of the Spirit World, and the Divine Guide back of all—the period of reconciliation of all conflicts, the harmonial or millennial age; the Golden Age of the Future. The office of this functionary is the Pantarchate—his title, Pantarch; his function, the, service of all; his diploma, the greater capacity to serve!"

That is nonsense enough for once.

The woman's question is still attractive, and some readers will perhaps thank me for submitting to them this little criticism on. (French) womankind, from the pen of Mr. Alphonse Karr. I will only premise that I don't believe a word he says:

"In a woman's life, everything leads to a new dress; everything ends with a new dress; every circumstance is marked by a new dress; and the dress is always the important point. A girl is golug to be married—a new dress! For a moment her heart is filled with love, thoughts of an entirely new existence, and of a long separation from her parents. Everything disappears before the all-absorbing question of the wedding dress. A relation dies. The grief of the ladies is violent; but it is soon checked, for the mourning has to be thought of. What are people to wear? What is the most fashionable mode of testifying one's sorrow? It is necessary to go to the linen-draper's, to the dressmaker's, to the milliner's, and in a little while all is arranged, and in the meantime we are so thoroughly occupied, that there is quite an end to the lamentation, unless, however, the dress do not happen to fit, or the bonnet be too much or too little off the head. But if the dress is made of some new material, if the bonnet is becoming, then they experience an involuntary glow; they are triumphant, they are very happy."

Let me add to this the following touching words of "the wife's helping hand," which come I don't know whence, but which will move some of your fair readers, I am sure: "At no moment of difficulty does a husband, knowing his own utter helplessness, draw so closely to his wife's side for comfort and assistance as when he wants a button to be sewed on his shirt-collar!"

The Magazines for June are just out. Harper's is a good number, as usual; and has one article of especial interest to your readers at the South. This is an important and very thorough paper on "Insects Injuring to the Cotton Plant," by Mrs. Charlotte Taylor, a Southern lady, a South Carolinian by birth, and probably the best microscopic entomologist in the United States. This paper is the result of many years of personal observation and study, and cannot fail to be very valuable to all engaged in the culture of cotton. I understand that she contemplates a paper on the insects destructive to the sugar cane; which are, however, I have been told, but few, the chief being a mischievous ant if I am rightly informed.

The other articles are, "a Summer in New England" (1st paper), by Porte Crayon, so well known to the readers of Harper. This is Mr. Strother's first appearance in New England, and I can bear witness to the wonderful accuracy of his pencil. Then comes a paper on the "Ancient Monuments in the United States," which is meant the Indian remains; by E. G. Squier. "The Century Plant," by Fitzhugh Ludlow, one of our most promising young writers; a story which opens in Baltimore. "Sullivan's Island," one of a series of ballads T. Dunn English is contributing to this Magazine. "Froth," a story of New York fashionable life by George Arnold. "The First Overland trip to California." "He was always such a Fool," a curious marital experience, by J. D. Whelpley. "Lowell's Widower," by Thackeray, with his own funny illustrations. "Miserable man that I am," by Miss Rose Terry. "The Table," whose subject is "American Culture, its characteristics and defects," is an admirable paper, by Dr. A. A. Lipscomb, which I advise no one to skip, no thinking man or woman especially.

The caricatures this month touch phrenological examinations; they are by that cleverest of American artists, M'Clennon, and the reader will find a capital caricature of M'Clennan himself in the lower right hand corner of the first page. The largest figure on the second page is a good hit at Walter Whitman, a Bohemian of some note here, who calls himself "a rough and a Kosmos," and is in fact the poet of the "rougha."

Speaking of artists reminds me that Col. T. B. Thorpe, of your State, has just completed a picture of Niagara, which is of snob excellence that the shrewd managers of the Cosmopolitan Art Association have purchased it, and are about sending it to London to be engraved, for their premium plate for next year. I have not had a look at the picture yet; but it is widely spoken of by the most competent critics here, and I quote the opinion of one of the best below:

"There was a general expression of surprise at this excellence of the Colonel's picture, for it was, we understand, his first essay in landscape. It would not be just to the artist to compare his work with the views of Niagara painted by Gignoux, Hewett, Church, and other distinguished landscapists who have given the first years of their life to that spirit land of art; but we may, without fear of offense, compare the design of Col.

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

MAY 30, 1860.

some particular parts of the picture have great merit. The grand transparency of the column of mist, through which the bright green water is seen, is a very effective piece of painting.

The Atlantic has the following papers: "The Future of American Railways," by Thomas C. Clarke, an eminent Civil Engineer. "In a Fog," by E. H. House, a promising young magazinist, of New York, who has also an article on Japan, which is timely and interesting. "The Granadian Girl's Song," a short poem, by the author of "Sir Rohan's Ghost," a young lady who turns her hand by turns to poetry, stories, and reviews, and does all with ability. "Chess," by M. D. Conway, of Cincinnati, a gentleman who has played with Morphy, and came off respectably; nobody, so far, can say more, who has tried his hand against your young New Orleanian. "Model Lodging Houses in Boston," by Charles E. Norton. "The Representative Art," by Adam Badeau. "The Vineyard Saint," a poem by Bayard Taylor. "The Sphinx's Children," by Miss Rose Terry; and "Clarsan's Picture," by Edward Spencer, a young Marylander, who is making himself a name in Magazine literature.

I just hear that "the Mill on the Floss" has sold already between 19,000 and 20,000 copies. It is not yet a month published. Surely it is something to have such an audience as that.

* * *

WASHINGTON CITY CHURCH.

MR. BATTLE'S RESPONSE TO HON. W. H. HAMMETT.

The following noble letter is encouraging. Let us have more of them:

MR. EDITOR: In your paper of the 16th I see a proposition, by the Hon. Wm. H. Hammett, of Point Worthington, Miss., to be one of one hundred to give William T. Smithson one hundred dollars, to aid in the building of the Washington City Church; and also, one of twenty to give five hundred dollars for the same purpose. I heartily respond to the hundred dollar proposition, and regret that a large expenditure of money which I am compelled to make, puts it out of my power, now, to respond to the five hundred dollar proposition; but hope that a good cotton crop next season may put me in a condition to do so. We should be ashamed that the Methodists of the Southern States have allowed the building of the Church at Washington to linger, and drag along, and wear out the energy of that noble man Smithson, as it has done.—But I trust the plan here proposed will soon raise all the money needed to complete the church, and Mr. Smithson be rewarded by a thousand thanks in this world and a crown of glory in the next.

ALFRED BATTLE.

Tuscaloosa, May 21, 1860.

And here is another. We suggested to Mr. Raiford to let the hundred dollar proposition go on, and him start a fifty dollar proposition. It will be responded to we think:

MR. EDITOR: From your paper of the 16th instant I see that Hon. W. H. Hammett has proposed to be one of one hundred who will contribute one hundred dollars to Wm. T. Smithson, to aid in building the Washington City Church. Now I propose to join him if he will bring the number down to fifty; and I will send a sight draft on Walker, Gilmore & Co., to Mr. Smithson, for the amount.

N. B. RAIFURD.

China Grove, Miss., May 25.

LITERARY NOTICES.

MANUAL OF GEOLOGY. Designed for the use of Colleges and Academies. By Ebenezer Emmons, State Geologist of North Carolina, late State Geologist of New York, Professor of Natural History and Geology in Williams College, etc. Illustrated with numerous engravings. Second Edition. New York: A. S. Barnes & Burr, 51 and 53 John-street; and sold by booksellers generally. 1860.

CHILD'S BOOK IN NATURAL HISTORY. Illustrating the Animal, Vegetable and Mineral Kingdoms; with application to the Arts. By M. M. Carll, New York: A. S. Barnes & Burr. 1860.

These books have been sent us by H. D. M'Ginnis, 36 Camp-street. They belong to the extensive and popular series of school books published by Barnes & Burr, and so favorably noticed by the press of the country.

The author of the Geology has a high reputation, and has filled high positions, in connection with this science. His book is an American work, with American illustrations of American geological formations. It is divided into twenty-five chapters, and treats of the nature and classification, and definitions of geology—geologic forces—classification and nomenclature of rocks—the Tacoaic system—the Silurian, Devonian, Carboniferous, Permian, Triassic, Jurassic, and Cretaceous systems—the Cainozoic division—Volcanoes and Earthquakes—Mineral Veins—Mean Elevation of Land—Soils, etc. The illustrations are abundant and apparently well executed.

The Natural History is adapted to children, well arranged and illustrated.

ABRIDGEMENT OF THE DEBATES IN CONGRESS, from 1789 to 1796. From Gales & Seaton's Annals of Congress; from their Register of Debates; and from the Official Reported Debates, by John C. Rives. By the author of the "Thirty Years' View." Vol. I. New York: D. Appleton & Co., 346 and 348 Broadway. Agent in New Orleans, S. Colman, 152 Baronne street.

This first volume of this valuable work extends from 1789 to 1856, embracing the debates of the first, second, third and fourth Congresses. The Index is very copious and satisfactory one, and by means of it the debates on any particular measure of interest to the reader may be easily found. We have here the account of the Inauguration, and first Inaugural Address, of Washington—debates on the Algerine War—on Amendments to the Constitution—on Freedom of Conscience—Bank of the United States—Commerce—Cotton—Tariff—Difficulties with G. Britain—Territorial and Indian Questions—The Mint—Naturalization—Seat of Government—Slavery and Slave Trade—Admission of Tennessee. These are only points selected at random to indicate the contents of this great record of the early legislation of our country. There are many things in this book, in the way of political opinions, customs, and proposed measures, which will astonish those modern politicians who have never made themselves acquainted with the early political history of the nation.—Acquaintance with these things is valuable and interesting, and so also is acquaintance with the measures and speeches of the statesmen who figured during that period.

ELEMENTS OF ENGLISH COMPOSITION, Grammatical, Rhetorical, Logical, and Practical. Prepared for Academies and Schools. By J. R. Boyd, A.M., author of Annotated Editions of English Poets, "Elements of Logic," Improved Edition of "Kames' Elements," etc. New York: A. S. Barnes & Burr, 51 and 53 John street. 1860. For sale in New Orleans by E. R. Stevens & Co., 57 Common street.

This is another of the valuable series of school books published by Barnes & Burr. It is not an original work, in one sense, and so much the better. It is rather a compilation of the best writers in the language on grammar, rhetoric, and logic, as applied to Composition. The author also draws upon his experience as an Instructor.—The work is adapted to beginners, and also to the most advanced classes. Good works on Composition are among the most valuable of books, as it is one of the most elegant and valuable of arts.

CORRECTION.

DEAR BRO. HAMILL.—The following were made Life Members of the Missionary Society, which was not noticed in your report: Gen. N. D. Guerry, $20; Isabella C. Guerry, $20; Carrie Guerry, $20; John Guerry, $20.—Bro. Guerry paid nearly $300 missionary money.

W. B. NEAL.

I add this: Bro. Guerry, so remarkable in his missionary benevolence, gave me also $600 this year for the College.

E. J. HAMILL.

RAMBLES IN SOUTH ARKANSAS.

A beautiful day—the air warm, balmy, and fragrant with the early breath of Spring, is cheering the hearts of a lady and gentleman as they drive slowly along the woodland path that winds its tortuous way through the grand old forests of oak and gum, embowered with grape vines, and waving sadly to and fro long streamers of grey moss. At a glance you perceive that they are "Arkansas travellers," intent upon accomplishing the journey to their county site, notwithstanding the trifling obstacles of trunks of trees, limbs, grape vines, horse-flies and buffalo gnats. You see from the determined air of the gentleman, and the quiet manner of the lady, that they "care for none of these things," but keep on the "uneven tenor of their way," knowing from past experience, "where there is a will there is a way," especially in Arkansas.

What a pity! There, the gentleman's "Sunday-go-to-meeting" hat has been brushed into the muddy road, with the addition of a large dent on the front side. Alighting and picking up his hat, the gentleman looked at it with such a lugubrious air as to call forth a hearty laugh from his companion; joining in the laugh and leaping into the buggy, crack goes the whip and off trots his "pets." When the morning sun arose above the dawn clouds, and neared the fashionable hour of breakfast, these Arkansas travellers had left their "Log-Cabin" far behind in its grove of dog-woods on the Bayou Bartholomew, and had come to a stand on the banks of a wide stream, with high, sloping hills stretching beyond. The gentleman is lighting a match, whilst his companion collects dry wood and leaves, to make a smoke to keep from the horses the troublesome gnats. Be patient for a moment and you will see how Arkansians manage to cross swimming water with no visible means of doing so, but two fallen trees, one from each bank, whose tops cross near the centre of the stream. Very soon a fine smoke relieves the horses, which are taken from the buggy, and the "gear" tied securely upon them. The cushions and so forth are carried over the rude tree-bridge to the opposite bank by the gentleman; returning, he calls to the lady: "Come on, there is no danger," and she, in true country style, picks up her dress, and clasping tightly the hand of her husband, trusts herself upon the slippery log over the deep water. Without a mishap she has reached the opposite shore, and standing upon the butt end of the fallen tree, awaits with some anxiety the denouement. The gentleman partially disrobes, and returning to his horses, he leads one to the water, and giving him a blow with a grape vine, the horse plunges in, and becoming frightened, he rears and plunges again in the water, over the overflow, and hies away beyond the hills out of sight. Nothing daunted the staunch Arkansian ties the rope and the "lines" to the tongue of the buggy, and mounting the remaining horse, he too plunges into the cold stream, and swimming across, alights with the rope in his hand. "Come here, wife, and help to pull the buggy over." Now comes the tug of war. "Pull steady, hand over hand." Heigh-ho! slowly comes the buggy; but alas! just at the point of success, snap go the "lines," and flat falls the gentleman, while slowly, slowly, recedes the buggy into deep water. No ways disconcerted, our traveller wades into the stream, and tying the rope to the sunken buggy, he again emerges from the water, and calling wife to his help, they succeed in pulling it to shore. "My dear, you stay here, untie the knots, and arrange the harness, and I will look over the hill for that runaway." With no other saddle but the ladies riding-skirt, he starts for the search; in the mean time the lady, as far as possible, "puts all things to rights," then seats herself at the root of a massive oak, and looks around upon the unbroken solitude of the place. On the hill tops the tall pines nodded their heads, sighed and moaned. The March wind shook the perfume from the new buds and leaflets, and rustled the dry leaves on the hill-slopes; the buffalo gnats circled and danced to their hearts' content, and the slugging water flowed stealthily along, without a single expression of cheerfulness. The solitude soon became oppressive, and the fear of wild cats and panthers made the lady arise, and scenring the hatchet, she sat down, with "Jobson's Portrait of a Mother," which she chanced to have along with her, and became so interested that she forgot all about wild cats and her lonely situation. While deeply interested by the book she was startled to a standing posture by hearing footsteps; within ten paces rode a horseman, who proved to be an old acquaintance whom the husband had met on the hills, and sent to the relief of his wife. After the usual salutation the lady rode off behind her friend, leaving the buggy and baggage to take care of themselves. An hour's ride, and they had arrived at the friend's house, where the lady was kindly entertained. About sunset the tired traveller drove up with the missing animal. Remaining over night, they started betimes the next morning, and passing rapidly over a beautiful country of woodland and prairie, they soon emerged from a skirt of woods upon a prairie, with a scarce perceptible tinge of green over its broad surface, and hundreds of oval mounds fairly covered with blue violets. It is supposed that this prairie, from the regularity of the mounds and the uniformity of their size, was once the burying ground of a now extinct people. Whatever may be their origin, they much relieve the monotony of the prairie.

It is characteristic of the sons of Arkansas to make all things pay, and that runaway horse paid dearly for his misdemeanor by being driven at the rate of eight or ten miles an hour, which soon brought the buggy and its occupants to the flourishing town of Hamburg, in Ashley county, Arkansas. Hamburg contains two Academies, a Methodist Church, which does honor to the town, a framed Court House, and many stores and beautiful residences. It is noted for the hospitality of its inhabitants. Three years ago there was not a brick chimney in the place, and but few framed houses.

M. A. C.

Log-Cabin, Bayou Bartholomew.

A NOVEL AFFAIR.

Our Board of Trustees resolved to enlarge and otherwise improve their Church here, and appointed the pastor financial agent. As soon as this was known the class leaders of the colored society wished to know of the agent if a contribution from them would be received; they said they would raise $500, and requested the Pastor to open a subscription list on the next Sunday afternoon. Two hundred and twenty-three dollars were subscribed, nearly one hundred of which was paid down in cash. Afterwards additional amounts were subscribed. The female members deeming it too slow a process, surprised the white congregation by having a notice read from the Mayor of the city, granting them permission to hold a fair. On Saturday night large crowds of finely dressed colored people assembled in the basement of the church, the upper part having been taken down. Sure enough there were all the paraphernalia of the most elegant modern fair, conducted after the most approved style, both as regards material, arrangement, and manner. The fair was visited by many of the leading families, who were lavish in praise of the taste and management of their servants. They had music and feasting, promenading and conversation; bonnets, the most rich and tasteful I ever saw. A keener critic and severer moralist might have marked a defect, and inferred a consequence disparaging to the colored people; but their modesty, politeness, cheerfulness, and simplicity commended them to those who rightly appreciate their disposition and character. Their intelligence and good behavior indicate careful training and affectionate regard from their owners. The nett proceeds of the fair were $280.

A VISITOR.

Baton Rouge, May 25, 1860.

ADAM BEDE.

MR. EDITOR—I have seen in our journals several notices of the book bearing the above name, and commended in flattering terms. Now I ask permission to say that a more scandalous and contemptible book has hardly been issued from the press in a long time. It is a covert assault on Methodism, and a fulsome laudation of every thing Episcopalian in tendency; and, besides, is low in style, mean in thought, and vulgar in much of its matter. I speak of nothing on the subject of novels. I have no controversy now on the matter. I only utter my protest against the attempt to circulate this trashy book among our people as a Methodist novel.

C. K. MARSHALL.

Vicksburg, May 24, 1860.

LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.

CALCASIEU CT.—REV. W. P. STAYTON writes: We are getting along finely. We have had some interesting meetings since Conference. We closed Sunday night that resulted in nine accessions to the Church. We have had thirty-three accessions to the Church since Conference. We feel somewhat indebted to the Carlinago circuit, Miss., for two of her local preachers that have settled in the bounds of this circuit; we should like to have several more of the same kind, for we need all the help that we can get on this large circuit. It is about 300 miles around. Your humble servant is almost broken down riding and preaching.

COLUMBIA CIRCUIT.—Rev. H. Parvin writes: We have been engaged in a protracted meeting sixteen days; twenty-one souls converted, fourteen joined the church one night; it seemed that all the sinners for ten miles around this place come to Mount Parnassus to seek the salvation of their souls. Rev. N. M. Davis, a Baptist preacher, has labored faithfully. The old soldiers have taken fresh courage. The Baptist brethren united with us, and the Lord blessed us together. It seemed like a Pentecost. I have taken 80 members on probation in the Church, have organized six Sabbath Schools, and have on hand an arrangement for a magnificent Camp-meeting. We are doing all we can towards supplying the parish with Bibles, and religious Books and Tracts. We hope each one of the new converts will subscribe for the New Orleans Christian Advocate soon.

ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

PLEASANT HILL CHILDREN MISSION.—Rev. P. R. M'Crary writes: This mission lies in the prairies of Lowndes county, embracing a wealthy community of intelligent planters, who are anxious to have their slaves religiously instructed. I preach thirteen times every four weeks, to about twenty plantations. The work has been considerably enlarged since Conference, and by the close of the present Conference year we shall have work enough for another missionary. The children are regularly catechized, and are making rapid improvement. It meets with favor from planters, negroes, and also the overseers, and some of the overseers say they intend to give a portion of their wages towards the support of the mission. Eighty have been received on probation this year, and a fine state of religious feeling at almost every appointment.

AUSTRIA AND HUNGARY.

The stern goddess Necessity, says the London Times, has made men bend beneath her yoke for many thousand years, but never has she achieved a greater triumph than in conquering the obstinacy of the Austrian Government. It is announced that measures are to be immediately taken to conciliate the Hungarian people, and to restore as much as possible the state of that land in existed before 1848. The Arch-duke Albert retires provisionally from his functions, and is replaced by General Benedek, who is commissioned to regulate the municipal laws, to reorganize the Comitats on the basis of the old institutions, to submit propositions for a central Diet, and to unite the five administrative sections which have existed since the defeat of the insurrection in 1849 into one single Administration at Buda. Thus ends the policy of "Thorough." Thus crumbles into ruin the fabric of Government which is identified with the name of Francis Joseph. After 10 years of injustice and oppression, of cruelty inspired by terror, of mistrust, espionnage, and denunciation, the Austrian Court is forced to confess its crimes have been blunders also. An immense army has been unable to give confidence to the rulers of a disaffected people, the closest alliance with neighboring despotisms has resulted in quarrels and bitterness, excessive taxation does not avert the bankruptcy of the Imperial Exchequer, religious intolerance only increases the hatred borne to the Church, and an elaborate machinery of administration does not enable the Government to carry out a single design which it proposes.

The state of Hungary has been for many months becoming more and more desperate. Previous to the late Italian war every foreign well-wisher of the Austrian empire, and even the wisest of Francis Joseph's native counsellors, urged the necessity of some change of system. A period had elapsed sufficiently long to show that the discontents which led to the outbreak of 1848 were by no means transitory in their nature. Year after year had passed away, and no sign of reconciliation between the Hungarians and the Court had been given. Imperial personages visited the country or bore rule in it, but only to surround themselves with a military and official circle, and to vent their irritability at what they called the insolence and ingratitude of the natives. The latter showed their dissatisfaction with the Government openly, and with a persevering sullenness which the Emperor has learned, since the late events in Italy, to interpret. Not that there is that antipathy of race which exists in Italy; the Hungarians, though not fond of the Germans, are content to remain under the same Government with them, and desire only institutions which make them independent. The discontent in Hungary is purely political, directed against a faithless and tyrannical Government; in Italy it was social and national, and directed against the dismemberment of the Peninsula and the presence of a foreign and dominating race. But still Hungary has been rapidly becoming as bad as Italy, and even more dangerous to the safety of the empire, inasmuch as its geographical position, and the neighborhood of the unscrupulous and aggressive Russians, would make another rebellion a death-blow to the monarchy.

The national wishes of the Hungarians will, of course, be differently represented by various parties; but we think that it will not be far from the truth to say that the people are not at bottom anxious either for a severance from Austria or for a democratic form of Government. As far as we are able to learn the state of opinion, there is but one desire—that they should be ruled constitutionally, and in accordance with the ancient rights of their country. It is only in despair of obtaining this that they would depose the Austrian Cæsar from his rank and title as King of Hungary. The beginning of Austian troubles has been the adoption of a centralizing policy, directed to the establishment of German supremacy over Czech and Magyar, Italian and Slave. To do the present Emperor justice, he was not the originator of this unfortunate system. It was the work of Viennese pedants, encouraged, perhaps, for their own purposes by the two last Russian Emperors, and aided by Rome and the priesthood, which hoped for extended authority by the overthrow of civil rights and Protestant liberties. The strength of Austria in days of old, the power which enabled her to rise unsubdued after so many defeats at the hands of the first Bonaparte, consisted in the attachment of a diversity of races, almost independent of each other, to the same Sovereign. But no sooner were the Treaties of Vienna signed than the centralizing process began, and has been continued with the same insane perseverance to the present day. At the present moment the orders in Austrian ships of war manned by the population of the Adriatic coast are given in German, and this folly is only a sample of greater ones committed in every province of the empire. This system was the real incentive to the Hungarian war, in which the great Hungarian families, with the least possible sympathy with Kossuth, took part against the Government. It is now generally admitted that the proclamation of a democratic Government by Kossuth was the chief cause of the unfortunate Hungarian failure. The terrors of the neighboring Sovereigns were aroused, and the late Czar Nicholas took the opportunity of combating the spirit of revolution, and laying the young Emperor, as he thought, under eternal obligations to him.

More than ten years past away, and Hungary, conquered, with her franchises abolished, her people subjected to the military rule, or to civil officials as insolent and even more meddlesome than soldiers, with the Romish priesthood in possession of privileges unexampled in history, and using them unscrupulously in favor of Imperial tyranny and their own, is once more on the point of insurrection. The events which have taken place in Italy carry hope to the oppressed in every part of the empire. Within the last few months it has been shown what may be accomplished by a resolute people in spite of both spiritual and worldly potentates. The Hungarians may think themselves unable to cope, alone and unaided, with the whole force of the Austrian empire, but they look forward to and prepare for the time when Austria shall be plunged into war with her two gigantic enemies. It is said that arms have been brought into the country from the side of Turkey, and so wide-spread is the determination to throw off the yoke of the Austrian Government that the Imperial officials have at last become convinced that concessions were absolutely necessary. Austria may well think the time come for a change of policy. The state of Hungary makes her powerless in the presence of France and Russia, divests her of all influence in Germany, which must now perforce look to Prussia as leader; encourages the other provinces to disaffection, and necessitates military expenses which have already almost exhausted the State. Austria has now not a friend in Europe, and can hardly borrow a florin in any European market. What the preachings of justice and morality, what even the dictates of policy, have failed to accomplish has been effected by financial embarrassment and the dread of foreign foes. The only question is whether it be not too late. Austria now grants nearly all that the Hungarians asked for ten years ago, and enough to have made them then the most loyal of subjects. Whether content will follow concessions so obviously dictated by necessity remains to be seen.

THE SICILIAN INSURRECTION.

The insurrection in Palermo broke out on the 9th of April. It was announced to the people by a loud report of musketry. The police, well aware that in the Church and the stores of Garcia (a convent at the east end of the capital) men, ammunition and arms had been assembled, made an onset against the place, which they had previously encompassed all round. Cannon were reared in that part of the marine plain which looks in a straight line towards the main door of the church. The doors were thrown down on the first discharge, and a storming party of troops and policemen advanced. They were received by volleys of musketry; but the defenders inside were but 40; a few of them fell dead; several officers were wounded; some made their escape over the roof; others sought a refuge in the sepulchral vaults; 13 were taken, and these, laden with chains, were led to prison, followed by 30 of the monks, who were dragged along with the prisoners; arms, ammunition, and a wooden cannon with iron hoops were found in the church and store-rooms. The soldiers then carried havoc and fire throughout the building; nothing was spared. A silver crucifix was broken to pieces by these Christian soldiers, shared the fragments among them. They took the golden pixis from the tabernacle, strewing its contents, the consecrated wafers or hosts, on the ground. Some fighting was still going on at Parazzi, and muskets shots were heard all along that line as far as the San Antonio gate. The fire ceased in a few hours, and the cry "Viva il Re" announced the complete victory of the troops. The soldiers had driven before them a few of the insurgents at Parazzi, and had then fired at random all along that line as far as the mentioned gate, among the unoffending population. The Lady Abbess of the Basta del Monte, out of the Macqueda gate, and a gown and surplice were dragged in chains to prison, because, unaware of any guilt, they had suffered the bells of the church to summon the faithful to the usual service.

On the 5th the soldiers again attacked Parazzi, where not a living soul was left; they battered with cannon the villas of Furno and Montegna, which had been previously sacked; those tenements burned for three days. They slew on this occasion a woman who was lying before them with an infant in arms; they slew mother and child. They killed seven women in their houses, firing at them long after they had secured their easy victory.

On the 6th, above Baida, two miles west of Palermo, on the hills 50 of the insurgents hoisted three tricolour flags on that mound which rises above the monastery; a battalion of Chasseurs attacked them; the fire lasted about four hours, without any hurt on either side, as the Royal troops, notwithstanding their numerical superiority, never advanced beyond cannot-shot of the insurgents. These latter removed their banners, retired in good order, and fell back on the adjoining Monte Cuccio, culminating height, 1,042 metres high rising above Monreale. The soldiers wreaked their wrath upon the luckless monastery and hospital of Baida, which they charged of having sheltered the insurgents in the night and supplied them with drink. Two of the monks were killed; the patients in the hospital were thrown on the ground, with the beds overturned upon them. The victorious troops encamped at Boca di Fulco.

On the 8th there was an attack on Favorita (two miles to the north). Not a few of the soldiers fell under the blows of the insurgents. The troops fell in disorder and were pursued as far as the Leoni, where they receive large reinforcements, and drove back their assailants.

On the 9th the bands of Misilmeri and Bagheria (on the mountains south and south-east) attacked the soldiers at Colonnella and Villa Giulia. Fortune declared in favor of the insurgents, but a steam-frigate, sent to the rescue of the troops, sweeping the shore with grapeshot, threw the insurgents into confusion; but they fell back with no very heavy loss.

On the 10th two strong columns were sent to the hills, from which the troops had been driven back. One of them proceeded by land, the other was sent by sea to Mondello (a headland on the north coast, about 12 miles from the city). These met with no resistance, but upon the false pretence that muskets had been fired at them from several villas they began their work of devastation, sacking, burning and battering down the houses with artillery. Seven villas, Verona, Villa Pareti, Belita and Bordonaro, with two or three others of which the names are unknown to me, thus perished in the flames. The smoke could be seen from Palermo; it looked like a general conflagration of the country. In town the following gentlemen—Baron Riso, Priuce Giardinelli, Cavalier San Giovanni, the son of Prince Monteleone, and others—were arrested, and on foot, two by two, they were marched into the Castle. Duke Verdura had been arrested on the eve of the insurrection.

On the 11th there was a second attack upon Baida. Three Italian tricolours again waved on the heights; this fire lasted two hours and a-half, but the insurgents overpowered by numbers were compelled to retreat. There was great consternation in the city. The arrests and domiciliary visits were numerous. A very painful incident marked the day. Father Ottovio Lanza (brother of Prince Butera, who died at Paris,) who was once a monk of the Olivetan order, and still was in priestly orders, and went by the name of Father Lanza, a man of rare accomplishments, and a noble character, had, together with Count Tasca, taken shelter the American Consul for leave to search the vessel. Leave was granted; the vessel was searched, and the unhappy fugitives fell thus into the hands of their pursuers.

Another nobleman, Cavalier Luigi Villarosa, befriended by Mr. Goodwin, the British Consul (a functionary highly respected and cherished at Palermo), applied for refuge to one of the English ships anchored in the harbour. The captain repulsed him, alleging his instructions, which only allowed him to extend his protection to British subjects. The unhappy Villarosa was more fortunate in his appeal to the humanity of a Russian captain, who took him on board, and, when the police called for their prisoner, incautiously pointed to the colors at his yardarm, and said that "the fugitive was already in Russia."

On the 12th there was an attack upon Monreale, at some distance from the town, at a place called Il Ploppo. We heard a well sustained fire of musketry and artillery; we began to think the thousands of insurgents so long announced had at last arrived. Great ferment reigned in Palermo; when all of a sudden, at half-past 4 o'clock, the firing ceased; the alarm bell was heard; no fugitive soldiers were seen. The insurgents were defeated. Twenty-five of them were taken prisoners; a few were wounded, none killed. Thirty of the soldiers were said to have fallen. The report spread also that some of the people in Monreale had fought on the soldiers' side—Miceli and others, patriots of 1848. The people at Palermo began to think that the revolution had miscarried; and the contest was given up. The police have removed all the clappers of the church bells, as they are afraid of the tocsin.

On the 13th, the city had still courage enough for a general pacific demonstration. General Salzano, in his order of the day, asserted that the population of Palermo were hostile to the movement. In answer to this assertion, at five o'clock in the afternoon, the whole mauhood of the town was in the streets; all the women were out of the windows, waving their handkerchiefs. They all cried, "Viva l' Italia! Viva Vittorio Emanuele! Viva la liberta!" Some cries of "Down with the police!" mingled with the other shouts. It was a surprise both to the actors and the spectators of the scene. The demonstration was got up no one knew when, how, or by whom. The police were taken aback; they looked round for an attack; they knew not how to proceed. At six o'clock all was over, the people were all safely housed.

Palermo is in a state of siege from the very earliest outbreak. No one is allowed to go about after dusk, except in case of extreme necessity, when he must carry a lantern in hand. Everywhere soldiers and cannon. No one can enter or leave the town without an express order from the commander of the place.

14th—The arrests continue; soldiers and policemen put an limit to their arrogance; they endeavor by all means to provoke a collision with the people.

15th—The thirteen persons taken with arms in their hands at La Gancia were shot this morning, at 4 o'clock, outside St. Giorgio-gate. The streets are deserted, not a person is stirring, there is not one window open.

16th.—The arrests continue; 30 carriages laden with prisoners are even at this moment driving towards the town jail.

So far the diary. A lady of rank, who, with her son, succeeded in making her escape from Palermo, owing to the protection of a foreign agent, testifies to the accuracy of the above statements, which, it is impossible to deny, bear the marks of veracity in every line.

I subjoin another extract from a letter dated the 19th:—"The country is still very quiet. For the last two days people have begun to recover from their dismay, a few shops being opened here and there to Toledo (the main street). It is stated that the Duke of Cesaro will be released to-day. His son, on the contrary, has been removed to the main prisons, and is kept in the closest confinement. A great proces will be instituted against him and a thousand other persons already arrested. Some of our noblest persons are among the number."

The 12th there was an attack upon Morreale, at some distance from the town, at a place called Il Ploppo. We heard a well sustained fire of musketry and artillery; we began to think the thousands of insurgents so long announced had at last arrived. Great ferment reigned in Palermo; when all of a sudden, at half-past 4 o'clock, the firing ceased; the alarm bell was heard; no fugitive soldiers were seen. The insurgents were defeated. Twenty-five of them were taken prisoners; a few were wounded, none killed. Thirty of the soldiers were said to have fallen. The report spread also that some of the people in Monreale had fought on the soldiers' side—Miceli and others, patriots of 1848. The people at Palermo began to think that the revolution had miscarried; and the contest was given up. The police have removed all the clappers of the church bells, as they are afraid of the tocsin.

On the 13th, the city had still courage enough for a general pacific demonstration. General Salzano, in his order of the day, asserted that the population of Palermo were hostile to the movement. In answer to this assertion, at five o'clock in the afternoon, the whole mauhood of the town was in the streets; all the women were out of the windows, waving their handkerchiefs. They all cried, "Viva l' Italia! Viva Vittorio Emanuele! Viva la liberta!" Some cries of "Down with the police!" mingled with the other shouts. It was a surprise both to the actors and the spectators of the scene. The demonstration was got up no one knew when, how, or by whom. The police were taken aback; they looked round for an attack; they knew not how to proceed. At six o'clock all was over, the people were all safely housed.

Palermo is in a state of siege from the very earliest outbreak. No one is allowed to go about after dusk, except in case of extreme necessity, when he must carry a lantern in hand. Everywhere soldiers and cannon. No one can enter or leave the town without an express order from the commander of the place.

14th—The arrests continue; soldiers and policemen put an limit to their arrogance; they endeavor by all means to provoke a collision with the people.

15th—The thirteen persons taken with arms in their hands at La Gancia were shot this morning, at 4 o'clock, outside St. Giorgio-gate. The streets are deserted, not a person is stirring, there is not one window open.

16th.—The arrests continue; 30 carriages laden with prisoners are even at this moment driving towards the town jail.

So far the diary. A lady of rank, who, with her son, succeeded in making her escape from Palermo, owing to the protection of a foreign agent, testifies to the accuracy of the above statements, which, it is impossible to deny, bear the marks of veracity in every line.

I subjoin another extract from a letter dated the 19th:—"The country is still very quiet. For the last two days people have begun to recover from their dismay, a few shops being opened here and there to Toledo (the main street). It is stated that the Duke of Cesaro will be released to-day. His son, on the contrary, has been removed to the main prisons, and is kept in the closest confinement. A great proces will be instituted against him and a thousand other persons already arrested. Some of our noblest persons are among the number."

The massacres, fires, and depredations of which the Royal troops have been guilty, are something unheard of. Whole towns, of 5,000 to 6000 souls in the country about Palermo are destroyed, the population cut in pieces. The finest villas, the magnificent palaces of our aristocracy, are all in ashes. Military executions have begun; no one knows when they are to end. Fourteen were shot in the first batch, 18 in the second.

ENGLISH VIEW OF THE IRISH EXODUS.

The Irish emigration still continues, says the London Times. It is no longer the overflow of a vessel full to repletion, but the operation of a syphon which drains to the very bottom. The railway system in the eyes of every Irishman appears to have one common terminus across the Atlantic. He sees trains of hopeful, if not happy, faces going off to the Land of Promise, from which relations and friends have sent not only invitations but the means of accepting them. They constitute the storehouse of independent enterprise which Providence would seem to have prepared through long ages for the peopling of the New World. If this goes on long, as it is likely to go on, Ireland will become very English and the United States very Irish. When an English agriculturist takes a farm in Galway or Kerry he will take English laborers with him. The days may indeed come when Ireland will be no more Celtic than the Scotch lowlands are Saxon, the Eastern Counties Danish, Cornwall even Phœnicina, and Ireland itself Milesian or Spanish. But several millions more undiluted Celts cannot be poured into the United States without leavening them yet more strongly with that very marked element. There will be more poetry, more moro eloquence, and more fanaticism, more faction, more conspiracy, more resentment, more bloodshed, more inabordination, more of the narrow politics that take their origin from race, and stop short of society, that ever account the whole less than the part, and think the best use of government is to do convenient ill. So an Ireland there will still be, but on a colossal scale, and in a new world. We shall only have pushed the Celt Westwards. Then, no longer cooped up between the Liffey and the Shannon, he will spread from New York to San Francisco, and keep up the ancient feud at an unforeseen vantage. We must girdle our loins to encounter the Nemesis of seven centuries' misgovernment. To the end of time a hundred million people spread over the largest habitable area in the world, and confronting us everywhere by sea and by land, will remember that their forefathers paid tithe to the Protestant clergy, rent to absentee landlords, and a forced obedience to the laws which those had made. But, even though the vengeful Celt should forgive and forget, that will not prevent the surer development of an intractable race and untoward circumstances in the character of the Great American nation. It will be more than half Celtic. Saxon, Dane, Gael, French, German, African, and other races will be there, but the preponderating element will be that which has risen to its perfection and glory on the banks of the Seine, and fallen to its depth and despair on the western promontories of Ireland. As "the child is father of the man," so have we seen nursed and educated by our side at home the power that will dominate over the New World, show its influence over either ocean, and be the lord of a whole hemisphere. This is the true and final home of the Celtic race. It is for this that it has wandered and suffered these two thousand years; for this, that it has never planted the firm foot of civilization on the soil that was not to be its resting-place, but has dwelt in tents and hovels, and not possessed the soil under the soles of its feet. We have been owners and masters of Ireland that its inhabitants might one day have elsewhere a grander possession and rule.

FOREIGN.

Garibaldi's Expedition to Sicily.—Great Agitation throughout Italy.

The expedition of General Garibaldi in Sicily was attracting much attention throughout the continent.

Gen. Garibaldi at the head of an army amounting in all to about 1000 men, had landed at Marsala, a city situated in the Northwestern part of the Island of Sicily.

Directly opposite Marsala two frigates of war belonging to the Government of Naples attacked Garibaldi's vessels, and after a sharp engagement one of his frigates sunk and the other was captured by the Neapolitans.

It is stated that after the loss of his vessels, Garibaldi, at the head of his army marched into Sicily and was making good progress.

Some said he had already captured some of the most important points on the Island, except Messina and Palermo, and that he was moving on the latter.

Shortly after the landing of Garibaldi's troops at Marsala, one of the war frigates belonging to the King of Naples bombarded the city without giving warning to vessels laying in the port.

A British vessel interposed for the protection of the English residing in the city.

Six thousand volunteers had already enrolled and were ready to leave at a moment's notice.

Col. Medici was making great preparations for a second expedition, which would take its departure at an early day.

It had been asserted that an enormous diplomatic representation made to Piedmont would decide the government to prevent the departure of a second expedition.

Great agitation prevails both at Naples and in Palermo, on account of the great insurrectionary movements on the Island and the triumphant march of Garibaldi.

Approaching Difficulties with Turkey.

Advices received from Constantinople state that the government of Russia is again acting against Turkey in the interest of the Christians.

Russian troops are concentrating along the borders of the Pruth, and a revolution is considered imminent.

MARRIAGES.

"It is not good for man to be alone."

May 27th, by Rev. J. M. Bolland, at Captain W. L. Howard's Hotel, Eastern Shore, Alabama, Mr. STANISLE PREVOT, to Miss LAURA PREVOT, both late of N. O., La.

By Rev. J. C. Keener, on the 28th inst., at Mr. J. Moore's this city, Mr. THOMAS S. GRAHAM, of Bossier parish, to Miss VIRGINIA E. STRATHER.

LUTHA FONTELLE.—We know not what impression this new contributor may have made upon our readers, but we consider her a writer of much promise, combining fine literary taste and sound evangelical piety. "THE SOUTHERN HOME," in last week's issue, is as eloquently beautiful in description as almost any of the sketches of the lamented Mrs. Caroline Lee Henlz, whose style was very similar. The charming "conceit," in the poetical part, of the conspiracy of the Southern roses, to flatter Old Winter, on his return from his annual tour North, out of his usual custom of changing the fashion of their dresses is really ingenious and striking. This sketch is equal, in our opinion, to most similar productions in the popular literary papers of the country. "LUTHA FONTELLE" is a young lady of Louisiana, and only needs literary aspiration, (which she has, we trust,) careful study of the best writers, and patient labor, to succeed with her pen. Our readers will be glad to know, we doubt not, that she will write regularly for the Advocate.

SITUATION WANTED.—We call attention to the Card of Miss M. H. Hall, on third page, sixth column. She desires a situation as a teacher.

RECEIPTS, BY THE POST-OFFICE,

From May 22d to May 29th, 1860.

A—W B Adams, $5.
B—J Boyce, $3 50; E Baldwin, $2 07.
D—J D Ducoa, $2 50.
F—J W Ford, $2.
G—J J Grace, $20 90; R P. Gordon, $2.
J—W M Jayce, $5.
M—J R Mayhew, $1 00; J J Millsaps, $5; J S Matthews, $2; W. B. Moore, $2; W Montgomery, $2 50.
R—W J Robinson, $7 25.
S—A J Smith, $0; J F Shaldon, $5; W Shepard, $2; D H Smith, $6; M C Smith, $3; S S Scott, $16, F W Shurbrough $12; S J Spotts, $2.
T—M C Turrentine, $30.
W—A West, $5; P J Walker, $1-66.

COMMERCIAL.

MONDAY EVENING, May 28th, 1860.

We condense the following statement from the New Orleans Price Current of the 20th instant:—

Our general market has not exhibited much animation during the week just closed, operations in some of the leading articles being restricted by the limited n

ALLINE ELWIN: A TALE OF ALABAMA.

BY FANNY SHALDON.

Chapter I.

"Oh lightly, lightly tread;
A holy thing is sleep
On the worn spirit shed,
And eyes that wake to weep."

"Do not awaken her, Sarah," said Mrs. Elwin to a servant who had just entered the room. "Poor dear child, she has watched beside my bed all night, and is weary enough;" and she sighed heavily as she gazed on the pale, care-worn features of her eldest daughter, who had thrown herself on the couch beside her mother to obtain an hour's rest. Night after night she had sat in that room beside her sick and suffering mother, all alone, cosoling the long tedious hours as they passed by, and almost despairing of ever seeing day dawn again; the ticking of the old clock and her own lonely thoughts her only company. As Mrs. Elwin gazed on the form and features of her child, now just visible in the dim light of early morning, an expression of deep sadness came over her countenance; her pale, emaciated features contrasted with intense anguish, and her lips moved in prayer. "O God," she exclaimed, were it not for Allise and little Mary, I would not care how soon I might be laid away to rest. Oh, the rest of the grave. How I long for its calm, tranquil repose. Life has been to me a torrid day, parched by wied and sue' ; her death will be a calm cool night when the weary day is done.' Oh! what will become of my helpless, destitute children; so young, so friendless; who will care for and protect them?"

As these thoughts passed gloomily through her mind and weighed heavily on her heart, Alline moved uneasily and awoke.

"Mother, is there anything I can do for you?" she said. "I have slept longer than I intended."

"No, my child, I do not wish anything; I am only sorry that your rest has been so short; your pale face and weary look grieves me much; you require rest, and must take it."

"I am much refreshed, mother, and feel very well I assure you. Do, dear mamma, do not distress yourself for me. See, what a beautiful morning we have. If this delightful weather continues long, you will soon be well again, and then we shall all be so happy. Little Mary even looks sad and thoughtful for mamma, and wished Ally would let her sit up and help to nurse her last night."

And the young girl kissed the pale brow of the invalid with ineffable tenderness. As she thus strove to cheer and encourage her suffering parent, her own heart was beguiled from sad thoughts and anxious fears. But Mrs. Elwin was not deluded by the flattering hopes of her child; she knew that a few more days or months would end her suffering, sorrowing—yes, but for her children—cheerless existence. She felt that ere long she would be far away in heaven, where sorrow and sickness never come, where no clouds ever lower, and where the brightness of noon is never dimmed or shrouded by the gloom of night; yet she strove to appear [illegible] "some consolation" [illegible] Azrael, for she could not bear to pain or distress her child. She knew that the bright hopes of her Alline would soon wither, and that trouble and desolation would ere long be the portion of her darling child. But her firm trust in the ever watchful providence of God calmed her troubled heart, and enabled her to view her approaching death with resignation. She believed that Ha who hears the cry of the young ravens would watch, care for and guard her orphans with a father's love.

Religion! How it calms our fears, dispels our gloom, and floods even our darkest hours with beams of heavenly light! The love of God soothes our sorrows, cheers our drooping hearts, and changes our disappointments into blessings that will "work out for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory."

Chapter II.

"From the home of childhood's glee,
From the days of laughter free,
From the love of many years,
Thou art gone to cares and fears;
To another path and guide,
To a bosom yet untried!
Bright one! oh! there well may be Trembling 'midst our joy for thee."

Mr. Elwin had married early in life a young and beautiful girl, whose friends and relatives were not very favorably inclined towards him. They tried to influence Cecilia to discard him, but this she refused to do, urging that it was with her mother's approval that she had promised her hand to Mr. Elwin; and, "come what may," she was heard to exclaim, "I am determined to marry him, and, as far as I am able, to make him happy." She believed that he felt a deep, earnest love for her. How few young girls ever doubt the sincerity of the lips that breathe love to them. Better, far better would it be for them were they as able to discriminate, for themselves, between the earnest abiding love of the virtuous and good; and the fickle, sordid affection of the mercenary and bad, as they are for others.

As the period for the fulfilment of her engagement drew near, she strove to appear cheerful, and to lighten his depressed spirits, for the sake of the love he bore her. Ah! could the veil of futurity have been raised, could the dim uncertain path before her have been disclosed, could the spectral forms of Care, Sickness, and Privation have been seen, how fearfully would she have shrunk from the consummation of those bridal vows. Not that Mr. Elwin did not love her; for he did feel an affectionate interest in the beautiful girl whose smiling bright look ever met his; whose earnest, varied conversation, and sweet, soft voice beguiled many an hour which otherwise had been passed in gloom and anxious thought; for he perceived the change which became every day more clear, in the manner of Cecilia's relatives, and he determined to hurry on his marriage as soon as possible; for, as the probability of losing her increased, so also increased his desire of possessing her.

Poor Cecilia! Warm and affectionate in her nature, with a mind and heart conscientiously striving to do her duty, it was a painful task to be compelled to wound or displease her friends. They had ceased to urge her to break her engagement; but, although they said little now on the subject, it was plain to be perceived that they thought her mind chilled and impradent. This grieved her sensitive heart, and as she was soon to leave them, she yearned for their love and sympathy.

The day of the wedding arrived. The WEDDING DAY! How many a destiny it has sealed for weal or woe! How many a young warm heart has beat with fond emotion, has exulted in the fruition of long cherished hopes and dim visions of joy, at this period in life! And oh how few of these bright anticipations and thrilling rapturous feelings have ever been fully realized! How many of those bright dreams have been dissolved, and the tenderness and devotion of the unselfish, self-sacrificing heart been crushed, or wafted away into the dark stream of forgetfulness! Cecilia bore no buoyant, hopeful heart this day; there were no wild, fluttering pulsations of overflowing joyousness, no spontaneous out-gushing of rapture on this her bridal eve. Morning dawned clear, bright and beautiful, as if to mock her sad, heavy heart. There was no hurry, excitement, or glad echo of voices, showing that anything more than usual was to take place; all looked grave and cold.

Cecilia sought her room after an early breakfast and threw herself in loneliness of heart on her couch to weep bitter tears. Her generous, affectionate nature was deeply grieved at the coldness of her mother; she could better have borne the chagrin of her brothers and sisters; but it was at the entreaties of her mother that she had at first yielded her consent to marry Mr. Elwin, and she felt that she was doing her cruel injustice. As evening approached, an aunt of Cecilia's came to offer her services in preparing for the wedding; she had always loved her with much tenderness; for, besides being her namesake, she had been called very much like her in disposition and person, and the old lady was very angry when she perceived the indifference and want of consideration shown by the family. She said it was a shame, and that it should never be said that Cecilia Morton was married without the usual ceremonies and festivities of a wedding. In vain Cecilia urged her not to think of this. She persisted in having things all her own way. A bride's cake and other preparations were soon progressing rapidly under the care and attention of the kind aunt.

At twilight the parlors were brilliantly lighted, and there began to assemble quite a large company, for Cecilia had many warm friends, who were delighted at the thought of witnessing her marriage and spending the last evening with her. They had not long to wait before the young couple appeared. The bride was simply attired in a robe of white India muslin; a veil of rich Mechlin lace fell in flowery gracefulness to her tiny white slippers; her only ornament was a white rose, that had been placed on her bosom by one of her young friends at the moment of leaving her room. Indeed these simple adornments better became the fair young girl than would have done rich jewels or more costly ornaments. Her pale, but serene brow bespoke a heart free from guile, and a conscience void of offence toward her friends and toward her God.

AFFAIRS IN MEXICO.

The Vera Cruz correspondent of the Crescent says: It is evident that the cause of the Liberal party is rapidly gaining ground in Mexico; it is equally evident that unless the McLane-Ocampo treaty is ratified by the Senate of the United States that there will be no peace in this country.

England and France are not idle—both have tendered their mediatorial offices to the Liberal and Church parties, and both have been rejected by the Liberals—the French having been accepted by the Miramon Government.

The English offer is upon a plan proposed by Lord John Russell—thus: "The convening of a National Assembly, both parties to be represented; mutual concessions to be made, and the guarantees of civil and religious liberty to constitute an element of the Government to be established." The Liberals accept that proposition. But Mr. Matthew, the British Minister to Mexico, recognizing the Miramon Government, (which rejects the plan of Lord John Russell, on account of the guarantees of civil and religious toleration) has presented his views of Lord John Russel's proposal, and says to the Liberal Government that the Assembly, under the Constitution of 1857, would not be an impartial Assembly; and hence, the Liberals reject the British offer as qualified by the British Minister. The French Minister (Mr. Gabriac) makes a similar proposal for an Assembly, but leaves out of view the principle of civil and religious toleration. The Miramon Government accepts that offer, but the Liberals reject it, as it would be a surrender of the basis upon which they hope to establish a permanent peace in Mexico.

Our Minister, Mr. McLane, is satisfied with Lord John Russell's proposal, and would wish to see it adopted by both of the contestants, but he is not satisfied of Lord John Russell's proposal with Mr. Matthew's qualification. Mr. McLane sustains the Constitutional Government in rejecting any plan by which the principle of civil and religious toleration would be sacrificed to it, and in this he will be sustained by his own Government and the American people.

There are some very striking features connected with the present attitude of Mexican affairs. The most prominent is found in the fact that the President of Mexico (Juarez) is a descendant from one of the tribes of Montezuma—that he is a clear Indian, without any taint of contamination from Spanish blood. It is three hundred and forty years since Cortez conquered Mexico, and the Spanish race so subjugated the country that the two races, Indian and Spanish, have become almost perfectly blended. But the Indian race rises superior to the Spanish, in every element that goes to make up usefulness and character. Throughout the right owners of [illegible] are naturally inclined to [illegible] On the summit Mexico the Indian race, dependent and [illegible] perament, and susceptible of making good citizens under the fostering care of a sound and liberal Government.—This is sought for by the President, General Juarez, in an effort to rid the country of Spanish Catholic corruption and abuses, and to obtain under the principle of civil and religious liberty that general and generous sentiment of inspiration which has given to the people of the United States their greatest energy, purpose and prosperity.

Should Mexico find herself aided and befriended by the United States, she will become identified with our people in commerce and intercourse; and, instead of regarding us with suspicion, she will find herself stimulated to enrich her people by a reward to her awakened energies and industry.

It is said that the Miramon party at the city of Mexico are out of money, out of provisions, and very much disheartened. From all quarters in the interior the Liberals are advancing rapidly to conquest. The French Minister Gabriac reports it around Mexico that he has a leave of absence. The fact is, he has been recalled, and the new French Minister is looked for here. Mr. White, the new English Minister, is also on his way here to supplant Mr. Matthew. Should the Senate ratify the McLane treaty, France and England would at once, under their new Ministers, recognize the Liberal Government.

If the Senate does not ratify the treaty, there will be an European intervention before the first day of November. Particarroyo, Minister of War, has resigned, and General Ampudia (who was whipped by Old Zack at Palo Alto. Resaca and Monterey) has been appointed to the War Office. Messrs. Minister McLane and Consul Pickett have gone on a two weeks' cruise on the Brooklyn, to look around Yucatan a little. Whether delightful, and vomito scarce. General LaVega, captured by Captain May at Resaca de la Palma, has been shot by the Liberals at San Louis Potosi.

Miramon is on the eve of leaving the city with 1800 troops, to march to the relief of Cobos, closely besieged by the Liberals at Oajaca. Governor Zamora is preparing to send from this State 3000 Liberals into the interior. General Carabajal arrived here last night.

The Matamoras correspondent of the Crescent gives an account of the great battle on the 24th ult., at the pass of Pinos, between the Liberalists under Gen. Uraga and the Centralists under Gen. Romulus de la Vega, in which the latter was defeated, with the loss of all his artillery, (18 pieces) one thousand men and himself captives in the hands of the victorious Uraga. La Vega is the General who fought so gallantly at Palo Alto, and was taken prisoner by Col. May.

This victory has opened the road from here to the interior, and it is already announced that a large conducta of some $2,000,000 is on the road from Zacatecas for this place. If such is the case, there is a better time ahead for trade both here and in Brownsville, for the interior is pretty well barren of goods at present, and large purchases will have to be made in this and in your market. It is said that this conducta will reach Matamoras within the next ten days, unless the late victory by Uraga should open the road to Tampico, when part of the treasure may be directed to that point.

Great interest is felt here in the action of your Congress upon the McLane and Ocampo treaty, for it is publicly declared by Gov. Trevinor, of this State, (Tamaulipas) that he will resist its enforcement with the whole power of the State. In Nuevo Leon the same, if not greater opposition exists. I presume your people do not intend to pay for such a treaty and then fail of its enjoyment; be frightened out of a policy which will open up this entire country to a better condition than it ever enjoyed before. Of the large imports into the Custom-House at Tampico, Great Britain enjoys five dollars where we get one, simply because English merchants have the start, and the sympathy of the Mexicans, owing to their misrepresentations of our traders. It only requires a decent opportunity for the New Orleans merchant, and he will run John Bull from Tampico as he has run him from Gaymas, Acapulco, Matamoras and Minatitlan.

But to reap these advantages, the United States must not only accept the treaty, but you must be prepared to force it through in spite of local armed resistance. Your terms are made with the Mexican nation, but your greatest opposition will arise from State and Municipal authority, and nothing but prompt action will suppress such annoyances. Make up your minds as to a fair interpretation of the compact, determine to deal justly, and then act in the premises on these conclusions.

The news from the interior is rather favorable to the Liberal cause at present, as dates from Zacatecas represent that Gen. Lozada has been defeated and driven away from Tepic, that Guanajuato has been besieged and is likely to fall into the hands of Juarez, and that the Centralists everywhere have been seriously depressed by the failure of the expedition of Miramon. At the same time, also, Miramon, through his subordinate generals, has commenced a system of oppression against all foreigners in the State which must break up every German, Frenchman, Englishman and American in the country, unless something is done to check his course.

Many well informed Mexicans are anxious as to the result of the next Presidential election. They are considerably relieved at the result in Charleston, as there is a strong hope with them now that some conservative old fogy will get the nomination, who will let things move along as they have been.

The population has been given over to great rejoicing over the late victory by Uraga, and a final pacification is already talked of as likely to result in the shape of a compromise. I think the imminent peril which seems to threaten Mexico from your side of the Rio Grande will ultimately heal up the breach amongst our contentious great men, and that for a little while there will be a state of peace.

There has been and is going on now a tremendous importation of Conestoga wagons, from Pennsylvania. I think there could not have been fewer than two hundred of the largest kind crossed over from your side of the river within the last two months, and still the cry is "more!" Another article of importation in this country from Texas is cotton, brought here from Victoria, Seguin and adjoining counties.

VICTOR EMANUEL AND THE POPE.

The European papers have made public the correspondence between the feminine old Ecclesiastic, and the burly champion of Italian nationality.

It is, says the London Times, a very curious specimen of Royal and Pontifical correspondence. The King writes most like a priest, and the Priest most like a dragoon. On the one side of this affair we have a Monarch with a relatively powerful army using the most gentle and deferential and peaceful language, striving in the most oily phrase to convince the Priest that it is His Majesty's duty to take from the Priest something which the Priest earnestly desires to retain. On the other side we have the testy old Priest, in short, stringent and decisive sentences, rejecting these blandishments, abusing their author very heartily, and telling him in good set terms what he may expect here, and especially hereafter, if he should dare to interfere with his property. It seems that so early as the 3d inst December the Pope had written an autograph letter to the King of Sardinia, desiring him to maintain before the then projected Congress the rights of the Holy See. The King, on the 6th of February following, replies to this apostolic letter, and, instead of promising compliance with its request, lays before the Holy Father what the Sardinian view of the then existing crisis is. Victor Emanuel is the devoted son of the Church, his race is a pious race, and all his own acts have been of the most pious character. The Pope, he flatters himself, cannot but feel how sincere his veneration has been, and what zeal he has shown in defence of "the right and authority which the "Holy See exercises on earth by virtue of the "Divine mandate of Heaven." He has given a hundred proofs. When the Legations rose against the Papal authority it was entirely without any promptings from Sardinia. When they offered themselves for annexation Victor Emanuel repulsed them. When "the presence of an audacious General"—meaning, of course, Garibaldi—"put in peril the tranquility of provinces "occupied by the troops of the Holy See," who but Victor Emanuel interposed to remove him from the neighborhood? But all these good offices of the Sardinian King were in vain. The people expelled the officers of His Holiness, and continued to attend their churches and to conduct their religious ceremonials just as if they had been acting under express orders from Rome. This was a very distressing state of matters; but what was to be done?—It so happened that Victor Emanuel had a particular mission to perform. It was the mission which was proclaimed by the Pope Julius II., and which was taken up by the Sovereigns of the house of Savoy; and its purport was "to deliver Italy from foreign domination." It was unhappily evident—thus Victor Emanuel went on to argue—that the re-conquest of the Romagna could only be effected by foreign assistance. This the honor of a Prince of the House of Savoy could not allow, and the "generous heart and the evangelical charity" of the Pope could not possibly permit him to wish. Religion itself would suffer; and, although physically the dominion of the Pope might be thus restored, morally the provinces would be still more entirely lost. It was very difficult to know what a devoted son of the Church, and the scion of a pious race, and the inheritor of the task of expelling foreigners from Italy, ought to do in so complex a contingency. But Victor Emanuel had his idea. That idea he submitted with confidence to the Pope. It was this—that Romagna and the Marches and Umbria should all be allowed to participate in the blessings which annexation to a strong Italian kingdom had already secured to a large portion of Central Italy. This is, lightly paraphrased, the pith of this humble and oily epistle. The Pope, when he got to the end of it, seems to have bounded from his chair of St. Peter. He had smiled upon Victor Emanuel had disclosed to him his "idea" of taking from him not only the Romagna, but also the Marches and Umbria. The Pope throws back the Royal "idea" with fierce indignation, denouncing it as utterly unworthy of a Catholic King and of a Prince of the House of Savoy. He says nothing about Julius II., but uses strong language as to the miserable state of that man's soul who could differ so diametrically from the Pope, and could have such bad designs upon the Papal States.

It must be confessed that the King of Sardinia's "idea" was somewhat of that character which we conventionally call "cool." To approach a man with expressions of veneration and devotedness, and then to tell him that the only plan you can suggest for recovering his lost property is that he should surrender all the rest, does seem calculated to put a venerable old gentleman into a passion, even if he should be a Pope. There was a grand opportunity here for a grave and dignified rebuke which must have told upon the opinion of the world. Pio Nono, however, unless the occasion falls [illegible] Christian education are revealing themselves in scoffing, and the bitterness of his soul; giving occasion to irreverent bystanders to laugh rather than sympathize. The King waited a month after this, and then renewed the correspondence in the same vague and deferential tone, but following, as before, a very decided meaning to peep through his silken phrases. He talked of a necessity which the force of events had induced, and to which even the Holy See must submit, and he spoke of contributing to the charges of the Popedom. In indistinct but unmistakable words he offers the Pope a title and a pension. The Pope's response to this letter has more of the gravity of a State document than that which was drawn from him by the sudden development of the King of Sardinia's first idea. He protests strongly, and he launches at the King some sharp epigrams, insinuating many charges of which he had no actual proof, but could have no moral doubt. He does not, however, scold.

Nothing arose out of this correspondence, which, when the King and the Pope had exhausted themselves, was continued with an equal inconsequence by Cardinal Antonelli and Count Cavour. In it both parties maintain the position which all the world knows that they held. The King of Sardinia is bent upon reuniting all Italy under his own sceptre,—a very patriotic and highly praise-worthy enterprise, which is not without its collateral and personal attirements. The Pope is doggedly determined to maintain in its integrity the most stupid despotism that Christendom has ever seen; or to screem and threaten as each shred is torn from him. Both parties in this correspondence act thoroughly up to the part which they have undertaken to play. Perhaps we may learn a little more distinctly from the King's letter that it is within his present plan to help himself to the rest of the Roman States. We knew already, however, that he had offered the Pope a titular sovereignty and a pension, and we know also that the Pope had obstinately refused all negotiation and all compromise.

DECLINE OF JERUSALEM.—Letters from Jerusalem complain of the desecration of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. The dome has fallen in, and the church is partially inundated with water. Mussulmous smoke pipe and drink coffee in the vestibule, children play, and beggars demand alms in the aisles.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

Tribute of Respect.

At the second Quarterly meeting for Natchez Station, held May 14th, 1860, the following preamble and resolutions, offered by brother D. L. Rivers, were unanimously adopted:

In view of the afflicting intelligence of the death of Rev. B. M. DRAKE D.D., this Quarterly Conference cannot withold some expression of its estimate of his character and services, more especially as he had stood so long the embodiment and illustration of the Church's best teaching, and our fittest model of an Ambassador of Christ.

For forty years he had devoted his life with undivided purpose to the itinerant ministry in the Methodist Church, steadily winning to himself the confidence of the people and endearing himself to every class of society, as a man of noble and generous nature, and a Christian whose highest aim was to walk with God." Therefore, we, representing the common sentiment of the Church in this city,

Resolve. That acquiescing in this inscrutable providence, we can only bow down and say, "Thy will be done"

That by the death of this great and good man, the whole Christian Church has lost one of its most zealous and useful members, and society one of its brightest ornaments, a man possessing rare conversational powers, unmixed with levity or austerity; gentle and dignified, kind and sympathizing—the social and Christian virtues so uniting in him as to gain our warmest love, and excite our highest admiration. That his ministerial character was always distinguished by courtesy and integrity, simplicity and devotion, diligence and ability, labor and study, thus rendering him eminently useful to the flock of Christ, and a worthy example for all who were called to the like holy office.

That we most heartily tender to his bereaved family our condolence, and commend them to the protection and guidance of Him who is too good to be unkind.

That as a testimonial of our respect for the memory of the deceased, and in consideration of his life long solicitude for us, the Church shall be draped in mourning.

That the Secretary shall furnish a copy of these proceedings to the New Orleans Christian Advocate for publication, and also transmit a copy to the family of our deceased brother.

W. H. WATKINS, P. E.

GEN. I. DICKS, Secretary.

Tribute of Respect.

Whereas, by an afflictive dispensation of all-wise Providence, brother ZACHARIAH THOMSON has been recently removed from the walks of men, therefore be it resolved by this Quarterly Conference,

1st, That we have heard of the death of our aged brother in Christ with profound regret and that we sincerely sympathize with the bereaved family which he has left to mourn his departure.

2d. That in the death of brother Thomson this Conference has lost one of its oldest and most valuable members, Paulding circuit one of its most experienced and worthy stewards, the Church of Christ and particularly the M. E. Church, South, a sincere friend and zealous advocate.

3d. That in the life and deportment of our deceased brother during his long connection with the Church of which he was a member, the principles and doctrines of our holy religion have been beautifully and practically illustrated.

A. F. DANTZLER, Sec.

Tribute of Respect.

Whereas it has become the melancholy duty of the members of the 2nd Quarterly Conference of White Pleine Circuit, Alabama Conference, held at Oxford on this, the 21st day of April, 1860, to take into consideration the death of our much beloved and worthy Brother, D. WOBNOCK, who departed this life on the 26th day of February, 1860:

Resolved—That in the death of Brother Wornock the Church has lost one of her most zealous and faithful members, and the Quarterly Conference one of its most vigilent and sobergetic Stewards.

Resolved—That the wife of our deceased Brother has lost a kind and affectionate husband, his children a much esteemed and devoted parent, and the community a worthy citizen.

W. P. HOWELL, Sec.
W. D. MATTHEWS, P. E.

MRS. CATHARINE M. WARNOCK died at the residence of her brother, J. M. Ford, Caddo Parish, La., Feb. 24, 1860, in the 47th year of her age. She had been a resident of Caddo parish for more than 20 years. She was born and raised in Marion county, Mississippi; she had been in declining health for 12 months. She had also heavy domestic afflictions that weighed down her spirits. Her history and experience admonish the imprudent and too confiding daughters of Eve to prize high the son of Bathah, but shun the sons of Bacchus more than the deadly viper. She professed religion in her youthful days, and was an acceptable member of the Methodist Church. Though her religious privileges were few, seldom having an opportunity to attend public worship, yet she read her Bible, and sought comfort from its cheering doctrines and promises. She enjoyed the comforts of religion; she died in peace, and felt that "to die was gain."

J. M. FORD.

EDUCATIONAL.

CENTENARY INSTITUTE, SUMMERFIELD, LA.—Annual Examination begins Tuesday, June 19th and closes Friday following.

SUNDAY, June 24th—Commencement Sermon, by Br. Lovick Pierce, of Columbus, Ga.

MONDAY, Forenoon—Exhibition by young men. Address before Literary Societies of the young men, by Rev. Dr. J. W. Harmon, of the Alabama Conference. Noon—Exhibition by young men

TUESDAY—Compositions by the junior class of the Female Department—Address on Music, by Rev. Dr. Pinl. P. Neely, of Alabama Conference. Night—Concert by junior portion of the Music Class.

WEDNESDAY—Commencement day; Regular Exercises; Address by Rev. Dr. W. J. Sasnett of Athens. Night—Grand Concert by Professor J. E. Dieffer and class in Music.

J. S. MONTHOMERY, Pres. Female Dept.
D. C. B. CONNERLY, Pres. Male Dept.

May 23, 1860.

SOULE'S COMMERCIAL COLLEGE, CORNER OF Camp and Common streets, entrance No. 82 Common street,—established in 1850,—open day and evening the entire year.

A full course of instruction in this institution embraces Double Entry Book-keeping, Commercial Calculations and Commercial Law, and Penmanship. Gentlemen can enter for the full course, or any branch they desire, and at any time, as there is no class system, no copying from books, and no memorizing of arbitrary rules.

Merchants, Book keepers, and young gentlemen wishing instruction, are respectfully requested to call and examine our practical forms and peculiar manner of teaching.

For catalogues containing full information, and Balance-sheet Circulars, the most magnificent work of the kind ever executed in the United States, address, GEO. SOULE, New Orleans.

FELICIANA FEMALE INSTITUTE, JACKSON, LA.—The exercises of the second term of the eighteenth year will commence on the first of March. Pupils entered at any time, and charged from the time of entrance.

Extensive grounds and houses have been added to the premises.

A good library, a new and complete apparatus, a full and competent corps of teachers, comfortable and newly-furnished apartments, afford the best facilities for a thorough education.

BOARD OF TRUSTEES:

WM. H. WATKINS, D.D., President.
J. N. LYONS, Secretary.
Prof. W. H. N. MAGRUDER, WM. LIPSCOMB,
JOHN W. BURRUSS, Esq., Col. S. M. BRYAN,
F. Y. D. HAGAWAY, Esq. Rev. A. O. MILLER
Rev. JOHN C. MILLER, JOHN McKOWEN, Esq
Hon. JOHN McVEA.

6m THOS W. BROWN, Principal.

PORT GIBSON COLLEGIATE ACADEMY, FOR Young Ladies, resumed its Exercises on the first Monday in October last. A well chosen Faculty will spare no pains or care to make this Institution a pleasant and profitable place for young Lady students.

The buildings are large, well-ventilated, and well furnished. The grounds ample and beautiful.

For information and Circulars, apply to

Rev. B. JONES, Port Gibson, Miss.

PROFESSIONAL.

R. M. TEVIS. H. F. FLY.

TEVIS & FLY, Lawyers and Land Agents, Hallettsville, Lavacca county, Texas, will practice their profession in the counties of Lavacca, Gonzales, Dewitt, Victoria, Calhoun, Jackson, Colorado, Fayette, Caldwell, and Guadalupe, and in the Supreme Court at Galveston and Austin.

Special attention will be given to the collection of foreign debts in the Federal Courts held at Galveston and Austin, to the investigation and quieting of land-titles, paying taxes, and buying and selling lands in any portion of Western Texas.

REFERENCES.

E. C. Estes, New York City.
Biedenborn, Terry and Co., New Orleans.
T. H. McMahon and Gilbert, Galveston, Texas.
H. Ayres, Galveston, Texas.
Rev. James C. Wilson, Texas Conference.
Rev. A. Davidson, Texas Conference.
Rev. Wm. H. Seal, Texas Conference.
Hon. O. R. Singleton, M. C. from Mississippi.
Rev. C. C. Oglespie, Editor "New Orleans Christian Advocate."

May 16, 1860. For the news, in answer to our letter.

JAMES [illegible]

"NOAH S. HUTCHINSON, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, Livingston, Alabama., will Practice in Sumter and the adjoining counties. [mar24]

J. E. ELAM, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, BATON Rouge.

REFERENCES—Hedgeroe & Odlee and Chinn & Bolton, New Orleans; W. S. Pike and A. Matta.....Baton Rouge.

FUQUA & KILBOURNE, ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW, Chatine, Louisiana, practice in the Parishes of East and West Feliciana, and East Baton Rouge.

References—Payne & Harrison, Byrée, Vasce & Co., W. and C. Leichford and Co., Broadwell & Haynes, and Pritchard & Flower, New Orleans. mar 7-1y

W. P. WINANS. J. V. HEATH.

WINANS & HEATH, ATTORNEYS AND COUNsellors at Law, Shreveport, La. Office—Market street. Will practice in the courts of Caddo, De Soto, Bossier, Claiborne, and Bienville.

G. SPENCER MAYO, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW, Harrisonburg, La., will practice in the Courts of Catahoula, Concordia, Caldwell and Franklin Parishes.

COMMISSION MERCHANTS.

W. A. BROADWELL. A. P. HAYNES.

BROADWELL & HAYNES, COMMISSION MERchants (formerly Broadwell & Payne), No 40 Common street N O. Having retired from business I take great pleasure in soliciting for my former Partners, BROADWELL & HAYNES, the patronage and confidence of my friends, believing their experience, capacity and means, will merit its continuance, and enable them to give general satisfaction. [jel] M. U. PAYNE.

W. R. STUART. ch & A. JAMES, New Orleans. Madison Parish, La.

STUART & JAMES, NO. 42 UNION STREET, New Orleans, have associated themselves together for the purpose of conducting a COTTON FACTORAGE & GENERAL COMMISSION BUSINESS; are prepared to make the usual Advances to planters, in the way of supplies, etc., and respectfully solicit patronage

A. H. MAY & CO., COTTON FACTORS AND General Commission Merchants, No 94 Gravier street, New Orleans. ap21y

J. U. PAYNE. J. P. HARRISON.
U. W. SUMMERTON. WM H. HARRISON

PAYNE & HARRISON, COMMISSION MERCHANTS No. 51 Delce street, New Orleans. no07-1y

S. L. WALKER, New Orleans. SOMT. C. HUTCHINSON Caddo Parish, La.

WALKER & HUTCHINSON, COTTON FACTORS and Commission Merchants, No. 67 Carondelet street, New Orleans. jc28

LEONARD PARK. P. S. LAULAIN.

LEONARD PARK & CO COMMISSION MERchants, and Dealers in Western Produce, 61 Magazine street, New Orleans. oct24

LANE, SALTER & CO., SUCCESSORS TO LANE, MAYFIELD & CO., Cotton and Sugar Factors and General Commission Merchants, No. 79 St. Charles street, New Orleans. jy6-1y

JOHN F. WYCHE & CO., COTTON FACTORS and Commission Merchants, No 14 Commone street, New Orleans.

BIBLE AND TESTAMENTS.—The Largest and most Varied Supply, South. Bibles from 3c cents each to $7 50 each.

Rich Family Bibles in costly bindings, also smaller Bibles in Velvet and fancy bindings.

Londons, Oxford and Cambridge Bibles; Eyre and Spottiswoodes, Begsters, one hand, and ordered.

Hebrew, Greek, Latin, Syriac, and Arabic Scriptures for Ministers and Students.

For Sunday Schools in Louisiana and Southern Mississippi; Testaments at reduced prices, and Pocket Testaments at half price.

Address,—Agent, S. W. Bible Society, Bible House, 103 Camp street, New Orleans.

BENTHUYSEN, LEWIS & CO., 110 CANAL-street (adjacent to the Clay Statue), would call attention to their large Stock of

PLANTATION,
HOUSEKEEPING,
AND FANCY DRY GOODS,

Comprising all qualities and descriptions, in any quantity to suit Purchasers, at

VERY LOW PRICES.

An examination of our Stock is requested.
Country Orders promptly filled.

BENTHUYSEN, LEWIS & Co.,
116 Canal-street.
April 24, 1860. 1y

SOUTHERN CLOTHING ESTABLISHMENT.—26, 28 and 30 St. Charles street, corner of Common. Clothing and Furnishing Goods at Wholesale and Retail.

Just received, per late steamers, one of the largest and most magnificent Stocks of FASHIONABLE SPRING AND SUMMER CLOTHING ever brought to the South, which, for Style, material, Workmanship and Cheapness, is not surpassed. Goods are divided into Three Departments, out all under one general view:

Store No. 26 St. Charles street, for Boys' Clothing;
Store No. 28 St. Charles street, for Men's Clothing;
Store No. 30 St. Charles street, for Furnishing Goods and Shirts.

L. W. LYONS,
Nos 26, 28 and 30 St. Charles street, corner Common st.
Salesmen speak French, Spanish and English. [oct2

BOYS' CLOTHING EMPORIUM, 30 St. Charles-st. between Canal and Common.

This store is exclusively for YOUTHS', BOYS' AND CHILDREN'S CLOTHING; SHIRTS AND FURNISHING GOODS, WHOLESALE AND RETAIL.

Just opened a large and excellent stock of SPRING and SUMMER DRESS and SCHOOL CLOTHING, embracing every style and quality, all of which will be sold at VERY REASONABLE PRICES.

Salesmen speak French, Spanish and English.

L. W. LYONS,
oc12 Nos 26, 28 and 30 St. Charles street, corner Common st.

SHIRTS! SHIRTS!! SHIRTS!!!—Just received, by late steamers, a large assortment of SHIRTS OF THE LATEST FASHION, of all the various qualities and sizes, White and Colored. Manufactured EXPRESSLY FOR THE NEW ORLEANS CITY TRADE, in Bl-Men, Youths, Boys and Children.

L. W. LYONS,
oc12 Nos. 26, 28 and 30 St. Charles street, corner Common st.

TRUNKS, TRAVELING-BAGS AND VALISES, UMBRELLAS, and WATER-PROOF CLOTHING of the best styles and qualities, made to order and warranted.

L. W. LYONS,
oc12 Nos. 26, 28 and 30 St. Charles street, corner Common st.

A PERFECTLY RELIABLE SEWING MACHINE, for THIRTY-FIVE DOLLARS!

The WILLCOX & GIBBS' Sewing Machine has now become an established favorite with this community, large numbers having been sold, and to the perfect satisfaction of the purchasers, to whom we take pleasure in referring. We claim it to be the simplest, fastest, most thorough, and altogether the best adapted Machine for family and plantation use that there is now made, and shall take pleasure in convincing any one of the fact if they will call and examine for themselves.

DAVIS BROTHERS, Agents,
18, Camp-street.
May 15, 1860.

PRINTERS' ROLLERS.—T. BEAULIEU IS READY and Printers' Rollers of the best quality, upon reception of moves either from city or country, at short notice. It is just as foolish for each pressman to cast his own rollers as it is for each man to make his own shirt. Work warranted to be of the best kind.

Address, T. BEAULIEU, oc19 Office of the Christian Advocate,
112 Camp st., New Orleans.

MISCELLANEOUS.

NO. 3 CAMP STREET. EUREKA!

SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINES!—FOR PLANTation, family, and Manufacturers' use.—Prices, $65, $90, $100, $115, $125.

These Machines have no equal; they possess all the latest improvements, the last being November 10th, 1859. Their mechanism is so simple and durable that a child can easily understand and operate them. They work with two threads, using Howe's patent shuttle, making the lock stitch, and presenting the same stitch on both sides of the fabric sewn—They will run, stitch, hem, fell, bind and gather.

ALL MACHINES WARRANTED.

Every variety of thread, Silk, Needles, and other fixings for sale.

Principal Southern Salesroom, No. 3 Camp st.

E. L. NIMMO, Agent.

CUDDY, BROWN & CO.—HAVING CLOSED THE office of MILES OWEN & CO., on the first day of January, 1857, my business connections in future in this city will be with Messrs. Cuddy, Brown & Co., 38 Camp street. MILES OWEN.

D. J. WASSON, CARPENTER AND BUILDER.—Also, sash, blinds, doors, cisterns, lumber, &c., to lots to suit purchasers. Orders promptly attended to.

Box 388 Mechanics' Exchange, 19 St. Charles st. Shop, 355 and 631 Rampart st., First District, New Orleans. mar20-1y

ROBT H. READ. F. BEAUMONT, JR.

ROBT H. READ & CO., DEALERS IN DRUGS, MEdicines and Chemicals, Oils, Perfumery, Instruments, Patent medicines, Toilet Articles, Letter-paper, Ink, Pens, etc., No. 108 CANAL STREET, near Royal, New Orleans.

Especial attention given to Commission Merchants and Planters' Orders. All Article Warranted to be of the best QUALITY, and carefully put up aug

BLOOMFIELD'S PRINTING AND BOOK-BINDING Establishment, No. 46 camp street, corner of Gravier. All kinds of BOOK AND MERCANTILE PRINTING AND BINDING executed neatly and correctly, at moderate prices.

dec 28 1y WM. BLOOMFIELD, Jr.

L. SAWYER, DEALER IN WOODEN-WARE, PAper, Brooms, Matches, Cordage, Twines, Scales; and the AKRON'S CELEBRATED BALANCES for Weighing Cotton, Sugar and Tobacco, No. 60 MAGAZINE STREET, New Orleans. ap20

J. H. KELLER, SOAP MANUFACTORY, CORNER of Howard and St. Andrew streets, New Orleans.

A good supply constantly on hand, and all orders promptly filled.

P. H. WILLARD, COAL MERCHANT, IS EXCHANGE Place, opposite he Post-office. Those desirous of purchasing Coal or Wood, can be supplied at short notice at the City Coal Office, where is constantly kept on hand Pittsburgh, Anglum, and Cannel, Anthracite and Lower Ohio Coal. Family Hotels, Cotton Presses Steamers, &c., &c., supplied at the lowest market prices. e22-1y

PH. P. WERLEIN, PUBLISHER AND DEALER in SHEET MUSIC and MUSIC BOOKS. Dealers will be supplied at the regular Board of Trade prices. The PI

NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY A COMMITTEE OF MINISTERS FOR THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH---C. C. GILLESPIE, EDITOR.

VOLUME X.—NUMBER 23. WHOLE NUMBER 489.

NEW ORLEANS, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 6, 1860.

$2 50 A YEAR, IN ADVANCE OFFICE—119 CAMP ST

PROGRESS OF PROTESTANTISM IN MISSISSIPPI AND THE SOUTH-WEST.—No. XVII.

MR. EDITOR: The advancement of the Presbyterian Church in Mississippi from the time of its first organization at Bethel, in 1804, was steady, though not so rapid as that of the Methodist and Baptist churches. Rev. James Smylie came to Mississippi as a Missionary of the Presbyterian church about 1805, and made his first location in Washington. I stated in a former article that it was thought Mr. Montgomery organized the Presbyterian church known as Pine Ridge, near Washington, but I have since learned it was organized by Mr. Smylie, as early as 1807. He subsequently organized a church in Amite county, called Amite, and one called Florida, which, from the name, I presume was in one of the eastern parishes of Louisiana, and another named Bethany, but where I am not able to determine. I have also learned since writing my thirteenth number that, though Mr. Montgomery may have assisted in the organization of Union and Ebenezer churches, over which he exercised the pastoral office so long, that the former was organized by Rev. Joseph Bullen in 1811, and the latter by Rev. Jacob Rickhow, in the same year. Mr. Bullen had also in the meantime instituted a church in Claiborne county, called Bayou Pierre.

The Mississippi Presbytery was set off by the Synod of Kentucky at a Session held at Danville, October 6th, 1815. The following extract from the minutes gives as correct history of the transaction: "The committee of overtures reported a petition from the West Tennessee Presbytery, praying that a new Presbytery might be formed, having for its eastern boundary the Perdido river, from thence, by a direct line to Fort Jackson, at the junction of the Coosa and Telapoosa rivers, thence to the line of division between the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations of Indians, and along that line indefinitely, forming a division between the contemplated Presbytery and the West Tennessee Presbytery, to be known by the name of the Mississippi Presbytery, to be composed of Rev. Joseph Bullen, Rev. William Montgomery, Rev. Jacob Rickhow, and Rev. James Smylie, which petition was granted; and it was ordered that said presbytery hold their first meeting at Pine Ridge Church, in Adams county, on the first Wednesday of March next, and that Rev. Joseph Bullen, or in case of his absence, the senior member present preside as Moderator.—THOMAS CLELAND, Clerk, pro tem.

In accordance with this action of the Synod of Kentucky, the Mississippi Presbytery met at Pine Ridge Church, March 6th, 1816. The members present were: of ministers, Joseph Bullen, William Montgomery, Jacob Rickhow, and James Smylie; of ruling Elders, John Grafton, of Pine Ridge Church, John Bolls, from Bayou Pierre, and Daniel Cameron, from Ebenezer. Rev. Daniel Smith, who was laboring as a Missionary at Natchez, was also present as a corresponding member. Of the four ministers composing this new Presbytery I have already given a brief history of Messrs. Bullen and Montgomery. I will now venture a few remarks about the other two. Of the early history of Rev. James Smylie I have no knowledge, but of his labors in Mississippi as a prominent, laborious, and useful minister of the Presbyterian church, I have been familiar from early childhood. While he was equal to any of his co-laborers, in self-sacrificing care and toil, to extend the Redeemer's kingdom, he was their superior, in pulpit abilities. One thing especially ought to endear his memory to Mississippians and the South generally Thirty or forty years ago but few professors of Christianity, either laity or clergy, thought of attempting the justification of African slavery, as it exists in the Southern States, from the Holy Scriptures. Most people, without pausing to examine the subject in the light of revelation, history, and physiology, jumped to the conclusion that it was a social, political, and moral evil, which, while it had to be endured, ought, if possible, to be removed. While others were discussing various schemes for gradual emancipation, colonization, etc, Mr. Smylie sat down to a quiet, honest, and critical examination of the Holy Bible in reference to this absorbing subject. The result was that the conviction was forced upon his mind that the enslavement of the Hamitic race had been recognized as justifiable under every dispensation of the Church since the flood; that the holiest men mentioned in the Bible had been connected with it, without censure, and that the relative duties of masters and servants were clearly defined in the New Testament Scriptures, which was demonstrative evidence that the relation was recognized as compatible with Christianity by Christ and the apostles. Whereupon he prepared and preached, in various places, a sermon in which he boldly defended our Southern Institution from the Bible. By the request of many this sermon was published in pamphlet form and circulated generally through the country, and was the first, I presume, ever published among us on that side of the question. Mr. Smylie was severely censured by some, even among his clerical brethren, for the bold stand he took at so early a day on this subject; but being sustained, as he verily believed, by the Holy Scriptures, legitimately interpreted, he firmly maintained his position. The increase of Biblical and historical knowledge among the people, taken in connection with physiological and intellectual science as developed in the different races of men, all unite to convince us now that Mr. Smylie was right, though he was at least a quarter of a century before the age. He lived to a good old age, and died greatly beloved by all denominations of Christians.

Rev. Jacob Rickhow came as a Presbyterian minister to Mississippi about 1810. He had previously been a member and minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He was admitted on trial in the travelling connection in 1793, and continued to itinerate in and about the State of New York for seven years, during which time he graduated to Deacon's and Elder's orders, and was located in 1800. The reason he assigned in this country for leaving our Church was, that he objected to our views of the possibility of falling from grace, and finally embraced the dogma of the unconditional perseverance of the saints. His standing here as a minister was good, so far as I know, and he did his share in pioneering through the new settlements, and serving distant churches. His voice was feeble, and his manner in the pulpit was not lively, though his sermons were instructive. When I knew him in my boyhood he seemed to be a man dejected in spirit, and poor in worldly substance. He lived for many years in the vicinity of Port Gibson, and attained to a great age. He seemed to work slowly, but he worked a long time in his master's cause. Of the ruling elders that met in the first Mississippi Presbytery, I had some personal knowledge of Daniel Cameron, an excellent man, and with John Bolls I was intimately acquainted. He was a native Irishman, and, I think, as pure a Christian as I ever saw. He was early in the country, and had his full share of opposition and persecution from the Papists, and was an active partisan in the stirring scenes connected with the change of government. His standing weight was one hundred pounds, yet he was one of the most active and indomitable men in the country, and seemed always "to be ready to every good work." He was a regular Presbyterian in principle and practice, but a man who "endeavored to keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace," so that he could feel perfectly at home among true Christians of every name, and hence he often took an active part in the social religious meetings both of the Methodists and Baptists of his neighborhood. Mr. Editor, did you ever know anybody to call on Hell to lead the devotions of a prayer-meeting? Now don't frown so until I have time to explain. You know that an Irishman pronounces hell as though it were spelt hell, hence they say up hell and down hell. Now, in days of "auld langsyne," when people first began to settle the vast canebreaks and primeval forests of the Petit Gulf-bluffs, there were just about men enough of all denominations professing religion to man a weekly prayer-meeting. Among them John Bolls was prominent, and a Baptist man by the name of Hill, and when it was Mr. Bolls's time, in course, to lead the meeting, he always called on "brother Hell" for a prayer. His Irish brogue seemed to give additional interest to all he said in his religious exercises. "Thou shalt reverence my sanctuary," was a text that had great weight with Father Bolls, so that if he saw any ill-bred or thoughtless persons behaving irreverently in the house of God, he would not subject the minister either to the mortification of reproving them, or quietly submitting to their indecorous conduct, but he would promptly take the matter into his own hands and administer the necessary reproof, to which he would append an affectionate exhortation to amendment. I wish all our churches had just such ruling elders in them as John Bolls was.

The original Cane-ridge Church, in what is now Fayette County, Miss. Conference, where I first united myself with the people of God, was built as a neighborhood church by people of different denominations, and no one was more active in doing it than John Bolls. When the house was finished, Mr. Bolls said it ought to belong to somebody that would take care of it, and as the Methodists were the strongest, and had no place of worship near, he moved "that the Rev. Randall Gibson, of the Methodist Church, be invited to preach a dedicatory sermon, and accept of the house in behalf of the Methodists," which motion prevailed, and there was organized one of the most productive Methodist churches we have had in Mississippi. Mr. Bolls had a large family, and has left a numerous posterity in the country, everywhere respected for their enterprise, intelligence and piety. Most of his children united with the Baptist and Methodist churches, and their descendants are still mostly found in those churches. His youngest son, who married a daughter of Rev. James Smylie, was long a prominent member of the Presbyterian church, and was a worthy son of a noble sire. Mr. Bolls attained to an extraordinary age, being not less than ninety, and was a general favorite with all classes of the community. The visit of a prelate to our rural dwellings would scarcely excite more interest than the advent of this sweet spirited and lively old gentleman. People are generally anxious to learn the secret of longevity, hence they inquire with interest into the history of the aged. "How have you made out to live so long?" inquired a junior of father Bolls one day. "O, I was raised on Irish potatoes and stir-a-bout," was the laconic reply. It improves the heart to dwell upon the life of such a pure-minded, unsophisticated, diligent Christian, amid all the variations of a long sojourn on earth, as was that of this ruling elder. Peace to his memory! May his posterity follow him, as he followed Christ.

J. G. JONES.

LATIMER IN THE PULPIT.

Of all the names connected with the Reformation in England there are few, if any, more highly or more deservedly honored than that of Hugh Latimer, Bishop of Worcester. It is not our intention to draw a sketch of the good bishop's life; but, as the title of this article indicates, we wish to give our readers some notion of Latimer as a preacher. That Latimer was the son of a Leicestershire yeoman; that he graduated at Cambridge; that, until this thirteenth year, he was a most zealous and bigoted Papist; that the devout and enlightened Bilney led him to forsake the errors of his way; that he became as uncompromising in his hostility to Romanism as he had been to its favor and defence; that, through the influence of Thomas Cromwell, he was appointed chaplain to Anna Boleyn, and raised to the Episcopal bench; that, under the law of the Six Articles, he was confined for six years in the Tower; that, though liberated on the accession of Edward VI, he declined, on account of his advanced age, to resume the responsibilities of his see; that he then spent his time in faithfully preaching the word, often publicly addressing the king and court; that the privy-council, under Mary, sent him again to the Tower, and thence to Oxford, there to defend his opinions; that he heroically refused to recant; that, at the age of eighty-three, he was committed to the flames, cheering his fellow sufferer with these memorable words, "Be of good comfort, Master Ridley, and play the man; we shall this day light such a candle, by God's grace, in England, as I trust shall never be put out;"—that these are the leading incidents of Latimer's life is probably well known to all our readers.—We would fain linger a little while, meditating on the consistent life and noble death of the venerable Reformer, whose character and conduct contrast favorably with some of his associates. Unlike Cranmer, for example, Latimer cannot be attacked by enemies, and therefore needs not to be defended by his friends. No worldly ambition filled his heart; no worldly policy influenced his course of action; no vacillation in his last days clouded the glory of his testimony. He "fought the good fight," and fought it well; he "finished his course," and finished it without a fall, without a stumble; he "kept the faith," and kept it fast; and in all the "great cloud of witnesses," there are few whose history more forcibly teaches us to "run with patience the race that is set before us." But the limits within which this article must be contained warn us against saying more of Latimer the man and Latimer the martyr; so now to our text, Latimer the preacher, Latimer in the pulpit.

Were any man to stand up and preach, in these days, after the manner of Latimer, we think that he would scarcely be tolerated by those classes who listened with such admiring attention to the sermon of the old Reformer. The Christian minister, following apostolic example, may speak of practical Christianity as a race, or a wrestle, or a battle; and he may go into the scientific or the commercial world for his illustrations; but the whole religious public would put its hands to its ears, and cry, "Shame, shame!" were any clergyman, of any denomination, to represent the duties and results of personal religion under the figure of a game at cards. We do not attempt to justify, much less to recommend to any preacher of the present day, such a metaphor: but we find it in one of Latimer's discourses:—"I intend to deal unto you Christ's cards, wherein you shall perceive Christ's rule. The game that we shall play it shall be the triumph, (or trump,) which, if it be well played, he that dealeth shall win, the players shall likewise win, and the standers and lookers upon shall do the same; insomuch that there is no man that is willing to play at this triumph, with these cards, but they shall be all winners and no losers." We must confess that Latimer makes use of many expressions calculated rather to shock the modern sermon-hearer's sense of propriety.—Those who now listen to the dignitaries of the English Church would be rather astonished to hear Moses pronounced "a glorious fellow;" Isaiah, "a good, plain fellow;" John the Baptist, "that hardy knight;" and the devil, "that stroug fellow." Although the ladies have borne, with admirable patience and dignity, the foolish and ill-natured remarks that have been made with reference to their crinolines, we fear that even their all but angelic meekness would give place to anger were the present Bishop of Oxford or London to comment in this style upon the poverty of the Virgin Mary's wardrobe: "I think, indeed, that Mary never had a vardingal, for she used no such superfluities as our fine damsels do now-a-days; for, in the old time women were content with honest single garments; now they have found out these roundabouts; they were not invented then; the devil was not so cunning to make such gear; he found it out afterward." Those gentlemen, however, who hope to alter what they deem so monstrous a fashion by abusing it, will do well to listen to Latimer's experience:—"I have been desired to exhort some, and, with some, I could do little in that matter." The ladies, will, we fear, be still further offended with our preacher when they are informed that he considered some of them rather tyrannical towards their "Adams." "They lay out their hair in tussocks and tufts.....because they will be quarter-masters with their husbands. Quarter-masters? Nay, half-masters; yea, some of them will be whole masters, and rule the roast as they list themselves." Poor Latimer! we are almost afraid to confess some of his sins against refinement; but, patience, worthy reader. Consider the age in which the honest reformer lived, and do not blame him too severely for saying that when Joseph's brethren had sold him, and sprinkled his coat with blood, "they thought all was cock-sure;" do not be too hard upon him for exclaiming, "Oh, there is a writer that hath a jolly text here;" do not be shocked when he tells you that the antediluvians, "like Antipodes," laughed Noah to scorn. There is another offence which we most reluctantly bring ourselves to mention; it is this, that Latimer, in his energetic mode of speaking, was in the constant habit of using a word which is in reality an oath, the word "Marry," which means "by St. Mary." However, he apologises for this:—"I myself have had sometimes in use to say, in my earnest matters, 'yea, by St. Mary,' and such like things, which indeed, is naught, (evil,) for we are commanded not to swear at all." If, according to the law as laid down by Lord Chesterfield, the practice of quoting common proverbs is ungentlemanly, then we fear that Latimer must be pronounced unfit for the polite circles of the present age, for of this he is guilty; but when our readers see to what excellent purpose he turns some of the people's old saws, we hope that even the most fastidious amongst them will be reconciled to the preacher, and allow him to utter his proverbial philosophy from the pulpit. Speaking of the hereditary transmission of moral qualities, Latimer explains the subject to the humblest capacity by quoting the proverb, "An evil crow, an evil egg." Referring to the mortality of the young, he mentions the certainly not elegant saying; "There come as many skins of calves to the market as there do of kine." The value of early piety and the probability of its not proving a failure in after years, he illustrates thus—"The earthen pot will long savour of that liquor that is first put into it."—The indolence, carelessness and dishonesty of servants frequently called forth from Latimer most energetic reproofs, in connection with which he tells the employers of servants that they must look well to their affairs, for "the master's eye makes the horse fat." The worthy bishop had a very low opinion of the commercial morality of his own times:—"The merchant commonly, in every city, doth teach his 'prentice to sell false ware."—"There never was such falsehood among Christian men as there is now." "No man setteth anything by his promise; yea, and writings will not serve with some, they be so shameless that they deny their own hand writing." What marvel, then, that he should quote the proverb—"When a man will be rich, he must set his soul behind the door," and admit that there is a worldly sort of truth in the old saying—"Happy is the child whose father goes to the devil?" He found that men did not like to be told of their faults, and complained that his preaching was too pointed and personal, whereupon he remarks—"There is a common saying, 'when a horse is rubbed on the gall he will kick;' 'when a man casteth stones among dogs, he that is hit will cry;' so it is with such fellows too; belike they be guilty, because they cannot suffer to be admonished." Preaching before the king, he took occasion to advert to the conduct of the magistrates, which was anything but upright in Latimer's estimation. "It is a dangerous thing to be in office;" "He that meddleth with pitch is like to be spotted with it;" "Beware of pitch, ye judges of the world; bribes will make you pervert justice." Perhaps the most curious instance of Latimer's use of proverbs is that in which he gives us the whole history of the famous saying, "Tenterden steeple is the cause of Goodwin Sands." The story is well known. Latimer gives it boldly in one of his sermons preached before Edward VI., introducing it in this quaint manner, "And here, by the way, I will tell you a merry toy." The use which Latimer makes of the proverb is this:—"Here was preaching against covetousness all the last year in Lent, and the next summer followed rebellion; ergo, preaching against covetousness was the cause of rebellion—a goodly argument." Then follows the story, which concludes thus:—"And even so, to my purpose, is preaching of God's word the cause of rebellion, as Tenterden steeple is the cause Sandwich haven is decayed." Such was Latimer's mode of adapting common proverbs to pulpit use; and we hope that our readers, instead of condemning the practice as "out of order," will reflect whether it might not be resorted to with good practical results by the preachers of our own time.

Of course Latimer came down heavily, almost savagely, upon the Romish Church; and, after exposing and denouncing its errors in such strong but not unjust terms, it is no wonder that, as he passed through Smithfield on his way to the Tower, he exclaimed, "This place hath long groaned for me." Towards the Pope he is so disrespectful as to call him "that Italian bishop yonder, the devil's chaplain." Christ chose to preach from Peter's boat;—"Now come the Papists, and they will make a mystery of it; they will pick out the supremacy of the Bishop of Rome in Peter's boat..... Well, he comes to Simon's boat; and why rather to Simon's boat than another? I will answer as I find in experience myself. I came hither to-day from Lambeth in a wherry; and when I came to take boat, the waterman came about me, as the manner is, and he would have me, and he would have me; I took one of them. Now, ye will ask me why I came in that boat rather than in another? Because I would go into that that I see stand next me; it stood more commodiously for me. And so did Christ by Simon's boat; it stood nearer for Him, he saw a better seat in it. A good natural reason." Sitting in Simon's boat Christ taught. "If I were a Papist," observes Latimer, with keen and contemptuous irony, "I would tell what he said.....and Pope Nicholas and Bishop Lanfranc shall come and expound this place and say that our Savior Christ said—Peter, I do mean this by sitting in thy boat, that thou shalt go to Rome and be bishop there five-and-twenty years after mine ascension; and all thy successors shall be rulers of the universal Church after thee."

The Pope found no favor in Latimer's eyes; it fared no better with the cardinals. Henry Beaufort, Bishop of Winchester, "was made a cardinal at Calais, and thither the Bishop of Rome sent him a scarlet hat. He should have had a Tyburn tippet, a halfpenny ballet, and all such prond prelates. These Romish hats never brought good into England." On Christ's saying to Judas, "What thou dost do quickly," Latimer observes, "He spoke in the singular number to him; ergo he gave him some pre-eminence. Belike he made him a cardinal; and it might full well be, for they have followed Judas ever since." Purgatory is "that fiery furnace that hath burned away so many of our pence." On the worship of saints, we read: "If thou wilt needs worship them, will you hear how you shall worship them? Live godly and uprightly after their example, follow their charitable life and steadfast faith; then you worship them as they ought to be worshipped."

The persons who came in for Latimer's severest censures were "unpreaching prelates;" in fact, although a bishop himself, he perpetually spoke of bishops in most disrespectful, and, we fear, uncharitable terms. The stanchest Presbyterian, the most thoroughgoing Congregationalist, would neither dare nor desire to apply to any member of the right reverend body such language as Latimer was in the habit of using. Speaking of some prelates who had given their sovereign improper advice, he exclaims, "Woe worth such counsellors! Bishops! Nay, rather Buzzards." He really goes out of his way, and sets historical fact at defiance, in order to have a fling at his mitred brethren; for whenever he speaks of the scribes, Pharisees and priests, who opposed Christ and put him to death, he takes a delight in calling them all bishops. "The Jewish people consented to his death by the persuasion of the bishops." "Now what doth Herod? Forthwith he calleth all the bishops and learned men, and inquireth of them the time at the which Christ should be born." He even has the audacity to ridicule the ancient mode of giving the episcopal blessing: "What is blessing? Not wagging of the fingers, as our bishops were wont." He gives King Edward this advice, in a sermon preached before his Majesty: "I will be a suitor to your grace, that ye will give to your bishops charge . . . . to look better to their flock, ... and send your visitors in their tails. And if they be found negligent or faulty in their duties, out with them; I require it in God's behalf; make them quondams, all the pack of them." The advice becomes more strange and startling as we hear a bishop go on to say—"If your Majesty's chaplains and my Lord Protector's be not able to furnish their places," (the places of the quondams), "there is in this realm, thanks be to God, a great sight of laymen well learned in the Scriptures, and of virtuous and godly conversations, better learned than a great sight of us of the clergy." But he is more severe than this. "Home were admitted to view hell thus, and behold it truly, the devil would cry, 'On yonder side are punished unpreaching prelates.' I think a man might see as far as a kenning, and see nothing but unpreaching prelates. He might look as far as Calais, I warrant you." On clergymen who absented themselves from their parishes, Latimer lays the lash unmercifully. In connexion with this subject he tells a story, in one of the sermons preached before King Edward: A bishop going on his visitation, arrived at a town, and entered it without the customary welcome from the church steeple. On making inquiry he found that "the great bell's clapper was fallen down, the bell was broken, so that the bishop could not be rung into the town." His lordship was "somewhat quick with the chief of the parish." "They made their answers and excused themselves as well as they could. . . . Among the others, there was one wiser than the rest, and he comes to the bishop—'Why my lord,' saith he, 'doth your lordship make so great a matter of the bell that hath lost his clapper? There is a bell,' saith he, and pointed to the pulpit 'that hath lost his clapper these twenty years. We have a person that fetcheth out of this benefice fifty pounds every year, but we never see him.'" Again, referring to the fee-farming of benefices, he says, "When any man hereafter shall have a benefice, he may go where he will, for any house he shall have to dwell upon, or any glebe to keep hospitality withal; but he must take up a chamber in an ale-house, and there sit to play at the tables all the day. A goodly curate!" There were in Latimer's days, as there are in our own, preachers whose discourses were the reverse of awakening. But this Latimer will not hear of an excuse for not attending public worship; I had rather ye should come, as the tale is, by the gentlewoman of London. One of her neighbors met her in the street, and said, 'Mistress, whether go you?' 'Marry,' said she, 'I am going to St. Thomas of Acre's to the sermon; I could not sleep all this last night, and I am going thither now; I never failed of a good nap there.'" But, if the preacher be an inefficient man, what is to be done by the unfortunate parishioner? Are they to dismiss him, or to starve him out? No; let us hear Latimer's advice. "But some will say, 'Our curate is naught, an ass-head, a idiot-pole, a lack-latin, and can do nothing. Shall I pay him my tithes that doth us no good, no never will do?' 'Yea,' I say, 'thou must pay him his due, and if he be such a one, complain to the bishop,' 'We have complained to the ordinary; but he is as negligent as he.' 'Complain to the council.' 'Sir, so we have done, but no remedy can be had.' 'Well, I can tell thee where to complain to God; He will surely hear thee, and remedy it..... Therefore pray unto God, and He will either turn his heart and make him better; or remove him from thee, and send a better in his place; or else take him away altogether!'"

With one passage more, illustrative of the plainness and simplicity of Latimer's style, we bring these observations to a close, hoping soon to resume the subject, and to present our readers with some illustrations of Latimer's mode of expounding Scripture, and some specimens of his best and brightest sayings. The simplicity of Latimer's style may be seen in all his discourses. We have taken this passage almost at random. "What is Jesus? Jesus is a Hebrew word, and signifieth, in our English tongue, a Savior and Redeemer of all mankind born into this world. This title and name, to save, pertaineth properly and principally unto Him; for He saveth us, else we had been lost forever. Notwithstanding, the name of savior is used in common speech; as the king is called a savior, for he saveth his subjects from all all danger and harm that may ensue of the enemies. Likewise the physician is accounted a savior, for he saveth the sick man from the danger of his disease with good and wholesome medicines. So fathers and mothers are saviors, for they save their children from bodily harm that may happen unto them. So bridges leading over the waters are saviors, for they save us from the waters. Likewise ships and boats are saviors, great and small vessels upon the seas are saviors, for they save us from the fury, rage, and tempest of the sea. So judges are saviors, for they save, or at least should save, the people from wrong and oppression. But all this is not a perfect saving; for what availeth it to be saved from sickness, calamities, and oppression when we shall be condemned after our death, both body and soul, for ever to remain with the devil and his angels? We must therefore come to Jesus, who is the right and true Savior, and He it is that hath saved us from sin.' Whom hath He saved? His people. Who are His people? All that believe in Him, and put their whole trust in Him, and those that seek help and salvation at His hand; all such are His people. How saved he them? First by magistrates He saved them from oppression and wrong; the children He saved, through the tuition of parents, from danger and peril; by physicians He saved from sickness and diseases; but from sin He saveth only through His passion and blood-shedding. Therefore He may be called and is the very right Savior; for it is He that saveth from all infelicity, all His faithful people." The reader, accustomed to what he calls, erroneously perhaps, more intellectual preaching, may smile at such a simple method of discourse; but this was the sort of speaking that made Latimer the most useful preacher of his day; and the age we live in, with all its boasted progress, would perhaps be none the worse if its religious instructions condescended, in this respect, to imitate his example.

ARMINIUS AND ARMINIANISM.

The May number of the Christian Examiner has a very interesting and able paper upon the above subject. It gives an elaborate history of the leading events of Arminius' life, an appreciative estimate of his opinions and character, and an outline of his posthumous influence in the theological world. It is one of those sterling articles, at once thorough and liberal, just and generous, which have given the periodical in which it appears its position and reputation. So comprehensive and satisfactory an account of Arminius and his system has never before been published in an American Quarterly. Less Hypercritical than Prof. Stuart, more instructive in details than Mr. Warren, the writer has produced a monograph of permanent value to friends and foes. We reproduce the following paragraphs.

"Denominationally estimated, Arminianism is the common doctrine of the Lutheran Churches in Europe and America; of the Episcopalians, both in England and this country; of the general Baptists, and of many minor sects, on both sides of the Atlantic. All the branches of the great Methodist family throughout the world embrace it heartily. This last body claim that the theological opinions more prominent among them, and more free from admixture with other doctrines than among other denominations, are substantially the Arminianism of Arminius. John Wesley, who was always bold enough to do a true and right thing when he thought it to be such, did much to rescue the name of Arminius from obloquy. 'One might as well cry, 'Mad dog,'' says he, 'as to call a man an Arminian.' Yet when he established a monthly periodical for the benefit of his people, he called it the Arminian Magazine.

To the practical mind of Wesley, indeed, it was morally impossible to do otherwise than adopt the theological views of the Leyden Reformer in opposition to those of Calvin. In this he separated from Whitefield and the Countess of Huntington's preachers, and the result was a long and fierce controversy. The doctrines of man's lost condition, of general redemption, and a "free salvation," were the chief points of theology involved in the sermons of the fervent itinerants, as they called to their multitudinous assemblies to repent and believe, appealing always to their own consciousness of power to choose or reject the offered remedy. It is an anomaly in the religious world,—not, however, without its analogies,—that while the Methodists have nothing in their articles of faith which demands it of them, they are the most earnest and persistent defenders of Arminianism, and most jealous of any encroachment on what is to every minister a compact, well-defined, and positive, though unwritten creed. The twenty-five articles of the Methodist Church in America were taken substantially from the Articles of the Church of England. Nearly half of them were designed to guard against Papistical doctrines and usages, and are now virtually of no importance. Nor do the remaining articles exclude any shade of evangelical belief from the Methodist communion. In fact, broad as is the platform of these Articles, it is not necessary that a candidate for membership subscribe to them. Only one condition is required in these societies,—a desire to "flee from the wrath to come, and to be saved from their sins." This desire must be evidenced by a life corresponding to certain moral rules; and though the member is also bound not to inveigh against the general sentiments held in the denomination, he is at liberty to enjoy whatever opinion he pleases, provided his life be holy.—Yet there is probably a greater uniformity of clearly defined theological opinion in no other denomination than in this; and this sentiment is substantially Arminian.

Most of the denominations who hold this doctrine at the present day do not adopt all the views of Arminius. His notions respecting original sin, as we have seen, were those entertained by the Calvinistic theologians of his time, and by others before them. They are not received by the anti-Calvinistic Churches of the present. The progress of the Arminians, however, in this respect, has been no greater than that of a majority of their opponents. In fact, Calvinism itself has undergone a wonderful change, at least in its exoteric statement of doctrine. The genuine theology of the great Genevan Reformer now holds sway in but few localities. In a modified form it is the creed of the Scotch Presbyterians, of the English Independents, of the Dutch, Swiss, and French Reformed Churches, of the Calvinistic Baptists in England and America, and of the Presbyterians, Orthodox Congregationalists, and a few smaller denominations, in this country. But the Calvinism of the modern Calvinists would have more horribly shocked the friends of Gomarus than the Arminianism of Arminius.

THE NEW ALADDIN.

"MY DEAR LOUNGER.—I once heard a story of Aladdin which was more Yankee than Arabian. Do you know what I mean, and, if so, would you kindly tell the story?

"Yours, HAROUN."

The Lounger believes that this is the story.

Aladdin began by swapping jack-knives and getting the best, and bartering halves of marbles stuck together for whole ones. When he grew older, and sold berries which he picked on the hill-pastures, he greased the bottom of the quart pot, so that a little capital was carried forward to the next measure. He hayed hard all summer, and went to evening school all winter, and learned the golden rule of arithmetic—addition for himself, and subtraction for his neighbor; and, in all the games, he held strictly to the rule of Turnabout: "You tickle me, and I'll tickle you, if I can, but at all events you tickle me."

At an early age Aladdin was considered to be good at a bargain; which meant, that he could always succeed in exchanging the worse for the better—always keeping the blind eye of a horse to the wall when he wanted to sell him, and always looking straight at it when he wanted to buy him; and the approving village shook its head, and said: "Let Aladdin alone to succeed."

He grew up, and left the village for the world. "He'll be rich!" said the village, with more enthusiasm and envy than any village says of a departing boy. "He'll be honest, faithful, generous." To Aladdin the whole world was but a market in which to buy cheap and sell dear. For him there was no beauty, no heroism, no piety, no history. To him all lands and waters are alike, for each is unhallowed by association. No Homer sings for him along the Ægean—he only curses the wind that will not blow him to Odessa. No sirens call to him from the sunny shore; he loves the sharp oath of a brutal boatswain.

With a Bible in this hand and a quid in his mouth he squirts about the holy places in Jerusalem, and calculates the cost of the sepulchre. He scratches his name with a jack-knife upon Egyptian obelisks by the side of the hieroglyphed names of Rameses and Thothmes—names that shook early history with their grandeur; and the reverend echoes of the Libyan desert, that have slept since they heard the strut of Alexander's army marching to find the oracle of Ammon, are awakened by the shrill whistling of Yankee Doodle and Dan Tucker.

He insults the Grand Lama—he knocks with the Great Mogul—he turns his back upon Emperors, and takes a pinch out of the Pope's snuff-box. He eats flesh cut raw from the living animal with Dinkas and Abyssinians, chews hang with the Arabs, smokes opium with the Turks, and rides for a bride with the Calmuck Tartars.

Then Aladdin comes home. He has turned his goods and his opportunities over and over again, and they are all changed into piles of money. The wise village welcomes him, and proudly points him out to the Aladdins of a younger generation as the shining example of the successful man—"For, my dear son, just think of it!—He began with nothing, and now, look!"

My dear son does look, and he sees Aladdin owning millions of dollars, and of the Doing-good societies of which he is not president he is director. His name is as good as gold. He has bought pictures and books and statues. He has also bought a Mrs. Aladdin. He is housed in luxury, but he picks his mouth with the silver fork. He has a home for the poet, but he boasts that he never reads anything but the newspapers. He goes to church twice on Sundays, and only wakes up when the preacher revile and denounces the sinners of Sodom and those tough old Jews of Jerusalem. His head is bald and shiney with all the sermons that have hit it and glanced off. He claps his hands in prayer, but forgets to open them when the poor-box is passed round; and he goes home, like a similarly successful man, thanking God that he is not as other men are, and after dinner lights a cigar, sits before the fire in the easy-chair, and tells the children to remember that honesty is the best policy, and looks sleepily at Mrs. Aladdin through the thick smoke.

By-and-by old Aladdin dies. The conventional virtues are called out by the editors as the mourning carriages are called out by the undertakers. The papers regret that they are summoned to deplore the loss of the reverend parent, generous friend, public spirited citizen, and pious man. Then the precious swapper of jack-knives and model for the rising generation is left under the sod. The stars that he never saw now burn over him with a soft lustre that no lamps above a king's tomb emulate; and the south wind, for whose breath upon his hot brow he was never grateful, now strews his last bed with anemones and violets, which his heel crushed in living. And the men who are to be formed upon that model and pursue a similar success, carelessly ask, as they stir their toddies, "So old Aladdin is gone at last; will he cut up well?" The sculptor carves a cherub upon his tombstone and graves the motto: "By their works ye shall know them," while some quiet Charles Lamb, with insanity in the family, asks, as he puts aside the long grass, and reads Aladdin's epitaph, "Where he oil the bad people buried?"—Harper's Weekly.

THE SECRET OF A GOOD MEMORY.

To possess a good memory—such was one of the most frequently-recurring wishes of earlier years. Whenever distressing circumstances, affecting either my own or other people's happiness, reminded me sadly, and oftentimes provokingly and painfully, of forgetfulness, the impatient exclamation of my lips, or the sighing utterance of my heart, invariably was, "Oh, how I wish I had a good memory!—how I envy those who can always remember the right thing and the right time, and spare themselves and others the countless vexations that fall to my lot!

Do any of my young friends re-echo this wish of my heart, and desire to become possessed of my secret? I will tell them how they may make it theirs, and I can assure them beforehand that they will find "the desire accomplished sweet to the soul."

As Luther, the great Reformer, was wont to say to the students who came to him complaining of the difficulties which lay in the path to literary success, "To pray well is to study well," so now, I say to you, To pray well is to remember well. If you would remember well and wisely—if you would remember all that is essential to be remembered—all that is conciated to add both to your own happiness and usefulness to that of those around you—plead the promise of the Savior, "He (the Holy Ghost) shall bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you." (John xiv. 26.) Plead it daily and earnestly, asking that it may be fulfilled in your own experience, and the forgetfulness you deplore will decrease, it may be rapidly, as in my own case, but at any rate certainly, for "all the promises of God" are yea and amen in Christ Jesus, and none ever pleaded for their realization in His name, and went away unsatisfied.

But do you say that such a promise, though very precious to the Christian in its relation to spiritual things, does not include the countless little things which you are obliged daily to bear in mind in order to the satisfactory fulfilment alike of the personal and relative duties of the life that now is? I reply, You have never yet realised the fulness of that promise, or you would not have to mourn its insufficiency to fulfill all your need. Shall I endeavor to analyse it, and shew you its adaptation to the little as well as to the great things of life? Nay, you shall dissect it for yourselves, that the joy of the discovery may be your own. I will only ask you one question—a suggestive one—and then leave you to pursue the train of thought it will awaken in a thinking mind. Do you not believe that in the "things which Christ hath said unto you" you have an all-sufficient rule of faith and practice—a treasury of practical as well as of doctrinal knowledge? If not, dear young friends, you have read your Bibles to very little purpose. Every duty of life, from the least event to the greatest, has been written, as with a sunbeam, in the pages of Revelation by the finger of God. All, therefore, that the memory need retain for our present and eternal blessedness is wrapped up in that brief but comprehensive promise of our Lord—"He shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you."

The promise is, first, that He shall teach you all things, all essential truth—all the things that belong to your peace; and, secondly, that having taught you, He will also keep you in remembrance of all that you need to know. What a casket of treasures is here! A lifetime shall not suffice to put you in possession of the whole, while yet the prayer of faith shall enrich you daily, enabling you to draw from the springs of memory—if you first supply them freely from the Fountain—waters as refreshing as they are inexhaustible. A pious and evangelical minister—a man greatly beloved for his works' sake, as well as for his Christ-like spirit—once addressed a class of young people, when speaking on the subject before us, as nearly as I can remember in the following words, "Whatever we clearly understand, and deeply feel, the memory retains and the life exhibits." Experience has since taught me the truth of the first clause of that memorable sentence, and the lesson has been one of great blessedness. Oh that the last clause may be verified also, both in my own experience and in that of all who shall read this memorial, making us become "living epistles of Christ, known and read of all men!"

What a glorious hope is set before us, dear young friends, when we are called upon to shine as lights in the world!

But how shall we fulfill this high and holy calling?

By revolving in an inner circle (would it might be in the nearest circle!) around the "Sun of righteousness," "the Light of the world." The closer we keep to Jesus, the more brightly shall we reflect His image. And let us never forget that it is by keeping His commandments that we can thus abide in and near Him. And if we would keep His commandments, how needful it is that we should habitually remember His words! Thus you perceive that to possess a good memory—a memory full of good things—"things wherewith one may edify another"—is to possess one great means of enabling our light an to shine before men as to glorify our Father in heaven. It is also a great means to enable us to sit with Christ in heavenly places, and to speak to ourselves in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs," (Eph. v. 19,) thus filling the otherwise dreary and depressing seasons of sickness and solitude with a divine companionship—a joy with which a stranger cannot intermeddle—a peace that passeth understanding.

Such a memory, like every other good and perfect gift, cometh from above, and is freely given in answer to the prayer of faith.

May it be yours, dear young readers, to ask and receive, and with it wisdom to use it aright, to the glory of God, the edification of your fellow men, and the present and eternal welfare of your own souls—so shall your path be that of the justified, which shineth more and more unto the perfect day!

MEMPHIS AND CHARLESTON RAILROAD.—The following is a very favorable showing of the business of the Memphis and Charleston road. The receipts of the Mem

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

New Orleans Christian Advocate.

Terms—$2 00 per annum, in advance.

NEW ORLEANS:

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 6, 1860.

ACTION OF THE NORTHERN METHODIST GENERAL CONFERENCE ON THE SLAVERY QUESTION.

The telegraph informs us of the character of the action of the Northern Methodist General Conference on the all-absorbing question, with them, of slavery. The subject was referred to a large committee, one from each Annual Conference, we believe, and both a majority and minority report were presented to the Conference. They are both unconscionably long, and, of course, stale and uninteresting, as everything on the subject necessarily is. We publish below the resolutions appended to each report. Both assert that slavery is a sin and a great evil. But the minority report proposes to leave the Discipline as it is. The majority report recommends, in the first place, a change of the present General Rule, which now "forbids the buying and selling of men, women and children with an intention to enslave them," so as to make it read as follows: "The buying, selling, or holding of men, women, or children, with an intention to enslave them." A change of one of the General Rules, being a change of the terms of Church membership, is prohibited by the fourth Restrictive Rule—the Restrictive Rules being the Constitution of the Church—unless first recommended by three-fourths of the votes of all the Annual Conferences, and then concurred in by two-thirds of the votes of the General Conference. The proposed change of the Rule has been before the Annual Conferences, and has failed of the three-fourths vote. The first proposition of the majority report, therefore, is, to originate the question in the General Conference, by a two-thirds vote, and send it down to the Annual Conferences—as the proposition for such a change can originate either in the General Conference, or in any one of the Annual Conferences. The telegraph informs us that this proposition failed, by ten votes, to get the constitutional two-thirds vote.

The majority report proposes in the second place to change the Chapter on Slavery. The old Chapter set forth the great evil of slavery, and prohibited ministers and other Church officers from owning slaves where the laws of the State admit of emancipation. The new Chapter proposes to set forth as the solemn declaration of the Church that "the buying, selling, or holding of human beings as chattels, is inconsistent with the Golden Rule, and with the Rule of Discipline which requires to do no harm, and to avoid evil of every kind." The telegraph informs us that this new Chapter was adopted by a vote of 154 yeas to 59 nays. So that what the General Conference failed to accomplish directly, by a two-thirds vote, and a change of the General Rule, it has accomplished indirectly, by a majority, (a large one, too) and a change of the Chapter. It amounts to the same thing in the end. Slaveholding members are not subject to be brought to trial under the General Rule against slavery, but they are subject to be brought to trial for "doing harm," and not "avoiding evil of every kind;" for slaveholding is made to come within the interpretation of that Rule.

What the effect will be on "the border," we have yet to see. The Baltimore, East Baltimore, Philadelphia, Western Virginia, Missouri, and Arkansas Conferences, are directly involved. The Northern Methodist Church has members and ministers in all these States, though they are few except in Maryland. They have heretofore declared that they would not submit to any change of the Discipline whatever. It remains to be seen whether they will maintain their pledges, or submit. It is certain, however, that whether the border Conferences submit or resist, many individual members will leave the Church. On the other hand, if Conferences secede, they will not be confined to the border. There is a widespread opposition throughout the Church North to this ultra legislation.

We say these things merely that our readers may understand the facts of the case, and not in any spirit of partisanship. If the border Methodists of the Northern Church can submit to this action of the majority, it is not our concern. We have no desire to persuade them to come to the Church South, nor to censure them if they do not come. To their own master they stand or fall. Should they come to us, heartily willing to adopt our Discipline, which legislates neither for nor against slavery, but which, like the Scriptures, defines the duties of both master and servant, and sends the gospel to both, we shall welcome them. The Southern Methodist Church is now happily free from any "deliverances" or laws on any subject which belongs to "Cæsar," and she desires affiliation with none who, however opposed to abolition fanaticism, are yet desirous to occupy an anti-slavery platform. The old anti-slavery element in the Discipline was the seed of all the increasing fanaticism which resulted in the division of the Church, North and South, and which now threatens to divide the Church North. If a Church can declare that "slavery is a great evil," she is conscientiously bound to seek its "extirpation." There is no certain and safe ground but that of Christ and his Apostles, who never made any such declaration, nor adopted any such legislation.

It has been lamented by some in the Southern Church, that Baltimore did not go with us in 1844. We once felt so. We do not now. Baltimore needed her recent providential discipline to open her eyes, even if her eyes are now open. Had Baltimore gone with us in 1844, she might have grown more anti-slavery, protected, as she would have been, by our name; and might have hindered that harmonious action by which we rid our Discipline of the "vexed question." Now, if ever, she can see that we were right. The Southern Church is free from all agitation, sound to the core, imposes no political yoke upon the neck of her members, is harmonious, brotherly, spiritual and prosperous. She has no call to settle the difficulties of others, nor to manage the elements that disturb them, nor to give advice to those who are eating the bitter fruit of their own doings. Her duty is to "stand still and see the salvation of God." However much she may regret the unscriptural and hurtful legislation of her Northern sister, and however much she may sympathize with the victims of it, she is not called upon to interfere. Her position toward them is like that of the United States toward foreign nations—a model to all, and interference with none. If the oppressed come to her, she is an asylum, but she cannot go to foreign war for them.

MAJORITY.

1. Resolved, By the Delegates of the several Annual Conferences, in General Conference assembled, that we recommend the amendment of the General Rule on Slavery, so that it shall read: "The buying, selling, holding of men, women, or children, with an intention to enslave them."

2. Resolved, That we recommend the suspension of the 4th Restrictive Rule, for the purpose set forth in the foregoing Resolution.

3. Resolved, By the Delegates of the several Annual Conferences in General Conference assembled, that the following be, and hereby is, substituted in the place of the present Seventh Chapter on Slavery.

Question 1.—What shall be done for the extirpation of the evil of slavery?

Answer.—We declare that we are as much as ever convinced of the great evil of Slavery. We believe that the buying, selling or holding of human beings, as chattels, is inconsistent with the Golden Rule, and with that Rule in our Discipline which requires all who desire to continue among us, to "do no harm, and to avoid evil of every kind." We, therefore, affectionately admonish all our preachers and people to keep themselves pure from this great evil, and to seek its extirpation by all lawful and Christian means.

MINORITY.

1. Resolved, That the M. E. Church has, in good faith, in all the periods of its history, proposed to itself the question, "What shall be done for the extirpation of the evil of Slavery?" and it has never ceased, openly and before the world, to bear its testimony against the sin and to exercise its disciplinary powers to the end that its members might be kept unspotted from criminal connection with the system, and that the evil itself be removed from among men.

2. Resolved, That any change of our Discipline upon the subject of Slavery, in the present excited condition of the country, would accomplish no good whatever, but on the contrary would seriously disturb the peace of our church, and would be especially disastrous to our ministers and members in Slave States.

3. Resolved, That the Committee on the Pastoral Address be instructed to state our position in relation to Slavery, and to give such counsel to our churches as may be suited to the necessities of the case.

DEATH OF THEODORE PARKER.

Recent European advices inform us that Theodore Parker died in Florence, Italy, on the 10th of May last. He had gone thither for the restoration of his health, but it could not be restored. He was about forty-eight years of age, having been born in 1812. Having attracted no inconsiderable share of public attention for many years past, it is not impraper that, on the occasion of his death, his life and character should receive some notice in these columns. His quasi religious relations especially call for it. He attained nothing worthy of a noble ambition in the way of fame, properly considered. He attained notoriety but not fame. Notoriety was the price he demanded of the world for his performances on its stage, and the world readily paid him his price—a price as easily given as won. It almost necessarily follows that the notice he attracted was not so much the result of anything like genius, as it was of an exaggerated and reckless eccentricity. A star may be so small as hardly to be observed in the clusters of the firmament, while harmoniously revolving with the singing spheres; but a comet, of less size and brilliancy, may attract universal attention, while flying athwart the ethereal expanse in violation of all heavenly laws. A small pirate may fill the seas, or a guerrilla robber-chief the land, with his name, while admirals with their navies, and generals with their armies, may hardly be known to a peaceful world. Of course, it requires some kind of devilish daring and desperation to make either a pirate or a robber, or an infidel Christian preacher. This kind of farce of character Mr. Parker had. Infidel Christian preacher may seem a contradiction in terms, but the words constitute the best brief description of Mr. Parker available. He was at least an infidel preaching in a professedly Christian pulpit, and exercising the pastorate of a professedly Christian Church. That Mr. Parker was an infidel, in the truest sense of the term, we do not think can be doubted.

He accepted or rejected, according to his own opinion or inclination, the teachings of the Bible, as he did those of Plato or Shakespeare, Confucius or Carlyle. Had he been an infidel out of the pulpit, the world would never have heard of him. Ralph Waldo Emerson, though an infidel of very much the same class, is a very different man. His genius has gained him fame, in spite of his infidelity. Theodore Parker possessed no such genius. Without it, even his infidelity would have failed of notoriety. But his infidelity in the pulpit—"the abomination of desolation standing in the holy place"—is what astounded the experience and shocked the taste and conscience of the world, and gained him the notoriety he coveted. He had a certain intellectual sharpness, and literary smartness, but these would never have made him largely notorious except in the anomalous and shocking connections we have named.

Although he did, directly, local and individual harm, he also did, indirectly, general good. Had he been less logically true to himself, and therefore less marked and forcible in character, and less notorious, he might have done only harm. His very ultraism was the antidote to his poisonous influence. Had he preached a diluted or spurious Christianity, skilfully disguised in the garb of a scriptural phraseology, instead of proclaiming from the pulpit, intended alone for the ambassadors of Christ, an unblushing infidelity, he would have been exceedingly more hurtful to a sound Christian faith. He opened the eyes of thinking men of all the worldly classes to the perception of the truth, that if the pulpit has no divine and divinely authenticated message to man, by which he may definitely learn his immortality, his duty, and the course of his true destiny, there is no sacredness about it, and no use for it. Men have justly and inseparably associated the pulpit with ideas of divine faith, hope, guidance, comfort and consolation, in connection with the questionings of the heart, the darkness and the sorrows of life, and the gloom of the grave. And when they find that in any or all of these relations it answers their sorest needs with a cold, unbelieving, cynical mockery, they will neither reverence it nor respect its teachings. Mr. Parker's preaching illumined no religious darkness, but added to its oppressive density. He relieved no distressing doubts, but taught doubt as a gospel, without even the unction of its distress. He presented to the bereaved heart no God as a pitying Father, and no hope as the dawn of a better day upon its night; on the contrary, to be "without God" was the freedom he taught, and to be "without hope in the world" the independence he affected. As to the precious name of Christ—a name above every other name, "the only name given under heaven whereby we may be saved"—he cast reproach upon it, as one without divinity and without authority. As to the "precious blood of Christ," by which all souls are redeemed, and may be sanctified and saved, he "counted it an unholy thing"—a common thing—the blood of a man merely, who had died as a martyr to his opinions. And as to "the Spirit of grace," he "did despite unto it," as of no more divinity and value than the intuitions of the human reason and the ideals of the human imagination.

GENERAL CONFERENCE APPOINTMENTS OF THE M. E. CHURCH NORTH.

At an extra session held May the 28th, for the election of officers for the next four years, the following officers were chosen: For editor of the Christian Advocate and Journal, Dr. Edward Thomson; for editor of Quarterly Review, Dr. D. D. Whedon; for editor of the Sunday-School books and papers, Dr. Daniel Wise; for Corresponding Secretary of the Missionary Society, Dr. Durbin, of Philadelphia; for Assistant Corresponding Secretary for the West, Dr. W. L. Harris; for editor of the Western Christian Advocate, O. Kingsley; for editor of Ladies' Repository, Dr. D. W. Clark; for editor of the German Apologist, William Nast; for editor of the Northwestern Christian Advocate, T. M. Eddy; for editor of the Central Christian Advocate, Dr. Charles Elliot; for editor of the Northern Advocate, I. S. Bingham; for editor of the Pittsburg Christian Advocate, Samuel H. Nesbit; for editor of California Advocate, E. Thomas; for editor of the Pacific Advocate, Thomas H. Pearne; for Book Agent at New York, T. Carlton; for Assistant Book Agent at New York, Jas. Porter; for Book Agent at Cincinnati, Adam Poe; for Assistant, Lake Hitchcock.

A resolution was unanimously adopted, excusing Bishop Morris, on account of his advanced years, from travelling. The Delaware (Ohio) Conference was changed in name to the West Ohio Conference.

READING IN THE UNITED STATES.

The editor of the Edinburg Witness, the well-known Mr. Bayne, in an article on our country, among some things not very palatable, says: The Americans are an educated, a religious, a temperate people. If the article had not extended to too great a length already, we should like to have said something about one or two other national characteristics. For example, they are eminently a reading people. Books are not, as here, the luxuries of the few, but the necessary food of the many. "Already," says Mr William Chambers in his lately published work, "Things as They Are in America"—one of the most interesting and valuable which has recently issued from the press—"already certain English publishing houses are turning attention to the great and everlasting field of enterprise in the United States, where books, as in the case of newspapers, are not a luxury of the rich, but a necessary part of the household furniture of those depending for subsistence on daily labor." Certainly in every way a remarkable fact. But we may have afterwards an opportunity of referring to this and other matters. Meantime we may say, that in all that has been advanced above, we have never been unmindful for a moment of the fact that there is another side of the picture. But our complaint is, that it is only "the other side of the picture" that is generally looked at; and it seems to us of very considerable importance in these days that the real greatness of the American nation should be more fully appreciated.

A GOOD PRACTICE.

A while since we tarried in a friend's family—and in the evening were kindly invited by the head of the family to read and pray. And at the time for morning prayers, Bibles were supplied for all, and the family with their visitors all read in course—which our friend has been in the habit of doing for years, as we learned from others—although he is not a professor of religion. We have thought of this particular case with pleasure, and think it should be a just rebuke to such professors as do not maintain the family altar.

We do not most heartily wish our excellent friend may soon go a step farther; and when he and his wife and little daughters have so seriously read the Scriptures as if far family prayer, they may kneel together and offer acceptable prayer to the God of heaven. But this practice of reading God's word morning and evening together, is an excellent practice, and we could heartily wish it were adopted in all families, as well where a public profession of religion has not been made, as where it has, the practice by all means should be most faithfully adhered to.

God's word is man's guide in this most important of all matters. It should be studied daily and constantly. The Bible should be read as a household book, and the whole family be interested in it. Then how appropriate to add prayers.

WASHINGTON CITY CHURCH.

The good work begins to progress more rapidly. Mr Smithson announces in the last Richmond Christian Advocate, that he has bought the lot, the most eligible in the city, for $10,050—$3,000 less than he expected to be compelled to give. He also announces the receipt of over $700 recently from various individuals, and the fulfilment of the conditions for over $1,000 more from Alabama. The Church must be built, and will be built. It must also be a magnificent Church, as beautiful as skilful architecture can make it.

NEW YORK LITERARY GOSSIP.

A painting by Mr. Holman Hunt, one of the leaders of what is called the Pre-Raphaelite School of Art, is just now exciting a great sensation in England. It is called "the Finding of Christ in the Temple," and represents the scene in the Temple when Mary having missed her son, returns and finds him arguing with the wise men, and astonishing them with his philosophy, so much deeper than their superficial word-splitting. Mr. Hunt made himself a place among the very first of living artists, seven years ago, by a painting called "the Light of the World," engravings of which are common. This was thought good enough to sustain the reputation of any painter, and Mr. Hunt might have rested on the laurels it gained him, and for the balance of his life gained that reputation into gold by painting second-rate pictures (second-rate for him) at high prices. Some artists do this quite successfully; and some authors of distinction follow the same course. But Mr. Hunt had higher aims. He determined to paint another picture—a better picture if possible—and he deliberately devoted six years to this painting. Some of our artists might take a hint from Mr. Holman Hunt. Then we should not have our Academy walls covered with canvas, to the number of four hundred pieces every year, very few of which will bring in to the artist anything more than money, or perhaps a repute which deserves to be called notoriety rather than fame.

But the painter gave more than time to his noble work. He determined to be accurate, and to get his inspiration on the very ground where his scene was enacted. Accordingly he went to Jerusalem, and lived there, and in its vicinity, a year and a-half. When thus his mind was filled with the life and scenery of the Holy City, he spent nearly five years in putting his conception on canvass. The result is a work which the best English judges pronounce the greatest which any living artist has produced. I hope we shall see it in this country, and I suppose it will be very likely to come over for exhibition.

Mr. Hunt's determination to be faithful to the facts, peculiarities, and to trust nothing to that which foolish painters call their genius, is worthy of all imitation, and especially should our own artists look to it. Church spent some years in South America, and has for his reward the glory of having painted the "Heart of the Andes," acknowledged on all hands to be one of the finest landscapes ever put on canvas. But see how few have followed his example, from this paragraph in the art column of one of our dailies:

"Lentze painted his American pictures in Dusseldorf! May went to Paris to paint Washington's Resignation; for the State of Maryland; Powell no sooner received the commission to paint De Soto's Discovery of the Mississippi, than he went over to the French capital, in doing which he followed the example of Vanderlyn when he got the commission from Congress for the picture of the Landing of Columbus. Scharwize's picture of the Landing of the Pilgrims was painted in Paris or Dusseldorf. The consequences have been that these historical pictures have nothing historical about them, but are in fact pictures of French and German models in masquerade dresses, and without the least indication of American feeling."

Speaking of Church, he has finished recently a fine painting called "Sunset," which has been purchased by a wealthy Baltimorean. It is observed that many of the finest pictures painted here nowadays, are for the South.

I saw the other day, at the house of a friend, a copy of "Boswell's Johnson," and another of "Hume's England," which two books together were valued by their owner at not less than $1,500! But they were not such copies as you buy in the book stores. My friend is what is called here a "book-illustrator," an old gentleman, with few cares, no cares, and a sufficiency of wealth; who has for years devoted himself to the collection of engravings—proofs where they were to be had, but in all cases fine engravings and rare—illustrative of English and American history. When he had, after twelve years, collected the portraits of all the people mentioned in the life of Johnson, which were to be obtained, and of all the scenes which had ever been engraved, he carefully inserted each in a sheet of thick plate paper, did the same with the pages, that all might be uniform, and then had the huge series of volumes bound, and therefore has such an illustrated Johnson as I am sure must be unique in the world. Hume was served in the same way; and was eighteen years under weigh; and he has now nearly ready for the binder a copy of "Sparks's Life of Washington," which is literally priceless; for when I asked its value, he answered rather crustily that it had none at all. There were on his shelves several other works, quite a dozen in all, thus splendidly illustrated, on which this old gentleman has spent pleasantly, perhaps, 25 years of a life which might otherwise have been miserable, or discontented. I see that the late W. E. Burton, the eminent Shakespearian actor, was for many years engaged in collecting the materials for a similarly adorned copy of Shakespeare. He did not live to complete the collection, but I am told by one who has seen the portfolios that it is a very splendid and valuable gathering. It is not to be included in the sale of his library, which is shortly to take place; and to show that he was not alone in his hobby, there comes from England an advertisement of the sale of the library of one Thomas Turner, Esq., which contains a copy of Shakespeare formed, like Mr. Burton's, on Boydell's splendid nine volume folio edition, but enlarged by additions of 5000 engravings, valuable original drawings, &c., to forty-five large folio volumes.

Speaking of Shakespeare, I have so long thought the name extinct, that I was no little surprised to find recently, in an English paper, the announcement that "Captain Shakespeare's" work on the "Wild Sports of India" will be shortly published by Smith, Elder and Co. Think of Captain Shakespeare! How odd it sounds.

"Lost and Found," a story of more than usual merit, which recently appeared in the Atlantic Monthly, it seems was written by a daughter of Mr. Putnam, the publisher of Irving's works; and a very graceful and genial little sketch, entitled "Little Scholars," in the last number of the Cornhill Magazine, was by the favorite daughter of Mr. Thackeray—that daughter who, according to her father, was some years ago such an insatiate reader of "Nicholas Nickleby."

The last number of the Quarterly Review (London) has an interesting article on "The vicissitudes of Families," showing how difficult it is, even in the most favorable circumstances of wealth, primogeniture, and high station, to keep up an uninterrupted line of descent. We read that the three noblest names in all Europe are DeVere, Fitzgerald, and Montmorency, all long circulated chiefly as the property of fashionable novelists. But is it not strange to read, as in the following paragraph, into what obscure corners the blood of nobles and kings even has flowed in course of time: "Edmund Earl of Kent, the son of Edward I., the tool, the dupe, and the victim of Martimer, was recently represented by a butcher and a toll-keeper. The fiery blood of the restless and ambitious Thomas Duke of Gloucester, youngest son of Edward III., ran in the veins of the late sexton of St. George's, Hanover-square. "Stemmata quid faciunt" would have been a not unnatural question on the part of one of these respectable individuals. Even lines which have not altogether sunk into degradation have had to be rather oddly recruited. It was a great opportunity for the wits of the "Anti-Jacobin" when they could attack the representatives of the Percies as "Duke *Smith*son, of Northumberland," which Smithson was a collier before he became a Duke. The heir of Simon de Montfort is a saddler in Tooley-street, London; the representative of the earldom of Mar was discovered in a coal-pit, and the estates and title of DeCourcy were successfully claimed a century since by a common sailor."

There are some curious anecdotes about crests and mottoes of royal and noble families:

The crest of the Cheneys, a bull's scalp, is said to have been won by Sir John Cheney, at Bosworth field, in a hand-to-hand encounter with Richard, who felled him to the ground by a blow which laid the upper part of his head bare. Though stunned by his fall, Sir John recovered after a while, and, seeing an ox's hide near him, he cut off the scalp and horns to supply the place of the upper part of his helmet, and in this singular head-gear performed miracles of valour. He was actually created a Baron, and a Knight of the Garter for his services at Bosworth, and it is said that the bull's scalp was also assigned him as a crest.

The crest of the Dudleys, of Clapton, was a woman's head helmeted, hair dishevelled, and throat-latch loose, proper. The story, as set down in writing by the parson of the parish in 1390, ran that the father of Agnes Hotot, a great heiress who married the Dudley of the day, having a dispute with one Ringsdale about an estate, it was agreed that they should meet on the debateable land and settle the title by single combat. Hotot on the day appointed was laid up with gout, and the heiress, rather than the land should be lost, donned his armour and encountered Ringsdale, whom she unhorsed. On being declared the victor she loosed her throat-latch, raised her helmet, and let down her hair about her shoulders, thus proclaiming her sex.

The crest of the Hamiltons is a tree with a saw through it, and their motto Through. The explanation is that Sir John Hamilton, grandson of the third Earl of Leicester, having killed John de Spencer, one of Edward II.'s favorites, was obliged to fly for his life. When on the point of being overtaken, he and his attendant changed clothes with two woodcutters, and were in the act of sawing through a tree when their pursuers came up. To steady his attendant, who was looking round in a manner to excite suspicion, Sir John called out Through.

The crest of the Stanleys, Earls of Derby, an eagle feeding an infant, is traced to an incident in the Latham family, from whom they acquired Knowsley. The legend is that a child, exposed by one of the Lathams, was thus wonderfully preserved. The device of the Leslies, "Grip Fast," was granted by Margaret, Queen of Scotland (wife of Malcolm Canmore), who, in crossing a flooded river, was thrown from her horse, and in imminent danger of being drowned, when Bartholamew Leslie seized her girdle and drew her to the bank. The crest of the Duvenports, of Cheshire, is "a man's head couped below the shoulders in profile, hair brown, a belter about his neck, proper." Mr. Lower's explanation is that one of them having been taken prisoner in the Wars of the Roses was spared on condition that he and his posterity would adopt this badge of humiliation. It is not the kind of stipulation that would be held binding on heirs, and in Ormerod's "History of Cheshire" the crest is said to have been assumed by one Vivian de Davenport, on being made grand sergeant, or principal thief-taker of the hundred of Macclesfield, in the thirteenth century."

The publication of Humboldt's correspondence with Varnhagen Von Euse, has given some interest to an otherwise uninteresting biography of Varnhagen. From this I quote here the following little story, not of Varnhagen, but of one of his friends, which shows how "good nature," that generally most useless quality, may sometimes serve its owner. Schlabendorf, the person spoken of, was a writer in Paris, a friend of the Girondists, and was put in prison during the frightful days of Robespierre:

"One morning the death-cart came for its usual number of daily victims; and Schlabendorf's name was called out. He immediately, with the greatest coolness and good-humor, prepared for departure; presence of mind in some shape, a grand stoicism or mere indifference, were common in those terrible times. And Schlabendorf was not the man to make an ungraceful departure when the unavoidable must of fate stood sternly before him. He was soon dressed, only his boots were missing; he sought, and sought, and sought, and the jailer sought with him in this corner and in that; but they were not to be found. "Well," said Schlabendorf sharply, "this is too bad; to be guillotined without my boots will never do. Hark ye, my good friend," continued he with simple good-humor to the jailer, "take me to-morrow; one day makes no difference; it is the men they want, not Tuesday or Wednesday." The jailer agreed. The wagon, full enough without that one head, went off to its destination; Schlabendorf remained in the prison. Next morning, at the usual hour, the vehicle returned; and the victim, who had so strangely escaped on the previous day, was ready, boots and all, waiting the word of command. But behold his name was not heard that day; nor the third day, nor the fourth, and not at all. There was no mystery in the matter. It was naturally supposed that he had fallen with the other victims named for the original day; in the multitude of sufferers no one could curiously inquire for an individual; for the days that followed there were enough of victims without him, and so he remained in prison till the fall of Robespierre, when, with so many others, he recovered his liberty. He owed this miraculous escape, not the least strange in the strange history of the Revolution, partly to the kindness of the jailer, partly and mainly to his good temper. He was a universal favorite in the jail."

It is not generally known that Hood, the great humorist, left behind other children than a son, who is trying, but vainly, to follow in his father's footsteps. But I see it announced that Messrs. Edward Moxon and Co., of London, have in the press, "Memorials of Thomas Hood," collected, arranged, and edited by his daughter; with a preface and notes by his son. In any circumstances, fresh memorials of the kindly humorist would deserve a welcome, and the welcome will be a double one, when the work is introduced under such auspices. I suppose, if the "memorials" prove sufficiently valuable, Messrs. Derby and Jackson will add the volume to their very well got up edition of Hood's works.

These publishers (Derby and Jackson) have in preparation several works of more than usual interest. They have now nearly ready Prof. J. G. Adler's translation of Raynaurd's "History of Provencal Poetry." Prof. Adler has added much to the interest of his work by offering several specimens of poetry in the dialect of the Troubadours, now disused as a written language. Also "Women of the South distinguished in Literature," with portraits on steel; a book something on the plan of "Griswold's Female Poets and Prose Writers," giving biographies and specimens of the writings of Southern ladies who have become eminent in literature. The work is by Mary Farrest, herself a distinguished Southern writer.

Messrs. John Eston Cooke, of Virginia, and John R. Thompson, the late editor of the Southern Literary Messenger, are preparing for the same publishers, a volume whose title, "the Poets and Poetry of the South," sufficiently explains its contents. Such an undertaking could not well have fallen into better hands. Both these gentlemen have themselves written poetry; they are men of true culture, and the volume, which is to be illustrated with several portraits on steel, will doubtless receive the welcome which it will deserve.

I saw the other day some pages of Mr. Stoddart's forthcoming volume, "The Loves and Heroines of the Poets," and judge that it will be an unusually fine volume. It will be embellished with portraits of heroines, authentic, whenever they can be procured, and some of them from curious and hidden sources. The poems chosen for selection and illustration will be such as were addressed by their authors to living women, and where that fact is not known, such as are addressed to "imaginary existences" of the fair sex.

The three great Italian poets—Petrarch, Dante and Tasso—open the volume, inasmuch as they, particularly Petrarch, seem to be the fathers of all modern love poetry. It will be full in English poetry, particularly that written in the time of Elizabeth, and Charles I. and II. The English poets begin with Chaucer and come down to those of the present day, including Scottish and American poets.

The greater poets will have notes prefixed to their specimens (which, by the way, will be arranged chronologically), illustrating in short space all that is known of their loves and heroines.

Among English announcements are, "The Upper and Lower Amoor," by Mr. Atkinson; "Chapters on Wives," by Mrs. Ellis; and a new work by Prof. Tulloch, upon English Puritanism and its Leaders, giving sketches of Cromwell, Milton, Baxter and Bunyan.

Messrs. Appleton and Co. announce "Origin and History of Language," by Wm. Farrar; "The Ironsides"—a tale of the English Commonwealth; Gilfillan's Alpha and Omega, or a series of Scripture Studies; Lyra Domestica; Trench's Sermons in Westminster Abbey; Winslow on Obscure Diseases of the Brain and Mind; Leslie's Personal Reminiscences, by Tom Taylor; Dundonald's Autobiography; Prof. Faraday's Lectures on Forces of Matter; Hockins' Hints on Photography.

I see that a New York publishing house has just announced that they are reprinting "the Kelleyn and O'Kelleys," a novel by the author of Dr. Thorne. They announce it as a new novel; and as this is one of the tricks of the trade which should be exposed, it is well to say here that the "Kelleys and O'Kelleys" is an old story, written and published in England some ten or twelve years ago, and thought worth a publisher's notice here at this time, only because some recent and more finished stories have brought the author into vogue. It is not fair to the reading public to awaken interest by announcing a book as new which was old a good many years ago.

Enough for this time.

***

Hebrew Christians.—A convention of Hebrew Christians, or converted Jews, was lately held in New York, when an association was formed with the title, "American Hebrew Christian Brotherhood." Its object is to propagate the Gospel among the Jews. It has already its own organ, The Israelite Indeed, published in New York, with nearly 1,000 subscribers. Among the converted Jews of this country, are found one United States Senator, about thirty Christian ministers, besides college professors, physicians, lawyers, and prominent merchants. The number of Jews in this country is computed at 150,000, and not 25,000, as has been erroneously stated. Some of their prominent Rabbis are of the opinion that they will number 1,000,000 five years hence.

Japanese Embassy to the Pope.—The present embassy to the United States bears no resemblance whatever to the visit of a number of the Japanese nobility to Pope Gregory XIII. in 1582. That was not an embassy at all; it was not accredited by the imperial government. The facts connected with the mission of the Japanese to the court of Rome are these: Three princes of the empire—Bungo, Arima and Omura—were baptized in the Roman Catholic faith, which they openly professed. Filled with zeal for the cause of religion, and reverence for the holy father, they sent some of their nearest relations with letters and presents to Gregory, to assure him of their submission to the Church, and of the rapid spread of Christianity in Japan.

A Western Confederacy.—According to the Washington correspondence of the Charleston Courier, Senator Latham declared in a speech in the Senate Monday 16th, and his declaration was confirmed by Senator Gwin, that California, in case of a dissolution of the Union, or a civil war in the Union, would maintain a strict neutrality, and would make the Sierra Nevada her Eastern boundary. He anticipated that wars of a devastating character and long duration would occur between the Northern and Southern States and perhaps wipe out some of them; and also heavy taxation to support armies and navies &c., from which California would be exempt.

A Wonderful History.—The mission of the American Baptist Union among the Karens in Burmah has a wonderful history. Only thirty years ago the first convert was baptized, and now the number of church-members is over fifteen thousand, and the natives under regular Christian instruction amount to more than 160,000. The station at Tounguo was commenced seven years ago, by a native preacher, and in two years there numbered in that place 2000 converts. Prosperity still attends it. Will the churches withhold funds, when God is thus pouring down his blessing?

Improving the English.—Except in a very few instances, where people wish to have some hand in editing the paper themselves, our plan of editing obituaries, as well as other communications, meets with general favor. We never run the pen across any of the essential facts; we only cut out unnecessary words. We sometimes change a good word for a bad one, but always expressing the same meaning, in better English. Those who complain would be astonished to know how popular this course is. We are glad of it. There must be one editor.—There is no telling the confusion, if Mr. Everybody should have a "finger in the pie."

The New York Independent, a professedly religious sheet, though greatly grieved at the failure of Mr. Seward to receive the Republican nomination, hoists the names of Lincoln and Hamlin as "nominations for freedom," over its editorial head.

LETTER FROM CHINA.

Ma. Editor: I did intend writing to you by last mail, but I did not for want of time. My health is still very good and also the health of the missionary brethren, with their families. We have every reason to believe that God is with us and smiling upon our efforts to advance the cause of Christ among this heathen people. Poor, unworthy creatures that we are, yet God is still our friend. He still cares for us, and is willing to forgive us all our sins. He, in infinite mercy, has shown to me the importance of living a holy life on earth; of living in entire obedience to his holy will, that my walk may be close with him; living by faith, being "hid with Christ in God," having Him as my only treasure, that there my heart may be, and that his will may be my law, having no desire to please myself in anything. And I pray that the Spirit of God may be to me what the chariot of fire was to Elijah, enabling me to travel daily to a throne of grace—a never failing fountain of joy and peace. O that a flame of sacred love may be kindled upon the altar of my heart, which shall never cease to burn and consume all the dross, elevating my desires from earth to heaven, fitting me more and more for sweet communion with God and for an eternal life in heaven. Take away the blessed influences of God's Spirit from our hearts, and immediately that holy love which we derived from it departs from us. "We become as the dry bones" around us; we do not live, but only exist, and fulfill no good purpose in life. Often do we complain of a want of joy and life in believing. But it is from a want of nearness to God. We do not come as often as we should to our great Physician. We neglect to go to the source of our joy. If we, at all times and under all circumstances, would follow the direction of the Holy Spirit, then we should have a bold access to a throne of grace. We should delight then in the presence of God, more than all our fleshly desires, and we would then feel, as did the Psalmist when he said in the fullness of his desire, "I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with thy likeness." We have numerous helps in this heavenly journey, for the presence of God is with the pilgrim. As Moses was comforted when he wished the Lord to show him the way in the wilderness, it was enough when told, "My presence shall be with thee." So may we, who seek a city whose builder and maker is God, rejoice that he who is that Spiritual Rock follows us through this wilderness—His service is delightful to the pilgrim. His fears are silenced when he beholds the comely form of his Savior. His desires are excited to more native labor to surmount the difficulties before him. When thus established in the faith, they appear not to him as difficulties, for they are no sooner met than overcame. By prayer he beholds his misery; seeing this his heart is humble, his faith is increased, and by it his soul is raised to behold the rest which awaits him. Oh that we could at all times keep our hearts engaged in this blessed and delightful work. Separated as we are from our brethren, we need their constant prayers, and now more than ever before.

The whole of this country is disturbed by civil war, famine and distress. It shakes to its very center; even the Emperor on his throne, who is at a loss to know what to do. I suppose the coming strife will be the last and fatal blow to him, which no doubt will rend the kingdom from his hand and destroy the present Tartar reign. The insurgents are still successful in many parts of the empire, and hold some of the richest provinces. Ten years has this war been carried on. The present Emperor has not seen one peaceful year. He is a young man, and of but little energy. The English and French have some of their forces here already, and are soon to proceed north. Some three or four of their ships are already north, and not far from the anticipated field of battle. Notwithstanding China is at war with foreign nations, we remain here without any disturbance, save the excitement of last July and August. Yet we know not what a day may bring forth. We pray that the Lord will overrule all these changes to his glory and to the salvation of the souls of this vast empire. The country is certainly in a great state of excitement, and out of which we will no doubt see great changes.

We may yet have trouble, and the native Christians will no doubt suffer persecution and sore trial for Christ's sake. But our trust is in God. He will care for those who daily cry to him, and will deliver them from all evil. My congregations are tolerably large, and I am happy to say there are some who manifest a desire to believe in Jesus, and accept of him as their Savior. They are evidently kept back in a great measure from acknowledging the Savior through fear. We cannot expect much else but fear to prevail among them, until peace is restored.

We have news from the Island of Madagascar, near the Cape of Good Hope. The native Christians there are suffering great persecution from the Roman Catholics, who have now taken possession of the Island by the force of arms, and are endeavoring to compel them to comply with their mode of worship. No Protestant missionary is now allowed to labor among them. They have all been banished from the Island, except one man who is pastor to the English Church in that place. But the Lord is blessing the work through the instrumentality of native pastors. Their numbers are increasing rapidly, and the Lord seems to be with them in their distressed condition. Being betrayed by one of the natives, they were surprised by French troops. When they discovered this, and that they could no longer defend themselves, they came forward in front of the French army, fell on their knees and offered up a short prayer to God for protection. They then laid down their arms in submission. God is blessing them wonderfully, and churches are being erected by the natives, though many of them have suffered martyrdom for it. All Christians are requested to pray for the persecuted Christians of Madagascar. Thursday evening, between the hours of seven and eight, is the time which has been appointed for special prayer for these persecuted followers of Christ. They have been persecuted for many years, but the work of God is so rapidly progressing among them, that we are led to hope their deliverance soon at hand. Let us pray for this. We see that God is able to work in a way we thought not of, and carries on this work without us. Praise be unto his holy name.

We are now having an unusual quantity of rain in Shanghai. The second week in January was the only week of good weather we have had this year. But we live in hope for a better day and fine weather. Such a time as this, it is about as much as we can do to get about in or through the mud.

I have not, my dear brother, received any of your papers for several months past. What the cause is I cannot imagine. I hope you apply to my father regularly for payment; do not hesitate a moment to do so. The Richmond Advocate comes to us regularly each mail. It is a great comfort to receive these papers. The Nashville Advocate comes occasionally, and that through the kindness of a very dear friend of mine and of the China Mission. I have as yet no news from my Conference, which met in November last. By this time I have always received some communication from them. I have seen notices of it in other papers, but none direct from my own Conference and beloved brethren. I pray the Lord to bless them and prosper them in their work. I am rejoiced to see so many young men coming in and connecting themselves with the Conference. May each be a valiant soldier in the field of battle is my earnest prayer to God. O that we may all be patient, believing and true followers of the Lord Jesus, single-eyed in all we do, then we shall see the salvation and victory of the Lord over the enemy. If we love and possess the Lord Jesus as our only treasure, we shall find in Him unspeakably more delight than in all the riches and fading glory of earth's wealthiest and most powerful monarch. What is all else worth when compared to our blessed Saviour? They are as the trifles of a day. Jesus is the Christian's all. We begin our race with him and we end it in him. He is our Captain, and directs in this race, and He crowns us when the race is ended. If Jesus is ours, we can cheerful live and cheerful die. May God help us to deny all for His sake who denied all for us. I fear sometimes I am not self-sacrificing enough. Pray for me, dear brother, that God may give me grace and fa

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

JUNE 6, 1860.

REFLECTIONS UPON THE DEATH OF DR. B. M. DRAKE.

"It is three score years
Sat lightly on him—for his heart was glad,
Even to the latest pulse, with that blest love,
Home-nurtured, and reciprocal, which girds
And garners up, in sorrow and in joy."

Mournful indeed was the intelligence which lately announced the sudden death of this great and good man! His memory is precious and imperishable, enshrined in the heart's inward sanctuary of all those who knew him. His virtues and piety have left a hallowed influence in his pathway, with that mellow and subdued light which blends in harmony with moral and intellectual beauty. We knew him well; and enjoyed the privilege of his early friendship, which has continued unchanged for nearly thirty years. And for a period of time we shared the social intercourse of the hearth and home of his most amiable and interesting family, while he acted as Principal, and myself as Governess, of that once flourishing institution, Elizabeth Female Academy, Washington, Miss., where our acquaintance first commenced. Circumstances like those were well calculated to develop the graces of his lovely character, and unfold the delicacy of its shades in every variety of aspect; and if ever the mellowing influence of the gospel of our Savior produced a beautiful consistency in the character of man, it was seen to shine pre-eminently in that of Dr. Drake. True benevolence and kindness of heart were conspicuous in all the acts of his private as well as public life. He never lessened the dignity of the pulpit by a change of character when out of it. He was a Christian gentleman, with that refined courtesy of manners which rendered his society agreeable to all. The element in which he lived was above the sordid motives of this world, and the centralizing power of his genial spirit was seen to culminate with increasing happiness around those who breathed the same atmosphere with himself.—He was never known to wound intentionally the feelings of those with whom he associated; either in word or action. His reproofs to the erring were always mingled with each gentleness and sweetness of language, that no one could take offence. The soft mantle of charity was thrown with kindness over the tallings of all.

The young were the objects of his most tender solicitude and care, over whom he watched with parental feelings of the most refined sensibility, always with an eye to their immortal happiness, which was ever present with his affectionate heart and heavenly mind. Long will the pupils of that school, who may now be living, cherish his memory with the most interesting associations of their lives. It will lie garnered up in the store-house of thought, tinged with the fadeless hues of immortal beauty.

We prosecuted our mutual labors in the education of youth without a discordant note or a jarring string. While we were engaged in that noble cause, we were blessed with a gracious revival of religion; the recollection of which is still fresh, with all its interesting and holy associations clustering around it. Our altars of prayer were crowded with lovely penitents, of intelligence and youthful beauty, calculated to call forth the heart's most tender sympathies, and inspire our liveliest hopes for the rising generation, where were

"Scattered diligently in susceptible minds
The germ of the good, and the beautiful!
They will develope there the trees, to bud and bloom,
And bear the golden fruit of Paradise."

Many of the young ladies received the principles of divine truth, with the unction of the Holy Spirit, and have still maintained as matrons of families the high position of Christian ladies of no ordinary character, to the present day. Others have entered the portals of Heaven, to rejoice through vast eternity that within those old Academ ic walls the germ of immortality began to bud. The last interview we had with our sainted friend, was at Judge Merrick's residence in New Orleans, one year ago—a season never to be forgotten. Little did we then think it was the last that we ever should enjoy upon earth. We had often dwelt upon those refreshing seasons with the most grateful emotions, when blessed by the divine presence and over-shadowed by the glorious Shekinah, and rounded up the number of pupils under our charge who had been brought into the fold of Christ—and how many had gone away to holy triumph to the spirit land, where we expected ere long to meet them. But our salated friend has gone first, and that noble, placid brow is now crowned with a diadem of immortal beauty, reflecting the radiance of the Son of God, whose cross he bore with undaunted courage while here on earth, to be suddenly exchanged for a crown of glory. That eye which always shone upon us with benign, spiritual intelligence, is now closed for ever! That tongue is mute; those lips are sealed, and we shall listen to his sublime and truthful eloquence in the sanctuary of God no more! But he has passed through the pearly gates into that glorious city above, to gaze upon the beatific vision of the adorable Triality; to join in the rapturous song of the redeemed, forever. He has met a group of cherubs from his own household, who preceded him, whom we once knew only to love, and those friends with whom he took sweet counsel while here on earth, and those pupils of blessed memory. The Church mourns; and his friends mourn; and with the widow and fatherless we mingle our tears in silence, that we shall see on earth his face no more!

S. B. THOMAS.

New England, May 24th 1860.

TO THE CLASS OF THE 2ND YEAR, ALA. CONF.

Several inquiries having been addressed to me in reference to the new course of study, it may be proper to state that the Committee will expect the class to prepare themselves for examination as follows:

On the Institutions of Christianity, read the fourth part of Watson's Institutes, and the Bible; and refer to Watson's Dictionary.

On Discipline—the Discipline; reference, Henkle's Analysis.

On Doctrines—Smith's Elements of Divinity, and Wesley's Sermons, vol. ii, in connection with the Bible.

On Biography—Watson's Life of Wesley.

On the Hymn Book, with reference to the theology of the hymns. The hymn book is, we are told in the preface, our poetical liturgy; the theology of that liturgy on the cardinal doctrines of Christianity we expect the class to understand. We shall require them to give hymns which teach the doctrine of depravity, justification by faith, &c.

The Institutions of Christianity are the Church and the Sacraments.

The Essay or Sermon, to be written as perfect as possible; to aid them in this matter, Quackenbos' Advanced Course of Composition and Rhetoric is recommended.—The class will not be examined on Rhetoric in general, as this belongs to the third year's study.

W. P. HARRISON, Chairman.

Auburn, May 23, 1860.

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

YAZOO DISTRICT.—Rev. D. M. Wiggins writes: Of the following the first column is the assessment for the Presiding Elder, the second for the Superannuated Preachers, widows, orphans, and to make up deficiencies of traveling preachers; Yazoo District, Mississippi Conference, at a District Stewards' Meeting, held at Richland, May 12th, 1860:

Yazoo City,	$100	$50
Mount Olivet,	130	82
Yazoo Circuit,	125	80
Ebenezer Circuit,	125	80
Lexington and Richland,	125	80
Holmes Circuit,	125	80
Blackhawk Circuit,	150	95
Siden Mission,	40	33
Greenwood,	40	33
Carrollton,	150	90

PLEASANT VALLEY.—Rev. H. P. Lewis writes: At a three days' meeting at Pleasant Valley, on Pearl River, our new Methodist Church was dedicated to the service of Almighty God. Dedicatory sermon on Sunday by Rev. Stephen Ellis, of Franklinton, La. Brother Young was with us during the meeting, and labored successfully. There was a good feeling in the congregation. The altar, at times, was crowded with mourners. Six joined the Church on probation.

